An Encyclopedia of Religion

Edited By

VERGILIUS FERM

Compton Professor and Head of the Department of Philosophy in The College of Wooster

THE PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY

NEW YORK

EDITOR'S PREFACE

When, more than three years ago, it was suggested that I undertake the editorship of an Encyclopedia of Religion, I had no idea of the immensity of the task or of the complications involved in its execution. The idea, however, seemed good to me, especially in view of the fact that there was no desk-size ready reference work in this vast field, authoritative and up-to-date, to which one could conveniently turn. Dean Shailer Mathews' and Dr. Gerald Birney Smith's Dictionary of Religion and Ethics, published nearly a quarter of a century ago, many of us have found valuable and useful; but the time did seem right for a new work, with more recent scholarly information and one which, perhaps, would carry articles of wider scope and treatment, more recent bibliographies and, perhaps, more representative of conflicting schools of thought.

It was clear, at the outset, that the services of a large number of specialists must be sought and their counsel enlisted, if such a work was to measure up to satisfying requirements.

The first task was to draw up a prospectus to make clear the nature of the volume sought and, on this basis, to engage the interest of others. Among the items contained in this prospectus were the following: 1) a concise definition to be given terms of importance and topics of primary significance in the field to be treated with more fullness; 2) the size of the volume to be limited to that of a handy desk-reference; 3) the topics to include the widest ranges of the field: the theologies of the major religions, denominations and cults with special attention to Biblical literature and Christian theology, ecclesiastical history and polity, the usual divisions of cultural and academic interests as these relate to religion, viz., philosophy, psychology, ethics, sociology, history, comparative religion, art and architecture, musicology and liturgy, important controversial disputes, missionary enterprises, religious education, and the like, together with the masters and leaders of classical religious thought; 4) the composition to be guided by three ideals of writing: authority, simplicity and succinctness; 5) the treatment of subject matter to be historical and descriptive rather than apologetic; 6) variant meanings and usages of terms to be given wherever necessary, together with etymologies of the more technical terms; 7) articles to carry an appended bibliography carefully selected by the expert in the subject with year dates of publications; 8) the identification of each contribution to be designated by authors' initials; 9) suggestions of whatever sort to be solicited from specialists both as to the selection of topics and the names of fellow-scholars as contributors; and 10) the encyclopedia to be constructed in a manner which would be most useful to both scholars and students and, at the same time, intelligible to cultured laymen. To this was added a pledge by the editor to work out somewhat generously a system of cross-references to facilitate the reader's search for specific information and to lead him on to related topics which appear in the work. (The editor alone is responsible for the insertion of these references.)

The correspondence involved in the undertaking has proved to be of such proportions as to make the size of this volume small by comparison. It has, however, been a most rewarding experience. The editor has been privileged to sit at a kind of switchboard and to bring into contact with one another scores of minds and the results of disciplined scholarship. What otherwise might have been an altogether wearisome burden has been turned to an almost exciting experience by the warm response which was so widely and generously given to this undertaking by those who have shared in it. One conviction has emerged: in the commonwealth of scholarship there is a spirit which unites rather than divides and it is in this altogether too esoteric company that one sees the concrete expression of that ideal of unity-in-diversity which ought increasingly to undergird all validly religious thinking and practice.   .

In this volume, there is a truly cooperative effort on the part of men and women of the widest ranges of background, of interests and even commitments. Here the conservative student in the calm irenic spirit of mind exhibits himself, his cause and his exposition alongside the liberal who matches that spirit; here meet Protestant and Roman Catholic men of learning together with scholarly representatives of the various households of Jewish thought and practice; here meet disciplined expositors of the many denominations to summarize the story of their churches and to present their doctrines; here meet historians, students of Biblical criticism, sociologists, psychologists, philosophers, theologians, and an array of other specialists.

Naturally, in such a wide domain as the field of religion, many limitations had to be set. For example, it seemed best, in drawing the circle of exclusion, to pass by the names of strictly contemporary religious thinkers, making exceptions only in certain cases and particularly in the names of foreign scholars.

This prefatory word should include some further summary statements of editorial policy:

As a general rule, the place of publication of books appearing in the bibliographies is given only for foreign books. In the absence of such designation, it may be assumed that the publication has appeared in this country. It has seemed advisable to print foreign words in transliteration for the purposes of this volume.

After some correspondence with the contributors concerned, it was agreed, in principle, to omit diacritical markings except in relatively few cases since there is a considerable lack of agreement among scholars as to their use and since, in most cases, the terms are recognizable without such markings. Furthermore, inasmuch as many of the terms defined are of foreign derivation and since, due to the different systems of transliteration in use among scholars, there exist in common usage variant spellings of certain terms, it seemed best to list a given word in its proper alphabetical order according to each of the various spellings with a cross-reference to its place of definition. Professors Charles S. Braden and Wing-tsit Chan, who have defined the large list of Hindu and Chinese-Buddhist terms, respectively, have agreed to this procedure. That diacritical marks, however, do occur here and there in this publication, in spite of this general principle, due chiefly to their persisting appearance in submitted manuscripts and the lack of editorial vigilance, need not be cause of concern.

The star (*) and double stars (), it will be clear to the reader, are employed as symbols of cross-reference (taking the place of q.v. and qq.v. which are usually found in many corresponding works of reference). The double star, of course, indicates that more than one stated term is discussed elsewhere in the volume. In highly exceptional cases, the star appears either as reference to a footnote of an article or for a purpose which is clearly indicated.

The articles bearing the initials of contributors of the Roman Catholic church carry the imprimatur of their religious superiors.

It needs to be emphasized that a work of such a nature and scope could never have been carried out without the direct help and sympathetic collaboration of many scholars. In every sense of the word, this is a cooperative enterprise. The editor expresses his warm appreciation to the one hundred and ninety colleagues who have so generously shared in its publication. Many of them have contributed more than a score of articles and given themselves generously in correspondence. To Professor Edgar Sheffield Brightman, I owe a word of special thanks for his counsel in editorial matters, as well as for his encouraging help in the more difficult days of preparation. To Dr. Dagobert D. Runes, president of the Philosophical Library of New York, I am greatly indebted. Without his unfailing support, encouragement and patience, particularly in these difficult days, this work would not have seen the light of day. I remember with gratefulness the help given me by a certain group of my students of the Philosophy Department at The College of Wooster, whose names are known among ourselves, and who, I am sure, share my joy in the completion of a task involving so many details of execution.

Vergilius Ferm

The College of Wooster Wooster, Ohio

KEY TO CONTRIBUTORS' INITIALS

A.C.	Allen Cabaniss	E.T.C.	Elmer T. Clark
A.C.K.	Albert C. Knudson	E.T.R.	Edward T. Ramsdell
A.C.M.	Arthur Cushman McGiffert	E.W.K.	Ethyn W. Kirby
A.E.H.	A. Eustace Haydon
A.E.W.	Arthur Evans Wood	F.A.L.	Felix A. Levy
A.H.S.	Abba Hillel Silver	F.C.G.	Frederick Clifton Grant
A.K.R.	Andrew K. Rule	F.C.S.	Francis Carr Stifler
A.P.W.	Allen P. Wikgren	F.E.	Fred Eastman
A.S.	Anne Seesholtz	F.G.E.	Francis Gerald Ensley
A.T.B.	Anton T. Boisen	F.J.B.	Frank J. Bruno
		F.L.P.	Fred L. Parrish
B.C.	Boaz Cohen	F.R.W.	F. R. Webber
B.E.M.	Benjamin Elijah Mays	F.T.P.	Frederick T. Persons
B.R.	Bertin Roll	F.W.B.	Francis William Buckler
B.S.	Brice Schratz	F.W.N.	Fred W. Neal
B.S.E.	Burton Scott Easton
B.Z.B.	Ben Zion Bokser	G.E.W.	G. Ernest Wright
		G.E.Z.	George Elias Zachariades
C.E.S.	Charles Edward Smith	G.G.A.	Gaius Glenn Atkins
C.H.	Charles Hartshorne	G.M.	Gardner Murphy
C.H.M.	Conrad Henry Moehlman	G.P.A.	Gaylord P. Albaugh
C.J.B.	Conrad J. Bergendoff	G.R.C.	Gerald R. Cragg
C.P.S.	Clarence Prouty Shedd	G.S.S.	George S. Stevenson
C.R.	Christopher Rengers
C.R.S.	Clarence R. Skinner	H.C.	Howard Comfort
C.S.B.	Charles S. Braden	H.E.J.	Howard E. Jensen
C.S.E.	Clayton S. Ellsworth	H.G.R.	Henry G. Russell
C.T.C.	Clarence Tucker Craig	H.H.	Herman Hausheer
C.V.	Cyril Vollert	H.Hfk.	Hanna Hafkesbrink
C.W.L.	Charles W. Lowry	H.H.N.	Harold H. Nelson
		H.K.	Herman Kieval
D.C.H.	D. C. Holtom	H.N.W.	Henry Nelson Wieman
D.C.O'G.	Daniel C. O'Grady	H.R.M.	Harriet R. Mowrer
D.D.W.	Daniel Day Williams	H.R.N.	H. Richard Niebuhr
D.F.E.	Donald Fossett Ebright	H.R.W.	Harold R. Willoughby
D.S.M.	David S. Muzzey	H.W.J.	Hjalmar W. Johnson
D.S.P.	D. de Sola Pool
D.U.	Dominic Unger	J.A.C.	James A. Corbett
D.V.S.	Douglas V. Steere	J.A.M.	John A. Mackay
		J.B.C.	Joseph B. Code
E.A.R.	Edward A. Ryan	J.C.M.	John Courtney Murray
E.B.	Ephraim Bennett	J.E.N.	Jannette E. Newhall
E.C.C.	Ernest Cadman Colwell	J.F.T.	Joseph F. Thorning
E.C.K.	Elmer C. Kiessling	J.J.F.	John J. FitzGerald
E.C.R.	Edith C. Rodgers	J.L.	John Line
Edn.H.	Edna Heidbreder	J.L.C.	John L. Cheek
E.D.S.	Edwin Diller Starbuck	J.M.	Julian Morgenstern
E.D.Sn.	Edward Douglas Snyder	J.M.M.G.	Joseph M. M. Gray
E.E.E.	Earle Edward Eubank	J.P.H.	J. Philip Hyatt
E.F.S.	Ernest Findlay Scott	J.S.B.	Julius Seelye Bixler
E.G.H.	Eric G. Hawkinson	J.T.M.	John Thomas McNeill
E.G.K.	Emil G. Kraeling	J.W.B.	John Wright Buckham
E.H.	Edward Heimann
E.H.B.	Edward Hall Broadhead	K.E.G.	Katharine E. Gilbert
E.J.G.	Edgar J. Goodspeed	K.H.C.	Kenneth H. Cousland
E.M.N.	Eva May Newnan
E.M.W.	Earl M. Wilbur	L.A.W.	Luther Allan Weigle
E.P.B.	Edwin P. Booth	L.F.	Louis Finkelstein
E.R.H.	Edward Rochie Hardy	L.H.DeW.	L. Harold DeWolf
E.R.M.	Ernest R. Mowrer	L.J.S.	Lewis J. Sherrill
E.S.B.	Edgar Sheffield Brightman	L.L.	Louis Lipsky
		L.R.W.	Leo R. Ward
		L.W.C.	Lowell W. Coolidge

———◆———

ALBAUGH, GAYLORD P., B.D.

Lecturer in Church History, School of Theology, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada.

ALBRIGHT, R. W., B.D., M.A., Th.D.

Professor of Church History, The Evangelical School of Theology, Reading, Pa, also Professor of Church History in Temple University, Philadelphia, Pa

ATKINS, GAIUS GLENN, LL.B., Litt.D., D.D., L.H.D.

Formerly, Hoyt Professor of Homiletics and Sociology, Auburn Theological Seminary, Professor Emeritus. North Marshfield, Mass

BAINTON, ROLAND H., B.D., Ph.D.

Titus Street Professor of Ecclesiastical History, The Divinity School, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

BEAHM, WILLIAM M., Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of Christian Theology and Missions, Bethany Biblical Seminary, Chicago, Ill.

BENNETT, EPHRAIM, B.A.

Rabbi at Beth El Synagogue, Cedarhurst, Long Island, N Y.

BERGENDOFF, CONRAD J., M.A., B.D., Ph.D., Th.D.

President of Augustana College and Theological Seminary, Rock Island, Ill.

BERTOCCI, PETER A., M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Philosophy and Psychology, Bates College, Lewiston, Maine.

BIGHAM, THOMAS J. Jr., S.T.B.

Fellow and Tutor of the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, New York City.

BIXLER, JULIUS SEELYE, M.A., Ph.D., D.D.

Recently, Bussey Professor of Theology, Harvard University; now President of Colby College, Waterville, Maine.

BLANK, SHELDON H., Ph.D.

Professor in the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, Ohio.

BOISEN, ANTON T., M.F., M.A., D.D.

Chaplain in the Elgin State Hospital, Elgin, Ill.

BOKSER, BEN ZION, M.A., Ph.D.

Rabbi at the Forest Hills Jewish Center, Forest Hills, New York and Lecturer at the Institute of Religious Studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary

BOOTH, EDWIN PRINCE, S.T.B., Ph.D., D.D.

Formerly, Professor of Historical Theology and now Professor of New Testament, Boston University School of Theology, Boston, Mass

BOURKE, VERNON J., M.A., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Philosophy, St. Louis University, St. Louis, Mo.

BRADEN, CHARLES S., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor and Chairman of the Department of History and Literature of Religions, Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill.

BRANDT, RICHARD B., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Philosophy, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pa.

BREEN, QUIRINUS, Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of History in the University of Oregon, Eugene, Oregon.

BRIGHTMAN, EDGAR SHEFFIELD, M.A., S.T.B., Ph.D., Litt.D., LL.D.

Borden Parker Bowne Professor of Philosophy in The Graduate School, Boston University, Boston, Mass.

BROADHEAD, EDWARD HALL, M.A., M.Mus.

Organist and Instructor in Music in Duke University, Durham, N. C.

BRUNO, FRANK J., S.T.B.

Professor of Applied Sociology and Chairman of the Department of Social Work, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.

BUCKHAM, JOHN WRIGHT, D.D.

Professor Emeritus of Christian Theology, Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, Cal.

BUCKLER, FRANCIS WILLIAM, M.A., S.T.D.

Michigan Professor of Church History, The Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio

BURGESS, S.A., B.A., LL.B.

Formerly President of Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa, Church Historian, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints

CABANISS, ALLEN, B.D., Ph.D.

Minister, Presbyterian Church, Columbia, Miss., Historian, Grand Lodge of Mississippi, F. and A. M.

CASE, SHIRLEY JACKSON, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., D.D., D.C.L.

Dean of the Florida School of Religion, Lakeland, Fla., Dean Emeritus, The Divinity School, The University of Chicago.

CASSADY, MAYNARD L., Th.B., M.A., Ph.D.

Principal Civilian Mobilization Adviser, Office of Civilian Defense, Washington, D. C. and recently Chairman, Department of Religion, University of Rochester, Rochester, N. Y.

CATLIN, WARREN B., Ph.D.

Fayerweather Professor of Economics and Sociology and Chairman of the Department, Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine.

CHAN WING-TSIT, M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of Chinese Culture, Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., Formerly, Professor of Chinese Philosophy and Institutions, Oriental Institute, University of Hawaii, Honolulu, T. H.

CHEEK, JOHN L., M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

Minister in the Brookfield Methodist Church, Brookfield, Ill.

CLARK, ELMER T., M.A., B.D., S.T.D., LL.D., Litt.D.

Editorial Secretary of the Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church; Editor of the World Outlook, New York City.

CODE, JOSEPH B., S.T.D., Sc.Hist.D.

Director of the Inter-American Institute, Kansas City, Mo.

COHEN, BOAZ, Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Rabbinics and Assistant Librarian in the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, New York City; Chairman of the Committee on Jewish Law of the Rabbinical Assembly.

COHON, SAMUEL S., D.D.

Professor of Jewish Theology, Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, Ohio.

COLWELL, ERNEST CADMAN, B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of New Testament Literature, Chairman of the Department of Early Christian Literature, Dean of the Divinity School and Dean of the Faculties, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill

COMFORT, HOWARD, M.A., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Ancient Languages, Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.

COMFORT, WILLIAM W., M.A., Ph.D., Litt.D., LL.D.

President Emeritus of Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.

CONRAD, SIMON.

Capuchin College, Washington, D. C.

COOLIDGE, LOWELL W., M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of English, The College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio.

CORBETT, JAMES A., Arch.Pal., Ecole Nationale des Chartres, Paris.

Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind.

COUSLAND, KENNETH H., M.A., B.D., D.D.

Professor of Church History in Emmanuel Theological College, Victoria University, Toronto, Canada.

CRAGG, GERALD R., M.A.

Professor of Systematic Theology and Lecturer in Christian Ethics, United Theological College, Montreal, Canada.

CRAIG, CLARENCE TUCKER, Ph.D., S.T.B., D.D.

Morgan Professor of New Testament Language and Literature in The Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio.

CROSS, TOM PEETE, Ph.D., Litt.D.

Professor of English and Comparative Literature, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

DAVIDSON, RICHARD, M.A., Ph.D., D.D.

Late Principal and Professor of Old Testament in Emmanuel College, Toronto, Canada.

DeWOLF, L. HAROLD, S.T.B., Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy, Boston University, Boston, Mass.

DRAKE, THOMAS E., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of History and Curator of the Quaker Collection at Haverford College, Haverford, Pa

EASTMAN, FRED, Litt.D.

Professor of Biography, Literature and Drama in The Chicago Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill

EASTON, BURTON SCOTT, Ph.D., B.D., Th.D., D.D.

Professor of the Literature and Interpretation of the New Testament, General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, New York City.

EBRIGHT, DONALD FOSSETT, B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Fellow, The Divinity School, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

EDDY, SHERWOOD, M.A., LL.D.

Author, Lecturer and World Traveler, New York City.

ELLSWORTH, CLAYTON S., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of History, The College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio.

ENSLEY, FRANCIS GERALD, S.T.B., Ph.D.

Instructor in Homiletics and Professor-elect of Systematic Theology in Boston University School of Theology, Boston, Mass.

ENSLIN, MORTON SCOTT, B.D., Th.D.

Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis in Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Pa.; Lecturer on Patristics, University of Pennsylvania, Editor, Crozer Quarterly.

EUBANK, EARLE EDWARD, M.A., Ph.D.

Professor and Head of the Department of Sociology, University of Cincinnati, Cincinnati, Ohio.

FERM, VERGILIUS, B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Compton Professor and Head of the Department of Philosophy, The College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio.

FINKELSTEIN, LOUIS, Ph.D.

President and Solomon Schechter Professor of Theology in the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, New York City.

FITZGERALD, JOHN J., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Philosophy, The University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.

FRANK, ROBERT WORTH, M.A., B.D., D.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy of Religion and Ethics in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.

GARRISON, WINFRED ERNEST, B.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.

Professor of Church History, Disciples' Divinity House and The University of Chicago, Literary Editor, The Christian Century

GILBERT, MRS. KATHARINE E., M.A., Ph.D.

Chairman, Department of Aesthetics, Art and Music, Duke University, Durham, N C.

GILMOUR, SAMUEL MACLEAN, B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis in Queen's Theological College, Kingston, Ontario, Canada.

GLUECK, NELSON, B.H., Ph.D., LL.D.

Professor of Bible and Biblical Archaeology in Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, Ohio.

GOODSPEED, EDGAR J., B.D., Ph.D., D.D., L.H.D., Doc.Litt.

Distinguished Service Professor Emeritus of Biblical and Patristic Greek, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

GRANT, FREDERICK CLIFTON, B.D., S.T.M., Th.D., D.S. Litt., D.D.

Edward Robinson Professor of Biblical Theology, Union Theological Seminary, New York City

GRAY, JOSEPH M.M., B.D., D.D., Litt.D., S.T.D.

Formerly, President of American University, Washington, D. C., now Minister of the Bexley Methodist Church, Columbus, Ohio.

GREENBERG, SIMON, Ph.D.

Rabbi, Har Zion Temple, Philadelphia, Pa.; Associate Professor in the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

HADAS, MOSES, M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Greek and Latin in Columbia University, New York City.

HAFKESBRINK, HANNA, Ph.D.

Professor of German and Chairman of the German Department, Connecticut College, New London, Conn.

HANNIN, WERNER.

Capuchin College, Washington, D. C

HARDY, Jr., EDWARD ROCHIE, S.T.M., Ph.D.

Instructor in the Department of Hebrew, Fellow and Tutor, in the Departments of New Testament, Ecclesiastical History, Theology and Liturgics in the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, New York City.

HARKNESS, R. E. E., M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of the History of Christianity, Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Pa.; President of the American Baptist Historical Society.

HARRIS, WILLIAM GLENN, M.A., M. Th., Ph.D.

Minister in the First Presbyterian Church, Birmingham, Mich.

HARTSHORNE, CHARLES, M.A., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Philosophy, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

HAUSHEER, HERMAN, B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Late Retired Professor, Lamoni, Iowa.

HAWKINSON, ERIC G., Ph.B., M.A.

Instructor in Church History and Homiletics in the Seminary of the Evangelical Mission Covenant of America, North Park College, Chicago, Ill.

HAYDON, A. EUSTACE, B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of the History of Religions; Chairman of the Department of Comparative Religion, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

HEIDBREDER, EDNA, M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of Psychology and Chairman of the Department of Psychology, Wellesley College, Wellesley, Mass.

HEIMANN, EDWARD, Ph.D.

Professor in the Graduate School of the New School for Social Research, New York City.

HELSEL, PAUL R., M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Philosophy in The University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Cal.

HERMAN, THEODORE F., D.D., LL.D.

President and Professor of Systematic Theology in the Seminary of the Evangelical and Reformed Church, Lancaster, Pa.

HOPPER, VINCENT F., M.A., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Literature, New York University, New York City.

HOLTOM, DANIEL CLARENCE, B.D., Ph.D., D.D.

Recently, Professor in the Theology Department, Aoyama Gakuin, Tokyo and· Dean of the Theology Department, Kanto Gakuin, Yokohama, now in residence at San Gabriel, Cal.

HORTON, WALTER M., Ph.D., S.T.M.

Fairchild Professor of Theology, Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio.

HUBER, Very Rev., RAPHAEL M., O.F. M.Conv., S.T.D., S.T.M.

Associate Professor of Church History, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.

HUDSON, WINTHROP S., B.D., Ph.D.

Formerly, Instructor in the History of Christianity, Colgate - Rochester Divinity School, Rochester, N. Y., now Assistant Professor of History of Christianity in the British Isles, Federated Theological Faculty, University of Chicago.

HYATT, J. PHILIP, M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature in the Vanderbilt University School of Religion, Nashville, Tenn.

JACOBSEN, THORKILD, M.A., Ph.D., Dr. Phil.

Research Associate in the Oriental Institute, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

JENSEN, HOWARD E., M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Sociology and Chairman of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology in Duke University, Durham, N. C.

JOHNSON, HJALMAR W., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy, Augustana Theological Seminary, Rock Island, Ill.

JOHNSON, PAUL E., M.A., S.T.B., Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of the Psychology and History of Religion in Boston University School of Theology, Boston, Mass.

JONES, RUFUS M., M.A., LL.D., D.D., Litt.D., D.Th., S.T.D.

Emeritus Professor of Philosophy, Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.

KANTONEN, T(aito) ALMAR, S.T.B., M.A., Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of Systematic Theology in the Hamma Divinity School, Wittenberg College, Springfield, Ohio.

KIESSLING, ELMER C., Ph.D.

Professor of English at Northwestern College, Watertown, Wis.

KIEVAL, HERMAN, B.A.

Rabbi at Beth Judah Synagogue, Ventnor, N. J

KIRBY, MRS. ETHYN W., Ph.D.

Formerly, Assistant Professor of History in Wells College, now in residence, Providence, R. I.

KNAPPEN, M.M., Ph.D.

Professor and Head of the Department of History and Political Science, Michigan State College, East Lansing, Mich.

KNUDSON, ALBERT C., Ph.D., Theol.D., D.D., LL.D.

Dean Emeritus, Boston University School of Theology, Boston, Mass.

KRAELING, EMIL G., Ph.D.

Formerly, Assistant Professor in the Department of Old Testament in Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

KRONER, RICHARD, Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy in McGill University, Montreal, Canada, visiting Lecturer in the Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

LEE, UMPHREY, M.A., D.D., Ph.D., LL. D., Litt.D.

President of Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Texas

LEVY, FELIX A., Ph.D., D.D.

Ex-President of Central Conference of American Rabbis, Rabbi in Emanuel Congregation, Chicago, Ill.

LINE, JOHN, M.A., S.T.D., D.D.

Professor of Philosophy of Religion and Systematic Theology, Emmanuel College, Toronto, Canada.

LIPSKY, LOUIS.

Vice-president of the Zionist Organization of America; American member of the Executive of the Jewish Agency for Palestine; formerly, Editor of The New Palestine.

LOWRY, Jr., CHARLES W., M.A., B.D., D.Phil.

Professor of Systematic Divinity, The Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MACKAY, JOHN A., M.A., B.D., D.D., Litt.D., LL.D.

Professor of Ecumenics and President of Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J

MAYS, BENJAMIN ELIJAH, M.A., Ph.D.

Formerly, Dean of the School of Religion at Howard University, Washington, D C; now President of Morehouse College, Atlanta, Ga.

McAVOY, THOMAS T., Ph.D.

Archivist of the University of Notre Dame Archives (formerly the Catholic Archives of America), Head of the Department of History, Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind

McGIFFERT, Jr., ARTHUR CUSHMAN, B.D., M.A., D.D.

President of the Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, Cal.

McNEILL, JOHN THOMAS, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., D.D.

Formerly, Professor of the History of European Christianity, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill., now Auburn Professor of Church History, Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

MEAD, SIDNEY E., M.A., Ph.D.

Gerald Birney Smith Instructor in Divinity, The Divinity School, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

MOEHLMAN, CONRAD HENRY, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., D.D.

James B. Colgate Professor of the History of Christianity, The Colgate-Rochester Divinity School, Rochester, N. Y.

MOORE, PHILIP S., Ph.D., Arch. Pal. Ecole Nationale des Chartres, Paris.

Associate Professor of Mediaeval Studies, The University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.; Editor of Publications in Mediaeval Studies.

MORGENSTERN, JULIAN, Ph.D., D.H. L., L.H.D.

President of the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, Ohio.

MORRISON, PAUL G., M.A., Ph.D.

Curator, Rare Book Room, The University of Chicago Libraries, Chicago, Ill.

MOWRER, ERNEST R., Ph.D.

Professor of Sociology, Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill.

SNYDER, EDWARD DOUGLAS, M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of English, Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.

SPIEGEL, SHALOM, Ph.D.

Professor of Hebrew Language and Literature in the Jewish Institute of Religion, New York City.

SPINKA, MATTHEW, Ph.D.

Waldo Professor of Medieval, Reformation and Modern Church History, The Hartford Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn.

SPRENGLING, MARTIN, Ph.D.

Professor of Arabic, The Department of Oriental Languages and Literatures in the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

STARBUCK, EDWIN DILLER, M.A., Ph.D.

Formerly, Professor of Philosophy and Director of Character Research and now Professor of Psychology, The University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Cal.

STEERE, DOUGLAS V., M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy, Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.

STEVENSON, GEORGE S., M.D.

Medical Director, The National Committee for Mental Hygiene, New York City.

STIFLER, FRANCIS CARR, M.A., D.D.

Editorial and Recording Secretary, American Bible Society, New York City.

SWEET, WILLIAM W., B.D., M.A., Th.M., Ph.D., D.D., Litt.D.

Professor of the History of American Christianity, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

TERRIEN, SAMUEL L., S.T.M., Th.D.

Instructor in Hebrew and the Old Testament, Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

THORNING, JOSEPH F., M.A., Ph.D., S.T.D.

Professor of Ethics and Sociology in Mount St. Mary's Seminary and College, Emmitsburg, Md.

TORNAY, STEPHEN C., S.T.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Instructor in Philosophy and the Classics, University of Utah, Salt Lake City, Utah.

UNGER, DOMINIC, O.F.M. Cap.

Professor of Sacred Scripture and Liturgy, Capuchin College, Washington, D. C.

VIETH, PAUL H., B.D., Ph.D.

Horace Bushnell Professor of Christian Nurture in the Divinity School, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

VOLLERT, CYRIL, Ph.D., S.T.D.

Dean of St. Mary's College, St. Marys, Kansas, the School of Divinity of St. Louis University.

WARD, LEO R., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Philosophy, The University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.

WEBBER, F. R.

Editor, Lutheran Church Art, New York City.

WEIGLE, LUTHER ALLAN, M.A., Ph.D., D.D., Litt.D., S.T.D., LL.D., J.U.D.

Dean of the Divinity School and Sterling Professor of Religious Education, Yale University, New Haven, Conn., recently, President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

WIEMAN, HENRY HUDSON, Ph.D., Litt.D., D.D.

Professor of Philosophy of Religion, The Divinity School, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

WIKGREN, ALLEN P., M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of New Testament Language in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

WILBUR, EARL M., M.A., S.T.B., D.D.

Emeritus Professor of Practical Theology and formerly President of Pacific Unitarian School for the Ministry, Berkeley, Cal.

WILLIAMS, DANIEL DAY, B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Theology in The Chicago Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.

WILLOUGHBY, HAROLD R., M.A., B.D., Ph.D., D.D.

Associate Professor of New Testament in the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

WINFIELD, OSCAR A., B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Formerly, Acting President of Gustavus Adolphus College; Professor of Philosophy, St. Peter, Minn.

WOLFE, ROLLAND EMERSON, B.D., S.T.M., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Old Testament in Tufts College and Crane Theological School, Tufts College, Mass.

WOOD, ARTHUR EVANS, S.T.B., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Sociology in the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Mich.

WRIGHT, G. ERNEST, B.D., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Old Testament, Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.; Editor of The Biblical Archaeologist.

WRIGHT, WILLIAM KELLEY, Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy, Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H.

ZACHARIADES, GEORGE ELIAS, Ph.D.

Professor of History and Greek in the Greek Theological Seminary, Pomfret Center, Conn.

MOWRER, HARRIET R., M.A.

Consultant in Marital Adjustment in Chicago and Evanston, Ill.; formerly, Domestic Discord Consultant for the Jewish Social Service Bureau of Chicago, Lecturer in Sociology in Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill.

MURPHY, GARDNER, Ph.D.

Chairman of the Department of Psychology in The College of the City of New York, New York City.

MURRAY, JOHN COURTNEY, S.J., M.A., S.T.D.

Professor of Theology, Woodstock College, Woodstock, Md. and Editor of Theological Studies.

MUZZEY, DAVID S., B.D., Ph.D.

Literary Editor of The Standard; Graduate Professor of American History, Columbia University, New York City, Director, The Society for Ethical Culture in the City of New York.

NEAL, FRED W., B.D., Ph.D.

Fellow in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

NELSON, HAROLD H., Ph.D.

Acting Director of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.; Field Director of the Epigraphic and Architectural Survey of the Oriental Institute, Luxor, Egypt.

NEWHALL, JANNETTE E., M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Librarian of the Andover-Harvard Theological Library in Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

NEWNAN, EVA MAY, M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Classical Languages and Head of the Department of Greek, The College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio.

NICHOLS, ROBERT HASTINGS, Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of Church History in Auburn Theological Seminary and Auburn Professor of Church History in Union Theological Seminary, New York City; Member of the Faculty of Political Science in Columbia University; Stated Clerk of the Synod of New York of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

NIEBUHR, H. RICHARD, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of Christian Ethics in the Divinity School, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

NORWOOD, PERCY V., M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Liturgics in Seabury-Western Theological Seminary, Evanston, Ill.

O'GRADY, DANIEL C., Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy, The University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.

PARRISH, FRED L., M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor and Head of the Department of History and Government, Kansas State College, Manhattan, Kansas

PAUCK, WILHELM, L.S.T., D.Th.

Professor of Historical Theology in The Chicago Theological Seminary and in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

PERSONS, FREDERICK T., M.A.

Librarian, Congregational Library, Boston, Mass.

PETRY, RAY C., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Church History in the Divinity School of Duke University, Durham, N. C.

PFEIFFER, ROBERT H., S.T.B., M.A., Ph.D., S.T.M.

Lecturer in Semitic Languages and Curator of the Semitic Museum, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.; Chairman of the Department of Semitic Languages, Harvard University; Editor of the Journal of Biblical Literature.

PIPER, OTTO A., Th.D., D.D.

Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis in Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J.

PITTENGER, W. NORMAN, S.T.M.

Tutor and Fellow in the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, New York City.

POOL, D. de SOLA.

Rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Shearith Israel, New York City.

RAMSDELL, EDWARD T., M.A., S.T.B., Ph.D.

Professor of Theology and Philosophy of Religion in Vanderbilt University, School of Religion, Nashville, Tenn.

RENGERS, CHRISTOPHER.
Capuchin College, Washington, D. C.

REU, MICHAEL, Th.D., Litt.D.
Late Dean of the Graduate School and Professor of Theology in the Wartburg Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

RHEINSTEIN, MAX, Dr.utr. iur. (Munich)
Max Pam Associate Professor of Comparative Law, The University of Chicago Law School, Chicago, Ill.

RIST, MARTIN, B.D., Th.D., Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament Literature and Interpretation in The Iliff School of Theology, Denver, Col.

ROBERTS, MILLARD GEORGE, B.D.
Fellow in American Church History, The Divinity School, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

ROCKWELL, WILLIAM WALKER, S.T.B., S.T.L., M.A., Ph.D., D. Theol.
Librarian Emeritus, Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

RODGERS, EDITH C., Ph.D.
New York City.

ROLL, BERTIN.
Capuchin College, Washington, D. C.

ROSENBLATT, SAMUEL.
Rabbi of the Beth Tfiloh Congregation, Baltimore, Md.

ROUSH, WALTER EDWIN, B.D., M.A., D.D., Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament Language and Interpretation in The Bonebrake Theological Seminary, Dayton, Ohio.

RULE, ANDREW K., Ph.D.
Professor of Church History and Apologetics in the Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.

RUSSELL, HENRY G., M.A., Ph.D.
Instructor in Biblical Literature, Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine.

RYAN, EDWARD A., S.J., Docteur en Sciences Historiques.
Professor of Church History, Woodstock College, Woodstock, Md.

RYCROFT, W. STANLEY, Ph.D.
Secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, New York City.

SCHRATZ, BRICE.
Capuchin College, Washington, D. C.

SCHWARZE, W.N., Ph.D., D.D.
President Emeritus of the Moravian College and Theological Seminary, Archivist of the Northern Province, Moravian Church in America; Bethlehem, Pa.

SCOTT, ERNEST FINDLAY, M.A., D.D.
Emeritus Professor of New Testament Criticism, Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

SCOTT, R.B.Y., B.D., M.A., Ph.D.
Professor of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis in the United Theological College, Montreal, Canada.

SEESHOLTZ, ANNE, M.A., Ph.D.
Sometime Fellow in Theology at Marburg, Germany, on Peace Mission to the Orient for the International Fellowship of Reconciliation, Member of the Faculty of the National Lutheran Board for Deaconess Work, Baltimore, Md.

SHEDD, CLARENCE PROUTY, M.A., B.D., Ph.D.
Stephen Merrell Clement Professor of Christian Methods and Director of Studies on Religion in Higher Education, The Divinity School, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

SHERRILL, LEWIS J., B.D., Ph.D.
Dean and Mary Hamilton Duncan Professor of Religious Education in the Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.

SILVER, ABBA HILLEL, D.D., Litt.D., D.H.L.
Rabbi of the Temple, Cleveland, Ohio.

SIMS, MARY S., Ph.D.
Executive of the Committee for National Interpretation and Support of the National Board of the Young Womens Christian Associations of the United States, New York City.

SKINNER, CLARENCE R., M.A., D.D.
Professor of Applied Christianity and Dean in Tufts College School of Religion and Crane Theological School, Tufts College, Mass.

SMITH, CHARLES EDWARD, M.A., Ph.D.
Professor of History in the College and Sciences, Louisiana State University, La.

SNYDER, EDWARD DOUGLAS, M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of English, Haverford College, Haverford, Pa

SPIEGEL, SHALOM, Ph.D.

Professor of Hebrew Language and Literature in the Jewish Institute of Religion, New York City.

SPINKA, MATTHEW, Ph.D.

Waldo Professor of Medieval, Reformation and Modern Church History, The Hartford Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn.

SPRENGLING, MARTIN, Ph.D.

Professor of Arabic, The Department of Oriental Languages and Literatures in the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

STARBUCK, EDWIN DILLER, M.A., Ph.D.

Formerly, Professor of Philosophy and Director of Character Research and now Professor of Psychology, The University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Cal.

STEERE, DOUGLAS V., M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy, Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.

STEVENSON, GEORGE S., M.D.

Medical Director, The National Committee for Mental Hygiene, New York City.

STIFLER, FRANCIS CARR, M.A., D.D.

Editorial and Recording Secretary, American Bible Society, New York City.

SWEET, WILLIAM W., B.D., M.A., Th.M., Ph.D., D.D., Litt.D.

Professor of the History of American Christianity, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

TERRIEN, SAMUEL L., S.T.M., Th.D.

Instructor in Hebrew and the Old Testament, Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

THORNING, JOSEPH F., M.A., Ph.D., S.T.D.

Professor of Ethics and Sociology in Mount St. Mary's Seminary and College, Emmitsburg, Md.

TORNAY, STEPHEN C., S.T.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Instructor in Philosophy and the Classics, University of Utah, Salt Lake City, Utah.

UNGER, DOMINIC, O.F.M. Cap.

Professor of Sacred Scripture and Liturgy, Capuchin College, Washington, D. C.

VIETH, PAUL H., B.D., Ph.D.

Horace Bushnell Professor of Christian Nurture in the Divinity School, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

VOLLERT, CYRIL, Ph.D., S.T.D.

Dean of St Mary's College, St. Marys, Kansas, the School of Divinity of St. Louis University.

WARD, LEO R., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Philosophy, The University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.

WEBBER, F. R.

Editor, Lutheran Church Art, New York City.

WEIGLE, LUTHER ALLAN, M.A., Ph.D., D.D., Litt.D., S.T.D., LL.D., J.U.D.

Dean of the Divinity School and Sterling Professor of Religious Education, Yale University, New Haven, Conn , recently, President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

WIEMAN, HENRY HUDSON, Ph.D., Litt.D., D.D.

Professor of Philosophy of Religion, The Divinity School, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

WIKGREN, ALLEN P., M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of New Testament Language in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

WILBUR, EARL M., M.A., S.T.B., D.D.

Emeritus Professor of Practical Theology and formerly President of Pacific Unitarian School for the Ministry, Berkeley, Cal.

WILLIAMS, DANIEL DAY, B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Theology in The Chicago Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.

WILLOUGHBY, HAROLD R., M.A., B.D., Ph.D., D.D.

Associate Professor of New Testament in the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

WINFIELD, OSCAR A., B.D., M.A., Ph.D.

Formerly, Acting President of Gustavus Adolphus College; Professor of Philosophy, St. Peter, Minn.

WOLFE, ROLLAND EMERSON, B.D., S.T.M., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Old Testament in Tufts College and Crane Theological School, Tufts College, Mass.

WOOD, ARTHUR EVANS, S.T.B., B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Sociology in the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Mich.

WRIGHT, G. ERNEST, B.D., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Old Testament, Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.; Editor of The Biblical Archaeologist.

WRIGHT, WILLIAM KELLEY, Ph.D.

Professor of Philosophy, Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H.

ZACHARIADES, GEORGE ELIAS, Ph.D.

Professor of History and Greek in the Greek Theological Seminary, Pomfret Center, Conn.

A

Aaronites: See blessing, priestly.

Ab, ninth of: (Hebrew form, Tisha b'Ab) Jewish fast day commemorating the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple by the Romans in 70 C.E. In addition to fasting, tradition also enjoins the abstention from all diverting activities. At the divine services, all synagogue ornaments are removed and the liturgy includes various dirges and the reading of the Biblical book of Lamentations. See Jewish religious festivals.   B.Z.B.

Abailard, Peter: Peter Abailard has been best known for his romance with Heloise. But he was one of the greatest intellectualists of the entire Middle Ages. Born at Palais or Le Pallet, Brittany, in 1079, he early became a wanderer in search of knowledge. His wanderings brought him to Paris sometime before 1108, where he became the pupil of the dialectician and "exaggerated realist" William of Champeaux*. Before this he had probably studied under the nominalist Roscelinus and under the famous teachers of the School of Chartres. He opposed William's position on 'universals', and drove him from the cathedral school in 1108. He also opposed the nominalism of Roscelinus. But always the dialectician, his own solution to the philosophical problem of universals* is unsatisfactory and not too clear. It is not far removed from the nominalism* he opposed. Around 1115 he decided to study theology under Anselm of Laon. After a short training, he began to teach and write. His first theological work was condemned at Soissons in 1121, and his later works at Sens in 1141. For his Sic et non, he was accused of trying to undermine the patristic authority, but this charge was false. He is important as dialectician who was dissatisfied with 'positive' theology and who wanted reason to play its part in the solution of theological problems. Being neither philosopher nor theologian, he sometimes failed to recognize the limits of reason. He died in 1142, leaving behind him the following writings: Logica 'Ingredientibus', and other dialectical works: Theologia 'Summi Boni' (Tract. de unitate et trinitate divina); Theologia christiana; Theologia 'scholarium' (Introd. ad theologiam); Comm in epistolam ad Romanos; Sic et non; Historia calamitatum. See atonement in Christianity; Scholasticism, William of St. Thierry.   P.S.M.

S. M. Deutsch, Peter Abälard (Leipzig, 1883); E. Kaiser, Pierre Abélard (Fribourg, 1901), J. Reiners, Der Nominalismus in der Frühscholastik (Aachen, 1910); C. F. M. De Remusat, Abélard, sa vie, sa philosophie et sa théologie. 2 vols. (Paris, 1845); F. J. Picavet, "Abélard et Alexandre de Halès, créateurs de la méthode scholastique" Sciences Religieuses, Vols. V, VI (Paris, 1894, 1895), J. G. Sikes, Peter Abaelard (Cambridge, 1932).   H. H.

abbess: The superior of a monastery of twelve or more nuns*. Although she does not have the jurisdiction belonging to abbots, she uses the crosier* as a symbol of her rank, and wears a ring. The title is in use among the Benedictines, Poor Clares and others. See abbey.   J.B.C.

abbey: A monastery canonically erected and independent, housing at least twelve members. The buildings are constructed around the quadrangle, and consist chiefly of the church, cloister, guesthouse, infirmary, refectory, chapter-house, and almonry. Carthusian* abbeys are constructed differently from those of other Orders in that three sides of a quadrangle are made up of small three room cottages occupied by individual monks. The buildings used in common enclose the fourth side. If the abbey is occupied by monks it is ruled by an abbot (Aramaic, abba, father). This title was given by St. Benedict* to the superior of a monastery of a settled location. The office is elective, made by secret ballot of the professed members, and for life. The authority of an abbot in his monastery is paternal and quasi episcopal. Jurisdiction differs. Ordinarily it extends only to members of the Order, sometimes it goes beyond the limit of the abbey over clergy and laity in a territory which may be an integral part of a bishop's diocese or which is no part of any diocese. In this latter case they are called abbots nullius. After election abbots receive the blessing of a bishop, and are invested with the mitre, crosier, ring, pectoral cross, and other insignia of their office.   J.B.C.

Abbott, Lyman: See New theology, the.

abbreviations of names of Catholic Religious Orders: See Catholic Religious Orders.

Abhidharmakosa: See Buddhist Terminology.

1

abhiseka: A late Vedic rite of annointing or sprinkling of emperors, kings or even lesser state officials on the occasion of their accession to power or of some signal achievement. The term is also used by Buddhists for their tenth stage of perfection, and more popularly for the ceremonial bathing in sacred waters as widely practiced in Hinduism.   C.S.B.

abjuration: (Lat. ab. from, jurare, to swear) In R.C. Church law, the formal renunciation of apostasy, heresy, or schism.   L.R.W.

abnormal psychology: That branch of psychology which deals with the disorders of the personality and with related processes such as dreams, hypnosis, telepathy* etc. As distinct from clinical psychology* it is theoretically rather than practically oriented and it makes little use of standardized tests. It is the non-medical equivalent of "psychopathology." See parapsychology.
   W. McDougall, Abnormal Psychology (1926); J. J. B. Morgan, Psychology of Abnormal People (1928); Morton Prince, The Dissociation of a Personality (1906).   A.T.B.

Abraham, Testament of: Jewish apocryphal book telling of Abraham's death and ascension to heaven. Probably written in Hebrew in the second century by a Jew or a Jewish Christian.   B.Z.B.

absolute: (Lat., absolutum, past participle of absolvere, set free, complete or finish) 1) Whatever is self-sufficient, unconditional, independent, not relative. 2) The all-inclusive, all-comprehending totality of the real; e.g., Hegel's Absolute. 3) The First Cause, the World Ground (Lotze, Bowne), self-existent "infinite energy producing and sustaining the world" (Knudson); this is the theistic Absolute. Cf. God as Personal.   E.S.B.

absolution: (absolvere, free from) The power and act of the Church that is expression of reconciliation with the visible Church as a sign and means of reconciliation with God, which frees a penitent sinner from his sin and from external disciplines due to his sin. For Protestant theology, following Luther and Calvin, absolution is identical with the saving power of the declaration of the Gospel. For Catholic theology, Roman, Eastern, and Anglican, absolution includes this (e.g., the declarative and precatory forms in the public services) but is specifically the act of the priest in Confession* remitting post-baptismal sin (for which the formulae of absolution before the 11th century were precatory but now in the West are indicative). The concept of absolution is dependent upon the concept of sin as offending both God and man, particularly fellow Christians, and upon the concept of the Church as a society that is channel of grace. Absolution is contrasted with forgiveness,* which is God's action, as the action of the Church congruent with the action of God. See Confessor; initiation rites; penance; retention of sins. T.J.B.

abstinence: Abstaining from indulgences in certain pleasures as a discipline of the soul, usually from marriage, certain foods, and wine. Extreme observance may take the form of asceticism—withdrawal from the World.   R.E.E.H.

abstinence, total: See temperance movement.

Abu Hanifa: (d. 767 A.D.) Persian Moslem. Founder of one of the four orthodox (Sunnite*) schools of jurisprudence; regarded by the orthodox followers as an infallible interpreter of the Koran and Sunna (manners and customs of the people), and one whose interpretations are representative of the consensus of Islam*. When compared with Arabic schools of interpretation he, a Persian, depended less upon tradition and more upon his independent personal judgment in cases at law in which the Koran is not explicit, even to setting aside the written authority of the Koran and Sunna in those cases in which he thought such action necessary to secure justice.
   D. B. Macdonald, Development of Muslim Theology, Jurisprudence and Constitutional Theory (London, 1903); I. Goldziher, Mohammed and Islam (1917).   F.L.P.

Acacius of Caesaraea: (d. 366) The pupil, successor (340), and biographer of Eusebius, and after the death of Eusebius of Nicomedia (342), the leader of the Arian* party at court; bitter opponent of Cyril of Jerusalem*; nominated (acc. Jerome) Felix (antipope of Rome, 358).   F.W.B.

accident: (Lat. ad, toward, and cadere, to fall; accidere, to happen) In philosophy, that which does not exist in or of itself but in another; e.g. quality, size.   L.R.W.

accidie; acidie: (Lat. acedia) A state of mind characterised by indifference or even repugnance felt toward religious exercises, a repugnance not of conviction, but resembling ennui. It was reckoned as one of the seven deadly sins.*   P.G.M.

Acoemetae: (Gr. sleepless) A monastic* sect founded in the early fifth century. Divided into choirs, the monks kept up a continuous round of prayer. Best known foundation: the Studium at Constantinople.   S.M.G.

acolyte: (Gr. akolouthos, attendant or follower) A cleric not yet in major orders, with such functions as preparing wine and water for Mass, and assisting the ministers at Mass, tasks now usually done by altar boys, sometimes called acolytes.   L.R.W.

acosmism: (Gr. a, priv.; kosmos, world) Doctrine that the universe is unreal. E.g., Shankara and F. H. Bradley saw nothing as real save the ineffable super-cosmic One, of which all in space, time, and finite experience is mere maya* or appearance.   C.H.

act psychology: See psychology, schools of.

Act of Six Articles: This act, pushed through parliament in 1539 by Henry VIII*, was called "the whip with six strings" by the Protestants. It reaffirmed transubstantiation, auricular confession, communion in one kind, and clerical celibacy, and provided the death penalty for the denial of these doctrines.   W.S.H.

Acta Apostolicae Sedis: See Pius X, Pope.

Acta Martyrum: Accounts of the trials of early Christian martyrs which were circulated among Christians of the early centuries as tracts for their edification.

O. v. Gebhardt Acta martyrum selecta (Berlin, 1903).   S.M.G.

Acta Sanctorum: A collection of abstracts of court proceedings against early Christians (acta) together with brief accounts of the death of the martyrs (passiones), published in sixty-nine volumes by the Jesuit fathers (Bollandus, etc.) at Antwerp during the years 1643-1910. Also in a Brussels edition, 1845-1926.   S.M.G.

action sermon: In Scottish Presbyterianism, a sermon preceding the Lord's Supper. The expression comes from actio gratiarum, the offering of thanks. Once familiar, it is now mostly obsolete.   R.H.N.

Acts of the Apostles: The second volume of Luke's book on Christian beginnings, which carries the story on from the descent of the spirit to Paul's arrival in Rome and two years' stay there. Luke* owed his knowledge of Paul's labors and journeys probably to Paul himself, with whom he travelled from Assos to Jerusalem, and after two years in and about Caesarea, from that place to Rome. His information about the early church in Jerusalem and Palestine, the bulk of chapters 1-12, he might easily have obtained in the course of the two years he spent in and about Caesarea, waiting for Paul's release. Acts tells the story of the Christian movement, groping its way out of Jerusalem and Judaism into widening circles—proselytes, Samaritans, Greeks, and then being carried out into western provinces, crossing from Asia into Europe, until Paul finds it already planted at Rome. The swiftly moving narrative carries the reader from one dramatic scene to another, through the splendid cities of the Graeco-Roman world—Jerusalem, Antioch, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, Rome. Social, humanitarian, and historical interests mark this as they do the earlier gospel volume. Numerous common traits bind the two volumes together; and many things point to a date long after Paul's time: his death assumed in the farewell at Miletus, the hero stature he has attained, the degree of church organization reflected, the dawn of Christian liturgy, the emergence of the sects. The use of written sources in the Acts must be given up; the so-called "We-sections" once ascribed to somebody's travel diary, are now seen to indicate in an unobtrusive way the writer's presence with Paul's party. Probable date (with Luke) 90 A.D.

Henry J. Cadbury, The Making of Luke-Acts (1927); F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity: Part I, The Acts of the Apostles, V vols. (1920-1933); E. J. Goodspeed, New Solutions of New Testament Problems, chapter vi: "The Origin of Acts." (1927); A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age (Revised ed., 1906).   E.J.G.

Acts of Paul, of John, of Peter: See pseudepigrapha, N.T.; apocrypha in the N.T. church.

Acts of Pilate: See Pilate, Acts of; Nicodemus, Gospel of.

Acts of Thomas: See Thomas, St.

Adad (or Ramman): Babylonian-Assyrian god of wind, storms, lightning, rain, and thunder. He is both beneficient (through rain) and destructive (in Assyria he is also a god of battles). In Syria he is also called Hadad or Hadar, and corresponds to Teshub. See Mesopotamian religions.   R.H.P.

Adalbert, Archbishop of Hamburg and Bremen: (ca. 1000-1072) Through the favor of the emperor, Henry III, he became archbishop of Hamburg and Bremen, 1045, with jurisdiction over the churches of Scandinavia to which he appointed numerous bishops. He is blamed for exercising an injurious influence upon young Henry IV.

J. Beinlich, Die Persönlichkeit Adalberts von Bremen (Breslau, 1918).   J.T.M.

Adalbert, Saint, of Prague: (956(?)-997) (Czech name, Wojtech) Educated at Libice and Magdeburg, he became bishop of Prague, 982. Favored Roman against Slavonic liturgy. After years of retirement at Rome he labored in Bohemia, Hungary and Poland, and in Prussia where he was slain by a heathen priest. While in Hungary (994) he baptized Vayik, i.e. Stephen, the royal saint of Hungary.

H. G. Voigt, Adalbert von Prag (Berlin, 1898).   J.T.M.

Adam: The first man and the father of the human race, the name being Biblically derived from the Hebrew "adamah," earth, the ultimate substance from which man as a bodily creature is constituted. As the primal source of all human life, Adam symbolizes in Jewish tradition the basic unity and equality of all mankind. Jewish theology treated Adam's fall as a parable of the imperfections which inhere in all human life, but not as their cause. Man is also endowed with an original impulse to virtue, and each person suffers death for his own sins. See fall of man; original sin; pre-Adamite.   B.Z.B.

Adamites: An obscure sect, originating in North Africa in the second and third centuries, mentioned by Epiphanius and Augustine and perhaps referred to by Clement of Alexandria. They called their church Paradise, condemned marriage as not observed by Adam, and practiced nudism in common worship. Also a similar sect in Bohemia in the 15th century.   S.M.G.

Adamnan: (624?-704) Irish monastic leader, ninth abbot of Iona (679-), author of the Life of St. Columba and apparently of the important legal document Cain Adamnain.   J.T.M.

Adams Foundation, The: Established in 1928 by Mrs. Anna B. Adams at the First Methodist Church, Bloomington, Indiana. The capital sum is $50,000. Its purpose is to bring outstanding speakers to discuss various phases of religion and to aid rural churches. Lecturers have included Drs. E. J. Goodspeed, E. S. Brightman, Bishop Oxnam and H. H. Crane. (Data furnished by the Minister of the Church.)   V.F.

Adapa: Babylonian hero, created by Ea* to tend his temple at Eridu and endowed with wisdom. When he broke the wings of the south wind and was summoned before Anu,* in obedience to Ea's advice he unwittingly refused the food of immortality.   R.H.P.

Adelard of Bath: An Englishman by birth who flourished in the early part of the twelfth century and taught in Paris and Laon. During his voyages in Italy, Sicily, Greece and in Mohammedan Spain, he acquired a great storehouse of knowledge. He distinguished himself not only in philosophy and theology, but in astronomy, the natural sciences, in geometry and even in animal psychology. His best known work is Quaestiones naturales. He is the first to use Aristotle's argument from motion to prove the existence of God.   S.C.T.

Adelophagi: (Gr. adelos, secretly; phago, to eat) A sect of the late 4th century which maintained, in supposed imitation of the prophets, that a Christian ought to eat in secret.   S.M.G.

adiaphora: (Pl. of Gr. adiaphoron, indifferent) An ancient Greek term, used especially among the Stoics, indicating things regarded as morally neutral or indifferent, i.e. neither good nor bad. Used by some as a theological term in early Protestant thought to designate things regarded as scripturally neutral, i.e. neither required nor forbidden by God (e.g. certain rites or ceremonies, holy days, images, etc.), hence to be used, or not, according to individual or ecclesiastical preference.   E.T.R.

adiaphoristic controversy: A seventeenth century debate arising out of the Augsburg Interim* (provisional scheme of compromise between the religious parties, pending a general council). Though neither Catholics nor Protestants were satisfied, Melanchthon* accepted the Interim as regards things indifferent (adiaphora), such as jurisdiction of bishops, observance of certain rites. As a practical issue the question was settled by the terms of the peace of Augsburg,* but the discussion of adiaphora continued for some time in the Lutheran Church. In 1681, a second adiaphoristic controversy arose between the Lutherans and pietists, regarding the lawfulness of amusements. See Leipzig, Interim of.   G.R.C.

Aditi: An abstract goddess of Vedic Hinduism, mother of the Adityas.* The name signifies "boundlessness." (Rv. I, 89, 10 says: "Aditi is the sky; Aditi is the air; Aditi is the mother, father and son; Aditi is all the gods and the five tribes; Aditi is whatever has been born; Aditi is whatever shall be born.") She is sometimes identified with the sky, again with the earth and at other times is hailed as a cow.   C.S.B.

Adityas: A group of Vedic gods given variously as six, eight and in later times, twelve, all sons of Aditi * Varuna is the most important, the others being little more than his personified attributes. The list includes Varuna, Mitra, Aryaman, Bhaga, Daksa and Amsa. Others added sometimes are Dhatar, Indra, Vivasvant, Martanda, Surya and Vishnu. The twelve Adityas of later Vedic times seems to correspond with the number of months.   C.S.B.

adjuration: (Lat. ad, to or toward, jurare, to swear) Appeal to do or not to do, for fear of punishment.   L.R.W.

Adler, Alfred: (1870-1937) Terming his branch of psychotherapy "Individual Psychology," he decried, in contrast to his master Freud,* the importance of sex. He made considerable contributions to science before his separation from Freud. He urged a simpler answer to the vexing problem of the cause of neurosis. His name is most frequently associated with the problem of personal inadequacy that has received a great deal of attention in the psychiatric and child psychology literature. He has added largely to the clarity of the role which inferiority feelings play in human beings. In 1917 he attempted a systematic interpretation of behavior based on the motivating force of a "will to power," i.e., an urge toward completeness and normalcy in physical development and in achievement. Later, in 1928, he recognized that insistence on the etiological importance of physical inferiority is limiting. He now attributed the child's feeling of inferiority not only to physical abnormalities when compared to parents, but also to his uncertainty or lack of independence, his feeling of subordination to parents or older siblings, or similar psychosocial factors. He accounted for conduct, character, and neurosis as so many varieties of "masculine protest," the wish to deny weakness or inadequacy. It is absurd to define all emotional reactions by his central formula. He ignored the fact that passive desires are just as common as aggressive ones; that neurosis does not predominate among the victims of actual inferiority, among the cripples or the feebleminded; that repression and the unconscious are significant. His psychotherapy stressed not drives or causes, but present purposes and goals. Concerning himself largely with the direction in which the individual is moving, his method is preferred to the therapeutics of Freud and Jung because theirs are too delicate and too involved to be entrusted to anyone but a highly trained professional psychiatrist. Adler's method became more widely known and accepted because his ideas were easily understood, and his treatment required much less time than did the orthodox method. Adler is not so much criticized for the falsity of his views as for their superficiality. Despite this justified criticism, his system will go down in history as a lasting contribution to the effort of man to understand himself. In 1920 he established his first clinics for the training of teachers in the treatment of maladjusted pupils. He brought to contemporary expression many of the truths which a long line of distinguished students of human life—Macchiavelli, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche—have offered. The central assumptions he made regarding human nature represent an important contribution to the understanding of people. His chief insights, such as the centrality of the "will to prestige," the importance of "social interest for health," and his "geometry of love" are valid insights into the working of the mind. See psychology, schools of.

His chief works A Study of Organ Inferiority and its Psychical Compensation (1917); Neurotic Constitution (1917), The Practice and Theory of Individual Psychology (1924), Understanding Human Nature (1927), The Education of Children (1930), What Life Should Mean to You (1931), Social Interest (1939). H.H.

Adler, Felix: See Ethical Culture Societies.

Admadiya: A recent Moslem sect founded at Qadian, India, by Mirza Ghulam Admad, who in 1879 offered himself as the promised Mahdi and Messiah in the likeness of Jesus. He re-interpreted the *jihad (holy war) as a striving after righteousness. Extensive missionary activity is carried on by devoted followers in Asia and Africa, Europe and America with considerable success. See Mahdi.

P.E.J.

administrative law: See law.

admonition: (Lat. admonitio, a warning to) a) Paternal. a secret remonstrance by a prelate to a suspected cleric; and if this is disregarded, b) Canonical: a legal summons to trial.   L.R.W.

adolescence in religion: (Lat. adolescentia, fr. adolescere, to grow up) Period of development between childhood and maturity (roughly from the early teens to the early twenties), marked by profound physiological and psychological changes. With the maturing of sexual functions, the boy becomes newly self-conscious as a developing man, the girl as a developing woman. A period of awakening and self-discovery; of awareness of physical growth, of emerging intellectual powers and creative interests; of lively imagination; of developing insight into differences in moral quality; of responsiveness to higher values, of susceptibility to ideals and of capacity for strong loyalties. Commonly a period of conflict 1) between the maturing sex drive and acknowledged ideals and 2) between the assertiveness of the developing ego and conventional ideas and attitudes. Self-discovery brings a new sense of independence with inevitable criticisms of adult patterns and mores and of inherited beliefs. Such criticism and doubt are often simply a vehicle of youthful expression. Religiously the period is important as a time of dedication (variously recognized in the organized religions of the world and even in primitive forms), when the religious nurture of childhood must issue in personal commitment if significant religious maturity is to follow. See conversion.

F. D. Brooks, The Psychology of Adolescence (1929); E. S. Conklin, Principles of Adolescent Psychology (1935); K. C. Garrison, Psychology of Adolescence (1934). E.T.R.

Adonis: See Mystery Religions.

adoptianism: The theory that Jesus was in nature a man who became the Son of God by adoption—current in 2d and 3d centuries. Prominent in the Spain of the 8th century, its Christological doctrine, in stressing the complete reality of the man Jesus, argued that the son of man at his conception was spiritually, not substantially or physically, accepted by the will of the son of God Thus the personal identity between the son of man and the son of God is preserved.

A. Harnack, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, vol. III (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1890), A. Hauck, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, vol. II (Leipzig, 1887); J. Bach, Dogmengeschichte des Mittelalters vom christologischen Standpunkt (Vienna, 1873-1875). H.H.

adoration: Primarily this term suggests the objective worship of God in his holiness and majesty, but it has become the name of an extraliturgical service, and a devotional practice, common in the western Catholic Church for many centuries. The service is the worship of Jesus present in the sacramental elements, reserved in a tabernacle or aumbry on or near the altar; such a service includes psalms, a collect and other material, a rite devised by S. Thomas Aquinas often being used. The devotional practice is the reverencing by the people of Jesus present in the sacrament, often exposed upon the altar, but more frequently in the tabernacle. See forty hours' devotion. W.N.P.

Adrian IV, Pope: (1154-1159) Adrian IV, the only pope of English birth (Nicholas Breakspear) experiencing parental cruelty at St. Alban's in England and monastic insubordination at St. Rufus in France, which occasioned his removal as abbot, was sent in 1152 on a delicate and important mission as Papal Legate* to Scandinavia. While here he raised Trondjem, in whose church he found the relics of St. Olaf, to the independent archiepiscopal see of Norway, reformed abuses and aided in ameliorating civil institutions of the country. As pope, Adrian is famous for his vigorous stand against the encroachments of the Normans in Sicily, the Republican brigandry in Rome (Arnold of Brescia*) and the imperial pretensions of Frederick I (Barbaross: 1152-1190) in Germany. The latter's refusal, on the occasion of his visit to Rome to be crowned emperor, to hold at Sutri, June 9, 1195, the stirrup for the pope—an old medieval custom of courtesy—was a significant prognostication of the controversies that were to ensue due to the hitherto too loosely defined legal status and relation between pope and emperor in the Leonine-Carolingian Church-State (Kirchenstaat). Matters came to a head in the acrimonious controversy at the Diet of Besancon (1157) and in the declaration of the Bolognese jurists at the convocation at Roncaglia, 1158, concerning the imperial prerogatives. But Adrian was equally adamant in his stand concerning the position of the medieval pope, for, since the emperor held his title as emperor from the pope the emperor was both spiritually, as a son of the "Father of all Christianity," and temporally, as dependent on the pope for his superiority over the other European Christian princes, inferior to him. The controversy dragged over into the pontificate of Adrian's successor, Alexander III.*

For sources, including Boso's Life of Adrian IV cf. Watterich, Vitae Pont. Roman (saec. IX-XIII, Leipzig, 1862), vol. II, 323-374; included also in Migne, PL, vol. 188, pp. 1351-1360. For John of Salisbury's Life of Adrian cf. PL, vol 199 Regarding the disputed donation of Ireland by Adrian, in virtue of the Bull "Laudabiliter" to King John II of England, at the request of John of Salisbury, cf. Cath. Encyc. I 158.   R.M.H.

adultery: See infidelity.

advaita: A Hindu philosophic term meaning nondualism. In the Vedanta it is the denial of the dualism of self and the world, spirit and matter. There is only one reality, Brahman.·   C.S.B.

Advent: ·1) The birth of Jesus Christ or more properly the coming of the Son of God in human form, the Incarnation through the Virgin birth. 2) Refers to the Second Coming of Christ, at times, under stress of hardship, deprivation and suffering, the exact time of his coming has been proclaimed. 3) The special observance by R.C. and Lutheran churches of four Sundays (E. C. six) preceding Christmas as a preparation for the Feast of the Nativity. Began middle of sixth century from which time Advent also marks the beginning of the Church Year. See Church Year Cycle. R.E.E.H.

Advent Christian Church: See Adventists.

Adventist sects: There are six adventist sects: Advent Christian Church, Seventh Day Adventists, Church of God (Adventist); Life and Advent Union; Church of God (Oregon, Ill.); Primitive Advent Christian Church. These have about 2,500 churches and 165,000 members. These sects, however, contain but a fraction of the believers in adventism. The Mormons, nearly all pentecostal sects*, and many other conservative bodies teach the doctrine. Cf. communistic settlements, religious.
                                                         E.T.C.

Adventists: Religious sects springing from the "Advent movement," which originated with the teachings of William Miller (1782-1849). Members of the movement believe in the personal and premillenial second advent of Christ, and the renewal of the Earth as an abode for the redeemed after a physical resurrection of the dead.

William Miller,* the originator, took the prophetic and apocalyptic passages in the Bible literally and by calculations based on the Book of Daniel, concluded the second advent would occur between 1843 and 1844. Lecturing first in Dresden, N. Y. in 1831, Miller soon succeeded in converting great numbers throughout New England to his belief. The danger of an approaching doom filled many with fear, and led sometimes to such excesses as sale of property, and the donning of robes to await the end. Thousands read of the impending end of all things in the Midnight Cry, Signs of the Times, and Trumpet of Alarm—periodicals of the movement.

With the dying down of the first excitement a nucleus of believers met in Albany, N. Y. to assert their continuing loyalty to the cause and there formed an organization. Their principal tenets were annihilation of the wicked, and sleep of the soul from the hour ot death to the Day of Judgment. The newly created heavens and earth would be inhabited only by "the people of the saints of the most high." The only millenium was the thousand years intervening between the resurrection of God's chosen at Christ's return, and the raising of all others a thousand years later. There was no promise of this world's conversion, Satan would continue on earth with the good until the end. For the purposes of publishing and fellowship, members organized as the "American Millenial Association", the organization, however, did not outlive its original members.

Many groups have withdrawn from the first body on doctrinal grounds. Jonathan Cummings, holding that immortality was a gift of Christ to a few chosen at the resurrection, organized one group called the "Advent Christian Church" at Worcester, Mass. in 1861 which in 1926 listed 29,430 members, with 444 churches valued at $11,069,449. In 1844 James Bates and James White, because of scriptural precept, began observing the seventh day rather than the first, and held completely to the Bible as their rule of faith and practice. At a conference held in Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1860, the "Seventh Day Adventist Denomination" was formed. This group, holding to scripture as law, baptism only by immersion, expulsion for the use of tobacco or intoxicants, and an unrevealed, but imminent date of the Advent, grew rapidly. In 1926 it listed 261,834 members, 5,862 churches, and over $48,000,000 in property. The "Church of God, Adventist" originated in Michigan under the leadership of Elder Cranmer, in protest against the claimed divine inspiration of one of the founders. This branch lists 1,550 members in 58 churches in 1926. Still another group, the "Life and Advent Union," was founded by Adventists in New York in 1863, under the leadership of John T. Walsh, who held there would be no resurrection of the wicked. Only 7 churches and 535 members were listed for this group in 1926. Finally, the "Churches of God in Jesus Christ," holding to all general adventist doctrines, are an organization of independent congregations formed at Philadelphia in November, 1888. It lists 86 churches and 3,528 members.

C. E. Sears, Days of Delusion (1924) ; A. C. Johnson, Advent Christian History (1918) ; W. Miller, Evidence from the Scriptures and History of the Second Coming of Christ (1838) ; Census of Religious Bodies, Adventist Bodies, Condensed Report, 1926 (1928).   M.G.R.-W.W.S.

advocatus dei: (Lat. advocatus, the called or summoned and Deus, God) The one officially promoting a case of beatification or canonization.
                                                         L.R.W.

advocatus diaboli: (Lat. advocatus, the called or summoned and diabolus, the devil) A person, also called Promotor Fidei, appointed to prepare in writing all possible grounds for not beatifying or canonizing one proposed for such honor. See beatification; canonization.   L.R.W.

advowson: (advocatio) In English law, the right of a patron* to presentation*; but when the bishop himself is the patron this right is known as collation. Till 1898 advowsons might also be donative, in which case the patron's rights were practically unrestricted. The Crown is patron paramount and presents where other patrons fail. Where the right belongs to a Roman Catholic it is exercised by Oxford or Cambridge University. Q.B.

Aelfric: (ca. 955-1020) Anglo-Saxon abbot and author. Compiled a grammar (hence his cognomen "Grammaticus"). Translated parts of OT. Wrote several widely used books of homilies, most famous being "The Lives of the Saints." Influenced the development of English prose. E.C.K.

aeon, eon: (Gr. aion, age) 1) An age,* or the whole duration, of the world; eternity. 2) In Platonic philosophy, the Eternal Being whose counterpart in the world of sense is Time (Timaeus 37D). 3) In earlier Gnosticism,* the Absolute Being, or, in later Gnosticism, successive emanations* from the Supreme Deity, which form the Pleroma ,the world of light or higher reality, divided by a gulf from the darkness of phenomenal being. This doctrine almost certainly derives from Mithraism.* E.M.N. aesthetics: Aesthetics, as the philosophy of art, shows 1) how the common liking of sensuous appearances may grow into instructed liking through knowledge and training. The datum for study is the immediate concrete situation with the human being and his sentiments, approvals, and aversions on one side, and a phenomenon with a colored or sounding surface, form, and intention on the other, with, finally, a relationship of agreement or disagreement between the two. This indissoluble unity of human aesthetic experience remains throughout the aesthetician's control. But he examines the development of value* and meaning in it by analyzing it into parts, and establishing the conditions under which the parts, and the whole, gradually become richer and more harmonious. Pleasant feeling rises to connoisseurship by long acquaintance with and study of the best that man has produced throughout time in the arts. The aesthetician therefore studies the psychological and social conditions of taste in various periods: e.g., the infusion of religious conviction into the taste of St. Augustine and Ruskin, of acquaintance with Japanese prints into that of Whistler, of predilection for scientific clarity into that of Descartes and Fechner. Light is thrown on the directions of taste not only by the general climate of interest in any period or particular individual, but also by physical and psychological researches: e.g. by Helmholtz's work on the "partials" or "overtones" of a given sound and Scripture's on voice production.

The initial liking and disliking become finally transparent structures with bonds of necessary relaiton, and thus judgments with authority in their own sphere, analogous to the judgments of the physicist or chemist on the constitution of the physical world.

2) But the philosopher of art notes not only the conditions of change from bare and brute liking to instructed taste, but also the tendency of authoritative preference in the arts to become active forming instead of passive receiving. Learning about art rises toward the doing of artistic deeds Liking takes on more and more the quality of the creative imagination, so that there is truth in the paradox that a good critic or connoisseur is a second creator. But if aesthetic liking grows into imaginative making, an understanding of creation in the arts is a presupposition of the understanding of taste. Samuel Alexander's researches on the relation of artistic creation to the constructive instinct and to cosmic creation as also Coleridge's and Croce's definitions of art as lyrical making, tend to recast, in the aesthetician's theory, that original datum of the aesthetic situation that was composed of liking, a phenomenon, and proportion. It ceases to be possible for the philosopher to study the end-product of artistic activity without reference to the activity and inspiration of its producer.

Two inadequate views of aesthetics have been common: 1) that it has to do with the immediate appreciation of sensuous values and relations, apart from historical and scientific knowledge; 2) that it treats generalized meanings: the various definitions of critical terms used in connection with the arts, in abstraction from a delighted sense of the body of art facts relevant to the definitions. Mutatis Mutandis, Kant's* pronouncement on abstract empiricism and abstract rationalism applies here: appreciation without knowledge is empty; definition without feeling is dead.

The method of aesthetics is neither a serial consideration of definitions, conceptions, problems, or topics, nor a summary of impressionistic reactions to beauties, but a dialectical development of the full meaning of art's meaning and place in human experience. See fine arts.

Students of Aesthetics often best support their theories by critical works in the arts, as for example Lascelles Abercrombie, The Theory of Poetry (1926) ; Carroll C Pratt, The Meaning of Music (1931) ; Erwin Panofsky, Studies in Iconology (1939) ; but in Aesthetics proper, DeWitt H Parker, Principles of Aesthetics (1920) ; Louis Flaccus, The Spirit and Substance of Art (1941) ; Max Schoen, Art and Beauty (1932) ; Theodore M. Greene, The Arts and the Art of Criticism (1940) ; John Dewey, Art as Experience (1934) ; are useful compendia Samuel Alexander, Beauty and Other Forms of Value (1933) ; R G. Collingwood, The Principles of Art (1938) are more original essays in the field. K.E.G.

aetiology: See etiology.

affinity, marital impediment of: See marital impediments.

African Methodist Episcopal Church, the: See negro church, the.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, the: See negro church, the.

African Orthodox Church: A colored religious sect founded and headed by George Alexander McGuire, who holds the title of Metropolitan and Primate. McGuire was a priest in the Protestant Episcopal Church, but founded his own denomination when he obtained what he and others regarded as valid orders in apostolic succession* from Joseph Rene Vilatte, who was ordained by Archbishop Alvarey of Ceylon, by permission of the Patriarch of Antioch, Syrian Jacobite Church, to be archbishop of the American Old Catholic Church. McGuire in turn ordained a bishop, who seceded from him and started a rival church in Brooklyn. The African Orthodox Church claims 13 congregations with nearly two thousand members. E.T.C.

affusion: Baptism in the Christian churches has been single and trine, in running and still water and from or in fonts, into or upon the name of Jesus and the Trinity and in three forms: immersion, or dipping; pouring, or affusion, or infusion; and sprinkling, or aspersion. C.H.M.

agape: (Gr. love) Among the Christians of the early centuries the Agape was a common religious meal of fellowship (love-feast*) of uncertain origin. Although at first it was probably a separate rite (possibly a Christian adaptation of similar meals which were quite prevalent in the Mediterranean world), it was frequently associated with the sacrament of the Eucharist, and at times (cf. Ignatius of Antioch) it was assimilated to it. However, from the second century on it was increasingly detached from the sacrament, and in contrast to it was normally celebrated in the evening, and seldom on Sunday. A real meal, not symbolic like the Eucharist,* it was held in private homes or in churches, with a bishop, presbyter, or deacon presiding. According to Hippolytus, the host provided the meal, invited the guests (among them the poor and needy), and expected the guests in return to pray for him. From Tertullian we learn that the meal was preceded by and concluded with prayer. Also, after eating, each one present sang a hymn or psalm, and possibly "prophesied." The function of the Agape was to promote Christian fellowship (love) among those participating, and to unite them in closer relationship with Christ, who was considered to be the unseen head of the table. In this respect it was functionally related to the Eucharist. Increasingly the meal became a charity supper, or else a memorial to the departed, and by the eighth century had practically disappeared. In modern times the Love-Feast, in one form or another, was revived by the Moravians, Mennonites, Dunkards, and other sects, and also was used by the Methodists. See sacramental meal. Also see Lundensian theology. M.R.

agapetae: (Gr. agapetai, beloved) 1) In the 1st century, virgins consecrated to God by a vow of chastity, but so closely associated with laymen that abuses occurred which the Council of Ancyra (314) condemned. 2) Branch of the Gnostics* (395). J.B.C.

Agatha, St.: A Sicilian noblewoman, put to death during the Decian persecution at Catania in A.D. 251 because of her Christian beliefs by Quintianus the Consular of Sicily. S.M.G.

age: According to Jewish time reckoning. Till thirteen years of age and a day a boy is regarded as a minor (Katan) and legally incompetent. Thereafter, provided he shows certain signs of physical maturity, he reaches his legal majority. In the case of a girl, minority ceases at the age of 12 years and a day, but her full legal competency begins 6 months after that. Mishnah Abot 5:21 which lists the various ages of man, makes 18 the proper age for marriage. The Biblical conception of the span of life is expressed in Ps. XC, 10 "The days of our years are three score and ten . . . and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years . . ." Similarly in the Talmud,* "If one dies at 80, one has reached old age" (Baba Batra 75 a). B.Z.B.

age, canonical: The age at which by canon law* the Church permits the faithful to receive the Sacraments, e.g., or requires them to fast. L.R.W.

ages: See aeon; culture epochs; cycles of time; golden age.

Agnes, St.: Roman virgin martyr of the persecution of Diocletian, venerated as a model of purity and patron of young girls. E.R.H.

Agni: The Vedic god of fire, whether the hearth fire, lightning or the sun. He was the priest god since it was through fire that the offerings were transmitted to the gods. He also had definite ethical functions as forgiver and punisher of sin. See Fire Gods. C.S.B.

Agnoetae: (Gr. not omniscient) In the 4th century, a sect which denied that God remembered the past without reflection or knew the future with any certainty. Sometimes called Theophronians, from their leader Theophronius of Cappadocia. In the 6th century, a sect of the Monophysites* which asserted that in some respects the human soul of Christ was not all-knowing. Sometimes called Themistians, after the deacon Themistius who first adopted the view. S.M.G.

agnosticism: (Gr. a-, not, and gignoskein, to know) The belief that certain knowledge has not been attained, either in some particular field (usually the religious), or in any and all fields of supposed knowledge. Agnosticism often shades into skepticism,* but the agnostic leaves open the possibility of future knowledge, while the skeptic (except for the methodological type) denies any such possibility. The term "agnostic" was first used by T. Huxley in 1869 (OED); he based it on Acts 17 23. E.S.B.

agnus dei: (Lat., Lamb of God) 1) The figure of a lamb, symbolizing Jesus (John 1, 29) as the sacrificial victim for the world's sins. 2) The liturgical invocation, "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us," used in the Mass* or service of Holy Communion. P.V.N.

Agobard: (769-840) Scholar, saint. Archbishop of Lyons, 816. He opposed 'weathermaking,' judicial ordeals, Jews, allegorization of worship, assisted the revolt against Charlemagne's successor, Louis.

agrapha: "Things unwritten", the technical term for sayings of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels. Several of them are found elsewhere in the NT (e.g. Ac. 20 35. 1 Thess. 4 15), others in the Apocryphal Gospels, most of them in the early Fathers. Recent discoveries, chiefly in Egypt, have brought to light a number of sayings ascribed to Jesus, and two leaves of papyrus, found at Oxyrhyncus, were evidently part of a considerable collection of such sayings. The existing agrapha may be reckoned at several hundreds, but very few, perhaps not so many as twenty, have any real claim to authenticity.
A Resch, Agrapha (1897, 1906); M James, The Apocryphal N. T. (1924); B Pick, Paralipomena (1908).   E.F.S.

Agricola, Johannes: (1494-1566) German Reformer, was involved in bitter controversy with Luther over antinomianism.* He was later influential and active at the court of Brandenburg. G.R.C.

ahimsa: Variously translated as harmlessness, non-injury, non-killing. A Hindu doctrine expressive of the oneness and sacredness of all life, human and sub-human, it is held with various degrees of strictness by different Indian religious groups. It is observed more rigorously in Buddhism than Hinduism generally, but most strictly of all by the Jains.* Mr. Gandhi's technique of non-violent non-cooperation is a political adaptation of the principle. C.S.B.

Ahriman (Angra Mainyu): Personified principle of evil and opposed to Ormazd. See Persia, religions of; Zoroastrianism.   V.F.

Ahura Mazda: See Ormazd.

Ajivikas: A humanistic sect of Hinduism founded by Gosala Mankhali-putta in the sixth century B.C. Closely similar to Jainism, but differing chiefly in their rigorous doctrine of determinism; and in certain moral practices.   C.S.B.

Akbar: (1542-1605) Third of the Moghul Emperors of India, 1556-1605. A Moslem by birth and training he was remarkably tolerant for his age. In his Hall of Worship he presided over religious discussions participated in by Hindus, Moslems, Christians, Atheists, Jews, Parsis and others. He founded a new eclectic religion which he called "The Divine Faith."   C.S.B.

Akiba: (c. 50-c. 135) One of the greatest of the Palestinian Tannaim* or early teachers of the Law.* The first 40 years of his life Akiba spent in complete ignorance; however, at the urging of his wife, Rachel, he devoted himself to the study of the Law and, after 12 years, was recognized as a master. He systematized the accepted Halakah* (religious practice) of his day and propounded new hermeneutic principles which greatly expanded the scope of the Halakah and facilitated its development. Akiba's genius also made itself felt in philosophy, in Haggadah* and in contemporary political events. He, more than anyone else, merits the title "father of Rabbinic Judaism." See rabbinism.
                                                              E.B.-L.F.

Akron theatre plan: See church building.

alb: A long tunic, often worn under other vestments*, in the East of any color, in the West usually and in modern times invariably white, hence the name (Lat. alba).   E R.H.

Albert of Brandenburg: (1490-1545) Elector and archbishop of Mainz. Against the abuses of an indulgence granted him by Leo X,* Luther made his famous protest. Albert was one of the more liberal Catholic princes during the Reformation struggles and a patron of art and learning. G.R.C.

Albert, the Great (Albert of Bollstädt): See Albertus Magnus.

Albert of Prussia: (1490-1568) Grand master of the Teutonic Order. He accepted the Reformed faith, and transformed Prussia into an hereditary duchy. As first duke he influenced the fortunes of Reformation in eastern Europe.   G.R.C.

Albertus Magnus: Albert was born at Lauingen, Suabia, in 1206, the eldest son of the Count of Bollstadt. He attended the University of Padua, and from there entered the Dominican Order* in 1223. After teaching in several German cities, he came to Paris in 1245, where he remained for three years and received his doctorate in theology. His next twelve years were filled with teaching and administrative duties. In 1260 he was named bishop of Ratisbon. He continued active until his memory failed in 1278. Death followed two years later in 1280. Pius XI named him Doctor and extended his feast to the universal Church. One of the greatest minds of the thirteenth century, Albert's writings cover a great scope. His interest and achievements in the experimental sciences were phenomenal for his time. He is also justly famous as the man who recognized the genius of the young Thomas Aquinas.*
T M Schwertner, St. Albert the Great (1932); J. Sighart, Albert the Great (tr from the French by T. A Dixon, London, 1876).   P.S.M.

Albigenses: A body of heretics in S. France, named after the town Albi, in 11th-13th centuries, a branch of the Cathari.* Their external anti-clerical criticism was the main cause of their persecution. The ecclesiastical authorities discovered, however, that they held Manichaean* doctrines and followed Manichaean practices. For long this was regarded as an invention of the Church of Rome, but the work of A. V. Williams Jackson and F. C. Burkitt in recent years has established the truth of this "charge." The result is a mystical asceticism, based on the concept of the evil of matter and of light as the only good. The best summary of their doctrine of salvation is the 18th century hymn "Eternal Light, Eternal Light."   F.W.B.

Albo, Joseph: (1380-1444) Largely rehashing the problems which occupied Maimonides,* Gersonides and Crescas, he was a popularizer rather than an original follower of his teacher Crescas. For Albo the defense against Christian polemicists became an even more outspoken issue. He formulated an orthodox Jewish theology, the Book of Principles (Heb. Sefer Ha-Ikkarim). Living in an age of religious disputations and forced conversions, he defended Judaism against Christianity, showing his people that Judaism is the true religion. The establishment of essential dogmas was his central theme. He contends that divine religion is based upon three general principles: existence of God, revelation, reward and punishment after death. Then there are special or derived principles peculiar to a particular religion, following from the initial general principles. He refutes Christian principles against Judaism as errors in fact, not as errors in approach.

S. Back, Joseph Albos Bedeutung in der Geschichte der jüdischen Religionsphilosophie (Breslau, 1869), Husik, I, Sefer Ha-Ikkarim. 5 vols Critically edited on the basis of Hebrew manuscripts and old editions and provided with a translation and notes (1929-1930), I. Husik, "Joseph Albo, the last of the Jewish Mediaeval Philosophers," in Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research (1930); A. Tänzer, Die Religionsphilosophie Joseph Albos nach seinem Werke Ikkarim systematisch dargestellt und erlautert (Frank a. M., 1896). H.H.

Albright, Jacob: See Evangelical Church, the.

Alcuin: (735-804) Born England. Greatest scholar of his age. Master Charlemagne's Court school, superintended his educational program. Opposed adoptionism.* Revised the Vulgate. Sought conversion of Invaders by evangelization, not force. See scholasticism. R.E.E.H.

Alden-Tuthill Lectureship, The: To provide each year a series of lectures at the Chicago Theological Seminary upon the subject of religion on some frontier of modern life. Founded, 1925. Among the distinguished lecturers have been Dr. Richard C. Cabot, the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Professor William E. Hocking, Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, Dean Willard L. Sperry, Professor John C. Bennett, and Professor Halford E. Luccock. F.E.

Aldhelm, Saint: (ca. 640-749) Anglo-Saxon abbot, bishop and scholar. Introduced Benedictine rule and extended influence of Roman Christianity in southern England. Wrote flowery prose and poetry. Most famous work: 101 riddles in Latin hexameters. E.C.K.

Alexander, St., Bishop of Alexandria: (A.D. c. 273-326) The ecclesiastical superior of Arius* and initiator from the orthodox standpoint of the Arian Controversy; the patron and episcopal predecessor also of Athanasius.* Theologically Alexander seems to have belonged to the anti-"scientific" school of Christian thought that had arisen in Alexandria early in the fourth century and that may have been rooted in earlier developments. While not uninfluenced by one side of Origen's* thought (cf. Athanasius) and not accustomed to express itself precisely in the terms of the Nicene theology, its position is essentially that of the Creed of A.D. 325. Indeed the ultimate debt of the Nicene* position to Alexander is very great.

Harnack (History of Dogma, vol. IV) gives the best account of Alexander's doctrinal standpoint See also J H Newman, The Arians of the Fourth Century (1833) Alexander's "Epistles on the Arian Heresy" are printed in English in The Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. VI Cf Bibliography given under the article "Arianism." C.W.L.

Alexander of Hales: (died ca. 1245) Through his powerful incomplete Summa universae theologicae, he is the founder of scholasticism in the strict sense. It is a large handbook of speculative theology, dialectically elaborated. His theory of principles elaborates the thoughts of Augustine, Anselm and Hugo of St. Victor in accordance with Aristotelian categories. Scholasticism owes to him the perfection of a teaching method in philosophy and theology, namely the triple division of a question into the pro, the contra, and the resolutio; and the application of dialectic to dogma. His view on religious knowledge became normative for the entire older school of Franciscans.

J. A. Endres, "Des Alexander von Hales Leben und psychologische Lehre," Philosophisches Jahrbuch (Fulda, 1888), F. J. Picavet, "Abélard et Alexandre de Halès, créateurs de la méthode scholastique," Sciences Religieuses, vols. V, VI (Paris, 1894, 1895). H.H.

Alexander III, Pope: (1159-1181) Born of a famous Sienese family, Orlando Bardinelli distinguished himself as a canonist (Commentary on the Decretum Gratiani, cf. "Decretals") at Bologna. In 1150 he was called to Rome by Pope Eugene III where he was successively created Cardinal Deacon, Cardinal Priest and Papal Chamberlain. As trusted adviser of Adrian IV* he was regarded as the soul of the independent party of cardinals who sought to escape the German yoke by allying the Church with the Normans of Naples. For openly asserting before Frederick Barbarossa at the Diet of Besancon (1157) that the imperial dignity was a papal Beneficium (in the general sense of favor, not feudal sense of fief) he incurred the wrath of the German princes and would have fallen on the spot under the battleaxe of his life-long foe, Otto of Wittelsbach, had Frederick not intervened. Despite the emperor's influence over the cardinals, exercised especially by the afore-said Otto of Wittelsbach and Rainald von Dassel, Cardinal Orlando received 19 out of a possible 22 votes for the papacy and took the name of Alexander III. Cardinal Ottavian, although receiving only the remaining three votes, was crowned as Anti-Pope,* Victor IV (1159-1164). Alexander responded to the packed Assembly at Pavia, that was to decide between the two contenders for the tiara, by promptly excommunicating from Anagni the emperor, Feb. 11, 1160 and by releasing the latter's subjects from their oath of allegiance. From now on the pope allied himself with the Lombard League (cf. "Guelfs and Ghibellines") which erected in his honor the city of Alessandria. The ensuing schism, far more disastrous to the empire than to the papacy, despite the creation of three additional anti-popes: Paschal III (1164-1168); Callixtus III (1168-1179) and Innocent III (1179-1180), lasted seventeen years and ended only after the Battle of Legnano, 1176 and the unconditional surrender of the haughty Barbarossa, in Venice, 1177. That the pope on this occasion placed his foot on the emperor's neck is a childish legend.

While an exile in France (1162-1165) Alexander came in direct contact with Henry II of England, at that time the most powerful monarch of the West. The pope was notably drawn into the controversy between the king and Thomas of Becket* regarding the rights of the Church of England and lived to see Henry penitentially praying for pardon at the tomb of the martyred Archbishop of Canterbury. Alexander III's crowning triumph for the Church was the celebration of the Third Lateran Council (cf. "Lateran Councils") in 1179, attended by 300 bishops, in which the famous decree was enacted reserving henceforth the election of a pope exclusively to a two-thirds majority vote of the cardinals. The pope died shortly thereafter, Aug. 30, 1181. Alexander III was a learned canonist, not inferior to Boniface VIII (cf. "Unam Sanctam") or Innocent III*; a diplomatic strategist and an energetic defender of the liberties of the Church.

His letters were published by Jaffé, in Regesta Roman Pontif., nos 10584-14424 and by Lowenfeld, Epistolae Pontif. Roman. ineditae (Leipzig, 1885). Other sources; Liber Pontificalis (edit Duchense) II, 394-446. cf. ib. Preface, p. XLII-XLIII and Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, 2, V, 520-720.   R.M.H.

Alexander, Samuel: (1859-1938) Developed the famous distinction between deity and God. Deity is the fact that just beyond any level of evolution a new emergent level is to arise. God is the universe conceived as possessing deity. He regards human consciousness as being in a sense deity, and holds at the same time that the human spirit is deity, not for man, but for the lower level, body. The human soul is deity for the body. In the next stage of cosmic evolution some unimaginable, yet inevitable superman is deity for man. God is not identical with human aspiration, but is an objective character of nature as a whole. God is objectively real.

Space, Time, and Deity. 2 vols. (London, 1920).
H.H.

Alexandrian Library: The most famous of ancient libraries, founded by Ptolemy I, in connection with the Museum, a group of scholars supported by the state. It was greatly enlarged by his son Philadelphus, and his librarian Demetrius of Phalerum, who proposed to assemble in it copies of all the books in the world. He told the king he already had 200,000 rolls, and hoped soon to have 500,000. Seneca says 400,000 books were burned during Caesar's campaign at Alexandria, but the Library was reestablished, and Aulus Gellius, in the second century after Christ, says it contained 700,000 books. It was for this library, according to Jewish tradition, (Letter of Aristeas) that the Septuagint version* of the Jewish scriptures (probably meaning the Law of Moses, Gen.-Deut.) was made. The smaller library, in the Serapeum, was probably destroyed by the Patriarch Theophilus, about A.D. 390, along with the Serapeum, though others (following Abu'l Faraj—Barhebraeus—14th century) say it survived until A.D. 641, when the Caliph Omar had the books burned to heat the baths of Alexandria. On the whole, the fate of the Alexandrian libraries remains obscure. The Great Library was headed by a succession of distinguished scholars.   E.J.G.

Alexandrian (Coptic) rite: The complexus of liturgical and disciplinary laws and customs originally used in the patriarchate of Alexandria. Variants of this rite are followed by the Monophysite Copts (1,120,000 in Egypt, 2,700,000 in Ethiopia) and by Catholic Egyptians and Ethiopians (59,000). The Orthodox Coptic Melchites* follow since the 13th century the Byzantine rite.*   E.A.R.

Alexandrian school: The provisions made at Alexandria for the training of the catechumens* led to the development of a Christian university there under the inspiring succession of Pantaenus (died 202), Clement (died 220), and Origen (died 254). Its chief characteristics were an allegorical method of Scriptural interpretation, and a speculative type of theology under the influence of Greek philosophy and especially of Philo.* The influence of this spirit was widespread in the East, and the term Alexandrian School is commonly used to designate those who reveated this spirit, whether they were actually Alexandrians or not. See allegorical interpretation.   A.K.R.

Alexians: The name given to the Alexian Brothers. At Mechlin, in Brabant, in the 15th century during the "Black Death," a number of laymen, taking no vows or rule of life, united under a certain Tobias to care for the sick. Later this group chose as a patron St. Alexius, who had served in the hospitals in Syria for many years, and they called themselves the Alexian Brothers. The order spread rapidly through Germany, Brabant, Flanders, and other countries. At present they have several hospitals in the United States, as well as others in England and Belgium.   T.T.M.

Alfarabi: (died 950) One of the famous Arabs who attempted to harmonize Hellenistic philosophy and Mohammedan* mysticism. He recognized the need of logic for islamitic speculation, at the same time he found great support in Neo-Platonism* for his Sufi* mysticism. Alfarabi anticipated many of the doctrines of Avicenna and Averroes. His interpretation of the human soul as an activation of the light emanating from a cosmic intellect, clearly antedates Averroes' doctrine of the mind. Alfarabi's logical treatises, his commentaries and his De Ortu Scientiarum were greatly used in the Middle Ages.   S.C.T.

Alfred the Great: (849-899) King of the West Saxons (871-), warrior and Christian scholar. Alfred is culturally important for his translations of Orosius, Boethius, Bede, Gregory the Great, etc., and for his promotion of education.   J.T.M.

Algazali; Al-Ghazzali: (1059-1111)The greatest theologian of Islam.* Professor at the Nizamite Academy at Baghdad four years, he abandoned his career for a pilgrimage in search of certainty. Widely learned in the knowledge of his age, his work has been compared with that of St. Augustine in Christianity. His chief work Ihya Ulum ad-Din (The resuscitation of the sciences of religion).

D B. Macdonald, Muslim Theology (1903).

P.G.M.

Al-Kindi or Alchindus: (d. 870) Arabian astrologer and physician at the court of Al-Mamoon, Caliph of Bagdad. He considered science, mathematics and logic as the proper approach to philosophy, and made Aristotle accessible to his followers. In his own theology he was a Neoplatonist.*

P.E.J.

Allah: (Contraction of Arabic al-ilah, meaning the god, or the worshipped) The proper name for God in Islam. The term seems to have been used by Arabians in ancient times as a supreme god, and since the reforms of Mohammed as the only God. The first article in the Moslem creed declares, "There is no God but Allah." It is also used as the name for God by Arabic-speaking persons of other faiths, as Syrian Christians. See Mohammedanism.

P.E.J.

allegorical interpretation: When a book, or collection of books, from the past is regarded as an inspired, authoritative standard of religious belief and conduct, it becomes necessary to reinterpret it to fit later beliefs and practices, disregarding its literal or plain meaning. Many ingenious methods of reinterpretation are resorted to, among them the allegorical by which a hidden, symbolic, metaphorical, "spiritual" meaning is discovered beneath the literal. Thus the later Greeks rationalized, thereby retaining, the Homeric myths (likewise the myth of Isis and Osiris) by finding in them a veiled but highly significant religious, philosophical, and ethical teaching through allegorization. Similarly, the Jews of Palestine, in accommodating the inspired words of Scripture to later times, adopted various types of interpretation, including the allegorical. Allegorical exegesis, however, was much more widely applied by the Hellenistic Jews, among them Philo* of Alexandria, confronted as they were by the necessity of reconciling their inherited faith with the Hellenistic thought which they had appropriated. The first Christians accepted the Jewish Scripture as binding and authoritative, but made it so by allegorizing it, finding underneath the literal meaning veiled prophecies concerning Christ and the new dispensation. Still later Christians, such as Justin, Clement, and Origen, by using the Philonic method of exegesis, accommodated the O.T. to the developing theology, which was increasingly Hellenistic in character. In time parts of the N.T. were allegorized, with Augustine,* for example, reading the entire scheme of salvation into the parable of the Good Samaritan. Allegorical exegesis of the Bible dominated the succeeding centuries, and is widely used even today; but needless to say is rejected by modern biblical scholarship. See Alexandrian school; anagogical interpretation; exegesis; literal interpretation; types.

The following monographs, though somewhat old, have not been superseded F. W Farrar, History of Interpretation (1886) ; G H Gilbert, Interpretation of the Bible A Short History (1908) allegory: (Gr. allegoria) Literally a description of one thing under the image of another. Although in popular usage often confused with parable,* the two are essentially dissimilar. The parable sets one thing against another, the allegory substitutes one thing for another. A properly constructed parable must be true to life, must picture people acting as people really act, and normally seeks to make but one point clear. For the allegory no such requirement exists. Justice may be depicted with veiled eyes though she holds in her hands scales which she must read. Every detail of an allegory (unlike a parable) is added, not because it is needed for the story, but to mean something, to represent something else which the teller wishes to represent. Thus frequently the allegory (unlike the parable) is of great length. This form of figurative speech is ancient and has been popular in the literatures of most nations. Examples from antiquity are provided in the allegory of the Vine (Ps. 80), the Door (John 10), and the so-called Similitudes in the Shepherd of Hermas. Among the most elaborate and sustained examples are Spenser's Faerie Queene and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

M.R.

By allegorical interpretation is meant the attempts by later readers to treat as allegory what was not originally so intended. This type of pseudo-exposition has been common among all peoples of all ages. Familiar examples may be seen in the transmutation of some of the more robust stories from Homer into philosophical principles and in the Jewish and Christian treatment of the Song of Songs. Other examples of this universal tendency may be seen in the writings of Philo Judæus and in the Epistle of Barnabas. See exegesis; interpretation; types.

B. T. D. Smith, The Parables of the Synoptic Gospels (1937).

M.S.E.

alleluia: A responsorial chant used in the mass* every Sunday except during Lent. The word Alleluia occurs in neumatic style with an elaborate melisma on the last vowel. See plainsong; psalmody.

E.H.B.

Alliance of Reformed Churches: "The Alliance of the Reformed Churches Throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian System," i.e. Reformed* or Calvinistic churches of Presbyterian polity, was formed in London in 1875. It held "the First Presbyterian General Council" in Edinburgh in 1877. Its general councils are quadrennial. It is divided into Sections pertaining to hemispheres, Eastern and Western. The Sections hold annual meetings. The councils and meetings are for conference and have no ecclesiastical authority.

R.H.N.

All Saints' Day: November 1, each year, is observed in the Roman, Anglican and various other Christian groups as a day upon which saints, not otherwise mentioned by name in the calendar, and those whose names are not known in the Church

Militant, are commemorated. In recent years, Protestant denominations have also observed the day.   W.N.P.

All Souls' Day: A day set apart each year in the Roman, Anglican and other non-Protestant Christian groups for the commemoration of "holy souls" who have departed this life, and are in the intermediate state awaiting their final end. The day is observed with solemn services, usually including requiem masses. November 2 is normally the date, in the calendars of churches of western Christendom. See necrology, requiem.   W.N.P.

alms and almsgiving: See charity and almsgiving.

Alogi: A name given in contempt to those who rejected the Logos doctrine of the Fourth Gospel. They flourished towards the end of the 2nd century, and their leader seems to have been one Gaius, against whom Hippolytus wrote a book which is now lost. The word "alogos" has the double meaning of "opposed to the Logos" and "devoid of reason."
E. J Goodspeed, Early Christian Literature (1942).   E.F.S.

alphabetic writing: System of writing invented in the second millenium B. C. (?) by the Semites or the Egyptians, which greatly improved upon the ideographic and syllabic writings by discriminating between consonantal and vocalic sounds. The Ugaritic* alphabet represents a North-Syrian attempt, of cuneiform* appearance, which was later abandoned. The Old Hebrew Alphabet, which is probably derived in part from the script of the Serabit-el-Khadim inscriptions (Sinai), is related to the Phoenician and most of the modern Alphabets. Square Hebrew, in which the Massoretic text* of the OT is written, is an Aramaic transformation of the Old Hebrew Alphabet. See moabite stone; Siloam inscription; and Lachish Ostraca.
H Bauer, Der Ursprung des Alphabets (1937); J. W. Flight, "The Present State of Studies in the History of Writing in the Near East," in The Haverford Symposium on Archeology and the Bible, edited by E. Grant (1938) pp. 111-135   S.L.T.

altar: A place for communicating with a god or the dead by means of sacrifice* or offerings. In early religions, when man found supernatural potencies in many phases of the natural environment offerings were sometimes presented on the ground, on mountain tops, thrown into water or attached to trees wherever these powers were manifest, with no artificial preparation of a sacred place. The constructed altar was a later development. The earliest forms were simple—a natural rock, the ground strewn with a special grass, a mound of earth or a heap of stones. Among the Semites* the altar was a place of slaughter. A natural rock with channels for carrying off the blood, a mound of earth or of unhewn stones surrounded by a trench preceded the elevated cut-stone structure with a wide platform. The presence of the deity was marked by a standing stone smeared with the offering. The fire altar, the altar of incense came later when gifts to the god were burned. The bronze altars of Solomon's* temple may show Phoenician influence. The Indo-European altar was a ritually-prepared sacred place strewn with grass. In India, the importance of the sacrifice and the ingenuity of the priests produced elaborate structures embodying symbolism in their form and manner of building. In China the local altars from earliest times have been mounds of earth. In the state cult, however, the mound was replaced by imposing marble altars in the annual sacrifices to Heaven and Earth. The altar of Heaven was circular with three terraces, the altar of Earth square with two terraces. Since the early gods of the religions were nature powers, the altars were originally in the open air. They range in form from the simple rock or mound to the magnificent sculptured altars of Greece, China's dignified altar of Heaven and the Brahmanic fire altar which took a year to build. Wherever the deity was enshrined in a temple, the altar took the form of a table. Sacrifice by slaughter and burning yielded to more subtle, symbolic forms of communion. The altar of the eucharist, the "Lord's Table"* of the Christian church retains the sacrificial idea in refined form. See blood, dancing; sanctuary; temples.   A.E.H.

altar bread: Bread specially prepared for the Eucharist, whether unleavened (West and Armenian Church) or leavened (East); in Anglicanism the use of unleavened altar bread was among the customs revived in the 19th century. Wafer is a purely popular term for the Western form of unleavened altar bread. See ritualism.   E.R.H.

altar-fellowship: A term popular among the Lutherans in referring to participation in the Eucharist as signifying unity of faith, mixed altar-fellowship being synonymous with "open communion" and unmixed altar-fellowship with "close communion."* See Galesburg Rule.   T.A.K.

Althaus, Paul: (1888-) He first taught in Rostock. Now he is at the University of Erlangen. A leader of confessional Lutheranism, he has been laboring in giving its theological heritage a new form. As a systematic theologian, he has reinforced the theological consciousness of the study of the NT; the use of the religious-historical material in hermeneutic investigations. With Heim,* he regards the rearrangement of apologetic principles and analyses indispensable. He is the leading theologian of the group theologia militans, a group which showed for some time noticeable resistance to Nazi ideology. In contrast to Barth* he upholds the traditional concept of general revelation. He has important ideas about the dialectical tension between creation and sin, eternity and history. His views on the doctrine of the divine orders renders the prospect of a Christian social ethic more adequately possible. His greatest contribution is to eschatology in which field he wrote the most important work of our time.
Die Prinzipien der deutschen reformierten Scholastik (Leipzig, 1914); Das Erlebnis der Kirche (Leipzig, 1919, 2 ed., Leipzig, 1924); Religiöser Sozialismus (Gütersloh, 1921); Die letzten Dinge (Gütersloh, 1922, 4 ed , Gütersloh, 1933) ; Staatsgedanke und Reich Gottes (Erlangen, 1923, 4 ed , Erlangen, 1931) , Die Krise der Ethik (Berlin, 1926) ; Die Weltreligionen und das Christentum (Munchen, 1928) , Grundriss der Dogmatik (Erlangen, 1929) , Christentum und Kultur (Leipzig, 1929) , Theologische Aufsätze (Gutersloh, 1929) ; "Die Theologie" in K Schweitzer Das religiöse Deutschland der Gegenwart (Berlin, 1930) ; Grundriss der Ethik (Erlangen, 1931) , Unsterblichkeit und ewiges Leben bei Luther (Leipzig, 1931) , Theologie der Ordnungen (Gutersloh, 1934) ; Politisches Christentum (Leipzig, 1935) , A. Beyer, Offenbarung und Geschichte (Schwerin, 1932) , K. E. Olimart, Der Begriffe der Schöpfungsordnung in der Ev. Theologie der Gegenwart (Essen, 1933).   H.H.

Amana Community, the: Located in Iowa County, Iowa, originally composed of pietistic Germans, dates from 1714 when Eberhard Ludwig Gruber, a Lutheran clergyman and Johann Friedrich Rock, rebelling against the formalism of German Lutheranism, withdrew from the Church and formed what they called the Community of True Inspiration. Persecution drove them to America (1842) where they purchased land in Erie County, New York, established several villages, built numerous industries and cultivated the soil on a large scale. Their way of life was completely communistic and they prospered. The rapid growth of the City of Buffalo, threatening their isolation led them to remove to Iowa in 1854. Here they established seven villages, instituted manufacturing enterprises, and placed under cultivation many thousands of acres in one of the garden spots of Iowa. In 1832, by unanimous vote of the members of the community their communistic organization gave way to a Joint Stock Company and religion and business were completely separated. This was made necessary not only because of changing economic and social conditions surrounding them, but also because of the waning of the old religious idealism and the gradual departure from the spiritual enthusiasm of their fathers. See communistic settlements, religious.
Bertha M. H. Shambaugh, Amana, The Community of True Inspiration (1908) ; and Amana that Was and Amana That Is (1932).   W.W.S.

Amarites, the: See communistic settlements, religious.

Amarna: See Tell-el-Amarna Tablets.

Amaterasu-Omikami: (Lit. "Heaven-shining Great August Deity") The primitive Japanese sun goddess. Worshipped now as the head of the imperial line and the founder of the state.   D.C.H.

ambo: (Gr., ambon, a platform) A pulpit, reached by steps, from which the liturgical lections were sung in the ancient basilica churches. Frequently there were two, on the south for the Epistle, on the north for the Gospel.   P.V.N.

Ambrose of Milan (340-397) One of the notable of the exegetes, hymn-writers and orators of the early Christian Church. Forming the bridge which led from Cyprian* to St. Augustine,* Ambrose, the bishop of Milan, was energetically engaged in the expansion and defense of inherited Christian doctrines. Noticeable intimations and beginnings of Augustine's theology are found in his views: that faith rests upon biblical authorities, that the authoritatively transmitted truth can be to some degree rationally explained, of the relation between auctoritas and ratio; the receding of the legalistic view of religion, of lex and merita; on the expansion of Adam's sin and guilt in the race by physical propagation, on the effects of Christ's work; an emphasis on the iustificatio sola fide; on baptism, repentance and the church. His writings and those of his contemporaries disclose also the growing invasion of the influence of the Epistle to the Romans into occidental thought. See Gregorian chant, hymns.

Th. Forster, Ambrosius (Halle, 1884) , J Tixeront, Histoires des dogmes, vol. 2 (Paris, 1906-1912)   H.H.

Ambrosian chant: A form of chant* characteristic of the Milanese rite, the origin of which is traditionally ascribed to St. Ambrose*   P.V.N.

Ambrosians: The name given to an order founded under the patronage of St. Ambrose* by Alexander Givelli, Antonio Petrasancta, and Albert Besazzi near Milan. In 1375 Gregory XI gave them the rule of St. Augustine modified by certain special constitutions. The new order took the name of Fratres Sancti Ambrosii ad Nemus. They followed the Ambrosian rite in liturgy and their duties included preaching and apostolic labors. In 1441 Eugenius IV merged all Ambrosian monasteries whose sole bond of union hitherto had been their unity of custom. In 1579 St. Charles Borromeo reformed the discipline of the order; in 1589 Sixtus V united the Brothers of St. Barnabas to the Congregation of St. Ambrose. Finally, in 1650, under Innocent X the order was dissolved.   T.T.M.

Ambrosians: 16th century Anabaptist* sect which claimed immediate communication with God through the Holy Ghost. They denied the necessity of ministers, and Ambrose claimed revelations higher in authority than those of Scripture.   G.R.C.

Ambrosiaster: (4th cent.) (Pseudo-Ambrose). A name given to the unknown author of a brief but important commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul, written at Rome sometime during the years 366-384. In the Middle Ages this was commonly ascribed to St. Ambrose.   S.M.G.

amen: (So be it; So it is; Verily) Hebrew word of uncertain origin. In the OT the term is used responsively to give solemn ratification to a doxology,* to a curse or oath; or to some statement that has been made. In the synagogue* (but apparently not in the temple) it was repeated responsively by the congregation after doxologies and following each verse of the priestly benediction. It was not recited after prayers, either public or private, unless these ended with doxologies. Apart from the synagogue usage, individuals were enjoined to repeat it after every doxology, as, for example, those uttered before and after meals. In addition, it might be a responsive ratification of any blessing, expressed desire, wish, curse, or oath. Not unnaturally, it tended to acquire a mystical, almost magical significance. Like the Jews, the Christians from an early time came to use amen liturgically as a response to doxologies, prayers, and hymns (which usually concluded with doxologies). However ,it was not at first repeated after creeds and other liturgical formulae. Further, it was recited responsively after the consecration of the eucharist, upon receiving communion, and following baptisms and exorcisms.* In general, as among the Jews, it indicated solemn assent or ratification. Also, it came to be widely used in private prayers, in anathemas, and in gnostic or magic formulae. In Rev. 3·14 amen is a proper name for the heavenly Christ; similarly, among certain gnostics known to Hippolytus it is the name of an angel. In the synoptic gospels certain teachings of Jesus are introduced with amen (verily), apparently for the purpose of emphasis. This may well have been a characteristic of Jesus' speech, but the authenticity of the duplication of the amen as reported in John is questionable.   M.R.

Amenemope: See Proverbs.

American Baptist Association: A group of conservative Baptist churches found almost, but not quite, exclusively in the South. They are the survivors of the so-called "Land Mark" Baptists, and claim direct descent from Christ and the apostles, hence "they are the divine custodians of the truth" and "they only have the divine right of carrying out the commands of Jesus as stated in the great commission, and of executing the laws of the kingdom, and of administering the ordinances of the Gospel." In theology these churches are severely fundamentalist. Headquarters are at Texarkana, Ark.-Tex. There are 1,064 churches with 115,000 members, nearly all in the rural areas.   E.T.C.

American Lutheran Church: See Lutheran Church in America.

American Lutheran Conference: See Lutheran Church in America.

American Lutheranism: See Lutheran Church in America.

American Lutheranism: A name given to a movement within the American Lutheran Church led by S. S. Schmucker* beginning in the 1840's, aiming to preserve a highly moderate confessional type of Lutheranism which had become native to America (typified earlier by the body of Lutherans known as the General Synod) as over against a rising tide of conservative and strictly confessional type of Lutheranism. Those holding to the large body of confessional books of the church as normative were given the name of "Old Lutherans." The controversy which raged reflected the European conflict among Lutherans, between the "Symbolists" and "Anti-Symbolists," following the Prussian Plan of Union of Lutheran and Reformed churches of 1817. It also reflected the growing denominational consciousness and rivalry throughout Protestant America of the period. Hosts of conservative German Lutheran immigrants crowded the American Lutheran scene with a flood tide in the thirties, forties and fifties. Schmucker, the American liberal, saw the impending confessional shadow and began his campaign to save his church from falling into traditional forms and provincial isolation. The controversy reached its climax with the anonymous publication of the Definite Synodical Platform in 1855: a work circulated among district synods aimed at uniting American Lutherans on the common confessional ground of a more simple "American Recension of the Augsburg Confession." This pamphlet, a desperate effort on the part of S.S.S. to stem the conservative tide was not only unsuccessful but it tragically hastened the day of the loss of his leadership and it broke ties of friendship. American Lutheranism never rallied from that day to this. See Kurtz, Benjamin, Sprecher, S.

The whole story is written up in The Crisis in American Lutheran Theology (1927), Vergilius Ferm.
                                                              v.f.

American Sunday School Union: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

American theology, early: The theology of the American colonists was naturally that of the European groups from which they sprang. Anglicans professed the Thirty-nine Articles;* Lutherans brought to America the faith set forth in the Augsburg Confession,* and Reformed that of the Heidelberg Catechism,* Congregationalists and Presbyterians adopted the Westminster Confession.*

The Puritans* of New England were the first to develop an American literature in theology. Much of their writing in the seventeenth century had to do with the problems of church polity and discipline, incident to their separation from the Church of England,* their development of "the Congregational way," and their attempt to maintain a theocracy.* After 1662, these problems were increasingly centered about the Half-way Covenant,* with Increase Mather (1639-1723), of Boston and Solomon Stoddard (1643-1729), of Northampton the principal exponents of opposite ways of dealing with those who could give no convincing public evidence of regeneration. Yet from the first the ministers of New England were busied with theology, in the strict sense of the term, as the systematic, methodical exposition of the revelation of God.

The New England Puritans were Calvinists,* not because they attributed any external authority to John Calvin,* but because they found his doctrines to agree with their own study of the Word of God. They stated the truths of the Word in terms that were characteristic of the Federal theology,* with its emphasis upon God's covenant, and its distinction between the covenant of nature or of works and the covenant of grace. This particular way of formulating Christian theology was comparatively new, its principal English founders having been William Perkins (1558-1602), John Preston (1587-1628), and William Ames (1576-1633). The works of these men were much read in New England, and Ames' Medulla Theologiae (1623), or its English translation, The Marrow of Sacred Divinity (1643), was widely used as a theological textbook; as were also John Wollebius' The Abridgement of Christian Divinity, Zacharias Ursinus' The Summe of Christian Religion, and Petro van Mastricht's Theoretico-Practica Theologia. Among books written in New England may be cited, Peter Bulkeley (1582-1659), The Gospel Covenant (1646), John Cotton (1585-1652), The Covenant of God's Free Grace (1645), and others, Thomas Hooker (1586-1647) The Faithful Covenanter (1644), Thomas Shepard (1605-1649), The Sincere Convert (1640); Thomas Cobbett (1608-1685), A Just Vindication of the Covenant (1648).

A comprehensive work was the lectures on theology by Samuel Willard (1640-1707), president of Harvard College, published by two of his students under the title, A Compleat Body of Divinity (1726). A theological best-seller, though hardly a weighty contribution to the subject, was the poem by Michael Wigglesworth (1631-1705), The Day of Doom, first published in 1662, going through many editions, and reprinted in New York as late as 1867.

The principle of religious liberty was expounded and defended by Roger Williams* (1603-1683), and John Clarke (1609-1676), the founders of the Baptist* churches in America. The democratic genius inherent in Congregationalism* was brought to clear expression in the books by John Wise (1652-1725), entitled The Churches Quarrel Espoused (1710), and A Vindication of the Government of New England Churches (1717). He asserted boldly that "Democracy* is Christ's government in church and State"; that "Power is originally in the people"; and that "By a natural right all men are born free." In 1772, nearly fifty years after his death, his works were reprinted, and two editions were required to meet the demand of a people about to declare their political independence upon the basis of principles such as he had expounded.

A recent study of the sermons preached on the annual election day in each of the New England colonies ,published under the title, The New England Clergy and the American Revolution, shows that for more than one hundred and forty years the ministers of New England had been preaching doctrines with respect to the Sovereignty of God, the moral constitution which He ordained for the universe, the natural rights of man, and the nature and function of government, which are substantially the same as the principles, underlying the Declaration of Independence.

It is often assumed that when the founding fathers of this nation spoke of the laws of nature and of natural rights they meant something atheistic and in opposition to revealed religion. But that was not so. Nothing is more constant in these seventeenth and eighteenth century sermons than their assumption that the laws of nature belong to God, and that there can be no contradiction between God's will as revealed in nature and His will as revealed in the Scriptures.

From the point of view of the sciences the first of the "self-evident truths" stated in our Declaration of Independence is not evident. It is simply not true that all men are created equal. But from the point of view of the law and love of God it is true; and that is the point of view that the authors of the Declaration took. They assumed the equality of men in the light of "the laws of nature and of nature's God." A theological premise underlies and is distinctly avowed in the Declaration of Independence.

The Great Awakening* of the fourth and fifth decades of the 18th century, with its insistence upon religious conversion and its conception of the church as a spiritual institution, emphasized the difference between church and state, and contributed greatly, though indirectly, to the movements which led to their eventual separation, and to the adoption in the American constitutions of the principle of religious freedom. The theologian of the Great Awakening was Jonathan Edwards* (1703-1758), the burden of whose preaching was the absolute sovereignty and holiness of God, the sinfulness and complete dependence of man, the necessity of a changed heart and life, and the power of God's grace to bestow this gift. He preached the gospel of divine immanence and divine initiative. He saw that all things have their being in God, and that a god who is less than the source and power of all being, is but a half-god. This greatest of all truths of religion was bound up, for him, with two other ideas the denial of the freedom of the human will, and the doctrine of particular election,* that God has arbitrarily and irrevocably chosen some for salvation and some for damnation. Edwards had one of the most powerful minds that America has brought forth, and remains its greatest theologian. His theology has philosophical grounding, depth, and poise, and his treatise on The Freedom of the Will has been said to be "the one large contribution which America has made to the deeper philosophic thought of the world."

The Great Awakening was opposed by Charles Chauncy (1705-1787), chiefly upon the ground of its emotional excesses; and he was followed by others who called in question the basic tenets of Calvinism. Among them were Lemuel Briant (1722-1754), and Jonathan Mayhew (1720-1766), and in time this movement culminated, under the leadership of William Ellery Channing* (1780-1842), in the Unitarian* schism of the Congregational churches, and the organization of the American Unitarian Association.

Meanwhile two parties had developed among the ministers of New England who remained on Calvinistic ground, holding positions that were termed orthodox, evangelical, and trinitarian. One of these parties stemmed directly from Jonathan Edwards, and sought to carry his theology to its full logical conclusions and consequences. The outstanding theologians in this party were Joseph Bellamy (1719-1790), and Samuel Hopkins (1721-1803), both pupils of Edwards, and Nathanael Emmons (1745-1767). They developed what was variously known as the "New Divinity," "Consistent Calvinism,"* "Strict Calvinism," or the "Hopkinsian theology."

In opposition to what were regarded as the innovations of these followers of Edwards, was the party which came to be known as "Old Calvin-ists."* Leaders among them in the theological war of pamphlets and books were Jedidiah Mills (1727-1776), Moses Hemmenway (1735-1811), William Hart (1713-1784), and Moses Mather (1719-1806).

From 1797 on, New England experienced what has been called its "Second Great Awakening." This was part of a nation-wide revival of evangelical religion in which practically all denominations shared.

Except on the frontier, this movement differed from the earlier Great Awakening in its relative quiet and lack of extravagances, in the fact that it was not attributable to a few outstanding leaders such as Edwards and Whitefield had been, and in the breadth and permanence of its results. It checked the spread of infidelity, and resulted in a remarkable increase in the membership of the churches. It was responsible for the beginnings of home-missionary effort and of the foreign-missionary enterprise. It led to the founding of Christian colleges and academies and to the establishment of theological seminaries for the training of ministers. It stimulated the organization of philanthropic societies and gave impulse to the beginnings of religious journalism.* In short, the Second Great Awakening set the general pattern which American Protestantism* has followed to this day.

With the dawning of the Nineteenth century, the differences between "Hopkinsians" and "Old Calvinists" tended to be reconciled, and the parties disappeared. This was partly because they shared alike in the Second Awakening and the activities it stimulated, and partly because they were drawn together in a common resistance to Unitarianism. In 1808 men of both parties united in the founding of Andover Theological Seminary. The theology of Timothy Dwight (1752-1817), president of Yale College, and of Nathaniel W. Taylor (1786-1858), first professor of theology in the Yale Divinity School, was practical-minded, preachable, and directed toward the conversion of the sinner. Taylor, in particular, made such "improvements" upon Calvinism that his opponents charged that he had improved it away and substituted for it a new doctrine of the freedom of the will, and suspicion of the "New Haven theology"* had something to do with the division of the Presbyterian Church into Old School and New School assemblies in 1837. Finally, Horace Bushnell* (1802-1876), a pupil of Taylor who refused to be bound by his mathematically logical methods, "challenged men to a new habit of thought." His work marked the passing of the older New England theology* and the opening of a new period in liberal, evangelical thought concerning the great truths of the Christian faith.

Except in New England, there was little or no cultivation of theology in colonial America. Samuel Johnson (1696-1772), first president of King's College, now Columbia University, wrote on philosophy rather than on theology, and the first of the Episcopal ministers, perhaps, who could be recorded as a theologian was Bishop John Henry Hobart (1775-1830), of New York. Among Presbyterians may be named John Witherspoon (1722-1794), president of the College of New Jersey at Princeton, signer of the Declaration of Independence, and Archibald Alexander (1772-1851), and Charles Hodge* (1797-1878), professors in the Princeton Theological Seminary. Henry M. Muhlenberg* (1711-1787), was a pietist and a great practical leader of the Lutheran churches rather than a theologian. Samuel S. Schmucker* (1799-1873), founder of the Lutheran institutions at Gettysburg, devoted his life to the teaching of theology and the education of ministers. He sought to adapt Lutheranism to the needs of America as he saw them, he published plans and proposals looking toward the ultimate unity of the Protestant churches, and he was one of the first advocates of the movement which culminated in the formation in 1846 of the Evangelical Alliance. With the great influx of German immigration in the middle of the century, however, a reaction set in toward a more strict, conservative adherence to the traditional positions of the Lutheran Church. See New England theology, New Haven theology.

The best accounts of early New England theology are in Perry Miller Orthodoxy in Massachusetts (1933), and The New England Mind (1939). The 18th century developments are described in Frank H. Foster A Genetic History of the New England Theology (1907), and George N Boardman, A History of New England Theology (1899). See also Alice M. Baldwin, The New England Clergy and The American Revolution (1928).

Recent biographies of Jonathan Edwards (1940) by Ola Winslow, Timothy Dwight (1942) by Charles E. Cuningham and Nathaniel W. Taylor (1942) by Sidney E Mead are well done and helpful.

Vergilius Ferm: The Crisis in American Lutheran Theology (1927) is the best account of the earlier period of Lutheran theology in America.   L.A.W.

American Tract Society: See religious tract movement.

Americanism: The term applied by Pope Leo XIII in his apostolic letter, Testem Benevolentiae of January 22, 1899, to those methods of apologetics which stressed natural virtues to the neglect of dogmatic teachings and to those notions of spiritual direction which insisted on individual inspiration and the active virtues in preference to external guidance and the passive virtues. Although the letter of condemnation was addressed to Cardinal James Gibbons and the American hierarchy, Cardinal Gibbons in his reply stated that no American bishop, priest or layman properly instructed in his faith had ever held the condemned doctrines. In the background of the condemnation was the attempt of certain European liberals to advocate for general adaptation in Europe, especially in France, the American relation between Church and State. Against this tendency certain theologians pictured these "Americanist" heretical tendencies which they claimed they found in certain American religious activities and in the biography of Father Isaac Hecker* written by Father Walter Elliott and adapted by Father Felix Klein in the French. Pope Leo in his condemnation of the heresy did not say that it existed in America. Furthermore, he specifically excluded from the condemnation American political institutions and those national characteristics common to the American people as a nation.

                                                    T.T.M.

Amesha Spentas: Attendants of Ormazd,* high god in the Zoroastrian religion. Personifications of the character of Ormazd good thought, perfect righteousness, desired kingdom, holy harmony, saving health, and immortality. See s.v. virgin birth. See Persia, religions of, Zoroastrianism. v.F.

Amiatinus, Codex: The leading manuscript of the Latin Vulgate version, written in England about the beginning of the eighth century, and carried to Italy in 716 and presented to the Pope.
It was used in the preparation of the Sixtine edition of the Vulgate,* 1585-1590, and is now in the Laurentian Library in Florence. See manuscripts of the bible.   E.J.G.

amice: (Lat. amictus, clothing) A separate collar worn with the alb.*   E.R.H.

Amish, the: See Mennonites.

Amita: See Buddhist Terminology.

Amon: Wicked king who ruled Judah 641-639
B.C. In one of the most degenerate periods of Judean life, he perpetuated, until assassinated, the paganisms of his father Manasseh. See Manasseh and Zephaniah.   R.E.W.

amora: (from the Hebrew and Aramaic, Amar, to "say" or "speak") Official title for a teacher or lecturer who expounded the Mishnah* in use from the time of the death of Judah I (219) to the completion of the Babylonian Talmud (500).   B.Z.B

Amorites: See Canaanites.

Amos: Earliest OT prophetic book, containing poems recited by this Judean shepherd of Tekoa while visiting northern Israel about 750 B.C., possibly one long address delivered at Bethel (Morgenstern), but probably excerpts from at least twelve poetic sermons uttered in Samaria, Gilgal, Bethel, etc. In a peak of prosperity, social degeneracy had weakened the moral life until Amos feared Israel would be destroyed by foreign aggressors. He sacrificed his vocation to warn his sister-nation, hoping to save her from impending doom by reforming her life. After intensive ministry of a few months, he probably was executed following a clash with Priest Amaziah of Bethel. His revolutionary ideas were 1) that Yahweh* was a god of justice, 2) that the deity expected people to be just with each other, and 3) that worship was a mockery unless accompanied by ethical living. Although still a henotheist,* strictly speaking, Amos ridiculed Israel's belief that she was Yahweh's chosen people and paved the way for internationalism and monotheism.* He was a literary master, founder of the line of eight century prophets, and pioneer in the social gospel.
    See The Prophets and their Times (1941), by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin, pp. 55-69 and Amos Studies (1941), by J. Morgenstern.   R.E.W.

amphictyony: (Gr. amphiktyonia, from amphi-ktiones, dwellers round about) A religious association of Greeks worshipping at the same shrine. The most important was that of Delphi, which maintained the temple of Apollo at Delphi and that of Demeter at Thermopylae. In legend it was founded by Amphictyon, son of Deucalion and brother of Hellen, ancestor of the Greeks.   E M.N

ampullae: (Lat. ampullae, bottles) Jars or bottles in early times for holy oils, or in mediaeval times the jars in which pilgrims sometimes carried oil from shrines.   L.R.W.

amulets: See charms and amulets.

Amyraldians: See Cameron, John.

Anabaptists: A name of abuse frequently used in the Reformation period. Properly and often loosely applied to any who questioned the validity of infant baptism. Anabaptism emerged at the end of 1521 when three "prophets" (of whom Muenzer was the most prominent) came to Wittenberg from Zwickau. They attacked the limited scope of Luther's reformation, especially in relation to baptism. Their activities resulted in widespread confusion, and they gained—quite unjustly—the reputation of being wholly opposed to learning. On Luther's return to Wittenberg, his previous attitude of caution gave way to sharp opposition. The Ana-baptists were ejected first from Wittenberg and then from other towns, but spread widely over the country-side During this period, Muenzer* preached with increasing emphasis the revolutionary elements, both religious and political, in his creed, and this phase of the movement reached a crisis in the Peasants' War.* Under Muenzer's leadership, a revolt originally directed against feudal oppression, became an attempt forcibly to erect his ideal Christian community of equality of status and community of goods. The rising was crushed and Muenzer was executed, but the movement immediately sprang up elsewhere. At Munster, the Ana-baptists seized control of the town, and attempted to establish their holy state. Under John of Leiden, the movement ran rapidly to excesses. The apocalyptic element came strongly to the fore. Wild visions were the justification of wild measures, such as polygamy. The excesses of the Munster experiment made the word Anabaptist a term held in widespread horror, and explain its convenience as a means of discrediting religious adversaries. This tendency in part explains the difficulty of tracing the exact course of the movement after the overthrow of the Münster theocracy. There is no doubt of the courage of the Anabaptists under persecution, but it is equally true that many suffered as Anabaptists who really did not merit the name.
This was especially true of the early Baptists.
    Though the Anabaptists are usually regarded as the extreme wing of the Reformation, it is likely that they were as often indebted to earlier sects and movements. In addition to their views on the nature of baptism, the Anabaptists seem to have shared certain other convictions. For example, we often find them holding to a Marcionite* view of the manner of the Incarnation. They repudiated oaths* and believed that Christians should not have recourse to law courts. True Christians were not to bear arms or forcibly resist evil men. They were to obey the authorities, but Government belonged to the province of the world, and so Christians should not hold office. The Anabaptists held strict views as to the exclusion of unworthy members from the Christian society. Some indeed believed that those who are truly baptised cannot sin.

It is important to notice that the early Anabaptists were convinced that religious reform must have social consequences At this point they were clearly in advance of many of the reformers, who were often markedly conservative in political and economic matters. Anabaptism appealed most strongly to the people in the humbler strata of society, and failed to win the support of princes and prosperous townsmen.

It is also necessary to note the existence of moderate Anabaptists in Switzerland, centering chiefly in Zurich. See Ambrosians, Denck, Hofmann, M., Hubmaier.

R Heath, Anabaptism from its rise at Zwickau to 1536 (London, 1897).   G.R.C.

Anacletus: See Peter, St. First Bishop of Rome. Clement, St., Pope.

anagogical interpretation: (Gr. anagogo, to lead upwards) The discovery of hidden spiritual truth in the literal text of Scripture. A type of allegorical interpretation*. See exegesis.   S.M.G.

Anahita: ("the unspotted") Ancient Persian goddess of a river (Yasht 5), who became the goddess of fertility, love, and childbirth.   R.H.P.

analogy: (Gr. ana, according to, logos, ratio, proportion) A similitude in relationship. Thus, to say that God is to his creatures as a father to his children is to describe him by analogy, or proportionally, and similarly, when it is said that God is the poet of the world (Whitehead), or that the world is a divine poem (Peirce). Other theological analogies are. ruler of the universe, heavenly king, "light whose smile kindles the universe" (Shelley), soul of the universe "whose body nature is and God the soul" (Pope). Even such terms as "creator" or "maker of all things" or "first cause" are analogical; for they mean that as the artist to the statue, or as the farmer to his crops, or any agent to the results of his activity, so (with whatever qualifications or differences) is God to things other than God. The earliest known monotheism, the sunworship of Ikhnaton*, seems to have been an implicit analogy· as are the sun's light and warmth to the growth and happiness of living things on earth (assuming that the sun is a conscious being aware of what it does), so is God to men and all beings. Since the natures of things are essentially relational, except perhaps for such simple qualities of feeling as redness or sweetness (Peirce*), there is probably no sharp line between analogical and non-analogical similarity. Hence when it is said (as by Thomas Aquinas) that qualities cannot be ascribed to God and the creatures in the same sense but only analogically, it may be asked if this is not usually the case when properties are ascribed to diverse things. Is not all similarity "with a difference" and in relation to something? Men and dogs are fathers, not in the same sense but analogically. The "kindness" of a wife and a business partner are not wholly the same The problem is always to define the exact scope and limits and relational reference to each resemblance. But whatever the qualifications, some abstract feature or ratio in common is implied, and this common feature must not be denied if anything is to be left of the analogy. If God is Father, he must not at the same time be in every specifiable respect other than fatherly, on pretext that similarity to a father in such respects would be "anthropomorphic".

The theological use of analogy is exposed to failure in three ways. through vagueness, through inappropriateness, and through self-contradiction. The last arises through the effort to avoid the first two. For example, there are many sorts of fathers, and no one would think that there was any complete proportion between the relations, child-father and creature-creator. Hence the fatherhood of God, if not further explained, has at best only vague meaning. But by thinking of a quite definite sort of human father, say the best one knows or can imagine, it is possible to give definite meaning to "heavenly father." However, this definiteness may be at the expense of the mode of superhuman excellence or perfection which also one wishes to ascribe to God. Thus an inconsistency or vacillation arises, by which one avoids a too vague analogy only by falling into an objectionably anthropomorphic one, and then, when the anthropomorphism* is noted, takes refuge again in the vagueness. The intellectual integrity of theology stands or falls with the finding or failure to find a remedy for this too long customary but scandalous procedure. The proposition that God knows and loves the creatures and has purposes for them can be given definite meaning, but if at the same time it be insisted that God is totally immutable and unaffected by anything temporal or contingent, and thus is exactly as he would be did the creatures not exist at all, then what is left of the definiteness? One who purposes something is one whose anticipatory plan precedes the something in time; with God, it has been usual to say, there is no such precedence, since he possesses the fulfillment of his plan from all eternity. One might go on with other features of the theological analogy, as traditionally treated, and show that all are similarly nullified. As Kant* showed, all our meanings involve space and time, and if God (as Kant believed, though here without proof) is simply nonspatial and non-temporal, then he is for us unknowable, even by analogy. Scholars are beginning to recognize that there is a way of avoiding this result, namely to admit that in some analogous if not univocal sense God is temporal and spatial (and dependent and complex) as well as conscious and good and purposive and powerful. Not that God is mutable or extended or dependent in just the way and degree we are, any more than he is good or powerful in just the way we are, but always with a difference or in some proportional way. It is illogical to admit subtle analogical meanings for the one set of concepts while insisting upon a crude univocalness—and therefore a denial of their applicability to God—for the other set. If God has a body, it will not be as a fragment of reality surrounded by an external environment, but all the universe of things other than God will be this body A partial, localized being (see Omnipresence) will have a partial, localized body, the inclusive, cosmic being will have an inclusive, nonlocalized body. Moreover, the integrity of the universe must be supposed adequate to the divine perfection; for instance, the cosmic organism is to be conceived as the sole that is indissoluble, all dissolution being rearrangement of parts or creation of new parts within the cosmos, which throughout retains its essential unity.

The above does not mean that God must be admitted in all respects mutable, extended, or dependent. Even man has an aspect ("the soul") which is relatively or imperfectly fixed, inextended, independent of contingencies; analogously, in God there may be a perfectly fixed, non-spatial, and independent or necessary aspect, his "essence", whose logical status may and must, in consistency, be supposed different from that of his accidents. (See Transcendence.)

The three key analogies are perhaps the social analogy (prominent in the idea of the divine fatherhood), that God is to us as a superior and benevolent human being is to other human beings; the mind-body analogy, that God is the soul of the universe as a man is the soul of so much of nature as is included within his skin, and the artist analogy, that God creatively produces and shapes the universe. Each analogy has its defects. Thus father and child are mutually external, and conceivably may cease to have anything to do with each other or to know of each other's doings; the mind seems to have a non-social relation to the body, a relation of use or exploitation rather than a social relation of mutual sympathy and understanding; and the artist analogy involves both the externality of the first analogy—the artist and his product (once created) being separable and potentially independent of each other—and involves also the non-sociality of the second analogy. A perfect or the most perfect possible analogy must somehow combine the merits and avoid the defects of these analogies. This can be done by supposing a relationship as intimate and constant as that between mind and body, as sympathetic as that between the ideal father and his child, and as active as that between artist and his materials. Thus God must be the world-soul, but in such fashion that he loves each creature as a cell within his own body, and that he molds the life of the entire organism consciously with regard to its inner health and value. It may be maintained that the mind-body relation in some degree has these characters even in us. For, while we do not think lovingly of individual cells within our bodies, it may be that we do feel something of their feelings sympathetically, so that, for example, our suffering is our confused sense of pains endured by groups of our bodily cells at the time, and our acts of volition do mold the lives of cells, even though without our clear awareness of these cells as individuals. In God the "cells" become all individuals within the world-body, and instead of feeling mere masses of cells he has clear sympathetic awareness of individuals composing these masses. See God as personal, omnipresence, panentheism, perfect, Whitehead.

"Analogy" in J Hasting's Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics (1908-27), "Analogy" in D Runes, Dictionary of Philosophy (1942)   C.H.

analytic psychology: See psychology, schools of.

anaphora: (Gr, offering up. Lat, oblatio) The consecratory eucharistic prayer of the Eastern liturgies, corresponding to the Preface and Canon of the Roman Mass*. The earliest extant example is in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus*, c. 220.
                                                            P.V.N.

anarchism: (Greek, an without, arche, government) A social theory which regards the state as the source of our major social and moral ills, and which seeks to establish justice and equality among men by abolishing political government, and by substituting for it an entirely spontaneous cooperation of free individuals, organized into purely voluntary territorial and functional groups for the purpose of producing and distributing the goods and services essential to the satisfaction of the physical, intellectual, esthetic, and emotional needs and aspirations of human beings. It holds that human nature is essentially good, and that social order can best be maintained, not by an external and invasive authority, but by the ever changing equilibrium of social forces and influences, none of which would have the unfair and artificial advantage of state support.

Although anarchistic ideas were expressed among the Greeks by Aristippus, (ca. 435-356 B. C.) and more fully by Zeno (ca. 342-270 B. C.), the latter in phrases similar to those now in use, the political and economic concepts of anarchism were first formulated by William Godwin in his Enquiry Concerning Political Justice, (2 vols. 1793) and the term was first employed to describe the theory of a stateless society by Pierre Joseph Proudhon in his Qu'est-ce que la propriété? in 1840.

Anarchism is a varied and protean movement, but at least four types of theory can be distinguished within it: 1) Individualistic anarchism or Proudhonian Mutuellisme, which accepts private property freed from all state-created restraints and privileges, 2) Communistic anarchism, which repudiates the coercive collectivism of Marxian socialism* in favor of the common possession of the means of production by the free agreement and cooperation of voluntary groups; 3) Christian anarchism of Tolstoy* and his disciples, who derive anarchistic doctrines deductively from the teachings of Christ, and 4) Terroristic anarchism, which follows Max Stirner (Johann Kaspar Schmidt) in advocating assassination and other individual acts of terrorism as means of promoting their doctrines by "the propoganda of the deed." See communistic settlements, secular

Eunice Minette Schuster, "Native American Anarchism", in Smith College Studies in History, Vol XVII, Nos 1-4 (1931-32), Bertrand Russell, Proposed Roads to Freedom (London, 1919), Paul H Douglas, "Proletarian Political Theory" in C E Merriam and H E Barnes, (eds) A History of Political Theories, Recent Times (1924), pp 178-269, Paul Elzbacher, Anarchism, translated by Stephen T. Byington (1908).

H E.J.

anathema: Literally, "something set up",—as a votive offering, or as an object polluted or accursed. In this latter sense it is used by Paul (Gal. 1 8, 9. 1 Cor. 12 3, 16 22) of one who is utterly rejected by God and man. It became the term regularly employed in the act of excommunication*

E.F.S.

Anaxagoras: (c. 500-430 B.C) Anaxagoras of Clazomenae, Asia Minor, a supposed disciple of Anaximenes, author of peri phuseos, is credited with having first diverted argumentation (or philosophy) from Ionia to Athens where he exerted a powerful influence upon Pericles and his age. Plato and Aristotle mention "disciples" and "followers" of Anaxagoras, possibly Archelaus and Euripides among others. In Athens, Anaxagoras was called Nous He anticipated Socrates* in free thought. He declared that the sun was not a god but a moulten mass of fire. For such heresy, Josephus states he was sentenced to death. (Diels, 46A 19). In any event he was banished and, depressed by disgrace, ended his life in Lampsacus on the Hellespont.

Anaxagoras was first to introduce *nous (mind) as a principle of cosmic interpretation. Of him Aristotle said "When one man said, then, that reason (mind) was present—as in animals, so throughout nature—as the cause of order and of all arrangement, he seemed like a sober man in contrast with the random talk of his predecessors " Anaxagoras made no attempt to account for the origin of "matter." He believed in a primeval, chaotic, corporeal mixture of everything—migma. So-called primary determinations were thought present, but so-called secondary qualities were contingent upon the principle of order and developed concomitantly with the progress of cosmic formation. To this chaotic mass nous imparted the initial impulse of motion. Opinion divides as to whether Anaxagoras conceived of nous as effecting a single impact and then withdrawing, or whether he thought nous was progressively present wherever matter was and administered, continually and efficiently, superintendency of arrangement of cosmic order (Diels, 46 B, 12, 13 and 9, 12).

Besides attempting to account for inorganic and organic objects, Anaxagoras computed the size of the sun, (Plutarch, Lysander XII, 2) first determined the phases of the moon, (Hippolytus, Philosophumena ou Ref. de Toutes les Heresies I, 8, 10) explained the origin of the winds, cause of thunder and earthquakes, (Diogenus Laertius, II, 9) the shape and support of the earth, (Hippolytus I, 8, 2) the falling of meteors, (Plutarch, 12) and the production of life and its development into species (Diogenes Laertius, II, 10).

Probably most notable were characteristics which he ascribed to nous. Nous was simple, unmixed and alone, a spiritual essence whose activity affected material elements, without partaking of the nature of matter. It was infinite, knew all things, was self-ruled, its activity originated motion, differentiated and selected, was teleological, and betrayed further and crucial characteristics of person in its capacity of time-transcendence "Whatever things were to be, and whatever things were that are not now, and whatever things shall be, all these nous arranged in order." (Diels, I, 8, 2).

H Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker (Berlin, 1922); Max Heinze, Uber den Nous des Anaxagoras, Reports of the Deliberation of the Royal Scientific Saxony Society, Vol 41 (Leipzig, 1890)

P.R.H.

ancestor worship: A complex phenomenon, beginning, in rudimentary forms, in primitive religion* and developing through later stages, growing out of beliefs that the spirits* of the dead linger about their earthly habitations, have continued needs for food, drink, etc, are motivated like living persons, have ways of avenging their neglect, and have powers of protecting and blessing those responsible for their care. The motives of ancestor worship, therefore, although involved and not always the same, are chiefly 1) the desire to tend the dead (not always, however, leading to worship), 2) fear of ghostly visitations and of their avenging acts (leading as often to magic as to worship), 3) desire for the protection and blessing which the departed spirits can give; and 4) the feeling that reverence is due them. Services to, and veneration* of, the dead become worship only in so far as these practices and attitudes involve some sense of real dependence upon the ancestral spirits and the consequent desire to placate and honor them Such observances are primarily family responsibilities, becoming general only in the case of tribal or national heroes and leaders and only then involving (and not always) actual deification. Special shrines, appropriate rites, and appointed times for the ceremonies commonly characterize ancestor worship. In our century, the practice is common, though not universal, among the primitive peoples of the world,. among the Chinese masses (where it is integral to the family system and the primary virtue of filial peity), and in Japan, where it is important not only for family life but for the whole imperial system, having, therefore, strong political as well as religious bearings. See Chinese religions; hero worship.

E.T.R.

anchoret or anchorite: (Gr. anachoretes, a recluse, retired man) Applied to an extreme type of Christian ascetics, appearing first in the third century, who sought spiritual perfection by withdrawing from the community, often exposing themselves to hardships such as inadequate clothing or shelter, wearing coarse cloths and sometimes chains. Some even spent years on top of pillars; among these the most famous was St. Simon Stylites. See asceticism, hermit, recluse. Cf. cenobite.

R.B.B.

Andover Controversy, The: A somewhat vague designation of a vigorous expression of conflicting theological opinions regarding the state of heathen, to whom the Christian gospel had never been preached, after death. Robert A. Hume and one other candidate for appointment to foreign missionary work under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions held the opinion of some professors in Andover Theological Seminary, that there was, for such heathen, a "second probation after death."

For this the officials of the Board refused to commission them. The liberal constituency of the Board denied the right of the "Prudential Committee"—the executive agents of the Board—thus to determine the theological standards of the Congregational Churches. A vigorous conflict of personalities and opinions was initiated which was in action from 1886-1893. The retirement of conservative leaders and a more irenic temper finally ended the controversy and missionaries on the field, under the administration of the American Board, were assured the same freedom of thought as the ministers of the Congregational churches generally. The problems of Christian theology in the 19th century also engaged the interest of the Andover men. See Smyth, E. C.

H. K. Rowe, History of Andover Theological Seminary, (1933); The Andover case . . (1887). Andover defense; defense of Prof. Smyth; arguments of Prof. Theodore W. Dwight, Prof. S. G. Baldwin, Hon. C. T. Russell and ex-Governor Gaston (1887).
Andover heresy . . . Prof. Smyth; argument together with the statements of Profs. Tucker, Harris, Hincks and Churchill (1887).
Andover Theol. Seminary, arguments on behalf of the complainants in the matter of the complaints against Egbert C. Smyth. Dates and data, (1926).

G.G.A.

Andover theology: See Progressive Orthodoxy.

Andreae, Laurentius: (c. 1470-1552) Andreae had studied in Germany, been on church missions to Rome, before he, as archdeacon in Strengnas diocese, became chancellor of Gustavus Vasa, and the king's influential counsellor in making the royal power independent of Pope in the Church and superior to nobility in government. Andreae had a part in translation of the Swedish Bible, otherwise his efforts were in the realm of the state, where until 1531 he was a dominant figure.   C.J.B.

Andrew of Crete: (d. 720 or 740) A Byzantine theologian, a zealous iconodule, and hymn writer, metropolitan of Gortyna in Crete. Although not a great hymn writer himself, he inspired a considerable number of gifted Greek writers to compose hymns. Andrew is credited with the invention of a number of canons, many of his works have not yet been published.   M.S.

Angelico, Fra: (1387-1455) Religious artist. Born Guido di Pietro, and in religion known as Giovanni da Fiesole. Because of the spiritual quality of his art he earned for himself the title of "Angelico", and because of the holiness of his life and his beatification he is called "Il Beato". His finest work is in the chapel of Nicholas V in the Vatican.   J.B.C.

angels: Angels belong to the class of beings generally known as demons. They are living creatures of the spirit world, intermediate between gods and men, who may be either hostile or friendly toward humanity. Angelology had been specially developed in Persian religion from which it passed over into Judaism and then into Christianity. In those religions that stressed the personality of the deity angels served as agents for expressing and revealing the mighty will of God. Judaism had a hierarchy of angels at whose head stood seven (or four) archangels who with their myriads of subordinates discharged varied functions. They were servants and messengers of God, their original demonic nature was revealed in their connection with natural phenomena like wind and lightning, they mediated divine revelation to men and interceded for them before God, and they served as protectors for both individuals and communities. The early Christians believed that a supporting host of angels would accompany the triumphant Messiah's return (Mark 8 38, 13 24), even as his birth had been announced by an angelic choir (Luke 2·13f.). Also angels were a kind of spiritual double for men (Matt. 18.10, Acts 12 15). The worship of angels occurred in early Christianity, although it was frowned upon in some quarters (Col 2 18; Rev. 19:10; 22 8f.). But in the second century Justin Martyr* said that Christians paid reverence to the army of good angels. After the fourth century the cult of angels became more general, the archangel Michael being especially honored. Angels figured conspicuously in medieval Christian art, but their worship was discredited by the Protestant leaders and the Enlightenment relegated them to the domain of poetic fancy. Cf. Cherub, Cherubim; Mohammedanism, spirits.

W Lueken, Michael (1898), W Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums (1906), pp. 368-381, F. Andres, Die Engellehren der griechischen Apologeten (1914)
S J.C.

angelus: (Lat., angel or messenger)
1) A prayer said three times a day in honor of the Incarnation, essentially three Aves, to which were later added three scriptural verses and a concluding prayer.
2) The bell rung for the prayer.   L.R.W.

anger of God: See wrath of God.

Anglican Evangelicals: See Evangelicals, Anglican.

Anglicanism or Anglican Church: See Church of England.

Anglo-Catholics: The term "Anglo-Catholic" first appears in the 17th century as a description of the position of the Church of England*. The tradition of the Caroline divines was continued by the isolated High Churchmen of the 18th century, in America they were influential in the northern colonies, and after the Revolution became one of the major influences in the Episcopal Church. The Reform movement threatened the traditional position of the English Church and led churchmen to look for firmer foundations   John Keble's* protesting sermon on "National Apostasy" (July 14, 1833) is counted as the beginning of the Oxford Movement* soon carried further in the series of Tracts for the Times.   The tractarians* preached an objective, authoritative, ethical, sacramental religion, J. H. Newman's* Via Media (more correctly Lectures on the Prophetical Office of the Church, 1837) defined their claim to Catholic authority as against both Protestantism and Rome. The controversy raised by Newman's Tract XC culminated in his defection to Roman Catholicism in 1845   This ended the Oxford Movement as such, but only spread Anglo-Catholicism, in its practical expression the sobriety of the Tractarians was succeeded by the more popular appeal of ritualism*, while until his death in 1882 the learned orthodoxy of Pusey* dominated its theology.

In 1889 Lux Mundi (edited by Charles Gore) began a movement toward Liberal Catholicism, and brought into the Anglo-Catholic tradition the social Catholicism of F. D. Maurice*.   Even the more conservative theologians, such as the American F. J. Hall and Bishop Weston of Zanzibar, were not unaffected by these tendencies, but most Anglo-Catholics stopped short of the Cambridge School of the 1900's, with its pragmatic and modernist sympathies.   Recent tendencies are various. Beginning in 1920 the Anglo-Catholic Congresses brought together the academic and parochial wings of the movement.   Essays Catholic and Critical (1926) is one specimen of a considerable theological activity   Recent Anglican Prayer Book revisions show much Anglo-Catholic influence, the Church Union Summer School of Sociology at Oxford is a center of discussion of social theory and practice.   The Oxford Movement Centenary of 1933 gave occasion for a review of tractarian principles, which are still central in Anglo-Catholicism, their expression is diversely worked out not only by clerics, but by lay writers of such diverse appeal as Evelyn Underhill, T. S. Eliot, Dorothy Sayers, and Henry A. Wallace. See Christian Social Union.

R. W Church, The Oxford Movement (the classic account) (1891), W. L Knox and A R. Vidler, The Development of Modern Catholicism (1933), Report of the Oxford Movement Centenary Congress (1933).   E.R.H.

Anglo-Saxons and the Introduction to Christianity: When the Teutonic tribes invaded Britain south of the Rivers Forth and Clyde (5th century), they established a number of independent kingdoms which were christianized one by one. The first was Kent by St. Augustine* who set up the see of Canterbury in 597.   The Celtic inhabitants of Britain pushed back into Wales and Cornwall, later engaged in a series of controversies with the newly converted Anglo-Saxon Christians.   One subject of discussion was the time of the observance of Easter*, but both Roman and Celtic were loyal in spirit to Rome.   The second kingdom to be converted was Essex, with London as the see in 604   The others in the following order Northumbria (York, 625), East Anglia (Dunwich, 630), Mercia (Lichfield, 656), Wessex (Winchester, 669), and lastly Sussex (Selsey, 708). In addition to St. Augustine, sent directly to England by Pope St. Gregory the Great*, the following took part in the evangelization of the Anglo-Saxons   St Aidan, a monk of Iona, Scotland, Sts Cedd and Chad, St. Cuthbert and St. Wilfrid*.   Latin was used in the liturgy and in the canonical hours, and the ritual was very much like that of southern Italy due undoubtedly to the traditions of Monte Casino brought into England by the Benedictines. Devotion to the Blessed Virgin was deep and widespread.   There were certain interesting innovations, but none of a doctrinal character.

John Lingard, History of Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church (London, 1845)   J B.C.

Angra Mainyu (Ahriman)   See Persia, religions of, Zoroastrianism.

animals, worship of: A vast array of living forms of air and earth and sea have claimed the awed respect of man.   The thought forms of prehistoric man were so different from ours that it is difficult for us to understand the reasons for his attitudes toward the animals.   Certainly he felt himself more akin to them than does modern man. Yet they had qualities that set them apart   Some were dangerous, some had great strength, some were mysterious, some cunning, some were available for food*.   The efforts of early man to make alliance with some animal forms and to protect himself from others may account for much of what is called animal worship.   The need for food, coupled with an early apprehension regarding blood and killing gave rise to some cults.   The desire to preserve the food supply accounts for others   When grain became a staple food, various animals were identified with the fertility of the earth   The snake, associated with underground waters, was revered as the source of vegetation, fertility in field and home, wealth and healing.   Some cults arose from the belief that the souls of the dead reappeared in animal form.   Because of appropriate qualities, animals were sometimes associated with the various nature gods as their companions, temporary embodiments or symbols.   The so-called animal gods may be a variation of this practice. The animal as the sign of the district became identified with the god, and the divine symbol retained both the animal and human form.   Alliance of a tribe or an individual, for various reasons, with an animal species resulted in the many forms of totemism*.   A.E H.

animatism: See primitive religion.

animism: See primitive religion, spirits.

annates: A tax on ecclesiastical appointments consisting of the first fruits, or first year's revenue of a benefice.   During the late middle ages, it was payable to the papal treasury.   In England after 1531, it was payable to the crown.   W.S.H.

annihilationism: The doctrine that the death of the wicked involves the extinction of their being One form of annihilationism teaches that this extinction is the final result of the gradually disintegrating effect of sin on the being of the evil doer. Other annihilationists teach that after death the wicked will suffer punishment in proportion to the evil deeds committed during their earthly lives, but that this future punishment* will be followed by complete cessation of being. See future life.

H.W.J.

Annunciation: 1) The announcement by the Angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary* that she should give birth to Jesus (Luke 1 26-38). 2) The festival of the church, March 25, celebrating this event.

R.E.E.H.

Annunciation, Orders of: Include under this appellation all of the orders founded under the patronage of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary*. There are in the history of religious orders six of this type 1) A military order, the Order of the Annunziata, founded under Amadeus VIII, duke of Savoy in the 15th century. 2) The Annunciades, a penitential order, founded by St. Jeanne de Valois, daughter of Louis XI of France in 1501. It continued until the French Revolution at which time it was suppressed. 3) The Celestial Annunciades, a religious order of women founded by Bl. Maria Vittoria Fornari at Genoa in 1604. 4) The Annunciates of Lombardy, known also as the Sisters of St. Ambrose, they were organized in 1408 at Pavia by young women of Venice and Pavia under the direction of Father Beccaria, O.S.B., for the cure of the sick. 5) The Archconfraternity of the Annunciation was established in 1460 in Rome to provide dowries for poor girls who were to be married. 6) The Annunziata is a name sometimes given to the Servites* since their chief monastery at Florence is dedicated to the Annunciation.

T.T.M.

anointing: (The English word is derived from in and ungere, "to smear"). The ritual application of oil* was employed among many religions and peoples for the elimination of disease or demons and for the introduction of divine power. Boys and girls have often been anointed as a preliminary to the ceremonies of puberty. In ancient Israel, sacrifices were anointed (Ex. 30.26), oil was used in the consecration of priests (Lev. 8.12) and in the anointing of kings (I Sam. 10.1), the latter was an infrequent custom among other peoples. Hence the future king was the "messiah"* or anointed one. In the NT, sick are anointed (Mk. 6.13; Jas. 5.14). This led to the Roman Catholic sacrament of extreme unction* and the Orthodox anointing of the sick. See chrism.

C.T.C.

An-omoi-ans: The extreme Arian* party in the last stages of the struggle opposing not only homoousion but also homoiousion and *homoion as descriptions of the relation of the Son to the Father. This extreme position holds that the Son is not only of a different essence from the Father but also stresses their unlikeness. See Eunomianism.

F.W.B.

Anselm, St. of Canterbury: (1033-1109) He was the first in scholasticism* to make respected speculation in the grand style Like earlier theologians, he collected sentences from Augustine's works, but, as no one before him, he lived himself into Augustine's spirit. He energetically re-introduced the spirit of Augustine into theology. Opposed to an unfruitful use of dialectics, his thought was determined by an apologetic interest against it. His interest in philosophy was purely religious He showed little interest in the technical problems of contemporary philosophy. His moderate realism lent wings to his speculation. It was not his method to hold together the separate theses by a net of dialectical wires, but upon the basis of inner experience to reproduce speculatively the inherited Augustinian ideas. auctoritas, ratio, free will and grace. He concurs with Augustine that Christianity agrees with universal rational knowledge, that from the standpoint of Platonic idealism Christianity is the highest truth. In his Cur Deus Homo?, he subjected, for the first time to a scientific examination, the view that the forgiveness of sin was made possible by the death of Christ. He created the doctrine of atonement. The great merit of his theory of satisfaction was to have posed the question of the possibility of the forgiveness of sin, to have worked it out by remarkable dialectical ability, and to have understood it as the objective basis of the existence of the church. In the Proslogium, and above all, in the Monologium he expounded his famous ontological argument for the existence of God*. See atonement in Christianity, feudalism, satisfaction

B Funke, Grundlagen und Voraussetzungen der Satisfaktions-lehre des heiligen Anselm (Munster, 1903), M Grabmann, Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, Vol. I (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1909), F R Hasse, Anselm (Leipzig, 1843-52).

H.H.

Ansgar: (801-865) "Apostle of the North" Saintly, visionary monk of Corbie in Picardie and the daughter monastery, Corvey, established 822, in Westphalia. Missionary to Denmark 826-828, to Sweden ca. 829-831. Returned to become Archbishop of Hamburg, the new Missionary See, 831. Later Archbishop of Hamburg-Bremen. Inspired a missionary succession. Visited Sweden again ca. 852. Returned to stabilize his See, the only institutional continuum of his troubled life and work.

E.G.H.

antediluvians: The men who lived before the Flood*, listed in Sumerian* inscriptions, in Berossos*, and in Gen. 4 and 5.

R.H.P.

Ante-Nicene Fathers: The term "Fathers" is used to designate the early writers of the Church, the line ending, for the Western Church, with Gregory the Great*. Strictly used, the term indicates their orthodoxy, approbation by the Church, and sanctity of life, as well as their antiquity; but it is also used somewhat more loosely to include men whose orthodoxy has later been challenged.

The Ante-Nicene Fathers were those whose activity antedated the Council of Nicaea* in A.D. 325, including the Apostolic Fathers*, the second century Apologists*, and later writers like Irenaeus and Hippolytus, Tertullian and Cyprian, Clement of Alexandria and Origen.   A.K.R.

anthem: (Gr. ant'phona, through the Saxon, antefn) A form of sacred choral music with non-liturgical words, used in the Anglican and related Protestant services. Originally synonymous with antiphon*. The English anthem in the Elizabethan and early Stuart periods took the place of the motet* in the Latin service and differed from it only in the use of English instead of Latin. William Byrd and Orlando Gibbons were significant composers in this period. In the restoration period John Blow and Henry Purcell changed the form, added length, used solo voices interspersed with mixed choruses and introduced string orchestral interludes. In the 18th century Greene and Boyce followed the style of Purcell changing the string sections to organ. The outstanding composer of the 19th century was Samuel Sebastian Wesley who first used an independently conceived organ accompaniment to the choruses instead of the traditional duplication of voice parts.
E Dickinson, Music in the History of the Western Church, (1931), N. B Foster, Anthems and Anthem Composers (1901)   E.H.B.

anthesteria: (Gr. anthestēria, from ánthos, flower) The Feast of Flowers, a three days' festival of Dionysus at Athens in the month Anthestērion, (Feb.-Mar.), in which the slaves participated.   E.M.N.

Anthony, Saint: (251-c. 356) Abbot, founder of Christian monasticism*, b. Coma, Egypt, died Mt. Colzin, near the Red Sea. At the age of twenty he gave away his inheritance to the poor and for twenty years lived in solitude in the mountains. At the end of this time he organized the monastic life for the crowds who had come to him. He visited Alexandria in 311 to support the Christians in persecution, and again in 350 to preach against the Arians. His feast is celebrated on Jan. 17, and his relics repose in a church near Vienne. He is the patron of Hospitallers*, butchers, basketmakers, grave-diggers, domestic animals, etc. He is invoked against skin-diseases, epilepsy and pestilence. See Anthony, St., Orders of.   J.B.C.

Anthony, St. Orders of: Include under this name all the orders founded under the patronage of St. Anthony* the Hermit, or professing to follow his rule. Of these orders there are five: 1) The Disciples of St. Anthony (Antonians) were the men drawn to his hermitage in the Thebaid by the fame of his holiness; this group formed the first religious community of Christendom. 2) Antonines or Hospital Brothers of St. Anthony were a congregation founded by a certain Gaston of Dauphne and his son c. 1095. Their first house and hospital were built near the church of St. Anthony at Saint-Didier de la Mathe. The order continued until the French Revolution. 3) Antonians was the name given to a group of orthodox Armenians founded during the 17th century at the time of the persecution of Catholic Armenians. The founder was a certain Abram Atar Poresigh. 4) A anthropology: 1) A branch of systematic theology which deals with the doctrines of man's origin, primitive condition, probation and apostasy, original sin, actual transgressions, and free agency.

Congregation of St. Anthony was founded in Flanders in 1615 under the rule of St. Augustine. 5) The Chaldean Antonians of the Congregation of Sain-Hormisdas was founded in Mesopotamia by Gabriel Dambo in 1809.   T.T.M.

2) The general science of man, comprising two major divisions physical anthropology which treats of what man was and is as an animal, and cultural anthropology, which treats of what he has discovered and invented, learned and communicated, as a social being.

The word seems to have been coined by Aristotle in his Ethics, where he uses it in a non-complimentary sense, to describe negatively the lofty-minded man who, he says is ouk anthropologos, not a gossip nor a talker about himself. It was first employed in English in an anonymous book, Anthropologie Abstracted; or, the Idea of Humane Nature Reflected in Briefe Philosophical and anatomical collections, published in 1655. But not until after the appearance of the British Encyclopedia of 1822 did the term acquire its present inclusive scientific meaning.

Physical anthropology is a branch of natural science, and is in turn composed of several subsidiary disciplines. (a) Anthropogeny treats of the origin of man and his ancestors, including the geological evidence to determine the time and physical conditions of their appearance, the biological evidence to discover their living companions, both plant and animal, and the anatomical evidence to demonstrate their similarities to and their differences from present living races. It is therefore largely dependent upon general palaeontology. (b) Somatology studies the physical characteristics of the various races and sub-races. Since these can be accurately compared only when reduced to quantitive terms, it has developed the technique of anthropometry, or the measurement of the physical dimensions and proportions that characterize races. Because of the great emphasis formerly laid upon the characteristics of the skull as criteria of race, somatology has stimulated the intensive study of craniology, and because in the case of fossil races only the bones or bony fragments have survived the ravages of time, somatology also depends for its knowledge of prehistoric races largely on osteology, which treats of the development, structure, articulation, etc., of the parts of the skeleton. (c) The geographical distribution of races and the influence of environment upon physique, a branch of anthropogeography, has long claimed the attention of physical anthropologists. (d) Racial psychology has made little progress, owing to the subtle nature of such racial differences in structure of the central nervous system as may exist, and to the impossibility of measuring their functions directly apart from the effects of training and experience. (e) Renewed interest in the problems of racial physiology and bio-chemistry has resulted from recent advances in those fields, while Dr. Edward Loth's attempted study of (f) the comparative anatomy and morphology of the soft tissues in 1931 yielded limited results because few if any accurate dissections have been done on some of the races of man.

Cultural anthropology is a branch of the historical and social sciences, and has also given rise to many specialities. Of these (a) linguistics, or the comparative study of language, is basic, since language is the chief means through which culture is symbolized and communicated. (b) Technology is the comparative study of the material inventions and cultural equipment of races and peoples, the origins, development, and geographical distribution of their arts and industries. (c) Prehistorical archaeology is "technology in the past tense," it studies the earliest remains of man's handiwork, and permits inferences as to the extent, distribution, and development of early industries, and the sequences and duration of prehistoric periods. It reveals, however, only partial knowledge, since man's early handiwork in wood, bone, and other perishable materials has rarely been preserved, and the techniques and skills employed in supplying wants are often left to conjecture. (d) Social anthropology is the comparative study of custom and tradition, social organization and institutions, including marriage and the family, economics, education, moral ideas and codes, government and law, folk-lore, magical and religious beliefs and practices, etc   Social anthropology has been distinguished from sociology in its development in that the former has been chiefly concerned with peoples who do not possess a written history. This is due to the fact that when social anthropology became conscious of itself as a science, other specialized disciplines were already engaged in the study of peoples of advanced culture, and the period of exploration had brought the European and American powers into close contact with alien races and customs. Anthropologists found a fresh field for scientific investigation in this enormous mass of new material and in the practical problems which arise when peoples of very different cultural backgrounds become socially interdependent. Both social anthropology merges into sociology insofar as R. R. Marett's caution, that "anthropology must not be allowed to sink to mere barbarology" is heeded.

As a comparatively new science, anthropology has been divided into antagonistic schools, of which the more important are the evolutionists, the diffusionists, the functionalists, and the American historical school. (a) The early evolutionists, such as Herbert Spencer and E. B. Tylor in England and Daniel Brinton in the United States, believed that the psychic unity of mankind impelled societies independently to invent the same ideas, institutions, and appliances in similar circumstances, regardless of historical contacts, and that all cultures and all elements of culture must pass through the same stages in the same order. The evolutionists were right in assuming that all races everywhere possess the capacity to invent the basic elements of civilization, and they had correctly observed the progress of knowledge, the increasing complexity of cultural forms, and their better adaptation as means to ends through the elimination of antiquated elements. But they erred in assuming that by the study of examples collected at random they could reconstruct a universal evolutionary scheme according to which every past and existing culture could be given its place in a single ascending line. Furthermore, the evolutionists never really understood Darwin, for his theory suggests neither independent origins, nor parallelism, nor unilinear evolution. He did not assert that each species had arisen again and again from humbler prototypes, nor that the various species had passed through identical stages of development. (b) The diffusionist, or European historical school, led by Fritz Graebner and Wm. Schmidt in Germany and by G. Elliott Smith and W. J. Perry in England, minimizes the possibilities of multiple inventions, denies the existence of necessary evolutionary sequences, and emphasizes the role played by borrowing from a few centers of cultural origin. The theory reaches its extreme form in W. J. Perry, whose hypothesis of a pan-Egyptian origin of all cultures is contradicted by an abundance of well-authenticated archaeological and historical data. (c) The functional school, led by Bronislaw Malinowski, turns aside from historical reconstructions and theories of origin of disparate elements of culture and devotes intensive study to specific cultures as integrated wholes with a view to "establishing the relationships between the various elements" and disclosing "the part played by any one factor of a culture within the general scheme." (4) The American historical school, under the leadership of the late Professor Franz Boas, has been less speculative and more thoroughly inductive in its methods. Its objective, as stated by Professor Boas, is to understand culture as a whole through "the reconomstruction of human history" and "the determination of types of historical sequences [and] the dynamics of change." It has tended to integrate the psychological approach of the older evolutionists with the diffusionist's caution against a priori schemes of cultural development and the functionalist's appreciation of the interplay of factors that constitute a particular society. Only thus, as T. K. Penniman has observed, can the anthropologist really "study Man, and not merely develop his own notions." See evolution; folklore.

Alfred C. Haddon, History of Anthropology (London, 1919) ; Robert H. Lowie, The History of Ethnological Theory, (1938) ; T. K. Penniman, A Hundred Years of Anthropology, (1936) ; Ralph Linton, The Study of Man, (1936)   H.E.J.

anthropology, theological: The doctrine of man (from Greek anthropos and logos). What distinguishes the theological doctrine from philosophical and psychological views of man, is its having regard solely to man as he is known in his relation to God. Man was created by God to share God's purposes and enjoy followship with Him. He was endued with powers of mind and spirit appropriate to this. He has, however (historically and each of us in himself), chosen perversely his own way (the Fall*); and while theologies differ as to the effect of this apostasy on man's proper being (Is the divine image in him erased, defaced or only obscured?), all agree that by it man's rank before God is that of sinner, and evil and disorder are brought into his world. Nor is there recovery either for his world or himself in his own resource, but only in the fact that He who created man to such high estate and destiny has, now that these are forfeit through man's disobedience, employed His power a second time to retrieve and restore. Divine grace* and salvation* are the complement of the Christian doctrine of man.

26

H. W. Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man (3rd ed. 1926); E. Brunner, Man in Revolt (1939), Oxford Conference (1937) series on Church, Community and State, II The Christian Understanding of Man (1938), R. Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, I (1941); II (1943).   J.L.

anthropomorphism: (Gr. anthropos, man, morphe, form) Ascription of human traits to things other than man. Term often used to discredit any analogy, however remote, between man and the non-human. Yet the alternatives to a legitimate, limited analogy between human and non-human are an illegitimate, inaccurate analogy, or an unintelligible dualism. The purely "unknowable" is, as Peirce* said, the sole (and illusory) escape from the task of finding a reasonable anthropomorphism. See analogy, anthropopathism, God as Personal.   C.H.

anthropopathism: (Gr. anthropos, man, pathein, suffer) Ascription of human feelings to the non-human. Ruskin's "pathetic fallacy" disparaged the process as applied to inanimate nature. Ruskin condemned the attribution, not of all mental states to nature, but only of specifically man-like states. So, to ascribe feeling to God is not necessarily to ascribe human feeling to Him. See anthropomorphism, God as Personal.   C.H.

anti-Benevolent Society agitation in the U. S.: See anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

anti-Bible Society agitation in the U. S.: See anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

antichrist: Literally, one who opposes or denies Christ. More specifically, a great antagonist who is expected to fill the world with wickedness but who will be defeated by Christ at his second coming. The earliest occurrence of the word is in the NT (I John 2 18, 22; 3·7; 4.3; II John 7). The origin of the belief (as distinct from the title) may be seen in the Iranian conflict between Ahriman and Ahura Mazda*. From Persia this view of strife between the supreme powers of good and of evil made its way into Jewish thought and eventually into Christianity. In subsequent Christian thinking Antichrist has been identified with the Roman empire or emperors (especially Nero), with Mohammed, and not infrequently with the Roman popes (e.g., by Wycliffe and Luther).

W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, (2nd. ed., 1921).   M.S.E.

antilegomena: (Gr. anti, against; lego, to say, speak) A term anciently used of literary works whose genuineness was questionable, and applied by Origen, Eusebius and others to the group of NT books whose place in the canon was disputed in their day. With some justification from Eusebius it has in modern times been loosely used (e g., Preuschen, Antilegomena, 1901) as practically equivalent to apocrypha*. See Canon.

A P.W.

anti-missionary movement in the United States: Commonly considered to have originated as a frontier offshoot of Baptist life and to have since remained peculiarly associated with the history of that denomination Recent findings, however, indicate that this movement has been of broader scope than suspected. In origin it does not now appear to have been solely a frontier phenomenon, nor does the Baptist denomination appear to be the only one to have experienced its inroads

About the year 1820 there arose almost simultaneously at home bases and on the frontier a mighty gust of anti-missionary activity to which at least nine distinct religious groups are known to have contributed momentum. Of these groups only the factions led by John Taylor, Daniel Parker and Alexander Campbell* can be said to have taken root immediately in Baptist soil The remaining groups in probable order of the strength of their opposition voices were the unaffiliated "Free Thinkers", the Universalists, the Christian Connection (both New England and Western divisions), the "Reformed" Methodists, the Hicksite Quakers and the Unitarians.

A search for the reasons occasioning this unsuspectingly widespread opposition to missionary endeavor reveals a basic cause buttressed substantially by a number of subsidiary considerations peculiar to one or more of the specific groups involved.

The basic cause was a deep-running fear of the consequences of the early eighteenth century tendency toward centralization of religious authority. In light of the age, the fear is quite understandable.

From 1796 to 1830 "national" organization for "benevolent" purposes came to be an American religious epidemic. One after another the evangelical denominations effected the organization of "national" Missionary, Bible, Sunday School, Tract and Educational societies for the propagation of their distinctive beliefs both at home and abroad. Then in turn each denomination took upon itself the task of establishing a theological seminary where young men might be trained under benevolent auspices to be sent forth as salaried missionaries to remote areas. Finally came the startling innovation of "national" benevolent societies which waived denominational doctrines to secure united religious action—notably the "American" Bible, Peace, Sunday School, Tract, Colonization, Seamen's, Temperance and Prison Reform societies. To minority groups within denominations as well as to minor denominations this ever-increasing tendency to "national" organization and concentration of financial resources in the hands of a few society executives loomed as a great danger to religious liberty. A single denomination or group of denominations might conceivably become so powerful as to effect a practical union of Church and State despite constitutional guarantees to the contrary. It was imperative therefore that all benevolent societies organized on a "national" basis be vigorously opposed. Whether or not the society carried the word "missionary" in its title was immaterial. All national benevolent societies stood as possible missionary vehicles for the union of church and state and needed to be opposed as such.

Serving as subsidiary props to support this basic fear of centralization of religious authority were anti-missionary arguments that may be classified in one of three categories· 1. Scriptural, 2 Doctrinal, 3. Cultural. The argument that benevolent societies were "human" institutions contrary to Scripture was the special weapon of Campbell and Parker, but used freely by all the anti-missionary groups excepting the Unitarians and "Free Thinkers". The doctrinal argument is not so easily explained. On the one hand, the hyper-Calvinism of the Baptist reactionaries tended naturally to belittle the "human" efforts of benevolent societies to meddle with the divine plan. On the other hand, liberally inclined theological groups like the "Reformed" Methodists, the Hicksite Quakers, the Unitarians and the Universalists felt in variant degree the necessity of sanctioning anti-missionism as a means of resisting powerful orthodox combines. Holding a middle position, the Christian Connection remained true to its basic doctrine that all names should be cast aside but that of "Christian" by opposing the sectarian character of most benevolent societies, yet could not bring itself to support undenominational benevolent effort for fear that it would lead to orthodox ascendancy. As for the cultural roots of the movement, they were both intellectual and crude. To the Harvard trained Unitarian, the sophistically inclined Universalist and the outspoken "Free-Thinker" the missionary movement as conducted was an unnecessary waste of excitement, money and life. Especially was this true with respect for foreign missions, inasmuch as it was claimed that no thinking person could credit a loving God with condemning to perdition an ignorant heathen who had not yet heard of Christ. The conversion of the heathen could wait until such time as the cause of liberal theology had been won at home. To the rugged frontiersman who was one of the chief objects of the missionary enterprise, evangelical benevolent efforts were even more incomprehensible. Dapper young missionaries educated in the eastern "priest factories" were being sent to convert him as if he hadn't had any religion up to now. Moreover, they were being paid to do it They were working for money instead of for God. The old semi-literate farmer-preacher with his "call to preach" for nothing was much preferred

About 1840 the basic fear of a denominational or orthodox combine that might achieve practical union of Church and State began to abate. With its diminishment anti-missionary propaganda naturally began to lose its force. By degrees active opposition to benevolent enterprise came to be confined chiefly to the "Primitive" and "Two-Seed-in-theSpirit (Parkerite)" Baptists who concentrated in the south central states. The story of the exact nature of the recession of the opposition spirit in other-than-Baptist groups awaits further research.

The early twentieth century has added two new types of anti-missionism. Russellism, due to Pastor Russell's anti-ecclesiastical zeal, has offered some support. Fundamentalism, quite irrespective of denominational lines, has contributed its heated charges of heterodoxy against forward-looking missionaries, liberal members of theological faculties and pioneering personnel in other benevolently sponsored projects.

Today, however, anti-missionary agitation is once more reverting to its perennial Primitive Baptist base in the South where some 100,000 supporters, one third of whom are Negro, still rally

The Baptist phases are treated at length in B. H Carroll, The Genesis of American Anti-Missionism (1902) and W. W. Sweet, Religion on the American Frontier the Baptists (1931), Chap IV. Book material on 18th century activity within other groups is not available, but 18th century periodicals provide ample data. For the Christian view see Gospel Luminary (Rochester and New York City, 1825-33, and Christian Messenger (Georgetown, Ky., 1826-45). For "Free-Thinker' argument see Reformer (Phila , 1820-35), Plain Truth (Canandaigua, N Y., 1822-1824 Rochester, N Y , 1828-29), Correspondent (N. Y. 1827-1829), Priestcraft Exposed (Lockport, N Y , 1828-29) and Priestcraft Unmasked (N Y and Phila , 1830). For Hicksite Quakers see Berean (Wilmington, Del , 1824-28). For Reformed Methodists see Telescope (N Y , 1822-24), Friendly Visitor (N Y , 1825), Cry From the North (Boston, 1827),Cry From the Four Winds (Boston, 1827-28) and even some issues of the Christian Advocate (N. Y., 1826 through 1840) For Unitarian view see Christian Examiner, Boston, Vol I no. 3 (June 1824) pp 182-196 For Universalists see Trumpet (Boston, 1828-64), Sentinel and Star in the West (Cincinnati, O., 1829-36) and almost any Universalist periodical 1828ff G P. Albaugh, An Annotated Bibliography of Religious Periodicals and Newspapers in What is Now the United States, 1730-1830 (1943) expands this list considerably and gives library locations For Russellite view see C W Ferguson, Confusion of Tongues (1929), Chap IV, especially pp 79,80 For Fundamentalism see S G Cole, History of Fundamentalism, Index under "Missions", "Theological education", etc.   G.P.A.

anti-national religious organization agitation in the U. S.: See anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

antinomianism: A term used to indicate types of ethical thought in which hostility to the law of Moses has led to a tendency to immoral teaching or practice. There are traces of this kind of thought in the NT, where it represented a phase of Paul's struggle to clarify the relations of the Gospel and the Law. There is a strain of antinomianism in the Gnostics*, and certain other groups —the Marcions and the Manicheans, for example—rejected the Mosaic law, though without using this as an excuse for immorality. Throughout the Middle Ages there were various heretical groups which preached antinomianism, and some went so far as to claim that even harlotry was not sinful to the spiritual man. Antinomianism was prominent in the discussions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries In England the Famil-lists gained a foothold, and during the Civil War all such groups increased considerably. The best known sect—and one regarded at the time with most horror—was the Ranters*. They believed that nothing is sin except what a man believes to be so. There was also a Baptist antinomianism of a different order which sprang from hyper-Calvinism. Antinomian controversies raged furiously throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The best known was in Germany, and involved Luther, Melanchthon and Agricola. It was ended by the Formula of Concord* (1577). Antinomian controversy also flourished in England and even more so in New England. See Ada-mites.   G R.C.

antinomy: (Gr. anti, against, and nomos, law) A pair of contradictory propositions each of which can be shown to follow necessarily from a common premise The presence of antinomy proves either that the common premise is false or that reason is inherently self-contradictory. Kant* drew the former conclusion in his dialectic, and denied that the empirical world is "a given whole," since from that premise there followed with equal necessity the assertion and the denial of the infinite divisibility, etc., of space and time. See N. K. Smith, Commentary on Kant's Critique of Pure Reason (1918). See antinomianism.   E.S.B.

Antioch (in Pisidia): A city in Phrygia on the main road connecting Syria with western Anatolia (the Sebaste), founded by Seleucus Nicator ca. 280 B C. In the 1st century A.D. it was thoroughly Hellenized, with a large Jewish population, and had become the center of Roman civil and military administration in South Galatia. Two visits of St. Paul to the city are referred to in Acts 13 14 and 14 21, and two others possibly implied in 14 6 and 18·23.   S.M.G.

Antioch (in Syria): A city on the Orontes river, about twenty miles from the Mediterranean. Founded ca. 300 B.C. by Seleucus Nicator. In 64 B.C. made the capital of the Roman Province of Syria. Some unnamed Christians fled to An-tioch from Jerusalem following Stephen's martyr-dom and founded a new church which included among its members Greeks as well as Jews (Acts 11 19 ff.). It was at Antioch that the term "Christian" was first given to converts to the new faith (Acts 11 26). It was Paul's point of de-parture on his first missionary journey (Acts 13 4).   S.M.G.

Antioch, Synod of: There were two synods held at Antioch in 340 A.D. in connection with the Arian* controversy. The first was held by the Semi-Arians* or Eusebians, at which Athanasius suffered one of his many depositions. The second synod, in an effort to conciliate the West which was strongly Nicean, drew up four creeds one after the other which were as Nicean as possible without actually using the term *homo-ousios (the same substance), to which the Semi-Arians ob-jected as much as the Arians did.   A.K.R.

Antiochene (Syrian) Rite: The complexus of liturgical and disciplinary laws and customs orig-inally used in the patriarchate of Antioch This rite in variants is followed by the Syrian Ja-cobites*, who are divided into a Monophysite Church with 80,000 members, and a Catholic Church with 71,000 members. A group of Mala-bar Christians (250,000) also follows the Antio-chene rite. In 1930 five thousand of these in Malankara were united with Rome. The Syrian Melchites, both Orthodox and Catholic, follow since the thirteenth century the Byzantine rite*.   E.A.R.

Antiochian School: Not a school in the sense of a teaching institution with buildings and a regular succession of teachers and students, but rather a certain type of theological attitude, begun possibly by Lucian* of Antioch, and associated with Antioch until, after the condemnation of Nestorius* in A D 433, its centre was transferred to Nisibis and Edessa*. In conscious opposition to the allegorical method of Scripture interpretation associated with the School of Alexandria,* and sometimes through bitter controversy with it and its adherents, the school of Antioch practiced the sounder gram-matico-historical method. (See Biblical criticism.) But this basic method that was common to all the adherents, could be associated with such widely different kinds of spirit as the pre-Arian point of view of Lucian and the rationalism of Theodore*, on the one hand, and the basic orthodoxy of Chrysostom and Theodoret on the other.   A K.R.

Antiochus Epiphanes, crisis under: Seleucid king (175-163 B C.), who attempted to "coor-dinate" the Jews in his Hellenization program Forbade Jewish worship and religious customs under penalty of death and defiled temple at Jerusalem with an idol 167 B.C. His oppression reflected in Dan. 7 8, 25, 8.11-14, 24-26, 9 27, 11 31-36. The temple was purified and rededi-cated Dec. 165 B.C., (an event commemorated in the Hanukka* festival). See Judas Maccabeus, Maccabees, Books of.   E.G.K.

antiphon: (Gr, responsive sound) 1) A phrase from Scripture sung before and after the canticles and psalms in the Divine Office*, giving the "color" of the festival or season. 2) A psalm sung antiphonally by the two sides of the choir. See anthem.   P.V.N.

Antiphonary: (Lat., antiphonarium, liber antipho-narius) The liturgical book containing the chants sung by cantors and choir in the Divine Office (Breviary).   P.V.N.

anti-pope: An anti-pope is a false claimant to the Holy See* in opposition to a canonically elected or universally recognized Roman Pontiff or Bishop of Rome. Such pretenders, subsidized by schis-matical factions in the Church, German Emperors, or rebellious cardinals, appear in various periods of the Church's history. According to Hergenroether there were twenty-nine such anti-popes, beginning with Novatian*, 251 A.D. and ending with Felix

V. (Amadeus of Savoy 1439-49). At times, as e.g., during the Great Western Schism* (1378-1417), there were as many as three contemporary claimants to the Holy See. Due to the confusion of the times, to the subjective uncertainty of even well-meaning cardinals, bishops, generals of Religious Orders, kings and even saints, and to the loyal adherence of the greater part of the Church to any given claimant, Alexander V, (1409-10), elected at the Council of Pisa and John XXIII (1410-14) are not considered anti-popes whereas due to restricted nationalistic adherence of their subjects and open rebellion from the very start, Clement VII (Robert of Geneva: 1373-94) and Benedict XIII (Peter de Luna 1394-1414) are characterized as such. Cf. article Alexander III, Pope; Pope.

Cath. Encyc I, 582,The New Cath. Dict. (London, 1929), 52-53   R.M.H.

anti-saloon league: See temperance movement.

anti-semitism: A popular name for the prejudice against Jews to which various social pressures have contributed. In each period of history, however, this prejudice has found distinct outlets. In ancient times, the Jews like the Christians, were charged with disloyalty to the Roman Empire for refusal to conform to the emperor cult as idolatrous. In the Middle Ages, Jews were condemned for persisting as a religious minority. In modern times anti-semitism has been fostered by various fascist states which have found Jewish universalism inconsistent with their own tribal nationalism. Anti-semitism has been condemned by the leading ecclesiastical representatives of both Catholicism and Protestantism, as is well summarized in Jacques Maritain's A Christian Looks at the Jewish Question, (1939) (Catholic), and Protestants Answer Anti-Semitism, edited by Beatrice Jenney, (1941). See ghetto.   B.Z.B.

Antisthenes: (ca. 444-368 B C) See Cynics.

anti-Sunday School movement in the U. S.: See anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

anti-theological education agitation in the U. S.: See anti-missionary movement in the U. S anti-Tract movement in the U. S.: See anti-missionary movement in the U. S.

anti-Trinitarianism: See Unitarianism.

Anu: Sumerian god of the sky, head of the pantheon, in Babylonia he was worshiped at Uruk (Erech), in Assyria at Ashshur*. See Mesopotamian Religions.   R.H.P.

Anubis: See Hermes; Egypt, Religions of.

Anunnaki: See Igigi.

Apis: Egyptian bull-god; a black bull with distinctive white markings whose worship was linked with various gods. At Memphis, Egypt, the bull (Apis) was regarded as the body of the god Ptah; when the bull-god died it was buried with elaborate ceremonies. Embalmed bodies of bulls discovered in the Apis cemetery belonged to the period from the Late Empire until the Ptolemies. See Egypt, religions of   F.L P.

Apocalypse of Moses: See Jubilees, Book of.

apocalypticism, apocalyptic literature: (Gr. apokaluptein, to uncover or disclose) A type of thought which flourished in late Judaism and early Christianity, producing a distinctive kind of literature (165 B C.-120 A D.). The purpose of these writings was to nerve the faithful to stand firm against the cruel fate they were enduring, with confidence that speedily the tables would be turned and evil would be destroyed. Underlying these writings was the view (not native to Judaism) that the present evil age, under the dominion of the archfiend, would come to a dramatic close. The world would literally come to an end, would be consumed with fire to purify it from evil. The righteous would rise to take their place in a new and purified world. The present evils (the worship of God prohibited by a foreign tyrant, or Israel oppressed by Rome, or Christians persecuted by nonbelievers) were in large part due to the machinations of evil spirits who had unleashed their forces in a final clash with the forces of good.

The best-known apocalypses are the canonical Daniel and Revelation, but many others of similar nature were produced, among which are Ethiopian Enoch, Slavonic Enoch (Secrets of Enoch), Syriac Baruch, IV Ezra, Apocalypse of Peter, Ascension of Isaiah. In addition are several semiapocalypses, such as the Assumption of Moses, Book of Jubilees, and Shepherd of Hermas. Mark 13 has not infrequently been regarded as an earlier apocalypse recast as a prophetic word of Jesus.

Regularly these writings purport to have been written by the great men of the past—Ezra, Moses, Abraham, Noah, Adam—who had had revealed to them in visions by angels appointed for this purpose what was to come to pass, but who had kept the matters secret, to be revealed just before the end. Frequently under the transparent fiction of fearful beasts and the lush angelology the actual circumstances which convinced the anonymous writer that the bell was about to strike can be detected. The essential difference between these writings and those of the prophets, with which they have often been compared and contrasted, is that the prophets raised their voices in protest in times of prosperity, to rebuke and to warn, the apocalyptists, on the contrary, wrote in times of distress to nerve the faithful to stand firm—the darkest moment always presages the dawn.

The origin of this type of thought is probably to be found in Persian dualism—the twelve-thousand year struggle between Ahriman and his demonic hosts and Ormuzd and his angels. While certain elements of this thinking (notably the notion of resurrection and future life) came to be appropriated by normative Judaism and was read back into its scriptures, apocalypticism and its writings never became central or even prominent in orthodox Jewish thought, they were, in fact, totally ignored by the rabbinic writers. For Christians it was quite different. From the first the early disciples saw in Jesus the supernatural son of man* mentioned in Daniel, and expected his imminent return on the clouds of heaven (see Millenarianism) The Christians eagerly appropriated them and recast the material to form new ones of their own Cf. Final Judgment.

R H Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, 2 vols (1913).

M. S Enslin, Christian Beginnings (1938), pp. 351-372.   M.S.E.

apocatastasis: The word means literally "re-establishment", and was used in Stoic* philosophy to express the belief that all things, after a cycle of ages, would return to their original condition. This idea has commended itself to various thinkers (e.g., Nietzsche), and has been defended on mathematical grounds. Luke employs the term in Ac. 3 21 to convey to his Greek readers the conception of the Kingdom of God In its verbal form it also occurs in Mt. 17 11 where it applies to the restoration of true religion before the advent of the Messiah.

W L Davidson, The Stoic Creed (1907)   E.F.S.

apocrypha, early Christian use of: In NT times the canon of scripture was still, to some extent, fluid, and many books not definitely included in the OT were regarded as in some sense biblical. The NT attitude to them seems to be indicated in the difficult passage 2 Tim. 3·15, 16, where it is said that Timothy from his childhood had known "sacred literature", i e., books dealing with religious themes. Every such writing, it is added, is inspired by God, and is helpful to the Christian teacher, forming a kind of supplement to scripture proper. A number of passages can be collected from the NT in which reference is made to books now reckoned apocryphal. The familiar verses Matt. 11 28-30 are reminiscent of the closing words of Ecclesiasticus*. Luke quotes expressly (11 49) from some lost apocryphal book, described as "the wisdom of God". Paul frequently echoes the apocrypha, and most notably the Wisdom of Solomon*, from which the argument in the first two chapters of Romans is largely borrowed. The author of Heb. takes one of his examples of faith from the 2nd book of Maccabees*. The Jewish Apocalypses (see Apocalyptic Literature) formed a group by themselves. Although not scriptural they claimed to preserve visions granted to holy men, and could thus be regarded as in some sense of divine origin. The author of Revel. makes free use of ancient apocalypses, and references to them can be traced throughout the NT. See Old Testament.

References are minutely noted in R H. Charles Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (1912).   E.F.S.

apocrypha in the New Testament church: The books included in our NT were only a selection from a considerable literature which was current in the church of the first two centuries. Before the canon was finally determined a number of those early writings found a place in it, along with those which we still read. Some of them came to be rejected for no other reason than that they were obviously inferior, both in literary and religious value, to our present Gospels and Epistles. Although they were dropped from the NT they are still preserved in the collection of the Apostolic Fathers (e.g, I Clement, Shepherd of Hermas, Epistle of Barnabas). Others are known as Apocrypha, with the suggestion that they never had any valid title to acceptance. For the most part these apocryphal books were deliberate fabrications. It was a common practice, especially among the Gnostics, to propagate heretical doctrine by means of writings composed in the name of revered Apostles. In the more ignorant communities these forgeries were sometimes used without suspicion in the church service. Other spurious books were written with no theological motive but merely in imitation of the genuine NT writings. All the different types of NT literature were thus imitated. There still survives an Epistle purporting to be Paul's lost letter to the Laodiceans. We possess in whole or in part a number of Gospels (e.g., the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of the Infancy). The book of Acts afforded the model for numerous works which might be described as historical romances (The Acts of Paul and Thecla, the Acts of John, the Acts of Thomas*). The book of Revelation gave rise to a whole series of similar books, of which the earliest and most notable is the so-called Apocalypse of Peter . It has often been regretted that so many of the apocryphal writings exist only in fragments, or have left nothing but the record of their names. From what we possess, however, it does not appear that they were of much value. It is evident, for instance, that the authors of the non-canonical Gospels had no information about the life of Jesus apart from that given them in the NT records. Everything they add is derived from their own fancy or their peculiar doctrines. See pseudepigrapha, N.T.

M. James, The Apocryphal New Testament (1924), B. Pick, Paralipomena (1908)   E.F.S.

apocrypha, Old Testament: (Gr. neuter pl. of adjective apokryphos, hidden, secret). Writings of scriptural form or content, but excluded from the canon*, designated in Hebrew sepharim hisonim, "outside books", and siphre minim, "heretical books" (Sanh. X, 1). The term first bore a laudatory meaning of esoteric writings withheld from the uninitiated because of their sacred and mysterious nature (4 Ezra 14. 44-47; cf. Dan. 12 4, 9). Owing to its application to writings of sectarians, like the Gnostics*, it acquired (since the second century) a disparaging sense of non-canonical, untrustworthy, spurious, and even false and heretical. It came to denote especially works of doubtful origin or authorship, pseudepigraphs.

Specifically the Apocrypha of the OT contains fourteen books commonly found in the Greek Bible (the Septuagint*) and the Latin Vulgate* in excess over the Hebrew Bible. They are (in the order in which they appear in the Authorized and in the Revised Versions)· 1) 1 Esdras, 2) 2 Esdras (same as 4 Ezra), 3) Tobit*, 5) Additions to Esther*, 6) Wisdom of Solomon*; 7) Ecclesiasticus* or Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach; 8) Baruch*, with the Epistle of Jeremiah, 9) Song of the Three Children*, 10) History of Susannah*, 11) Bel and the Dragon*, 12) Prayer of Manasses*; 13) 1 Maccabees; 14) 2 Maccabees.

Excepting 1 and 2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses, these books form part of the Catholic canon. At the Council of Trent* (1546) their canonicity was formally reaffirmed. The Protestants, on the other hand, following Jerome*, exclude them from sacred Scriptures. Accordingly they initiated the usage of Apocrypha for a collection of books appended to the OT and (up to 1827) generally added to every English Bible*. While some Reformed Churches banished the Apocrypha from public worship, the Church of England* prescribes its reading in public services "for example of life and instruction of manners".

Catholics class these books as "deuterocanonical" and reserve the name Apocrypha for other quasi-scriptural books in excess over those of the Vulgate to which Protestants give the name Pseudepigrapha. The difference in nomenclature is purely arbitrary. The term Apocrypha may be well applied to the whole body of non-canonical literature of the Jews produced in the last centuries B.C. and the first century C.E. in Palestine and in Egypt, mostly in Hebrew and Aramaic and some in Greek.

The books of the Apocrypha proper may be classified as: 1) Historical, including histories, historical tales, legends, supplements and embellishments of the OT, 2) Didactic or Sapiential, and 3) Apocalyptic. The last type predominates in the Pseudepigrapha. The entire material is of greatest value for the Jewish religious development between the Old and the New Testaments.

See apocalyptic literature, canon; Judith; pseudepigrapha.

R H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O. T. in English (Standard work), (Oxford, 1913); M. R. James, Lost Apocrypha of the O T. (1920); E. Schuerer, History of the Jewish People (1909), Vol. 3.　　　　　　　　s.s.c.

Apollinarianism: A name given to the theological system of Apollinaris of Laodicea*. Apollinaris held that Christ had a human body and a human soul but no human mind or spirit. In Him this was replaced by the divine Logos, the source of Christ's self-consciousness. Apollinaris attracted a considerable following in spite of the fact that his ideas were anathematized by synods of the church, but soon after his death the sect became extinct. See Christology.　　　　s.m.g.

Apollinaris of Laodicea: (died A.D 390) Bishop of Laodicea in Syria in the late 4th century. In his early days an opponent of Arianism*. Collaborated with Apollinaris the Elder in the reproduction of the Scriptures on classical models to compensate Christians for the edict of the emperor Julian denying them the right to teach the classics. Author of a theological system condemned as heretical by several synods, and in particular by that of Constantinople in 381.　　　　s.m.g.

apologetics, Christian: The science of the defence of Christian truth In contrast to polemics*, Apologetics deals with points of view so fundamental to the Christian faith that argument with professing Christians is not anticipated, and only the attacks of non-Christians are envisaged Negatively, an effort is made to anticipate the points of possible attack, and to defend them by evidence and sound reasoning. Positively, a Christian view of God and the World is elaborated, aiming to make it so adequate and winsome as to obviate attack before it even gets started.　　　　A.K R.

apologists, early Christian: Early Christianity was soon subjected not only to physical violence but to severe criticism from Jewish and pagan opponents, and as it gradually came to feel its individual character as a new faith, it began to defend itself against these attacks. The earliest writing of exactly this kind of which we know was The Preaching of Peter, written early in the second century, and now lost except for a few fragments. It attacked both Greek and Jewish ways of worship, and described the Christians as "a third race". A second apology was that of Quadratus*, written in Athens in A D. 125 or 129, to be presented to Hadrian, in order to obtain more lenient treatment for the Christians, but only a single sentence of it is preserved. A few years later, probably between A D. 138 and 147, another Athenian, Aristides, addressed a defense of the new faith to the emperor Antoninus, but this too has disappeared, except for a Syriac translation and a free recast of the Greek in the mediaeval romance of Barlaam and Joasaph. It attacks Chaldean, Greek, Egyptian and Jewish forms of worship, in contrast with Christian worship and morals.

The dialogue was seized upon for purposes of Christian apologetic about A.D. 140 by Aristo of Pella, in Perea, and while his book has disappeared, Origen says it showed how the Jewish prophecies of Christ applied to Jesus. Both apology and dialogue were made use of by Justin* a few years later (150-165) for the purposes of Christian apologetic. See Minucius Felix, Marcus　　　　　　　　E.J G.

Apology of the Augsburg Confession: See Augsburg Confession.

apostasy: (Gr. apo, from, and stasis, standing) An interior or an exterior lapsing from the Faith, in a conscious and formal way or only in a material sense, after having received faith and baptism. The external, formal apostate is excommunicated*. See heresy, reprobation.　　　　L.R.W.

apostles: A word which is used in the N.T. with a variety of meanings: 1) The immediate disciples of Jesus. 2) The personal witnesses of the Resurrection. 3) Men endowed in a special degree with the power of the Spirit. 4) Christian missionaries generally. The word apostle means literally "one sent out", and was used of the officials who left Jerusalem year by year to collect the temple-tax from Jews of the Dispersion. According to one view the church adopted the name from this Jewish custom, and applied it to emissaries formally appointed. But the suggestion is always present, in NT usage, that the "sending out" was the act of God or Christ, and that the church, at its public meeting, merely accepted, on the impulse of the Spirit, a choice already made. The significance of the word is important since the opposition to Paul was grounded on the charge that he was not a true Apostle. His enemies apparently held that no one was entitled to this name unless he had personally known Jesus, and Paul replies that he had seen him in his glorified body on the way to Damascus. (1 Cor. 9 1, Gal. 1 15, 16). He also points to the success of his work and his manifest possession of the Spirit as proof of a real apostleship. At a later time the name became little more than a conventional one. All who had been duly ordained to missionary work became by that act apostles.   E.F.S.

Apostles' Creed: Not of Jerusalem or apostolic origin, arose through natural expansion of a trinitarian formula because of the inner needs of the churches and not in opposition to Marcion*. Its earliest Roman form I believe in God, Father Almighty and in Christ Jesus, his Son our Lord, and in holy spirit, holy church, and resurrection of the flesh. In the fourth century, the myth of composition by the twelve apostles appears. It disappeared at Rome for centuries but was preserved, expanded, and returned to Rome by the Franks Its text was never fixed by council and assumed its present form in the sixteenth century. There is no agreement regarding its interpretation. See creeds of Christendom; old Roman Symbol.

Burn, A. E., The Apostles' Creed (1928) ; Holl, Karl, Gesammelte Aufsaetze, II, 115-128 (1928), Lietzmann, Hans, Geschichte der alten Kirche, II (1936) ; Moehlman, C. H., Protestantism's Challenge (1939) and Journal of Religion, 1933, 301-19

               C H.M.

Apostolic age and Apostolic Fathers: The term "Apostolic Age" is a vague and somewhat misleading one. Properly it should denote the period during which personal disciples of Jesus were still alive, but there is no means of determining when the last of them died. Moreover the church had entered on a new age when some of its original members must have been living. Paul died about 62 A.D., and with him the primitive period may be said to close. In modern usage the term "Apostolic Age" covers the whole century during which the NT books were written, although the later part of this century is described as "sub-apostolic". When the meaning of the word is thus extended a group of writers may be justly designated by the name commonly given to them of "Apostolic Fathers." Some of their works date from a time anterior to the later NT books, and are thus of the highest value for the light they throw on early Christian thought and practice. Several of them (e g Papias) are only known from quotations in the History of Eusebius. The works which survive are the Epistle of Clement, a homily known as the Second Epistle of Clement, the Epistle of Barnabas, the seven Epistles of Ignatius, the Didachê, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle to Diognetus. The earliest of these writings is the First Epistle of Clement, dating from the end of the first century. The longest is the Shepherd of Hermas, an allegory in the form of visions, which illustrates some features of the popular Christianity of its day. The most important is the collection of letters by Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, written on his way to martyrdom at Rome. The Didachê (Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) was only discovered near the end of last century, and is a brief manual of early church order See Patristics.

A. C McGiffert, The Apostolic Age (1897), G Weiss, Urchristentum (Eng. tr 1938), J. B Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers (1890)   E F.S.

Apostolic Canons: A collection of 85 rules for the direction of clerical life, forming the last chapter of the 8th book of the *Apostolic Constitutions. Only the first 50 of these were recognized as valid by the Western Church. The Council of Trullo (692) repudiated the Apostolic Constitutions but gave its formal approval to the Apostolic Canons.   S.M.G.

Apostolic Christian Church: A sect of 57 churches and 5,800 members made up of German and Swiss churches established by Benedict Weyeneth about the middle of the nineteenth century. It is a holiness evangelistic association. See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.

                               E.T.C.

Apostolic Christian Church (Nazarene): A sect of 31 churches and 1,600 members said to have been brought to this country from Hungary and to represent the doctrines of the Swiss preacher Froelich It is a pacifist group. See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.

                               E.T.C.

Apostolic Church Directory: A collection of 35 articles of moral and ecclesiastical instruction, made in the early 4th century and credited to the Apostles. Often called Apostolic Church Ordinances.   S.M.G.

Apostolic Constitutions: A recension in eight books of the Didascalia, the Didache, and other early Christian writings, published late in the 4th century as a manual of Church discipline, worship and doctrine, and purporting to be the instructions of the Apostles as compiled by Clement of Rome.   S.M.G.

apostolic delegate: See legates and nuncios, papal.

Apostolic Faith Mission: A pentecostal sect* originating in 1900 at Topeka, Kansas, and under the leadership of Miss Minnie Hanson and Mrs.

M. White. It denies being a denomination, and stresses sanctification, feet washing, spirit guidance, and healing, it treats sick persons by sending blessed handkerchiefs through the mails. It has 17 churches and 2,300 members. See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.   E.T.C.

Apostolic Fathers: See Apostolic age.

Apostolic Methodist Church: See holiness churches.

Apostolic Overcoming Holy Church of God: A colored pentecostal sect founded in 1916 by W. T. Phillips, a former Methodist preacher, who became the bishop of his new group. The headquarters are at Mobile, Ala. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

apostolic see: (Gr. one sent, apostle, and Lat. sedes, seat) The see or diocese of the Pope, also called the Holy See*.   L.R.W.

apostolic succession: The continuity of the Christian ministry is expressed by traditional Catholic groups in their doctrine of the apostolic succession, which in Roman theology tends to be understood as the historical sequence of the three orders of sub-deacon, deacon and priest (in the two grades of priest and ordaining priest or bishop); in Anglican theology as bishop, priest and deacon; and similarly in the Eastern Orthodox Church. Particular stress is laid upon the function of the bishop, especially in the Anglican and Orthodox communions. Among Protestant groups, Presbyterians have a theory of apostolic succession which locates it in the presbyterate functioning as a whole, or in an episcopal capacity. The entire conception of apostolic succession is defended, by all groups maintaining it, as a means of securing the purity and continuous character of Christian faith, and its preservation through the ages by a body especially designated for the purpose, namely the ministry as "from above" rather than evolved from congregations. This continuity is traced back to Christ and his apostles. See clergy. Cf. Consolamentum.   W.N.P.

apotheosis: (Gr. apothéosis, from apó, quite; theós, god) 1. The act of transforming into a god, deification*. E.g., the apotheosis of Roman emperors at death, by state decree. (See emperor worship.) 2. The ascription of divine power to a human being; glorification.   E.M.N.

apotropaism: The magic art of averting or overcoming evil influences and ill luck by resort to supposedly effective ritual acts, incantations, or other magic formulae, protective or defensive magic.   R.E.W

a priori: See epistemology.

apse: (Gr. apsis, vault or arch) A semi-cylindrical projection, roofed with a half dome. It was derived from Roman precedent and was a constant feature of the early Christian basilicas* and the various schools of the Romanesque. It developed into the Gothic chevet.   F.T.P.

Aquinas, St. Thomas: (1224?-1274) Theologian, philosopher and Dominican monk. Born in Italy the son of the Count of Aquin and the Countess of Theate. As a child he was educated by the Benedictines* at Monte Cassino and in Naples, at twenty he joined the Dominicans*, and for many years studied at Paris and at Cologne under St. Albert the Great. At the age of 32 he obtained at Paris permission to teach, and from that time was a professor there and at the Papal Curia in Rome and at Naples. His writings are voluminous, but the chief ones are these, done mainly in the order given A Commentary on Peter Lombard's Sententiae, the Summa Contra Gentiles, Commentaries on Aristotle's works, the Summa Theologica, and the Questiones Disputatae which are thorough discussions on Truth, on the Power of God, and on Evil.

He is at first influenced most by St. Augustine* and his theology and to some extent his philosophy are always indebted to this source. But his later works show him more and more, especially in psychology and epistemology, under the influence of Aristotle whom he calls the Philosopher. Among his characteristic teachings are the following. Things have determinate natures; human intellect can abstract these, and thus "know" things, but all our knowing is dependent on sensory images and on the body. God is knowable, not intuitively nor by way of St. Anselm's ontological argument, but a posteriori and naturally from things. Nature and its way must always be defended, e g., though supernatural charity comes from God, we may not say with Peter Lombard* that it is the Holy Ghost dwelling in the soul. Aristotle is wrong in holding that the world-movement must be eternal, but philosophy cannot prove that it is temporal. Philosophy is based on natural data, theology on supernatural data, hence each has its own being. Man is a person and as such has rights beyond the temporal and political and is like God, and yet he is limited and dependent. See reason in religion. Scholasticism; soul; Summa Theologica; Thomism; universals, battle over. Cf. William de la Mare.

Martin Grabmann, Thomas Aquinas, His Personality and Thought. (Tr. 1928).
Jacques Maritain, St. Thomas Aquinas, Angel of the Schools. (Tr. London, 1933).
Martin D'Arcy, Thomas Aquinas. (London, 1930)
    L.R.W.

Aralu: Abode of the dead in Babylonian mythology, the underworld, a vast dark and gloomy subterranean cave entered through a hole in the earth guarded by seven doors; all persons went there at death and none ever returned, they led a semiconscious existence and lived on dust; they could give oracles to people on earth, hence the alternate name Shualu (signifying "to ask") which appears as Sheol* in the OT, referred to also under the names Ekur, Kigallu, and many epithets and metaphors.   R.E.W.

Aramaic Language: Ancient tongue in which some parts of the O.T. were written (Jer. x, 11, Ezra iv, 8—vi, 18; vii, 12—26; Dan. ii, 4b—vii, 28). Jesus Christ spoke an Aramaic dialect.

Belongs to the North-Western branch of the Semitic family. See H. H. Rowley, The Aramaic of the Old Testament (1929).   s.l.t.

Arameans: Ancient people kindred to the Hebrews, who occupied mainly the region of Syria Often mentioned in the OT. See E. G. Kraeling, Aram and Israel (1918).   s l.t.

Aranyakas: Literally "forest treaties." That part of Hindu sacred literature which lies between the Brahmanas and the Upanishads. Either composed by or designed for those in the third of the four ashrama, the forest dwellers. See sacred literature, Hindu.   c s.b.

arcani disciplina: (Lat., discipline of the secret) A modern expression describing a practice which prevailed in the Church in the early centuries of debarring all but baptized believers from the celebration of the Eucharist.   s.m.g

archaeological periods: (Near East) A. Paleolithic (Old Stone Age)
1. Early Paleolithic
Surface finds have been found in Palestine and highland regions of Western Asia, while in Egypt Chellean and Acheulian flint tools have been found in geological formations, especially on the terraces of the Nile. There are no certain human remains earlier than this period in the Near East. Though dating is, of course, uncertain, this age is probably to be placed in the Pleistocene (geologic) Age, perhaps as early as the second or first interglacial period in Europe (over 200,000 yrs. ago at the least). A most important series of cave deposits in Palestine began at the end of the period (middle or late Acheulian), in the first phase of the third glacial age.
2. Middle Paleolithic
Age of Neanderthal man (Mousterian Period in Europe), the first distinguishable race, dwelling in Europe and Western Asia more than 50,000 to 100,000 years ago, in all probability. The first complete skeletons have been found in Palestine (12 in number) in caves of the Mt. Carmel range, though these specimens appear to be mixed with characteristics of homo sapiens. Neanderthal hunters had begun to inter their dead in such a way as to indicate a belief in an after life—the first trace of religious belief discernible.
3. Late Paleolithic
First appearance of homo sapiens in Europe (Cro-Magnon man), and the great development of cave painting in southwestern Europe. There was a great advance in the arts and crafts. Bodies were often buried with ornaments, and the first stone, bone, and ivory statuettes of nude women appear. The figurines and cave paintings probably indicate advanced religious or magical speculation, the nature of which is difficult to determine.
B. Mesolithic (Middle Stone Age)
Better represented in Palestinian caves (the Natufian culture) than anywhere else in the world. The culture was flourishing about 12,000 years ago, coming to an end before 6000 B.C. at the latest. Palestinian man of this age was small in stature

(5 ft to 5 ft. 4 in. high), and probably represents the earliest appearance of an historical race. He had learned to grow cereals (probably millet or wheat), domesticate animals, make stone basins, mortars, and simple stone constructions; and he was a firm believer in an after life.
C. Neolithic (Late Stone Age, cir. 7000-4500 B.C.)
In Europe this age is represented by the introduction of agriculture, the domestication of animals (both introduced into the Near East in the preceding period), the invention of pottery, and polished stone implements. In the Near East pottery was invented, and the first villages or experiments in community life appear. At Jericho the first sizeable building has been found, and from figurines discovered within and without may perhaps be interpreted as a temple. There are indications of a rather developed religious cult (including phallic models), and plastic statues in triads (father, mother, child) were found. Though the evidence is difficult to interpret, it has been suggested that the mythology and cultic symbolism associated with the gods of fertility must have been developed in this age. It is also probable that this is the age when megalithic burial monuments, such as dolmens and cromlechs, were built, not only in Europe but also in the Near East, though we are to reckon with a cultural lag in the case of the European Neolithic
D. Chalcolithic ("Copper-Stone" Age, cir. 4500-3000 B C.)
Transition period of great prosperity in the Near East, when copper first came into use, beautiful painted pottery developed in the Fertile Crescent, the first great public buildings built, writing developed (cir. 3500 B.C.), and agriculture and religion flourished. Temples became institutions of great power and influence. Abstractions, such as "soul", "divine", "mankind", "holiness", "goodness", "purity", and 'truth" were conceived. Basic cereals, fruit, and vegetables were grown.
E. The Bronze Age
1. The Early Bronze Age (cir. 3000-2000 B.C.)
A term in popular archaeological use, though bronze seems not yet to have been known. It is the age when the first organized states appear in Egypt and Mesopotamia, and can be said to mark the beginning of the historical period. Monumental architecture (including the Egyptian pyramids), statuary, and inscriptions occur, and mental activity was turned into a wide range of channels, including the production of great epics, such as the Sumerian creation and flood stories, and the first sign of a developing conscience in the realm of social idealism.
2. The Middle and Late Bronze Ages (cir. 2000-1500, and 1500-1200 B.C.)
Period of great international and intellectual activity, the rise and fall of the Egyptian, Babylonian, Hyksos, Hittite, and Mitannian (Horite) empires, the appearance of the first monotheism (14th cent., in Egypt), and the emergence of the Israelite people as a group, organized under a religious bond, in the highlands of Palestine.
F. The Iron Age

1. The First Iron Age (also called "Iron I" or "Early Iron Age", cir. 1200-900 B. C.)

Period of international turmoil, marked by the irruption of the "Sea-Peoples", including the Philistines, into Palestine and Syria, the introduction of iron into common use, and the greatest expansion of the Israelites as a nation under David and Solomon.

2. The Second Iron Age ("Iron II" or "Middle Iron", cir. 900-600 B.C.)

Period of the Divided Monarchy and prophetic reformation in Israel, of the great Phoenician commercial expansion (from whom the Greeks borrowed the alphabet), and of the rise and fall of the Assyrian empire.

3. The Third Iron Age ("Persian" or "Middle Iron", cir. 600-300 B.C.)

Period of the Neo-Babylonian and Persian empires, and of the Exile and Restoration of the Jews.

Subsequent periods need only be listed, since the outline of their history is fairly well known.

G. The Hellenistic-Roman Period (cir. 300 B.C.-300 A.D.)

H. The Byzantine Period (cir. 300-640 A.D.)

I. The Arab Period (cir. 640—)

W F Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, (1940) , V. Gordon Childe, New Light on the Most Ancient East, (London, 1935) , C F C. Hawkes, The Prehistoric Foundations of Europe to the Mycenaean Age, (London, 1939) , The Cambridge Ancient History, Vols. I-XII (1923-1939).

See Biblical archaeology.   G.E.W.

archaeology: A term made up of two Greek words, archaios, "ancient", and logos, "discourse". It. means, therefore, the systematic study of antiquities; a science which begins its study when man first appears on earth in the closing epoch of geology. It is concerned with those remains of past civilizations which have been excavated, in the widest sense with both epigraphic and anepigraphic discoveries. See anthropology.   G.E.W.

archbishop: See bishop.

archdeacon: See clergy.

archimandrite: See clergy.

architecture: See art, ecclesiastical, Christian; cathedral, church building; temples.

archives, ecclesiastical: The word archive, originally signifying a building where records were kept, came to be applied to the records. Ecclesiastical archives comprise all records, documents, historical materials, histories which a church organization preserves.   R.H.N.

Arianism: The heresy especially associated with the name of Arius*, but continuing as a powerful force within the Church for two generations after its condemnation at Nicea (A.D. 325). From this date until 344 the Arian party, led by Eusebius of Nicomedia*, fellow-pupil with Arius of Lucian*, remained under cover, but attempted by court intrigue and slanderous attacks to eliminate the leaders of the Nicene party. From 344 to 361, as a result of the favor of Constantius, the second son of Constantine and an Arian, Arian views were given comparatively free play It is during this period that three distinct schools of Arianism arose: the strict Arians or Anomoians*, the Semi-Arians or Homoiousion party, and the Homoians. The first group asserted the unlikeness of Christ to the Father, the second affirmed the famous "of like being (or substance)", the third stood on the intermediate platform of "like the Father". After 361, the lead being given at a Synod of Alexandria held early in 362 and presided over by Athanasius*, the Semi-Arians and Nicenes gradually drew together and the way was prepared ecclesiastically for the condemnation of Arianism along with Apollinarianism* at Constantinople in 381—the Synod later to be known as the Second Ecumenical Council. Imperial convictions and policy, however, had a part in the termination of the Controversy, as they had had in its continuation. The subsequent history of Arianism is largely confined to its impressive missionary career among the Germanic tribes. In this connection the name of Ulfilas* (A.D. 311-383), "apostle to the Goths" and translator of the Scriptures into Gothic, is the most notable.

The Writings of Athanasius, Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nazianzus, The Church Histories of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret—also of Philostorgius (fragments preserved by Photius) ; J. H Newman, The Arians of the Fourth Century (1833) , H M Gwatkin, Studies of Arianism (1882) and Arian Controversy (1889) , F J. Foakes-Jackson, "Arianism" in Ency Rel and Ethics; the standard histories of Christian Doctrine   C.W.L.

Aristippus: (ca. 435-366 B.C.) See Cyrenaics.

Aristotle (384-322 B.C.) and Aristotelianism: A great biologist, moralist, logician, and metaphysician, who came closer than any other thinker to imprisoning mankind within the confines of his system. According to this system, the world is a many of substances. A substance is something which corresponds to the subject of a proposition and can never properly be treated as a predicate. A predicate is in a substance, but a substance is in itself. [Is it not also in the world?] Substance has two aspects, matter and form—plus "privation," or the absence of this or that particular form. There can be no matter without form (except as a mere idea in the mind) and no form without matter (except in the case of God, an exception which threatens the consistency of the system). The matter is that by which the same substance can have, now one form, now another, and by which several substances can have the same form. Matter is potentiality as contrasted to actuality; for its nature is to be capable of forms beyond those which it actually has. On the other hand, forms are actual or nothing; for—in contrast to Plato's system (as Aristotle interprets it) —there is no such thing as a mere form unembodied in matter (except for God, who perhaps in a sense is embodied in the world, a doubtful point in the system, however you take it), so that the only real forms are those which have their matter, whereas there may be matter which is lacking nearly all its possible forms. Yet Aristotle says that the generic form is matter to the species, the relatively universal potential to the relatively particular. Nor is this the only indication that "matter" and potentiality are not really equivalent. For the non-material side or form of a man, for example, his soul, is said to be his actuality, although it seems clear that the unrealized potentialities of the soul surpass those of the physical as such. The doctrine seems to be that it is the physical stuff which in the case of man takes on soul or becomes actually conscious, sentient, etc. But (in modern scientific terms) do electrons, say, think human thoughts? They become associated with such thoughts in some way, and must previously have had the capacity for such association, but they never had nor can have the capacity to think, which the soul has. The final expression of the idea that the superior or spiritual is the actual as such, in contrast to the potential as such, is in the idea of God as pure actuality or pure form, without potency or becoming God has no matter or particularity in Him, but only pure form, taken as pure spirituality, and hence he knows nothing but this very spirituality (all his thinking is of thinking itself). Were he to know mere material things, this would introduce potency and inferiority into the content of his immediate intuitions, and so contradict his perfection It is a momentous paradox, to use no stronger word, that Medieval thinkers (with the honorable exception of Levi ben Gerson*) attempted to combine the doctrine of God as pure actuality with the doctrine that God knows contingent particulars, as existent. To put such entities, as existents, with their matter, into the content of divine knowledge seems utterly contrary to the Aristotelian principles proclaimed by those who indulged in the procedure. (See Omniscience, Perfection) And the evidence of experience is that each level of being has potencies which are just as expressive of its superiority to lower levels as are its actualities. A man can think and experience many things he does not actually think, and these things an atom or an ant could not think. Similarly the highest being, or God, must be capable of thoughts and experiences he does not actually enjoy and of which no lesser being is even capable. In no other way can the reality of possibilities and of time for God be maintained, and, since Omniscience measures reality, to deny potency to God is to deny that potency (and particularity) exists. Here Aristotelianism and, by the usual interpretations, Platonism* also, misled theology for over two millenia.

Aristotelian ethics has played a similarly dubious rôle in historical theology. The Aristotelian view of substance as what belongs to itself not to another thing is suitable to an ethics (or pseudo-ethics) of self-interest, not to an ethics which makes love the absolute divine principle of all things. Substances are precisely not "members one of another." For a strict Aristotelian, a cell is not a real individual in the individual human being, nor an atom in the cell, and Aristotle scarcely dreamt of either cells or atoms as they are now known to exist. His is the physics and biology of the naked eye, unaided by any lucky guess as to what more powerful instruments would reveal (partly because Aristotle detected certain philosophical errors in Greek atomic theory, and was too busy refuting these to explore more philosophical versions) Plato, on the contrary, thought of the world as an organism, as nearly as possible ideally perfect, of which all lesser organisms are members, and so by implication, through their interdependence in one organism, also members one of another. Yet Plato also kept slipping into a self-interest ethics, and never fully developed the doctrine of reality as composed of organisms organic to one another.

The theory of separate substances not organic to one another results in a dilemma which sums up much of the difficulty in later philosophy. Either the totality of the real is not a substance, or else this totality is the only substance—on the assumption that a substance can have no other substances as its parts. (Aristotle expressly denies that an organism has real parts.) If we take the first horn of the dilemma, the universe as not a substance, we have, among other difficulties, that the most stable of all orders, the cosmic order, belongs to a whole which has no substantial unity at all. If we take the other horn, and suppose the whole to have substantial unity, then all other apparent substances must be held unreal, for the world substance by hypothesis has no substantial parts. Thus assuming Aristotelianism, we have either a world-whole without parts (Spinozism*) or a world of parts without real wholeness (the doctrine of Hume*). In more theological terms· if God is not the substance of which others are members (and thereby members of each other) then besides God we have the totality of the creatures forming, with God, the super-totality, God and the creatures, and either this super-totality is more than God, greater than the greatest being, or else the creatures, being neither in God nor additional to him, are just nothing. The violence of medieval attacks upon "pantheism"* are to be explained partly by the inability of Aristotelianism to construe God either as including the world or as not including it

The theological employment of Aristotle's concept of God as "unmoved mover" overlooked the possibility that the unchanging might be an abstract aspect of a being which concretely or as a whole changes. (See transcendence, time.) It was argued that what moves tends toward an end and if the end is reached motion ceases, while if the end is not reached there is imperfection. This overlooked the inexhaustibility of possible values, their absolute infinity as possible, and their necessary finitude as actual (since possible values are partly incompossible, and cannot all be realized together—Berdyaev and Whitehead).

Aristotle's works cannot be dated Among them are: Organon (the Treatises on Logic) , Physics , The Soul ; Metaphysics , Nicomachean Ethics , Politics ; Poetics. These and others are conveniently available, with an introduction, in The Basic Works of Aristotle (1941), ed. by Richard McKeon See eudemonism; hylomorphism, mean, Aristotelian, metaphysics; soul

C.H.

Arius: (A.D. 256-336) Presbyter of Alexandria and most prominent exponent of the heresy known as Arianism. Arius was a pupil of Lucian* of Antioch, a disciple of Paul of Samosata*, who had however combined the monarchian* and adoptianist standpoint of the latter with the Logos Christology of Origen*. This is the starting point for understanding the thought of Arius. One of his motives was monarchian; with this was combined the Greek idea of the utter transcendence and inaccessibility of God. The Logos, as for Origen, is the medium of the Father's creation, but for Arius He is entirely a creature, produced out of nothing as the beginning of the creation, endowed with free will, and made the recipient of the Divine Grace. Following the Gospel according to St John, Arius taught that this Logos became flesh in Christ, but denied that the latter possessed a human soul.

The Arian Controversy began in A.D. 318, when Arius openly opposed his Bishop Alexander* on the eternity of the Son. Against this Arius insisted that the Father must be older than the Son, and that "there was when the Son was not." After his excommunication by Alexander, Arius found many allies, and "in a short time the whole Eastern Church became a metaphysical battle-field." The climax of the controversy was the Council of Nicea called in 325 by the Emperor Constantine*. Here Arius' views were condemned, and the famous anti-Arian Creed of Nicea was promulgated. Its most important phrase, "of one being (or substance) with the Father", survives in the Creed commonly called the Nicene and used in many of the Liturgies of Christendom. See Arianism for the further development of this heresy and for a bibliography.   C.W L.

ark: The sacred ark, conceived to be the palladium of Yahweh*, appears to have been the chief cult object of the Ephraemitic sanctuary of Shiloh. It was borne by the priests in military expeditions as visible symbol of Yahweh's presence. (Num. 10. 35-36, cf. Ps. 68.1). Captured by the Philistines* in the second battle of Eben-ezer, it brought disaster upon the people of Ashdod and Gath, who returned it in desperation to the Israelites (1 Sam. 4-6). It remained at Kiriath-jearim until David* installed it in the new sanctuary at Jerusalem*. Subsequently it was transferred to Solomon's* temple and deposited within the debir or the Holy of Holies*. (2 Sam. 6, 1 Kings 8.1-11) In the light of advancing ideas of God, the ark was now reinterpreted to function as the receptacle of the tables of the Law* and was referred to as "the ark of the covenant of God". What happened to the ark later on is not known. Tradition reports that there was no ark in the Second Temple (Menahot 27b). The Priestly Code* traces the ark to Moses*, who constructed it at God's behest and set it within the Tabernacle* to shelter the Decalogue* and to serve as the throne of God, upon which He sat between the cherubim*. (Ex. 25. 10-22, 37. 1-9).

In the synagogue* the ark is built or placed in the eastern wall as the container of the scrolls of the Law. High in front of it hangs the perpetual light; above its door there is generally a representation of the Decalogue, and a curtain is placed behind or in front of the door. The ark thus symbolizes the Holy of Holies of the Temple*. See propitiation.   S S C.

Arles, Synod of: The first general council of the Western Church, which met in Arles in southeastern France in A.D. 314. Called by the emperor Constantine* to settle points at issue between Donatists* and Catholics in North Africa, which had been left unsettled by the Synod of Rome in 313 Attended by representatives of bishoprics in western Europe (including Britain) and North Africa. 22 canons condemned the Donatists and their main contentions and dealt with matters of ecclesiastical discipline that had emerged since the persecution under Diocletian.   S M.G.

Armenian Church: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

Armenian version: See versions of the Bible, ancient.

Arminian theology: Arminian theology places its chief emphasis upon man's freedom of choice. It arose in the Reformed Church of the Netherlands as a protest against the extreme form of Calvinism which prevailed at the beginning of the 17th century It takes its name from James (Jacobus) Arminius (1560-1609), a mild-mannered professor of the University of Leyden.

The protest of Arminius and his followers was against the dogmas of unconditional election and irresistible grace.

Their opponents held that God elects certain persons for salvation while others are denied that privilege. Furthermore, because God wills it so, it is just. Arminius held that, "He cannot will to do . . . that which He cannot do of right. For His will is restricted by justice." Arminius held that divine foreknowledge enables God to foresee the purely contingent. That is to say that God knows in advance that a man will sin by free choice but that God does not will nor predestine the man to do so. Arminius held, further, that man's freedom stands in contrast to compulsion, to necessity, and to spontaneity. Even in the desire for happiness, which is spontaneous, man is not free Freedom exists only where there is the power of alternate choice. Man faces alternate choice and is actually free.

The opponents held that the grace of God, which is made available for the elect, cannot be resisted. The Arminians held that grace is not irresistible, but that those who "are ready for the conflict, and desire His (Christ's) help, and are not inactive" will be kept from falling.

The influence of Arminian theology spread widely when it was adopted by the Methodist and related movements in the 18th century. Its viewpoint has promoted a spirit of tolerance. It has led to an emphasis upon human duties rather than speculative theology. See Dort, Synod of; Five Points of Arminianism; Remonstrants, the.

G L. Curtiss, Arminianism in History (1894);

James Arminius, The Works Of, translated from the Latin by James Nichols (1853), Selected list of Writings of Arminius The Priesthood of Christ (1603), The Object of Theology (1603), The Author and the End of Theology (1603), The Certainty of Sacred Theology (1603), On Reconciling Religious Dissensions Among Christians (1606), A Declaration of Sentiments (1608), A Dissertation on the True and Genuine Sense of the Seventh Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (1599), A Letter on the Sin Against the Holy Ghost (1599); Analysis of the Ninth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (1593)

W E.R.

Arnold, Gottfried: (1666-1714) Serving as professor of secular history for only one year in Giessen, he held pastorates in Werben and Perleburg. He was endowed with a poetic gift and translated the works of several religious mystics. He also wrote several spiritualistic works. His church history was the first one written in German. He was an exponent of a pneumatic or spiritualistic interpretation of the history of the Christian church. The work was a ruthless break-through of traditional ecclesiastical tendencies. It was a passionate sermon of repentance to corrupted Christianity, whether Catholic or Protestant. The central coherent idea of the work was the idea of the gradual process of corruption of the historical church.

Unparteiische Kirchen und Ketzerhistorie von Anfang des Neuen Testamentes bis auf Jahr Christi 1688, 2 vols (Frankfurt, 1699-1700)   H H.

Arnold, Matthew: (1822-1888) English educator, poet, and critic. Although actively engaged for thirty-five years as an inspector of schools, he lectured and wrote extensively on a wide range of subjects. His poetry, issued mostly between 1849 and 1867, is sombre and often skeptical in tone, reflecting what he termed "the main movement of mind" of the age. In his subsequent prose writings, however, he undertook to resolve his doubts. His principal excursions into the fields of social and religious criticism are Culture and Anarchy (1869), St. Paul and Protestantism (1870), Literature and Dogma (1873), God and the Bible (1875), all are marked by a strong ethical emphasis deriving from Stoic as well as Christian sources.

The Macmillan edition of the Works (15 vols, 1903) is the most nearly complete   Outstanding among recent studies is The Poetry of Matthew Arnold a Commentary, by C. B. Tinker and H F Lowry (1940).   L.W.C. ars moriendi: Counsel for the dying; especially a written guide to the priest in his ministry to the dying. Many artes moriendi appeared in the late middle ages. (A. Hardeland, Geschichte der speciellen Seelsorge, Berlin, 1897-8.)   J.T.M.

art: See dancing, hymns; idols and images; poetry.

art, ecclesiastical Christian: The earliest Christian art of which we have any examples are the crude drawings in the Roman catacombs*. The earliest church buildings are the Roman basilicas* whose apses* and adjacent walls are decorated with mosaics. This form of church persisted in Italy till well into the Middle Ages, and the campanile* appears with the basilica and is used with all the other Italian styles. After Constantinople became the capital of the empire the Byzantine style had a glorious reign in that city It was developed from oriental and Roman precedents and was characterized by the use of the barrel vault, the apse and the dome on pendentives, and its interiors were profusely decorated with a veneer of colored marbles and gorgeous mosaics. Sancta Sophia at Constantinople (532-562) and St. Mark's at Venice (c. 1100) are outstanding remaining examples.

The Romanesque style began in Lombard territory in northern Italy and is characterized by cross vaults supported by independent ribs and a crude but vigorous sculpture decoration. St. Ambrogio at Milan c. 1075 is generally considered the initial monument of the style. The Tuscan Romanesque of central Italy of which Pisa (1063-1118) is a notable example, is characterized by abundant external arcading and veneer of colored marbles but without any attempt at vaulted interiors. The Romanesque of southern France is of especial importance and has a school of sculpture showing in the south, strong Roman influence, but is more crude but vigorous farther north. A Romanesque school flourished in the Rhine valley and some other parts of Germany in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, showing strong Lombard influence, of which the great churches of Mainz, Speyer and Worms are representative examples.

The Gothic developed from the Romanesque in the Isle de France in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries and became the most noteworthy school of art in all Christian history. The profuse sculpture of its churches ranks with that of Greece of the fifth century B C., and its stained glass has no equal in all art. The Gothic movement spread into all European countries. Spain has splendid churches in the Gothic and Romanesque styles. In England the Gothic developed from the Norman Romanesque in the thirteenth century and is second only to that of France. Its iconography*, while not so profuse, is in its best examples, of a choice and striking character. Its cathedrals, parish and abbey churches and university buildings rank high among the buildings of the world, with much stained glass that is unexcelled.

The architectural Renaissance began with Brunelleschi's dome in Florence in 1420. In the first century of the movement it was a revival of all the preceding styles of European architecture except that of Greece. But it soon became a revival of the Roman classical and in this form it spread to the various European countries. The best example of this latter phase is the work of Palladio (1518-1580) and in its Palladian form it came to England, and was the chief influence in the work of Sir Christopher Wren (1632-1723). Wren's modified Palladian is the style seen in the London churches and the school is known as the Georgian.

The first churches in the American colonies of the seventeenth century, in Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Amsterdam, etc., were in the debased Gothic of the times, but the Georgian prevailed in the Anglican churches and so continued through the eighteenth century. The non-Anglican churches, however, especially in New England, were the plain meeting houses of English nonconformist precedent. It was not till after the Revolution that the American Georgian began to appear in other than Episcopal churches, and the white New England churches with their storied steeples are splendid examples of this movement continued at its best till about 1820.

The Georgian period was followed by the Greek, Gothic and Romanesque revivals till about the time of the Civil War when the so-called "dark ages" of American architecture began, which lasted well through the nineteenth century.

Since about 1900 there has been a remarkable awakening to the ecclesiastical proprieties in this country. The last vestiges of the "meeting house" ideal are rapidly disappearing. The "auditorium" is giving place to the more seemly house of worship. The hitherto unfinished "pulpit end" of the church has in numerous instances been completed with the appropriate chancel in which the altar is again taking its proper place. Under the leadership of brilliant artists like the late Ralph Adams Cram, fine Gothic churches with appropriate stained glass and abundant symbolism have been built, and the other historic styles have many fine examples in the towns and cities of this country. See church building.

D. M. Robb & J. J. Garrison, Art in the Western World (1935) ; H. Gardner, Art through the Ages (1936) ; S. Reinach Apollo (1910), F. Kimball & G. H. Edgell, A History of Architecture (1918), E. H. Short, The House of God (1926) ; R. Sturgis, Dictionary of Architecture and Building (1901-1902).

F.T.P.

art in the Enlightenment: See Enlightenment, the.

art, philosophy of: See aesthetics.

Articles of Religion (Methodist): These articles were included in the Sunday Service for the Methodists of North America, prepared by John Wesley in 1784, for the newly formed Methodist Episcopal Church. Originally they consisted of twenty-four articles, based upon the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England. Later the American Methodists added an article Of Rulers of the United States of America. Broadly speaking the Methodist articles differ from the thirty-nine of the Episcopal Church in that all references to Calvinism are excinded.

W.W.S.

arts, fine: See fine arts.

Arval Brothers: Fratres Arvali, a college of priests in the religion of ancient Rome. Perhaps of Etruscan origin. The archaic "Song of the Arval Brethren" indicates an agricultural function, a charm for the protection of the crops and for successful harvests.

W. W. Fowler Roman Festivals (1899).

F.G.M.

Arya Samaj: A modern reform movement in Hinduism founded by Dyananda Sarasvati in 1875. Although undoubtedly an indirect result of the Christian invasion of India it is notably hostile to Christianity and has sought the re-conversion to Hinduism of Indians who have become Christian. It represents a back-to-the-Vedas* movement, the founder having discovered in the ancient scriptures many of the values which modern India* has come to appreciate. He even finds monotheism there, since the multiple so-called Vedic gods are discovered to be but variant names for the one true God. The movement is strictly non-idolatrous in its worship, but it retains the characteristic Hindu beliefs in Karma and transmigration which the founder thought were taught in the Vedas Salvation is thought of as emancipation from rebirth

Dyananda was nationalistic to a high degree and his movement has been part cause, part effect of the modern rise of nationalism in India. It has become quite the most aggressive branch of Hinduism*.

The Arya Samaj has about a half-million followers at present, nearly a hundred times the membership of the Brahma-Samaj* from which Dyananda borrowed a number of the principal features of his society. But its influence on Indian life has not been in proportion to its relative superiority in numbers.

C.S.B.

Aryan religion: The religion of the ancient Aryans, the ancestors of the Iranians and Vedic Indians. The Aryans are a group which separated from the pro-ethnic Indo-Europeans about 2000 B.C. or soon after, and settled in Iran and in India. (See India, Religions of). Their religion, consequently, is a development of the Indo-European religion. The latter recognized, aside from tribal deities, cosmic divine beings: the supreme god was Dyeus (Greek, Zeus, Latin, Jupiter), the shining god of the sky, the giver of rain and fertility, the vanquisher of his foes through his lightning bolt. He is the father (not the creator) of gods and men and, unless identified with a local god, has no national limitations. His counterpart and consort is Mother Earth. Other gods of light (deivo, cf. Latin, deus [god]) are the Sun (svarya), the Moon (mas), and the Dawn (cf. Greek eôs). Fire worship was also common, as well as the local worship of minor deities in trees, stones, springs, and rivers. The gods fight unceasingly against the demons of darkness; these have sometimes stolen a divine treasure which must be recovered.

Culturally more advanced than the Indo-Europeans, the Aryans progressed religiously, without however loosing that sense of universality and fellowship with nature which are characteristic of the former. Dyeus was gradually displaced by Indra*, a younger and more heroic god of storms and lightning who killed the dragon Vrtra, but the sun and moon gods persisted sporadically among them. By the side of Indra we now find the heroic Trita, as also the Nasatyas (Asvins) in their war chariot. The real contribution of the Aryans was the development of deities regulating human society (Iranian Ahura, Indian *Asura), by the side of these gods of nature (deivo): eventually the Asuras (except Varuna*) became demons in India, while the Daevas, through Zoroaster, became demons in Iran. The gods of justice and right are. Mitra (Iranian, Mithra, meaning "compact"), the defender of the sanctity of contracts between individuals and of treaties between nations; and Varuna, the defender of the sanctity of oaths (identified with Ahura-Mazda* by Zoroaster). Mithra may have been a solar deity, Varuna the god of the ocean encircling the earth (in India he became a sea god). The Aryans achieved some notion of the cosmic order, the uniform law of nature, arta (Indian, rta, Avestan, asha), dominating over gods and men and unsuccessfully disregarded by demons, who consequently are but illusions (druh; Iranian, druj). To obtain the blessings of the gods, men must fulfil the requirement of "good thoughts, good works, good deeds"—originally a ritual precept, gradually moralized in Zoroastrianism and Buddhism. The preparation of the sacred drink (Vedic, Soma*; Avestan, Haoma*)—later a god,—the sacrificial worship, and the liturgies belonging to it (particularly the magical spells, mantra) are the monopoly of the priests, who attained consequently a high social position. Two classes among them are known. the "lighters of fire" (Indian, atharvan; Iranian, athravan), and the "callers" (Indian, hotar; Iranian, zaotar) who invoke the gods through ritual formulae and also through improvised hymns (Iranian, gatha). Before Zoroaster and Buddha*, the priests were responsible for religious progress among the Aryans.

O. Schrader, in J Hastings, Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, vol. II (1908) pp. 11-57 (chiefly on Indo-European religion) ; E Meyer, Geschichte des Altertums (3rd ed., 1913), 1:2, pp 914-931.

R.H.P.

ascension: The rising of Christ in his resurrected body from earth into heaven (Acts 1.9).

Beliefs in similar experiences on the part of holy men do not involve the fact of the resurrection.

R.E.E.K.

Ascension Day: See Church Year Cycle.

asceticism, in Judaism and early Christianity: (Gr. askein, to practice, train, exercise) The view that through moderation or renunciation of those things commonly considered pleasant one reaches a higher spiritual state. Asceticism was alien to the genius of Judaism, and not unnaturally so, since asceticism is peculiarly individualistic and dualistic: the longing to rid one's soul of the defiling corruption of the body. The Rechabites and Nazarites of the O.T. were not properly ascetics but reactionaries, men out of step with the times, who sought to reënact the good old days. The prohibition against wine by the Rechabites was thus not on ascetic grounds—still less on moral grounds—but was a protest against the settled life of Israel subsequent to the occupation of Canaan. Vineyards were the sign and product of a type of life impossible for nomads. Ascetic groups such as Essenes and Therapeutæ were present in later Judaism, but were far departures from its genius and apparently exerted little influence upon the rank and file.

Some branches of Christianity eventually took on an ascetic nature, as an acquired characteristic. It is not to be seen in the earliest days, although not infrequently it has been mistakenly read into Paul's cautious words regarding marriage. In I Cor. 7 36 ff. there is probably to be seen an indication of the so-called spiritual marriages (virgines subintroductae), which later caused a great moral problem for the church. Col. 2. 20 ff. suggests that early in the first century ascetic notes were being stressed—from the outside—and were being as heatedly opposed. As the years wore on, they became increasingly prominent, leading to a disparagement of marriage and a temporary unwholesome exaltation of the type of life characterized by the so-called pillar saints. In many circles of Christians there is still to be discerned the nervous suspicion that anything pleasant and natural to man is under the wrathful ban of God and will have to be atoned for at the bar of judgment.

See anchoret, communistic settlements, religious, hermit; recluse.

O. Zockler, Askese und Mönchtum (1897), E. Fehrle, Die kultische Keuschheit des Altertums (1910) ; J Main, Religious Chastity (1913) ; C. H. Moore, "Ascetic Tendencies of the Greek and Roman" in Harvard Essays on Classical Subjects (1912), pp 97-140, M. S. Enslin, Christian Beginnings (1938), pp. 120-126.

M.S.E.

Asgard: Home of the Norse gods, where Odin's seat was. In it lived the twelve gods and twenty-four goddesses, and in it was the hall of the chosen slain, Valhalla, surrounded by the forest of trees whose leaves were all of red gold.   P.G.M.

Ashkenazim: The biblical Ashkenaz (Gen. 10.3) was identified in medieval Hebrew with Germany, and the name Ashkenazim came to designate the Jews of Germany and their descendants in northern, central and eastern Europe, Great Britain, and the Americas. They constitute more than ninety per cent of all Jews.   S.S.C.

Ashshur: Assyrian national god; the lord of the Assyrians, without connection with natural phenomena, active in war, represented shooting the bow inside of a winged disk.   R.H.P.

Ashtart: See Mother Goddesses, cf. Ashtoreth.

Ashtoreth: (Possibly a distortion of Ashtart*, on the analogy of Bosheth, shame; Gr. Astarte) Supreme goddess of Canaan and female counterpart of Baal (cf. Baalism), known in Babylonia as Ishtar* and in S. Arabia as Athtar (masc.). Ever-virginal, she was also the fruitful mother and creatress of life. The Philistines* seem to have emphasized her warlike character (I Sam. 31.10). The numerous Ashtaroth represent various forms under which she was worshipped in different places (Judges 10.6, cf. I Kings 11.33; 23.13). Her name was given to the city of Og, king of Bashan (Deuter 1.4.). See Mother Goddesses.   S.S.C.

Ash Wednesday: The first day of Lent in the West, since it was prolonged by four days (early Middle Ages) to make a 40-day fast; the name came from the imposition of ashes on penitents, later on the congregation generally. See Shrovetide.   E.R.E.

Asmoneans: See Hasmoneans.

asperges: A ceremony preceding high mass, during which the celebrant of the mass, with assisting ministers, goes in procession through the congregation, sprinkling the members with water, and reciting meanwhile appropriate words from the Psalter and elsewhere. The purpose of the ceremony is to symbolize the purity of heart which should mark those who participate in the holy mysteries of the Church.   w.n.p.

Assam: A British Indian Province, north of Bengal and bordering on Burma. The prevailing religion of Assam is Hinduism*, in the form of Shaktism and Vishnuism. About a third of the population is Moslem. In recent times Christianity has made notable gains among the people.

c.s.b.

Assemblies of God, General Council: The largest of the pentecostal sects, having headquarters at Springfield, Mo. The group has about 2,600 churches and 148,000 members. See pentecostal sects.   e.t.c.

Assize of Clarendon: An edict of Henry II in 1166 which was of major importance in English constitutional development. It allowed the king's justices to invade private jurisdictions and regulated the rights of possession. See Constitutions of Clarendon.   t.j.b.

Associate Reformed Church: See s.v. Reformed Presbyterian Church in N. A., United Presbyterian Church of N. A. associationism: See psychology, schools of.

assumption: (Lat. assumptio, domitionis; Gr. kosmeois, analepsis) The doctrine that the Virgin Mary* was at her death assumed into heaven by her Son. Record of the belief, which is held both in East and West, is first found in 4th century writers, notably S. Epiphanius*, who thought the history obscure. The belief became widely popular, partly because of the absence of any relics but largely because of increased Mariolatry*. Theologians generally construe the event as an anticipation of the General Resurrection, Roman Catholics following the argument potuit, decit, fecit, and holding the doctrine a pious opinion that no one is permitted to doubt, as Benedict XIV* declared. Devotion centers not in the event but in the subsequent status of St. Mary as first among the saints already with the Lord.   t.j.b.

Assumption, Augustinians of the: A Roman Catholic missionary order established in 1843 at Nîmes, to combat irreligion in Europe and schism in the East. Suppressed in 1900 on suspicion of royalist intrigue, it continues work in the Near East.   t.j.b.

Assumption, Feast of the: August 15th. A commemoration which had spread from Jerusalem to Rome, Gaul, and Egypt by the 6th century. A holy day of obligation in most countries in the Roman Catholic Church, it is kept as a principal feast by the Orthodox and is in some Anglican books.   t.j.b.

Assumption of Moses, the: A fragment of a larger Apocalyptic* work now lost. Its form is that of an address delivered by Moses* to Joshua before his death. It was originally written either in Hebrew or Aramaic and it was composed during the first decade after the death of Herod or about 6 C E.

See pseudepigrapha.   b.z.b.

assurance (of salvation, God's favor): There is a plain doctrine of assurance in the N T. The purpose of the Gospel is the salvation* of men through their reconciliation to God, the subjects ' this salvation know themselves such. Attestation is twofold (Wesley*: direct and indirect witness of the Spirit) the witness within, to divine sonship (Rom. 8.16), the witness without, of its power and fruits ('We know . . .' I John 3·14).

In the Church, assurance has reflected the conception of faith*. Scholasticism, e.g., made faith decisive in salvation, but it was faith (belief) in the creeds and the teaching of the Church. This meant continual dependence on the Church and lacked definitiveness for full divine confidence at any given moment. The Reformers saw faith as directly Godward and the work of God; hence sure as is God. Assurance a part of faith (Augsburg Confession, IV), for Calvin faith includes certitudo salutis. But he allows that contrary elements within may dull this certitude, generally as Reformation progressed, teaching concerning assurance became less insistent (Westminster Confession, XVIII: 'believers may be certainly assured . . . this assurance not of the essence of faith'). In Pietism and Methodism, a revival of the doctrine occurs, faith again in the divine Spirit would could not fail. For Wesley, assurance every believer's clear privilege, common testimony was to certainty of acceptance with God.

Christian assurance does not beget complacency or exclude perseverance*. It is the nerve of the latter; knowledge that God has begun His work earnest of its completion. For comparison of assurance as spiritual convincement and certainty as mode of knowledge, see certainty.

D. M. Baillie, Faith in God and its Christian Consummation (1927); W. A. Brown, Pathways to Certainty (1930).   j.l.

Assyria and Babylonia, religions of: See Mesopotamian religions.

Astruc, Jean: (1684-1766) French specialist in inoculations, skin, and venereal diseases; physician to Louis XV; while doing research on the medical laws in the Bible, he discovered the significance of the names Elohim and Yahweh in differentiating biblical sources; published Conjectures on the Original Memoirs . . . , thus laying the basis for the documentary concept of biblical origins.   r.e.w.

Asura: An epithet applied to the Vedic gods, to emphasize their mysterious nature and power. Literally it means mysterious lord. In later Vedic literature the Asuras became demons, evil beings opposed to the good gods. See Aryan religion.

C.S.B.

Asvins: Twin Vedic deities closely related to Ushas*, goddess of dawn as brothers or husbands. They are represented sometimes as divine physicians who cure the diseased and are closely connected with love marriage and offspring. C.S.B.

asylum: a) An institution for the care of some class of destitute or afflicted persons, such as the poor or insane. This use of the term is somewhat outmoded in modern times, such institutions being designated by the words *hospital or infirmary. b) A place where in ancient Hebrew or classical times persons guilty of unintentional homicide might take refuge, being immune there from blood vengeance* on the part of some member of the victim's family. Hence, the phrase, "right of asylum". Among the early Hebrews six places were designated as Cities of Refuge which had their counterpart among the Greeks and Romans. Temples, altars and other sacred places have also been regarded as sanctuaries for certain classes of criminals from which they could not be taken without sacrilege. In medieval times Christian churches often served the same purpose. c) In international law an area of a country within which citizens of other nationalities exercise exterritorial rights.

A.E.W.

Atargatis or Derceto: The Syrian Goddess of whom Lucian wrote his de Dea Syria. Perhaps only a Syrian form of the general Semitic goddess Ishtar* Cf. "Atargatis" by Lewis Paton, ERE, II, 164 ff. Cf. Mother-goddesses. P.G.M.

Athanasian Creed: (Often called from its opening words, the Quicunque Vult*) One of the three so-called Ecumenical Creeds, the other two being the Apostles' and the Nicene. As in the two latter cases, its name is strictly speaking inaccurate, although in relation to the origin and import of the Creed not unjustified. Further, like the Apostles' Creed*, the Athanasian is Western rather than genuinely Ecumenical, although it is included as an Appendix in the Hour Offices of the Eastern Orthodox Church. The "Athanasium" originated almost certainly in Southern Gaul as a commentary on, or an exposition of, the fides Athanasii or Nicene Creed. It seems fairly certain also that it was post-Augustinian and reflected the desire to state the doctrine of the Trinity* in the terms of the Augustinian paradoxes, although Waterland's celebrated argument in favor of its origin in "Apollinarian times" (by this phrase he meant pre-Nestorian) has never lacked supporters.

Whether the Athanasian Creed was also conceived of from the first as a rule of faith, is unclear. At any rate it was from an early time in high favor among the Monasteries as a suitable subject for meditation and memorization. With the revival of Church music under Charlemagne*, it came into use as a canticle and was placed in the office of Prime*. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI (1549) it was directed that the Athanasian Creed should be "sung or said" after the Benedictus at the greater Feasts. In the Fifth English Prayer Book (1662), which is still the only official Book of Common Prayer* in the Church of England, it was directed that this confession should "be sung or said at Morning Prayer, instead of the Apostles' Creed" on thirteen Feasts (including all the major Festivals). The American Prayer Book (distinct from the English since 1789) never included the Athanasian Creed. See creeds of Christendom.

D. Waterland, A Critical History of the Athanasian Creed (1723, ed J R King, Oxford, 1870), A. E. Burn, Introduction to the Creeds (1899), E. C. S. Gibson, The Three Creeds (1908), J. H. Colligan, The Arian Movement in England (Manchester, 1913). See also art. "Creeds (Ecumenical)" in Ency. Rel. and Ethics, and Harnack, History of Dogma, Vol. IV, pp. 134-7, Vol. V, pp 303-4

C.W.L.

Athanasius, St., Bishop of Alexandria: (A.D. 293? 296?-373) The great defender of the Nicene faith against prolonged attacks by numerous and powerful Arians*. His life is an incomparable epic of heroism, fortitude, and faith. To him more than to any other single individual is due the triumph of the Nicene position as opposed to a doctrine now universally acknowledged to have represented the reduction of Christianity to a thinly disguised paganism. As a theologian Athanasius won his spurs before the outbreak of the Arian Controversy. In his Contra Gentiles and De Incarnatione—really a single apologetico-dogmatic treatise in two parts—we have a work by a comparative youth which represents the high-water mark of Ante-Nicene theology in its central line of development. At Nicea Athanasius undoubtedly supported Alexander*, but the decisive terms came from the West. As Bishop of Alexandria from 326 on, Athanasius planted himself steadfastly on the Nicene Creed and increasingly made his own its terminology. He maintained, for example, the synonymity of ousia and hypostasis, but with an attitude at once Christian and statesmanlike he conceded to the Semi-Arians in 362 the right to say three hypostases, provided that they accepted the single ousia. (See art. "Arianism"). Behind all his doctrinal writings, polemical and otherwise, is the central conviction that "God Himself has entered into humanity." From this angle Harnack is right in asserting that the point of view of Athanasius underwent no development. Loofs, however, is correct in holding that Athanasius' way of expressing his views underwent considerable development, and that contact with the West was not without influence in this respect. See Cenobite, creeds of Christendom.

Among the important writings of Athanasius, in addition to the two already cited, are Orationes contra Arianos IV, Apologia contra Arianos, De Decretis, De Synodis, Ad Afros.

For a translation of these and other basic works see The Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Second Series, Vol. IV. The Introduction to this volume by A Robertson is memorable For the whole corpus of Athanasius' writings in the original, see J. P. Migne, Patrologia Graeca. Among modern monographs Loofs' "Athanasius" in Realencyklopädie für Protestantische Theologie und Kirche (3rd ed.), is indispensable. See also bibliography under "Arianism". C.W.L.

43

Atharva-Veda: The latest of the four Vedas, the Veda of popular religion. Contains many magic charms and incantations along with hymns and prayers similar to those in the Rig Veda. While collected later than the Rig-Veda it represents a much more primitive stage of religion. c.s.b.

atheism: (Gr. a-, not, and theos, god) 1) The denial that there is any god*, no matter in what sense "god" be defined. 2) The denial that there exists a being corresponding to some particular definition of god, frequently, but unfortunately, used to denote the denial of God as personal (the denial of theism), or, more particularly, of a personal God as defined in a particular (e.g., trinitarian, Catholic, or Calvinistic) creed. See theism. E.S.B.

Athenagoras: A Christian philosopher and apologist in Athens in the late 2nd century. Author of the Legatio pro Chrsstianis (Appeal on Behalf of Christians) and of De resurrectione (On the Resurrection of the Dead). s.m.g.

Athos, Mount (or the Holy Mountain) The largest historic center of Eastern Orthodox monasticism. It is a peninsula jutting into the Aegian Sea from the main Peninsula of Chalcidice. It was reorganized as a monastic center in the tenth century by St. Athanasius the Athonite. At present the monastic republic consists of twenty establishments, of which eleven are cenobitic* (where the brethren share all things in common) and nine are idiorrhythmic (where the monks receive remuneration for their work). Of these twenty monasteries, seventeen are Greek, one is Bulgarian, one Serbian, and one Russian. According to the strict rule, no woman is permitted on the territory of the peninsula. m.s.

atman: A term of uncertain origin which in its oldest usage meant "breath" but came to signify "the self", and, in the Upanishads, the universal self, ultimate reality being represented as Brahman-Atman. It was through knowledge of the identity of the individual self with Brahman-Atman that *moksha was attained in one of the philosophic schools of Hinduism. c.s.k.

atman: (Indian) In early Vedic times: wind, breath, nature of a thing. Late Brahmanas and after: mind or consciousness of man, or soul of man, also, cosmic mind, cosmic consciousness, world soul: a unit in the cosmic aggregate of souls (purusha)*. f.l.p.

atonement in Christianity: The theme of all Christian doctrines of the atonement is the sentence: Christ died for our sins. From the very beginning of the church, the cross* of Christ was understood as a vicarious suffering. According to the records of the gospels, Jesus himself seems to have interpreted in such a way the death on the cross which he anticipated with certainty. His reinterpretation of the Messiah*-idea in terms of the Isaianic conception of the suffering servant and the manner in which he instituted the Last Supper clearly indicate this probability. After the crucifixion, His followers were persuaded by their experiences of His resurrection that His death was not only a triumph rather than a defeat but also a sacrifice by which all sacrifices to God were ended. This conviction was to them all the more marvelous because they were sure that God had sent in Jesus His Son. Thus Paul could declare that in Jesus (and when he thought of Jesus he thought of Him as crucified!) God had reconciled the world unto Himself. He believed that, by the grace of God, Christ had bought men free from the slavery to the dominions and powers, particularly of the law, sin, and death.

Whatever the theories behind these interpretations, the religious truth inherent in them was proved by the impression of the person of Jesus upon His believers.

As the church developed its liturgy, theology and ethics, these ideas of the NT constituted the core around which all later interpretations of the meaning of Christ's vicarious suffering grew. Among the doctrines of the atonement that were formulated in the course of time the following are outstanding:

1) The Ransom-theory. The theologians of the ancient church interpreted the death of Christ as a ransom paid to the devil. Irenaeus, Origen, Athanasius, Augustine were the chief expositors of this doctrine. The presupposition of their teaching was that Jesus Christ was the divine Logos Incarnate (this holds true also for all later theories). In rather crude ways they explained that Jesus Christ by permitting Himself to become the victim of death and the devil, had destroyed their power not only by offering them the price of His life in place of that of mankind, but also by proving in His resurrection, His supremacy over them. This teaching has long been recognized as theologically quite dubious, especially on account of the fact that it appears to imply that the devil is a power that can or must be bought off even by God, but it is nevertheless significant, because it carries within it the assertion of the belief in the victory of life over death and of good over evil, accomplished in the death and resurrection of Christ.

2) The Anselmic (or objective) theory of the atonement. The ransom theory dominated Christian thinking until the time of Anselm* of Canterbury. In his book Cur Deus Homo?, Anselm showed the inadequacies of the traditional theory and advanced a new one in its stead. Reflecting the spirit that dominated the church's practice of penance and possibly the spirit of feudalism, he argued that the death of Christ, the God-man, must be understood as a reparation or "satisfaction"* paid to God for the sins of mankind by which his honor is offended. This violation being infinite in character demands a retribution infinite in value. In Jesus God became man in order to make this payment possible in His voluntary vicarious death on the cross which infinite in character constitutes a superabundant "satisfaction" for human sin.

Even in Anselm's day, this doctrine was criticized not only for the arbitrary overemphasis upon the death of Christ which excludes a soteriological consideration of the whole life and person of Jesus, but also for the view of the nature of God which it implies, namely that God should demand the death of a wholly and supremely innocent person in order that His honor and justice be upheld. However, in spite of these weaknesses, Anselm's theory has determined and reflected Christian piety throughout the ages insofar as it was believed to articulate the religious experience of the weight of human sin in the presence of the cross of Jesus (Anselm himself wrote, pointing to the crucified one· Nondum considerasti quantum ponderis sit peccatum?). Moreover, his insistence upon the idea that God demands an absolute recognition of His justice while He forgives the sins of man, was rightly understood as an expression of the fundamental Christian conception of God as Holy Father.

3) The Abailardian (or subjective) doctrine of the atonement. Abailard* advanced an interpretation of the death of Christ in which the weaknesses of the Anselmic teaching were avoided. According to his view, the contemplation of the cross so moves the believer, that he will recognize in it the transforming power of God's sacrificial love and thus be led to repent of his sins, devoting himself henceforth to a life of sacrificial love.

The doctrine found much favor among the medieval scholastics. It was significant, however, that it was combined by them, especially by Thomas Aquinas*, with that of Anselm, because the teaching of the latter preserved the objective centrality of the cross in the Christian faith in a way which Abailard's theory rendered impossible.

Hence, it remained customary to interpret the death of Christ as a "satisfaction". This holds true generally also for Protestant theology, although the reformers and the humanist theologians introduced either modifications or criticisms of it. Under the leadership of Luther, the Reformers taught to understand the suffering of Christ as the divine punishment for the sins of the world. With this emphasis, which Anselm had intentionally avoided, they combined a renewal of the ransom theory, particularly those aspects of it which signified Christ's victory over hell, death and the devil.

The humanists, particularly the Socinians*, rejected the entire complex of ideas which explained the cross as a satisfaction. They pointed out that the conception of law underlying it rendered the Christian gospel of divine forgiveness and love invalid. In the course of time, the attitude of mind reflected in this criticism became quite general. Arminians, Rationalists, and modern liberal theologians thus contributed to the downfall of the traditional theories. Only Abailard's doctrine was occasionally restated in modern forms.

Recently, the idea that the cross of Christ is to be understood as a suffering of God began to find some favor among theologians. In a way, this idea is implied in all traditional atonement theories. However, the conception of God as immutable, which early became an essential part of Christian thinking, always caused the church to assert the divine impassibility. Hence it was never possible to speak of the suffering of God, not even with respect to Christ Indeed, the Christological dogma made it possible to state (as it was universally the case) that Christ suffered insofar as He was human but not insofar as He was divine The recent suggestion that the passion of Christ must be viewed as the suffering of God therefore requires a new Christological statement.

See holocaust; propitiation, reconciliation, sacrifice, salvation, satisfaction.

Gustav Aulen, Christus Victor (1931), Hastings Rashdall, The Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology (1919).   w.p.

Atonement, Day of: (Heb., Yom Kippur) The holiest day in the Jewish year observed as a fast from the evening of the ninth of Tishri to that of the tenth, essentially expiatory and characterized as "a sabbath* of solemn rest" and a holy convocation, upon which all manner of work is forbidden under the threat of excision. (Lev. 23. 27-32). The ceremonial of the day at the Temple* centered in the person of the High Priest* and in his atoning sacrifices and confessions, (Lev. 16. Cf. Mishnah* Yoma) Following the fall of the Temple, a liturgy of prayer replaced the priestly ceremonial, stressing confession of sin, repentance, and whole-hearted reconciliation with God. Cf. Kol Nidre.

See Jewish religious festivals.   s.s.c.

atrium: (Lat, reception room or entrance-hall of a house) In early Church architecture, an open court situated between the vestibule and the main body of the church, with a well or fountain in the center where worshipers could wash their hands before entering. Sometimes used as a burying ground.   s m.g.

Attis: See Cybele-Attis.

attributes of God: (Lat. ad-tribuere, to assign) An attribute, in metaphysics and theology, is that quality of an entity which expresses its essential nature and is therefore indispensable or necessary to its given being. Contrasting with the impermanence of modes or accidents, attributes become the summa genera whereby modes are understood and have their being in substance (cf. Spinoza).

The exact relation of attributes to God has been disputed. Some, like St. Augustine and Schleiermacher, suggest that they have no distinct being in God's nature (omniscience is omnipotence), while others think they are expressive of the divine nature in itself apart from the human viewpoint. "The attributes have no existence apart from the being of God, and the being of God has no reality apart from its attributes." (See A. C. Knudson, Doctrine of God, 1930.)

The classification of attributes is somewhat arbitrary, but unity, spirituality, eternity, omnipotence, ubiquity, immutability, and absoluteness have been orthodox meta-physical attributes, while wisdom, goodness, holiness, and beauty composed the ethical See analogy, God. See under specific attributes.   p.a.b.

attrition: In medieval theology, that sorrow for sin which (in distinction from contrition*, is incomplete or motivated by fear of penalty rather than by love to God. The Council of Trent (XIV, iv) regards attrition as sufficient for justification when followed by penance. The doctrine was opposed by Protestant and Jansenist theologians. See penance.   J.T.M

Auburn Affirmation: "An Affirmation Designed to Safeguard the Unity and Liberty of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America" was issued in May, 1924, over the signatures of about 1300 ministers. These men were resisting the efforts of fundamentalists* to dominate or divide the church. In this document they affirmed their adherence to evangelical Christianity. The General Assembly of 1923 having attempted, by promulgating the "Five Points" of fundamentalism, to define the doctrine of the church in this sense, the signers maintained that under the constitution of the church its doctrine could be defined only with the concurrence of the presbyteries. While asserting biblical revelation, they rejected biblical inerrancy, a cardinal point of fundamentalism. The public taking of this position by so many ministers, many of them influential, accomplished the object which they sought, so that the Affirmation was a decisive event in the church's history. It acquired the name "Auburn" because it was distributed from Auburn, New York.
               R.H.N.

Auburn Declaration: This name was attached to the doctrinal statement of the Auburn Convention of August, 1837 of the New School Presbyterians (see New School and Old School Presbyterians). The General Assembly of 1837 had asserted the prevalence of sixteen "doctrinal errors". The Auburn Convention repudiated these virtual accusations and adopted sixteen corresponding propositions. Dealing with salvation and the doctrine of man, these formulated Calvinistic doctrine as influenced by the New England theology*. The "Auburn Declaration" came to be regarded as an authoritative expression of New School teaching. Its approval by the Old School General Assembly of 1868 prepared for the reunion of the two Schools in 1869.

P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, III (1874); Minutes of the Auburn Convention (Auburn, 1837).
               R.H.N.

auditor: (Lat. one who hears) In canon law*, the person appointed by the bishop to summon witnesses and get all matters ready for a trial.
               L.R.W.

Aufklärung: See Enlightenment, the.

Augsburg Confession: The principal creed of Lutheranism and both historically and doctrinally the most important statement of the faith of the Reformation*. Written by Melanchthon* on the basis of the earlier Articles of Marburg, Schwabach, and Torgau, it was presented to the Emperor Charles V at the Diet of Augsburg on June 25, 1530. Bearing the approval of Luther*, who had added, however, that he himself "could not tread so gently and softly", the creed had been signed by the Protestant potentates. It contains two main divisions 1) Articles 1-21, concise doctrinal statements on God, original sin, Christ, justification, the ministry of the Word, the new obedience, the Church, the means of grace, the sacraments, confession and repentance, ecclesiastical government, ceremonies, civil government, Christ's return to judgment, free will, the cause of sin, good works, and the invocation of saints; 2) Articles 22-28, a lengthier practical and polemical exposition of the ecclesiastical abuses repudiated. After the Catholic reply, Confutatio Pontificia, had been read August 3, Melanchthon prepared the Apology of the Confession in sharp polemical tone and published both the Confession and its Apology in 1531. Already in this editio princeps the author changed slightly the original document of 1530, and in the succeeding editions of 1533 and 1540 he introduced further changes. The 1540 edition, known as the Variata, differed considerably from the original, especially on the Lord's Supper, and became the basis for the controversy between the Melanchthonians (Philippists, Crypto-Calvinists) and the rigid Lutherans. The compilers of the Book of Concord (1580) sought to return to the original text handed in at the Diet (the unaltered Augustana or Invariata) but by mistake printed from a poor copy, so that their German text differs from the original at nearly 500 places. Their Latin text, that of Melanchthon's editio princeps, is sounder. Both the German and the Latin texts of the Book of Concord* are authoritative. The unaltered Augsburg Confession is generally accepted by Lutherans* as their doctrinal standard. It is the foundation of Lutheran confessional literature and the source of many other confessions, e.g., the Anglican 39 Articles*. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church.   T.A.K.

Augsburg, Interim of: See Interim.

Augsburg, Religious Peace of: The settlement of the Protestant-Catholic controversy reached at the Diet of Augsburg, Germany, in 1555, whereby all adherents of the Augsburg Confession*, regardless of edition, were acknowledged as Protestants and given legal status and religious freedom. The religion of the ruler was to be the religion of the subjects, dissenters being given the right to emigrate. Ostensibly a victory for the Protestants, the Peace contained an "ecclesiastical reservation" of the forfeiture of the estates of Catholic princes who became Protestant, thus keeping a large part of the land permanently Catholic despite the Protestants' numerical majority.   T.A.K.

Augustana: (Lat. "pertaining to Augustus") The Latin name of the Augsburg Confession*. Since the German city of Augsburg, where this basic Protestant confession was presented, derived its name from the Roman emperor Augustus, the confession soon came to be known as the Augustana.
               T.A.K.

Augustana Synod: See Lutheran Church in America, Hasselquist, T. N., Lindberg, C. E., Olsson, O.

Augustine and Augustinianism: A descendant of the Punic people, Aurelius Augustinus' life and career coincided with the disintegration of the Western Empire of Rome. Born November 13, 354 A.D. in Tagaste, North Africa, he practiced the profession of rhetor at Carthage, Rome, and Milan. At the latter place where he experienced a spiritual catastrophe in 386, he was baptised with his son by St. Ambrose during Easter, 387. He became Bishop of Hippo in 395, and died as the Vandals surged around the wall of his episcopal town in August 430 A.D. Coming under the influence of Cicero in his youth, he adhered for nine years to Manicheanism* and favored for a short period the scepticism of the New Academy. He experienced in Neo-Platonism a culmination of his intellectual and religious quest, and concurrently, by the authority of the Catholic church, his moral conversion.

Uniting occidental Christianity with antiquity Augustine conserved and ennobled both. He gave them a fixed relation to the highest problems of the future and made the church the shepherdess of antique culture for the future. With her Augustinian heritage the church was able to realize the new tasks which the Middle Ages posed. His richly endowed, dynamic diversity of personality stamped him as the first modern man and as the last great man of antiquity, making him the creator of the culture and religion of the Middle Ages. His spirit presented the church with eagle wings with which to rise above states and peoples, he gave direction to the aspirations of the mystics; he posed the problems of scholastic science, and the opponents of scholasticism refreshed their spirit in him, he sketched the general directions of the tendency of the church towards world rule, and he lent the critics of the realized world rule of the church their sharpest weapons. Not only the pious, but also the children of the world received stimulation from him. Not only the princes of the church, but also the secular rulers went to school to him. As a priestly king he has been the silent pope of the occident, whose spirit really ruled the church. He was not a man of will, nor a critic, like St. Paul and Luther. The pleasure of destroying he lacked entirely. He was not by nature a reformer. He was of an eminently conservative nature, yet capable of assimilating everything that science and religion offered him. His doctrine is at one and the same time very orthodox and very liberal, very traditional and very personal. He was not only the master of science, but also the doctor of Christian piety. A remarkable power of observing nature, reality, and above all the recesses of the human soul; a lively, restless urge for knowledge and an instinctive sense for religion united in him, furthering and stimulating one another. He seized things and thoughts in their depths, unconsciously extracting from them the good and durable elements and fusing them with his own into a unity. Hence the elements of tradition did not overawe him as is usually the case with predominantly receptive natures. The world historical power of Christianity, which he immediately sensed, gave him both the inner freedom toward tradition and made him into its faithful protector. He was at one and the same time conservative in the highest sense and a man of progress. All temporal problems became for him questions of life and eternity. His description of nature, of history, of man, of anything had always a decisively personal color. His own conversion-experience was always in the background, serving as the point of departure for all his theorizing. The doctrines in which the inspiration of Augustine prevails cannot be reduced to synthetic expositions. Augustinianism is the seeing in the saint's mature ideas of sin, predestinarian grace, original sin, predestination, freewill and church a technically closed and finished unitary structure, ignoring its many knots, gaps and flaws. Rigid Augustinians have ceased to be aware of the many changes in the saint's theology. Augustine was natively incapable of organizing his thoughts into a closed system. He developed a comprehensive philosophy of the church and a new sacramental doctrine in opposition to Donatism*. A potent religious and ethical idealism is joined with church political tendencies in his hierarchical conception of the church. In contrast to Pelagius' rationalistic view of sin and grace*, he worked out an essentially voluntaristic doctrine of sin and grace. See allegorical interpretation, justification; libertarianism, original sin, predestination, philosophy of history, time, trinity. Cf. Cassian.

The Library of Congress lists about 200 entries in various languages for studies of St. Augustine, of which at least 120 are recent publications E Chapman, St. Augustine's Philosophy of Beauty (1939), M. C D'Arcy, Monument to Saint Augustine, essays on some aspects of his thought, written in commemoration of his 15th centenary (1930), E Gilson, L' introduction a l'étude de saint Augustin (1929), H. Hausheer, The Genius and the Influence of St Augustine (Doctoral dissertation State University of Iowa, 1922); H. Lesaar, Saint Augustine, tr. by T P. Arkell (1931), J. Mausbach, Die Ethik des heiligen Augustinus. 2 vol. (1909), H. Pope, St. Augustine of Hippo (1930); W. P. Tolley, The Idea of God in the Philosophy of St. Augustine (1930). H.H.

Augustine, Saint, of Canterbury: (died 604) Apostle of the Anglo-Saxons. Sent to England by Gregory I* at the head of a mission of 40 Benedictines, Augustine arrived in Kent 597, converted the king, Ethelbert, founded the see of Canterbury and became its first archbishop. See Anglo-Saxons and the Introduction to Christianity.
E.C.K.

Augustinians, or the Hermits of St. Augustine: All the monastic* groups following the Rule of St. Augustine, in imitation of the religious clerical body formed by St. Augustine* of Hippo. A chief center for them in the U. S. is at Villanova, Pa. See Black Fathers and Black Sisters; Mendicant Orders. L.R.W.

Aulén, Gustav Emanuel Hildebrand: (1879-) Swedish theologian, professor at University of Lund, and since 1933 bishop of Strengnäs. In the field of dogmatics and history of doctrine, Aulén has emphasized connection between Reformation and early fathers. He has been active in church music studies, and been editor of leading Swedish theological periodical, Svensk Theologisk Kvartalskrift. See Lundensian theology.   C.J.B

auricular confession: Private religious consultation with a clerical or lay adviser was common in the early church, though the formal disciplinary confession (exomologesis) was public. Secret confession of sins to a priest is normally indicated in the penitential books of the Celtic churches. An annual confession under seal of secrecy was made obligatory for all by the Fourth Lateran Council, 1215. See Penance.   J.T.M.

austerites: Severe self-discipline of the body, even to the infliction of cruel torture, for the sake of the soul's welfare and spiritual purity. R.E.E.H.

authority: The word authority connotes a special character or power, a person, e.g., having authority may mean something inhering in him establishes a presumption of the validity of his word, or will for others, or his position enables him to impose or enforce his will.

Religion may claim authority in latter sense, a Church, Christian or other, may hold itself to be the one duly instituted medium of truth from God to men, it has divine mandatory authority in the sphere of men. Such concept of the Church is "authoritarian", against it is belief in the direct testimony and diffused activity of the Spirit, whence the distinction: "Religions of Authority and Religion of the Spirit" (Sabatier); which loses its force with a more dynamic conception of religious authority.

Such as lies in what the people discerned in Jesus, He taught as having authority (exousia), not as the scribes (Mk. 1.22). The comparison well illustrates types of authority; the scribes "taught from authorities, balancing one traditional opinion with another, Jesus spoke with authority . . . confidence and power were felt in His words" (H. G. Wood). Like to His own was the authority Jesus commended and gave, its sanctions the divine power received and felt by men (Lk. 9.1, 2; Math. 7. 15-20; 11: 2-6). Paul's authority of the same order; his Apostleship from God (1 Cor. 1: 1), but those who know its virtue are its seal (9. 2). In all this, authority and operation of the Spirit are closely akin; not alternate as above.

This is far from meaning that Christian truth is chiefly of subjective attestation, it is offered as truth, as well as proved so by hearing. Hence for most Christians, institutions whence they learn truth have authority; all acknowledge in some way, e.g., the authority of Scripture. Mystics may seek a goal where Deity is so immediate that aids are superseded; yet Scripture and other guides have pointed the ascent (cf. Baron von Hügel* on George Fox and Inner Light in Essays and Addresses, II). Some have held Scripture to contain exact verbal transcript of divine thoughts; its writers amanuenses of the Spirit. But this dictation theory of verbal inspiration is not as native to Christianity as to certain other faiths anent their Sacred Writings, for Christians, Scripture enshrines the constituent Facts, the Rock whence Christianity was hewn. It is replete with the truth and power of that which it enshrines, which the Spirit attests to the reader, making it saving truth for him. This is the authority of Scripture in it here and now God's Word is heard.

Christians own the authority of the Church, the corporate witness through the years, but variously, from the doctrine of the infallible Church, necessary to certify Scripture amid discordant interpretation, to liberal appraisals of group and historic consensus. Defenders of the ecclesiastical view hold the Church's fixing Canon of Scripture a testament to its authority. But the Church versus Bible issue is now revealing itself as fruitless. The Church did not create the Bible, nor the Bible the Church; both come from one source, Jesus Christ and those who first experienced His saving work. This discloses the real locus of Christian authority. To the Church (Math. 18· 17, 18) or the ministers (16. 18, 19), authority is delegated to administer its life, but Christ's first commission to His followers was of service rather than authority (Headlam: cf. Mk. 10. 42-45; Lk. 22· 25, 26).

This realizability of the authority of the Church, as of the Scriptures above, in the believer's or the believing community's life, gives hints as to the mode in which experience is the vehicle of authority. Christianity is no religious psychologism, its truth derivable from or compounded of psychic states. Yet its being in se is manifest in the decisiveness of its intrusion into man's spirit; experience bears authority as it authentically betrays this action of what is not of itself. Transcendence of experience differentiates (Christian) religious authority from rational and political concepts. Rational authority rests on a priori principles, noncontradiction, etc., that are immediately self-attesting, hence the acceptability of structures coherently grounded on them. The authority of a political system consists in its being the best available for the order and advancement of the group it rules and serves. But Christian truth has its foundation in the Word that, so far from having its norms in human conditions, is primordially determinative, as it is to be redemptive, of them; its Authority is of the same rank as its Source and End. See sacred literatures, traditionalism.

J. H. Leckie, Authority in Religion (1909): C. H. Dodd, The Authority of the Bible (1928); R. H. Strachan, The Authority of Christian Experience (1929), Tambaram (Madras) Series, I, The Authority of the Faith (1939), International Missionary Council.

J.L.

Authorized version: See Bible, English.

autocephali: (Gr., independent) A term which described certain bishops* in early Christian times who were independent of their immediate metropolitans* and subject only to higher authority.

S.M.G.

auto-da-fé: (Port., act of faith) Term applied to the public ceremony accompanying the official final sentence of the Inquisition* The ceremony, especially during the 16th century in Spain, consisted of a procession to the place of condemnation for heresy, a sermon at the place, a reconciliation or a condemnation, and finally the turning over to the civil power those still found guilty of heresy*.   J.B.C.

autonomy: (Gr., autos, self, and nomos, law) Self-imposed law. In Kant*, a principle of rational will, an autonomous obligation is one that is imposed by the will on itself, yet is at the same time rationally universal. According to Kant, only autonomous acts are morally good. See heteronomy.   E.S.B.

auxiliary bishop: A bishop without jurisdiction who acts as assistant to another; the office, frowned on in the early Church, has become regular in modern times.   E.R.H.

Avalokiteśvara: See Buddhist Terminology.

Avataṅsaka: See Buddhist Terminology.

avatar: The Hindu term for divine incarnation. Thus Vishnu has manifested himself according to tradition in nine great avatars, and one is yet to come. "When righteousness declines, when wickedness is strong, I rise . . . take visible shape and move a man with men" . . . declares Krishna in the Bhagavad Gita*.   C.S.B.

Avellana: See Decretals.

Ave Maria: The Hail Mary*, or Angelic Greeting. A salutation to Saint Mary (St. Luke 1:28 & 42) used from c. 513 to which a precatory sentence was added in the late Middle Ages, it has long been a popular devotion along with Credo and Pater Noster, and is the repeated prayer of the Rosary and of the Angelus.   T.J.B.

Avera Bible Lectureship: Established in 1897 by Mrs. W. H. Avera at Duke University, Durham, N. C., with a capital sum of $2,500 and given at intervals of two years. The lectures deal with Biblical literature. Among those who have appeared on this foundation. H. S. Coffin; Bishops W. W. Duncan; G. Campbell Morgan, D. G. Lyon, W. F. Tillet.

(Data furnished by the office of the Dean of the Divinity School.)   V.F.

Averrhoes or Averroes: (1126-1198) (Averroists) Famous Arabian philosopher and physician born at Cordova, appointed judge at Seville and Cordova. His writings were numerous including works on astronomy, law, logic, medicine, philosophy and theology. He was devoted to Aristotle and for his great commentary on Aristotle was known and admired by Christian and Jewish scholars as "The Commentator". He denied freedom and immortality, teaching that God eternally produces intelligences by a process of emanation.   P.E.J.

Avesta: The sacred book of the Zoroastrians* (Parsis in India and Gabars in Persia), also called Zend ("tradition or commentary")—Avesta (presumably, "knowledge") The original Avesta (according to tradition) comprised all knowledge and was destroyed for the most part by Alexander. Out of its remnants, a work in 21 volumes (or nasks) was prepared in the 3rd cent. A.D., but only one nask (Vendidad) survives complete, the Dinkard (in Pehlevi) gives a list of the others. After the 9th century, only the parts dealing with the worship were taken to India and are extant in five parts Yasna (including the Gathas*), Vispered, Vendidad, Yashts, and Khorda Avesta. See Persia, Religions of.

English translation of the Avesta by J. Darmesteter and L. H. Mills in Sacred Books of the East, 1880-87, vols. 4, 23, 31.   R.H.P.

Avicebron: (1021-1058) Jewish philosopher and poet of Spain, Solomon ben Judah ibn Gabirol. His chief works are Meqôr Khayyim (The fountain of life) and Mibkhar ha-Peninim (The choice of pearls). Influenced by Arabic Neoplatonism, his independent thought foreshadowed Spinoza. But like Philo, Jesus and Paul, his work had more influence among Gentiles than among Jews. Also written up under Ibn-Gabriol, Solomon Ben Judah.   P.G.M.

Avicenna or Ibn-Sina: (980-1037) Most influential of Arabian physicians. Born in a village of Bukhara he mastered Moslem theology and Greek science by the age of sixteen. To him are ascribed about 100 treatises of which his five-volume Canon of Medicine became standard for centuries. Other writings on logic and metaphysics were also widely read. See Michael Scot.   P.E.J.

Avignon: A city in France, is famous in history chiefly as the residence of the Popes from 1305 to 1378. The period is often called the Captivity of the Popes in reference to the period of captivity of the Jews in the Old Testament. The popes who reigned during this time were all Frenchmen They were Clement V (1305-1394), John XXII (1314-1334); Benedict XII (1334-1342), Clement VI (1342-1352), Innocent VI (1352-1362), Urban V (1362-1370); and Gregory XI* (1370-1378).   T.T.M.

Awakening, the Great: The name usually given the intercolonial revivals which swept the American Colonies from 1725 to the opening of the War for Independence. Beginning in the Middle Colonies under the preaching of the pietistic Dutch Reformed minister at New Brunswick, New Jersey, it spread rapidly among the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians where it ran its course under the zealous leadership of a group of young evangelists who had received their training at William Tennent's "Log College". The New England phase was largely Congregational and began in Jonathan Edwards'* Church at Northampton, Massachusetts in 1734, exercising its chief influence in Central and Western Massachusetts and in Connecticut.

The three southern phases of the Awakening came last. The first was the Presbyterian, centering in Hanover County, Virginia. Beginning as a lay movement it took on a Presbyterian complexion with the coming of Presbyterian evangelists from the Middle Colonies, chief among whom was Samuel Davies. The Southern Awakening's second phase was begun by Baptist farmer preachers from Connecticut, formerly Congregationalists, who came, with their families, to Virginia and then to Sandy Creek, North Carolina in 1755. They introduced a new technique in evangelizing communities hitherto untouched by religious influence, thereby setting the pattern for the great western revivals of a generation later. The coming of the Methodists to the colonies was the last phase of the Colonial Awakenings. They had their largest successes in Maryland and Virginia where they were aided by the evangelical Anglican clergyman of Bath Parish in Virginia, Devereux Jarratt. Though representing several distinct phases, the Great Awakening was in a real sense a single movement, in which the emphasis was everywhere upon inner, personal religion. George Whitefield*, who made seven journeys to America between 1738 and 1770, cooperated with all the several phases of the revival and was one of its principal unifying influences. See American theology, early; Dwight, Timothy, New Lights; New Side Presbyterians, Old Side Presbyterians.

Joseph Tracey, The History of the Revival of Religion in the Time of Edwards and Whitefield (1842), C H Maxon, The Great Awakening in the Middle Colonies (1916), W M. Gewehr, The Great Awakening in Virginia (1930), W W. Sweet, Religion in Colonial America (1942).   w.w.s.

axiology: (Gr axios, valuable, and logos, theory) A comprehensive theory of value, correlating and interpreting the results of psychological, logical, aesthetic, religious, epistemological, and metaphysical investigations. Term first used by P. Lapie (1902) and popularized by E. von Hartmann (1908). See value and the bibliography there given.   E.S.B.

axiom: (Gr. axioun, think worthy, from agein, lead, weigh) A proposition taken as self-evident or beyond question, at least for a given inquiry. Present-day philosophy is reluctant to admit the absolute self-evidence of any proposition, partly because it has been found possible to dispense with one of the axioms of Euclid. Some hold that self-evident means not absolutely, but intrinsically, evident, evident from the mere meaning of the terms involved, whether this intrinsic evidence be conclusion or not. Peirce*, in his "Critical Commonsensism," posited indubitable beliefs, but held that they are vague, and that when put into sharply definite language they become open to doubt. For example, "nature is not without order," when given the more specific rendering, "nature is wholly orderly."   C.H.

Ayer Lectureship, The Francis Wayland: Founded in 1928 by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred Fry of Camden, New Jersey, in memory of Mrs. Fry's father, Francis Wayland Ayer. Shortly after the establishment of the Lectureship, the Rochester Theological Seminary and the Colgate Theological Seminary became the Colgate-Rochester Divinity School under whose auspices the Ayer Lectures are now given. Under the terms of the Foundation the lectures fall within the broad field of the history and interpretation of the Christian Message. Four lectures are given each year and are subsequently published in expanded form. Dean W. L. Sperry of Harvard inaugurated the series in 1928 speaking upon Signs of These Times.   C.H.M.

B

ba: 1) In Egyptian religion, the soul, which could return to the body so long as its body had not been destroyed. 2) The name of the sacred goat worshipped at Mendes, in Egypt. See Egypt, religions of. P.G.M.

Baader, Franz v.: (1765-1841) A practicing physician, he was honorary professor at the university of Munich Due to his aphoristic style, his excessive use of phantasy, the wealth of analogies and etymologies, his thought is unduly vague. Greatly indebted to Jacob Boehme, he combines the latter's mystical thought with elements of Schelling and Fichte. Human knowledge is co-knowing of the divine. Man is neither practically nor theoretically spontaneously active, but only receptively. Further knowledge is possible on the basis of the nature of man. Baader adheres to Catholic doctrine in the Anselmian sense. He accuses the founders of Protestantism to have upheld the principle of revolution instead of the principle of reform.

Sämmtliche Werke, 16 vols. (Leipzig, 1851-60) ; J. Hamburger, Die Cardinalpunkte der baadischen Philosophie (Stuttgart, 1855) ; J. Claasen, F. v. Baaders Leben und Theosophische Weltanschauung als Inbegriff christlicher Philosophie, 2 vols (Stuttgart (1886-87), H. Reichel, Die Societätsphilosophie F. v. Baaders (Tubingen, 1901). H.H.

Baalism: Designation of a nature religion, the main emphasis of which is on fertility. Fertility religion assumed various forms in the Near East, but was most highly developed in Canaanite (Phoenician*) religion, and played a major role in the OT by way of stimulus for syncretism and prophetic reaction. From various sources, including especially the OT, the Ras Shamra* tablets from North Syria, and Philo Byblius, the basic concepts are clear. El was the father of the gods (though he played little part in the affairs of men), and Asherah was the mother-goddess. Chief among their progeny was the familiar god who controlled the weather and vegetation, known as Baal, "Lord" (apparently a grandson). His consort was the goddess of fertility, Astarte (OT Ashtaroth [see Ashtoreth] though at Ras Shamra another goddess, Anat, was consort), and his greatest enemy was Mot, "Death."

To understand the story it is necessary to understand the climate of Syria and Palestine. In March-April the rains cease, and do not begin again until October-November. During the dry season, therefore, there is little vegetation which can grow, whereas in the spring as a result of the winter rains the whole country is covered temporarily with verdure. The Canaanite personified the forces responsible for this climatic cycle. The reason the rains stopped and the vegetation dried up was that the god of weather and vegetation, Baal, had been killed in a fierce struggle with Mot, "Death." The rains returned in the fall because friends, especially the Sun (Shapsh or Shemesh) and Fertility (Astarte), brought Baal back to life. The earth flowered in the spring because of the copulation of Baal and Astarte. (See nature worship.)

Due to geographic and climatic influences on the struggle for survival the major emphasis of the religion was thus on fertility. Worship and the various festivals were licentious, appealing to man's baser instincts, and fostering in a prominent role both male and female prostitution.

This religion had a great influence upon Israel in various ways, until the religion of the majority of the common people, especially in North Israel, became highly syncretistic. This occasioned the strong prophetic reaction and the posing of the question by Elijah and his successors as to whether Yahweh or Baal was to be Israel's God. Coupled with this was the denunciation of the symbols and acts of Canaanite religion, including Asherah (whose symbol was the sacred tree, grove, or post), pillar (perhaps the symbol of Baal, though this is not certain), and the terāphīm (images, including the fertility-goddess figurines which were so very numerous in popular religion).

Probably due to this prophetic reaction to Baalism also is the rare use in the OT of the term "father" as applied to Yahweh, and "son of God" as applied to man. The OT has no word for "goddess", and the terminology of its religion centers around the conception of Yahweh as the ruling Lord or King. The righteous Ruler gives his commands, statutes, or ordinances to man by means of his messengers (lawgivers and prophets). Man is His servant, and owes his Lord absolute obedience. Thus religion in the OT is expressed by the word "to serve," and it is "the fear of the Lord" which is the beginning of wisdom. This careful avoidance of sexual terminology was undoubtedly due to reaction to surrounding polytheistic and fertility religions W F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (1940), pp. 175-179 and references there cited; Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones? (1941), especially Chap. V; W. C. Graham and H G Mav, Culture and Conscience (1936), pp. 119 ff , Z. S Harris, "Ras Shamra· Canaanite Civilization and Language," Smithsonian Report, (Washington U S Government Printing Office) 1937, pp 479-502, C F. A. Schaeffer, The Cuneiform Texts of Ras Shamra-Ugarit (1939).   G E.W.

Babel era: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

Babism: See Bahaism.

Babylonian Captivity, The: The Babylonian Captivity refers to the period in Jewish history beginning with the year 597 B.C.E., when the first large group of Judeans, together with their king Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, were deported by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylonia, and ending in the year 538 B.C.E., when Cyrus, the conqueror of Babylonia, issued a rescript granting the Jews the right to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the Temple*. During this period several other deportations took place, among them the deportation following the destruction of the Temple in 587 B.C.E. The sources differ as to the number of Jews who were carried off to Babylonia (cf. II Kings 24 14, 16, Jeremiah 52 28-30), however, it is safe to assume that at least 20,000 were deported.

The condition of the Jews who settled in Babylonia was comparatively favorable The soil was much more fertile than that of Judea and easily supported many Jewish farmers. Some Jews even rose to positions of wealth. So comfortable was the lot of the Jews that many refused to take advantage of the proclamation of Cyrus, but contented themselves instead with giving financial aid to those who were returning to Jerusalem.

Approximately 42,000 Jews returned to Judea in 538 B.C.E. Those who remained in Babylonia formed the nucleus of the community that, centuries later, was to become the center of Jewish learning and culture.   E.B.—L.F.

Babylonian Religion: See Mesopotamian Religions.

Bach, Johann Sebastian: See cantata; chorale, fugue; hymns, mass; passion music.

backsliding: A term used to characterize the conduct of those who, having once made a credible profession of the Christian faith, seem no longer to be living in the faith. Whether this means that they have actually fallen from grace, are no longer children of God, and would finally perish if they died in this condition, or that they are still children of God but disobedient is a question that divides Arminians and Calvinists. See apostasy, conversion.   A.K.R.

Backus, Isaac: (1724-1806) Congregationalist, Separatist, Baptist minister and historian. 1771, agent of Baptists with government. 1774, before

Continental Congress, champion religious liberty. Travelled 68,600 miles.   C.H.M.

Bacon, Benjamin Wisner: (1860-1932) Biblical scholar. Was a Congregational pastor until his appointment to Yale in 1897, where he was Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis until his retirement in 1927. A leader in his field of study, he contributed a number of important books and articles Among these are the following studies The Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate (1909); Is Mark a Roman Gospel? (1919), The Gospel of Mark Its Composition and Date (1925), Studies in Matthew (1930), The Genesis of Genesis (1891); The Gospel of the Hellenists (published posthumously in 1933).   M.R.

Bade, William Frederic: (1871-1936) Biblical scholar, naturalist, archeologist. Professor of Hebrew and OT Literature Moravian College 1898-1902, OT Literature and Semitic Languages, Pacific School of Religion 1902-1936. Bade conducted archeological expeditions to Palestine (discovering Mizpah, Tel en Nasbeh) the results of which are described in a forthcoming volume edited by Prof. C. C. McCown.

Author· The Old Testament in the Light of Today (1915), Life and Letters of John Muir, papers and articles on biblical themes, nature study and archeology.   J W.B.

baetyl: A sacred stone, often a meteorite, before which worship was offered to some superhuman power.   P.G.M.

Bahaism: A modern religious sect founded in Persia by Moslem leaders in the 19th century. At first it was called Babism for the leader who in 1843 claimed to be the predicted prophet and assumed the name of Bab-ed-Din (forerunner of the cause). Another leader in 1862 announced himself as the manifestation of God foretold by the Bab, and took the name of Baha Ullah (author of the cause). Bahaists believe in the unity of all religions, world peace, universal education, and equality of men and women. See eclecticism, Mohammedanism.   P.E.J.

Bahya Ben Joseph: Judge at the Rabbinical court and philosopher, who lived in, the first half of the 11th century at Saragossa, Spain. He wrote the "Guide to the Duties of the Heart" in Arabic in 1040, which was the first systematic presentation of Jewish ethics.   B.Z.B.

Baius (or Du Bay) Michael: (1513-1589) Author of the theological system which denies the gratuity of original justice, affirms an intrinsic corruption of human nature through original sin, and rejects the notion of inherent, physical grace in justification. Seventy-nine Baianist propositions were condemned by an ex cathedra pronouncement of Pope Pius V*. Baius himself ab jured his errors and died a Catholic.   C.V.

Balder: Son of Odin & Frigga, god of peace. He was slain by Hoder with a javelin of mistletoe, unintentionally, but as Hoder was an unwilling tool of Loki, the blame for Balder's death rightly belongs to the latter.   P.G.M.

baldichinum: (It. Baldocco, Baghdad) A cover or canopy built over the altar, originally to protect it from dust, it is supported by columns or suspended by chains.   L.R.W.

Balkan Churches: See E a s t e r n Orthodox Churches.

Ballou, Hosea: The most important theologian of modern Universalism*. Born, Richmond, N. H., April 30, 1771. Died June 7, 1852. Son of Baptist minister. Very poor family. No formal schooling. Rebelled against Calvinism. Excommunicated. Became itinerant preacher. Tireless controversialist. Became settled minister in Mass., Vt., N. H., and finally in Boston, Mass. Denied the Trinity, thus being the first systematic Unitarian* in the U. S. Declared God's nature is love. Man saved from sin, not eternal punishment. Voluminous writer. Major work: A Treatise on the Atonement (1805).

Thomas Whittemore, Life of Hosea Ballou (1854), Maturin Ballou, Biography of Hosea Ballou (1852); Oscar F. Safford, Hosea Ballou (1889).   C R.S.

Ballou, Hosea (2nd): Born Oct. 18, 1796, died May 27, 1861. Educator, scholar and clergyman. Assisted in editing early Universalist* magazines. Author of Ancient History of Universalism. Became the first President of Tufts College, 1854-61. Member Board of Overseers of Harvard College 1843-58.

Hosea Starr Ballou, Hosea Ballou, 2nd, D. D. (1896).   C.R.S.

Baltimore, Councils of: This is the name usually given to the national councils of the Roman Catholic Church in the U. S., held with the approval of the Pope and under the presidency of the Archbishop of Baltimore, either as Archbishop in the provincial Councils of 1829, 1833, 1837, 1840, 1843, 1846, 1849, or as Apostolic Delegate in the Plenary (or National) Councils of 1852, 1866 and 1884. The Provincial Councils consisted of the bishops of the Province of Baltimore, except that of 1849 at which the Archbishop and Bishops of the province of St. Louis were in attendance. The Plenary Councils were attended by all the bishops of the country. Their decrees, as approved by the Holy See, were obligatory for the whole Catholic body of the country. Cf. Commandments of the church.

Peter Guilday, A History of the Councils of Baltimore 1791-1884, (1932).   T.T.M.

bambino: (It. child) A wax or other figure of Jesus as child in the manger or crib, this figure is exposed for honor from Christmas to the Epiphany; e.g., at the church Ara Coeli in Rome little boys and girls take their turns in a pulpit during that season in reciting brief eulogies in honor of the Christ Child.   L.R.W.

bamot: See high place.

ban: 1) An official ecclesiastical excommunication* or denunciation. 2) A fine imposed by ecclesiastical authority for sacrilege or other crimes. 3) In German history, the ban was a formal edict of interdiction* The expression "ban of the empire", under which a prince was placed, refers to his divestiture of all honors and privileges, and the prohibition of all association with him ' Entire towns or communities might be placed under the ban, and hence deprived of their rights and privileges.   C.V.

banns: (A. S., bannan, to summon) A public announcement, verbal or published, of a proposed marriage by a church. Required in R. C. it is observed by custom in certain evangelical churches   R.E.E.H.

baptism, Christian: Christian baptism is of uncertain origin. That Jesus, and possibly his first disciples, had been baptized by John seems likely, but in the teaching and practice of Jesus himself baptism is never made a condition of discipleship. Not until after his death when his followers carried their missionary labors beyond Palestine did baptism clearly emerge as Christianity's distinctive initiatory rite. It was the converts to be gathered from among "the gentiles" (ta ethne) whose baptism was enjoined in the so-called Great Commission (Matt. 28 19). Possibly the baptism of Jewish proselytes furnished the model followed by the early Christian missionaries on gentile soil, and the act may originally have implied repentance and a purificatory consecration to the new way of life. But as early as the time of Paul a more distinctly sacramental significance was attached to baptism. It was the act that symbolized, if indeed it did not effect, the union of the believer with Christ. The act itself was so efficacious that no importance attached to any official ministrant. Even Paul had not figured conspicuously as a baptizer at Corinth, yet he assumed that everyone in the church had been baptized and thus had become united as one body to Christ (I Cor. 1.13f). At first the rite seems to have been performed simply in the name of Christ, but before the close of the first century the trinitarian formula had come into use, as attested in Matt. 28 19. At first immersion was the common practice but as the movement spread to territory where the needed water was not available it was deemed sufficient to pour water on the head or moisten it with the finger tips. In the early days of the missionary activity the candidates for baptism were adult converts, but when sacramental efficacy began to be connected with the act it came to be performed for the benefit of children and even for the deceased (I Cor. 15 29). During the second century both the form and the significance of the baptismal rite were more specifically defined. The description by Justin Martyr* mentions a preliminary period of fasting followed by the act of baptismal regeneration issuing in an illumination of the understanding. The practice in North Africa in the time of Tertullian* was even more formal. First came a period of fasting and confession, then the candidate publicly renounced the devil and perhaps professed his acceptance of some doctrinal formula, an invocation was pronounced over the water to render it an effective sanctifying agency, the candidate was immersed three times in the name of each person of the trinity, on his coming out of the water unction was administered, this was followed by the laying on of hands, and the performance closed with a ceremonial tasting of milk and honey. The influence of contemporary gentile rites of purification and initiation is here clearly apparent.

From the second century on the intrinsic value of the baptismal act was uniformly recognized. It was to be performed only once, since it meant forgiveness of sins and regeneration. Post-baptismal forgiveness was questionable, consequently baptism was sometimes long postponed. Another problem was raised by the conversion of heretics who had been baptized by irregular ministers, but finally the rite was held to be valid irrespective of the person by whom it was administered. Still later the Donatists* raised a similar issue but the Catholic church maintained the inherent validity of the rite. The power of God operated in the sacrament quite apart from any human instrument. This interpretation prevailed until the time of the Protestant reformation. The early reformers, while not minimizing the importance of baptism, listed it as only one of the means of grace. Different Protestant bodies also varied the manner of performance and differed in the meaning they attached to the ritual act. See sacraments. Cf. Anabaptists, infant salvation; confirmation; laying on of hands, milk and honey.

W. Brandt, Die jüdischen Baptismen (1910), W. Heitmüller, Taufe und Abendmahl im Urchristentum (1911); F. Gavin, The Jewish Antecedents of the Christian Sacraments (1928).   s.j.c.

baptism, lay: See lay baptism.

baptism, non-Christian rites: The efficacy of water as a cleansing fluid led to its ceremonial use as a means of removing the contagion acquired by contact with dangerous potencies (blood, death, things tabued), and then by extension, the contagion of moral failure or sin. Baptismal rites fall into three classes—infant baptism, usually associated with name-giving, adolescent baptism as part of the ceremony of tribal initiation*, and baptism as a mode of admission to the privileges of a religion. The baptismal fluid, usually water, may be variously applied—by immersion, washing, pouring or threefold immersion (Tibetan Buddhism). Because of their peculiar virtues, wine, oil, honey, blood, and cow's urine are sometimes used. The officiant is usually a priest but the father or the headman of the village often performs this priestly function for a child. The baptism removes from the infant the impurities of birth and protects it from lurking unseen dangers. The name-giving ceremony, which has generally been merged with baptism, recognises the child as a legitimate member of the family and puts him under the protection of clansmen, ancestors and the family and tribal gods.

Baptism at puberty marks the end of childhood and the assumption of adult rights and responsibilities. Initiation is a second birth and the "twice-born" youth often receives a new name.

The mystery religions* (Eleusinian, Orphic, Mithraic, Egyptian, Syrian) required baptism for the washing away of moral evil as a preparation for the rites of communion with the deity whose mastery of death assured immortality to the initiates. These baptisms sometimes symbolized dying to the old life and rising again to the new. The same idea underlies the baptism by immersion which was part of the initiation of proselytes to Judaism.   A.E.H.

baptism for the dead: Some Christians at Corinth about the middle of the 1st century are reported by St. Paul (I Cor. 15.29) to have been baptized on behalf of friends or relatives who had died before being admitted by that rite into the Church. The practice persisted among Marcionites and Montanists in the 2nd century, and survives today among Mormons.   s.m.g.

baptismal regeneration: See regeneration.

baptismal vow: A profession of intention to live according to the Christian faith and a renunciation of evil made by a candidate for baptism before the administration of the rite. Customary in the Church as early as the time of Justin Martyr*.   s.m.g.

Baptist Brethren, German: See Dunkers.

Baptist Churches: See: American Baptist Association; Christian Unity Baptist Association, Duck River Baptists; Free Will Baptists; General Association of Regular Baptist Churches in the U. S. A., General Baptists; General Six-Principle Baptists, Hard Shell Baptists, Independent Baptist Church of America; National Baptist Convention; National Baptist Ev. Life and Soul Saving Assembly of the U. S. A., Primitive Baptists, Regular Baptists; Separate Baptists, Seventh Day Baptists, Seventh Day Baptists (German), Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Predestinarian Baptists; United American Free Will Baptist Church (Colored), United Baptists.

Baptist Churches, negro: See negro church.

Baptist Young People's Union: See Young. People's Societies, Christian.

baptistery: Among Roman Catholics, it is usually that portion of a church which contains the font and is reserved for the act of baptism, though occasionally it is a separate building devoted to a like purpose. Among Baptists, it is a large tank located at the front of the church and used for baptism by immersion.   w.s.h.

Baptists: Baptist mythology traces continuity from John and Jordan by churches, makes immersion and complete separation of church and state original issues, includes John Milton and Roger Williams* among the Baptists, lets John Locke acclaim them pioneers of separation of church and state, asserts that John Gano immersed George Washington at Valley Forge. Historically speaking, Baptists originated in the early seventeenth century within English Congregationalism as affusionists* and the separation of church and state issue first appears among American Baptists toward the end of the eighteenth century. The first Baptist confession of faith to prescribe immersion was published in London in 1644 by Particular, or Calvinistic Baptists. No English General, or Arminian Baptist confession of faith prior to 1660 even refers to immersion. As a minority group, early English Baptists naturally desired religious liberty for themselves but as premillenarian* enthusiasts were contemplating the establishment of a Mosaic commonwealth rather than a democracy.

The Arminian* English Baptists began within migratory Congregationalists in the Netherlands, 1609, when John Smyth poured some water upon himself. From Congregationalism* they took over the two principles of the autonomy of the local church and fellowship with other churches. Smyth's attempt to affiliate with the Dutch Mennonites* led to schism and the dissenting contingent returned to England in 1612 to continue the practice of affusion of believing adults until the Restoration. Their principal emphasis was that membership in a Christian church is voluntary, local, and limited to such as had personally experienced salvation and publicly professed faith in Jesus as Lord. A second type of English Baptists known as Particular, or Calvinistic Baptists issued from a series of schisms within the Jacobs-Lathrop Congregational Church in London. This group introduced immersion early in 1642.

American Baptists did not come in a body from England but coalesced as a non-immersionist group in Providence, 1639, and as an immersionist body in Newport, R. I., 1644. Of the former Roger Williams was a member for only a few weeks when he separated. Their numbers, growth, and cultural level prior to the Great Awakening* were low. Fifty years later they reported a membership of over 65,000 of which more than fifty-five percent was in the Southern states with Virginia numerically sixth but relatively first. In 1790 out of 1132 Baptist ministers only 23 had earned academic degrees while in 1819 there were only "three liberally educated Baptist ministers west of the Hudson". But this humble body had been very influential in promoting the adoption of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Baptists of Germany date from 1834 and the convictions of Johann Oncken. This kind of Baptist promoted the beginnings of Baptists in Denmark, Holland, Sweden, Austria-Hungary, Poland and points beyond. For all these Baptists the issue of complete separation of church and state has never existed.

The acceptance of immersion by the Congregational missionaries Adoniram Judson and Luther Rice while on their way to India led to the organization of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society in 1814. A decade later the Baptists founded a publication society to conduct propaganda through tracts, hymn books, periodicals, handbooks, Bibles, and Sunday School literature, naming it American Baptist Publication Society in 1840. The needs of the shifting American frontier called the American Baptist Home Mission Society into life in 1832.

There is no Baptist church. There are only Baptist churches. The local church legally is sovereign and may alter its conditions of membership or ordain any candidate for the ministry by majority vote. The usual spiritual officers are ministers, deacons, and deaconesses. For missionary and educational endeavor and to provide orderly procedure, Baptist churches have grouped themselves into associations, state conventions, and national conventions. In the north something like organizational chaos prevailed until the formation of the Northern Baptist Convention, 1907, which affirms the independence of the local church but practices a very considerable control. There are no binding general Baptist creeds or confessions of faith. Theoretically a Baptist creed is always subject to revision by appeal to the Bible. Innumerable local and sectional binding confessions and covenants exist, the Philadelphia confession being practically the Westminster. Baptists are biblical literalists with no generally recognized interpretation of the Bible. The resulting confusion signifies debate and progress. Former simplicity in worship is rapidly disappearing and some Baptist churches are architecturally monuments of medieval Gothic with lighted altars and pre-Christian symbolism. The Lord's Supper is rapidly losing its commemorative significance and is becoming a genuine sacrament. Close communion* still prevails in the Bible Belt. Numerous Baptist churches no longer insist upon immersion as prerequisite to membership and many more welcome all evangelical Christians to some type of restricted membership.

As early as 1653, the General Six Principle Baptists arose through insistence upon Hebrews 6 1, 2 as binding. In 1671, the Seventh Day Baptists refused to accept the new First Day Sabbath of the Westminster Confession of Faith*. Conflict over the Negro slavery issue ended in the organization of the Southern Baptist Convention, 1845. More than a decade earlier the Disciples* broke with the Baptists principally over the interpretation of the significance of immersion. At present there are at least eighteen minor Baptist groups from Duck River to Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit-Predestinarian*, from Separate to United Baptists. A total catalogue of fundamentals would indicate emphasis upon absolute predestination, limited atonement, natural inability, irresistible grace, perseverance of the saints, conditional predestination, universal atonement, saving faith, resistible grace, uncertainty of perseverance, full verbal inspiration, premillennialism, laying on of hands, observance of the seventh day, foot washing, the celebration of the Lord's Supper in the evening, anointing the sick with oil, close communion, the seed of God and the seed of the serpent, opposition to a paid ministry and to the education of ministers, and opposition to missionary organizations, secret societies, Sunday Schools, and church organs. Evidently the causes of separation are three-fold. 1. Divergence of opinion over the five points of Calvinism* and the five points of Arminianism*, 2. Literalism*, 3. Adiaphora*. Of these the first and third are disappearing, but literalism survives. Indeed, literalism has come to its own again in Fundamentalism*, which has been the leading issue among Baptists during the last quarter century.

Baptist religious statistics are not reliable. According to the census of Religious Bodies, United States, 1936, the largest American Baptist group is Negro with 46 percent of the total; next, the Southern Baptists, about one-third; then, the Northern Baptists, about one-sixth, with the eighteen minor groups constituting one-twentieth of the Baptist population. The Southern Baptists are 87 percent rural, the Negro Baptists two-thirds, and the Northern Baptist almost 60 percent. The value of church edifices in 1936 was estimated at about 390 millions. Out of a reported membership of over eight millions, Baptists send less than 14,000 of their children to parochial schools. When Brown University, the University of Rochester, and the University of Chicago are classified as Baptist schools, an imposing educational front is presented.

Champlin Burrage, Early English Dissenters (1912), A. H. Newman, History of Baptist Churches in the United States (1915); J. H. Shakespeare, Baptist and Congregational Pioneers (1906); H. C. Vedder, "Baptists" in Americana; W. T. Whitley, History of British Baptists (1923).   C.H.M.

baraita: An Aramaic term referring to tannaite* traditions not incorporated in the Mishnah*. Its relation to the Mishnah is similar to that of the Apocrypha* to the canonical Biblical writings.   B.S.B.

Barat, St. Madeleine Sophie: (1779-1865) French nun, foundress and first superior-general (1806-1865) of the Society of the Sacred Heart, which under her direction spread through the world. Of unusual energy and extraordinary mental gifts, she was noted for her wisdom in government, her charity and humility.   E.A.R.

Barclay, Robert: (1648-1690) Of Ury, Scotland, having received a Calvinistic education at Paris, Barclay was "convinced" of Quakerism* in 1666 and from 1670 was the leading Quaker systematic theologian. His outstanding work is the Apology (Latin ed., 1676; English, 1678, frequently reprinted) expounding Quakerism, tinged with Calvinism, in accepted theological idiom in partial reply to the Westminster Confession and Shorter Catechism. His scholarship and original contributions attracted widespread attention, and Quakers still consider him a weighty authority. See Society of Friends.

Collected Works, Truth Triumphant, etc. (1692); M. C. Cadbury, Robert Barclay, His Life and Work (1912).   N.C.

bard: A professional singer among the Celtic peoples. Somewhat more elevated in rank than a minstrel or troubador, the bard's songs dealt with heroes, genealogies and religion.   P.G.M.

Bardesanes: (154-222) (Syr, bar, son, Daisan, the river on which Edessa was situated) Born in Edessa in Syria, where he became a pioneer teacher of Christianity. Founder of Christian Syriac literature and writer of many hymns in Syriac. Praised by Eusebius but condemned by Ephraem and other Syrian fathers of the 4th century. Tried to relieve God of responsibility for evil by asserting that He was organizer but not creator of the world, and accused of gnostic* tendencies.   S.M.G.

Bar Kokhba: (Aramaic, "son of the star") Leader of a Jewish revolt (132-135) against Hadrian. Name originally Bar Kozeba was changed to Bar Kokhba on his assumption of command. His generalship prolonged a brave but futile fight against Rome. He died in the Battle of Bethar 135, otherwise little is known about him.   N.G.

Barlaam and Josaphat: Popular Middle Ages romance based on the legend of Buddha*. Josaphat was the son of a 4th-century king in India who persecuted the Christians. After keeping his son in seclusion in order to prevent his conversion to Christianity, the king himself was converted by Barlaam, a hermit. Josaphat later succeeded his father on the throne, then resigned and joined Barlaam in the desert. There are many versions of this legend.   J.B.C.

bar mitzvah: (Heb. bar, son; mitzvah, duty or command) Term applied to 1) a Jewish boy on attaining his thirteenth year, the age of religious duty and responsibility, 2) the solemnization of the event by calling up the boy, on the following Sabbath, as one of the seven men to read the weekly portion of the Law, or, as the eighth man, to read the Haphtarah (prophetic lesson). Occasionally the boy delivers a religious address. The event is celebrated by the family. Henceforth the boy is included among the ten males required for public worship, and wears phylacteries during week day morning prayers. Cf. initiation rites.   S.S.C.

Barnabas: Barnabas ("son of prophetic speech") was the name given to Joseph, a Cypriote Levite (Acts 4:36). An association with Paul in Antioch (Acts 11:22-26) and missionary work (Acts 13-14) was dissolved by dissension (Acts 15.36-40; Gal. 2:13). Further mention in I Cor. 9.6, Col. 4:10.   B.S.E.

Barnabas, Epistle of: A short writing which probably originated in Alexandria about 130. Owing to its early date and the tradition which linked it with Barnabas, it was at one time included in the NT. It is anti-Jewish in sentiment, and allegorises the OT in a manner that sometimes suggests the Epistle to the Hebrews*. See canons of various churches.

J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers (1890); E. J. Goodspeed, Early Christian Literature (1942).   E.F.S.

Barnabites: The popular name given to the Congregation of Clerks Regular of St. Paul which was founded in 1530 by St. Anthony Mary Zaccaria. Its purpose is to preach, catechize, give missions, etc., seasoning all of its works with special references to the epistles of St. Paul. The members take the usual three vows of religion plus an additional one whereby they vow not to seek or accept any ecclesiastical dignity unless ordered to accept it by the Holy See. There are no houses of this order in the United States.   T.T.M.

Barnes, Albert: (1798-1870) American Presbyterian minister who supported the new school of theological thought represented by Nathaniel W. Taylor* differing from strict Calvinism and out of harmony with the Westminster Confession. Barnes became the storm-center in the Presbyterian church, his sermon "The Way of Salvation" being made the basis of a heresy trial   v.f.

Baronius, Caesar: (1538-1607) The ecclesiastical historian, was born at Sora and educated at Veroli and Naples. He joined the Oratory at Rome in 1557 under St. Philip Neri, whom he later succeeded as superior in 1593. In 1596 he was raised to the rank of cardinal and then made Vatican librarian. Twice the papacy was almost bestowed upon him, but both times he was defeated because of the hostility of the Spanish delegation whose rancor sprang from Baronius's support of the papacy against the claims of the Spanish crown. He is best known for his great historical works, Annales Ecclesiastici, which were undertaken as a refutation to the Magdeburg Centuries. Between 1588 and 1607 twelve folio volumes of this work appeared. Baronius's Annales, although marred by errors in Greek history caused by his having to use second hand sources, was one of the first attempts to write history from a purely objective viewpoint.   T.T.M.

Barrows, John Henry: (1847-1902) Congregational clergyman was born near Medina, Mich, and was a son of Rev. John Manning and Bertina Anthony Barrows. He graduated at Olivet College and studied theology at Yale, Union and Andover seminaries. On May 6, 1875 he married Sarah Eleanor Mole. After brief pastorates at Springfield, Ill. and Lawrence, Mass. he had a distinguished ministry at the First Presbyterian Church in Chicago from 1881 to 1896. He organized the World's Parliament of Religions at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893, much of the success of which was due to him. He greatly stimulated the public interest in the ethnic religions, was Haskell lecturer at the University of Chicago in 1895 and Barrows lecturer in India and Japan the following year He was President of Oberlin College from 1898 till his death, and greatly promoted the interests of that institution. His published works include. The World's Parliament of Religions (1893), Henry Ward Beecher, the Shakespeare of the American Pulpit (1893), Christianity the World Religion (1897); A World Pilgrimage (1897), Spiritual Forces in American History (1899), The Christian Conquest of Asia (1899).

Dictionary of Am. Biog, v. 1, p. 651, Congreg. Yr. Bk., 1903, p. 14.   f.t.p.

Barrows Lectures, The: A foundation established in 1894 by Mrs. Caroline E. Haskell at the University of Chicago, these lectures deal with the subject of Christianity and are given by leading scholars of Europe, Asia and America "as a new golden bond between the East and the West." The seven lecturers have been J. H. Barrows, A M. Fairbairn, C. C Hall, C. R. Henderson, C. W. Gilkey, F J. McConnell and Shailer Mathews The endowment is $17,498.00. (Information from the offices of the Dean of the Divinity school and the secretary of the University.)   v.f.

barsom: A bunch of twigs (Avestan, baresman), cut from the trees with appropriate rites and litanies and presented in the temples, only the priests could carry it during prayers or magical ceremonies. Modern Parsis* have substituted metal rods.   r.h p.

Barth, Karl: Reformed theologian born 1886 in Basel, Switzerland, 1911 pastor in Safenwyl, 1921 professor of Reformed Theology in Goettingen, 1925 professor in Muenster-in-Westphalia, 1930 in Bonn. 1935 exiled by the Nazis, since 1935 professor in Basel.

The prophetic vigor and the earnestness of his Roemerbrief (1919) caused a great and deepgoing stir in the religious and theological life of Germany, which soon spread to the other countries of the Continent. He became almost immediately the head of a new theological movement. He had been under the influences of neo-Kantianism, Kierkegaard and the religious socialism of Ragaz and Kutter. In the first phase of his public activity he uttered a condemning protest against the self-complacency of theology and church, confronting them with the Word of God as the manifestation of the "Wholly Different One", by means of which everything man-made was questioned (Theology of Crisis). In this protest Barth was seconded by kindred spirits, especially Fr.Gogarten, Emil Brunner and Eduard Thurneysen. The group published the magazine Zwischen den Zeiten. Barth himself regarded this first phase of his theology as a corrective of every type of theology, reminding them of the fact that all our statements concerning God are but stammering attempts to give expression to the unspeakable (Dialectical Theology). (See Dialectic). The second phase, beginning about 1925, is characterized by the growing influence that Calvin and orthodox Calvinism had upon Barth's thinking. Barth developed a highly elaborate theological system, established upon the formula Deus dixit. Therein he opposes natural by scriptural theology, but at the same time insists upon the cogency and absolute authority of rational conclusions drawn from Scripture.

Theological divergencies led to breaks with both Gogarten and Brunner. In the German

Church conflict Barth, originally reluctant, later took an active part, until the Gestapo barred him and his books from Germany Although he has numerous disciples all over the world the several and deepgoing changes in his theological outlook were not favorable to the formation of a Barthian school in theology; but the profundity of his spiritual insights and the energy of his thinking have made it imperative for every theologian to take issues with Barth. In recent years Barth became particularly influential in Continental church life and politics through a series of pamphlets, published under the title Theologische Existenz heute (1933-1938), which was continued from Switzerland by a new series entitled Theologische Studien. Cf. Dostoievski.

Works

All the important books of Barth have been translated into English.

The Word of God and the Word of Man (1928), Come Holy Spirit. Sermons (1933); The Epistle to the Romans (London, 1933); The Resurrection of the Dead (1 Corinthians 15) (London, 1933), Credo. A presentation of the chief problems of dogmatics with reference to the Apostles' Creed (London, 1936); Church Dogmatics (Edinburgh, 1936-), (So far, two volumes have been published) God in Action, Theological Addresses (1936), The Holy Ghost and the Christian Life (London, 1938), The Knowledge of God and the Service of God according to the Teaching of the Reformation. Gifford Lectures 1937/38 · (London, 1938), The Church and the Political Problem of Our Day (1939), This Christian Cause. A letter to Great Britain from Switzerland (1942).

Books on Barth and Dialectical Theology.
Emil Brunner, The Theology of Crisis (1929), Torsten Bohlin, Glaube und Offenbarung. Eine kritische Studie zur dialektischen Theologie (Berlin 1928), John McKonnachie, The Significance of Karl Barth (London, 1931), Wilhelm Pauck, Karl Barth, prophet of a new Christianity (1931); Otto A Piper, Recent Developments in German Protestantism (London, 1934) ; C. G. Berkouwer, Karl Barth (Kampen, Holland, 1936) ; F. Kent, Karl Barth and his teaching (London, 1937) ; P H Monsma, Karl Barth's Idea of Revelation (1937) ; W. M. Horton, Contemporary Continental Theology (1938).   O.A.P.

Bartholomew: Bartholomew was one of the Twelve in the Synoptists and Acts but nothing else is known about him; identification with Nathanael in John 1.45 ff is only conjectural.   B S.E.

Bartholomew, Massacre of St.: The name given to the great massacre of Huguenots* in France which began on St. Bartholomew's Day, August 24, 1572. It influenced the trend of Protestant thought and tactics throughout Europe. See Wars of religion.   w.s.h.

Bartolus of Sassoferrato: (1314-1347) Greatest jurist among the post-glossators, whose aim was application of the principles of Roman jurisprudence to the political actualities of the time, particularly Italy. A doctor of law at twenty, he taught at Pisa (1339-43) and Perugia (1343-57). His influence on jurisprudence* which was strong for two and a half centuries after his death rests partly on the comprehensiveness of his work and particularly on his sense of realities. So while he does not dispute in theory the ultimate supremacy of the Church over the Empire, actually he holds them to be equal, while he holds that the Empire is universal yet each civitas is sibi princeps. Great was the authority of his defense of the principle Rex in regno suo est imperator regni sui

C. N S Woolf, Bartolus of Sassoferrato, his Position in the History of Medieval Political Thought, (Cambridge, 1913) , Ephraim Emerton, Humanism and Tyranny, Studies in the Italian Trecento (1925), (contains translations of Bartolus's De Tyrannia and De Guelphis et Gebellinis.   Q B.

Baruch: The companion and amanuensis of Jeremiah* (Jer. 36. 4-32). Baruch is likewise the title of four different, non-canonical, Jewish books, of varying character, all ascribed to or centering about the figure of the historical Baruch. These writings date in all likelihood from the first and second centuries A.D.

See apocrypha, Old Testament; pseudepigrapha.   J.M.

Bascom, John: (1827-1911) A. B. Williams College, 1849, Andover Seminary 1855, pres. Univ. of Wisconsin 1874-1887; prof. political science, Williams College 1891-1901.

Author of volumes on political science, aesthetics, psychology, ethics and theology, including the following· Philosophy of Religion (1876), Natural Theology (1880), The New Theology (1891), Evolution and Religion (1897), God and His Goodness (1901).   J.W.B.

Basel, Council of: (1431-48) Was summoned by Pope Martin V in order to deal, among other matters, with the Hussite schism, for the Crusades conducted against the Bohemians for the purpose of subjugating them had failed. The Council regarded itself as possessing an authority superior to that of the pope (as the Council of Constance, 1414-18 had declared), although Martin's successor, Eugenius IV, never acknowledged the claim. In the matter of the Hussites*, they were granted certain of their demands—among them the use of the cup in the Eucharist, although this was never approved by the Pope, and later was withdrawn by Pope Pius II. On these terms, the Calixtine party among the Hussites was received into communion with the Church. Eugenius was able to reassert the claim to papal superiority over a general council when in 1437 he ordered the Council of Basel to reconvene at Ferrara. Most of the fathers obeyed, although the recalcitrants remained at Basel, and in their protest against Eugenius' claims deposed him in 1439 and elected a new pope, Felix V. In 1448 the rump of the Council moved to Lausanne, but after the abdication of Felix V gave their adherence to the successor of Eugenius, Pope Nicholas V. Thus the schism was healed, but at the cost of the abandonment of the conciliar theory. See compacts or compactata; Ferrara-Florence, Council of.   M.S.

Basil, the Great: (ca. 330-379) As churchman, theologian and representative of the monastic ideal, he gave normative suggestions to the articulation of Greek orthodoxy. In particular he rejoiced in extensive physico-theological discussions. But he also exhibited a strong urge to transcend everything hylic, to ascend to God, and to live only in Him. See Basilians, Cappadocians, the three, Cenobite

K. Holl, Amphilochius von Ikonium in seinem Verhältnis zu den drei grossen Kappadociern (Tubingen & Leipzig, 1904).   H.H.

Basilians: The monks of the Eastern Orthodox churches* who follow the Rule of St. Basil the Great*, the archbishop of Caesarea of Cappadocia (329-379). He had founded a monastery on his own ancestral estates, and c. 356 drew up a Rule for the members of the community basing it upon the Rules he had studied on his visit to Egypt and other countries. This became the basis of most of the subsequent Rules of various monastic reformers of the Eastern churches. The chief revision was made by St. Theodore of Studion* (d. 829), and it is in this form that it enjoys the widest use at present. There has never developed the multiplicity of various monastic orders in the East as has been the case in the West. Since all the hierarchs of the Eastern churches are chosen from among the monks, monasticism has exerted an influence upon the East which is even greater than that in the West. But the Basilian Order is not restricted to the Eastern communions, for there exists a small number of Latin Basilian monasteries as well.

Ernest F. Morison, St. Basil and his Rule (London, 1912), W. K. L. Clarke, St. Basil the Great (Cambridge, 1913).   M.S.

basilica: (Gr. basilikos, royal) A building for public assemblies, law courts, etc. In Roman times they were also used for markets. They were great halls with nave and aisles separated by columnar arcades and usually having apses* at one or both ends. The early Christian churches are supposed to be modelled after them. Basilica is still the regular Latin word for a church.

F T.P.

Basilides: Taught at Alexandria during the reign of Hadrian. A leading exponent of Gnosticism* in a Christian version. Held that the Creator of this world was the God of the Jews, an inhabitant of the lowest heaven. Jesus came to end Jehovah's sovereignty. · Jesus was only human in appearance. Simon of Cyrene suffered in His stead on the Cross.   S.M.G

basin: Sprinkling bowl used in a sacrificial service in the Jerusalem Temple, and made of copper, brass, silver, or gold.   B.Z.B.

Battle-Axe experiment: A shock-producing perfectionist* adventure fathered by one of America's oddest nineteenth century religious figures—Theophilus Ransom Gates (Born 1787 at Hartland, Conn.: died 1846 in environs of Philadelphia).

Full understanding of the experiment requires mention of three basic factors that combined to make Theophilus an extreme religionist. First was his inherent disposition. Probably inheriting in degree his father's tendency toward "seasons of derangement", he early experienced strange apparitions which left him deeply fearful for the present state of his soul. Second was his reforming zeal Convinced that his unhappy state of mind was due to the inability of existing religious establishments to satisfy human needs, he refused attachment to any and set out as a wanderer in search of greater truth. Ideas crystallized by a call to preach which came in 1810, he settled in Philadelphia to lash existing religious practices with tongue and pen. The latter proved to be his most effective weapon. From 1810 to 1818 he published at least a dozen pamphlets, most apocalyptic in tone, reflecting vaguely an interest in a new life of holiness, purity and perfect love. Then from 1820-1835 he conducted with remarkable success the monthly Reformer in which he criticized mercilessly all digressions from "primative" or "pure" Christianity, particularly priestcraft, benevolent organizations and sectarianism. A supplementary periodical attempt, the bimonthly Christian (Phila., 1830-31) of similar design but more radical in expression was less successful, ending quickly in merger with Reformer, which union brought almost as quick demise to the latter publication heretofore so well patronized. Reforming zeal thus frustrated by the loss of the most effective medium of spreading his ideas, the third and decisive factor in Theophilus's life began to exert its influence. Somehow, exact date uncertain, he was drawn into marriage. The match was exceedingly unfortunate. Home life came to be a "dog-cat" relationship of the most miserable sort with wife constantly insinuating insanity of husband. Dual strain of calumny at home and in relationships at large drove neurotic tendency to an extreme. Fiery reformer turned radical perfectionist.

Already under the influence of "Free-Love" ideas akin to those of John Noyes, Theophilus now strode forth to proclaim a millenium based thereupon. In 1837 through three numbers of an inflammatory periodical sheet entitled Battle-Axe and Weapons of War (terminology from Jeremiah) he outlined his new "Order of God". Unhappy marriages were to be dissolved. Binding rules respecting relationships between sexes no longer existed. Free choice was to prevail in selection of mate and in the matter of having offspring, care to be exercised always that the "principle of holiness", not the "beast principle" motivated action. In fact, freedom was proclaimed in every area. There was to be no Sabbath, no sacrament, no preaching, no restricting custom of any kind to inhibit the growth of the perfect spirit in the individual. Thus the perfect society on earth was to be established.

Strange things began to happen in the environs of Philadelphia. A number of men unhappy in their present state unceremoniously approached women of their choice announcing they had been directed by God to present themselves as soul-mates, receiving favorable response. Some women approached men in like manner with like results. Sometimes one or both parties were already married, but this was immaterial to the "Battle-Axer". Not welcome in the city proper, devotees to this new order gathered some thirty-five miles outside in "Free-Love Valley", forming there a little colony. Probably never more than several dozen in number at any one time, their lot was nevertheless one of constant persecution. Growing fondness for nudity and development of weird religious rite in no way eased their plight

By this time the experiment had transgressed the bounds Theophilus had set for it. He chose to fade into the background. Hannah Williamson, his most fervent disciple, became active leader of the group. It now quickly became clear that the persistence of the adventure was due chiefly to the personality of its founder. Devoid of his present leadership. the movement within a generation dwindled into legend, as did so many religious schemes of the restless thirties and forties.

The only general treatise to date is C C Seller's admirable booklet Theophilus, The Battle Axe A History of the Lives and Adventures of Theophilus Ransom Gates and the Battle Axes. A list of known "Battle-Axers" and a Bibliography of Gates' works are appended. Original source material dealing with Gates's pre-Battle-Axe thought and experience is fairly plentiful   The volume The Life and Writings of Theophilus R. Gates (Sec. ed. with Additions, Phila , 1818) is a collection of the known pamphlets published by him, except Truth   or the Religious Sentiments of Theophilus Gates (Poughkeepsie, 1811) and A Measuring Reed (Phila , 1815) which can be consulted separately   The three periodicals mentioned supra are indispensable for data 1820-1837   Thenceforth reversion to Sellers, who does not give specific documentation, is necessary   Most likely sources of additional information are periodicals and newspapers in environs of Philadelphia 1837ff and the writings and journalistic publications of John Noyes who constantly took issue with Gates whom he considered a plagiarist.   G.P.A.

Bauer, Bruno: (1809-1882) Hegelian, was the most radical of the NT critics of his age, attributing no historic value to the documents and treating Christianity as an amalgam of the teachings of Seneca, Philo and Josephus. None the less, certain of his conclusions regarding the relation of Christianity to Hellenism* have stimulated later research.   B.S.E.

Baur, Ferdinand Christian: See Tübingen School. Also see Lives of Jesus.

Bautain, Louis, Abbé: (1796-1867) A Catholic philosopher, was reconverted to the Church in 1821, after some years of philosophical skepticism. He continued after his conversion to accept Kant's objections to all rational theistic arguments but taught that God may be known through faith, through feeling and through direct mystical insight. This "fideistic" theory of religious knowledge was officially condemned in 1840, and Bautain signed a formula of recantation. See fideism.   W.M.H.

Baxter, Richard: (1615-1691) Born in Kidderminster, Gloucester, he began his career as an obscure lecturer, without a university degree, but during the Puritan Revolution he became a power in Puritan* affairs and a prolific and widely read writer. At the Restoration he took an active part in the Savoy* Conference, although he displayed a less cooperative attitude than Thomas Manton or Edward Reynolds, and while he accepted a chaplaincy from Charles II, he later rejected the bishopric of Hereford. In 1662 he became a nonconformist*. He was a leader in dissenting affairs and strove constantly to secure a comprehension of the Presbyterian group in the Anglican church   See Puritan Ethics.

His best known writings are The Saint's Everlasting Rest (London, 1650), A Christian Directory (London, 1673), and his autobiography, Reliquiae Baxterianae (London, 1696)   His Practical Works have appeared in two editions, 23 vols (London, 1830), 4 vols (London, 1868)   See F. J Powicke, The Life of the Reverend Richard Baxter 2 vols. (London, 1924-27).   E W.K.

Bayle, Pierre: (1647-1706) Eminent tolerationist in the France of Louis XIV. Since 1681 he resided mainly in the Netherlands.   Brought up a Protestant, he was for a few months a Catholic, then returned to Protestantism, but was strongly influenced by Descartes*. A pioneer in popularizing literature through an international review, he is best known for his Dictionnaire historique et critique (1695-1702), 1740, English translations available), which was an important source of the French encyclopaedists and philosophes, and is largely useful still today. See reason in religion.

K. Martin, French Liberal Thought in the Eighteenth Century A Study of Political Ideas from Bayle to Condorcet (London, 1929), H. Robinson, Bayle the Sceptic (1931)   Q.B

beadle: 1) An usher attendant upon ecclesiastical or academic dignitaries, bearing the mace. 2) A parish officer appointed to keep order in church.   P.V.N.

beast: This is the usual English translation of the Greek thērion in Revelation* 13 and 17. The original means a wild and robbing animal. John's portrayal was based on the fourth beast in Daniel* 7.4 which its author certainly intended to refer to the Seleucid Empire. Already in the rabbinic* exegesis, however, it was interpreted as Rome. An originally mythological concept was given historical application in Jewish-Christian apocalyptic*. In Revelation 13 the Beast is an agent of the Dragon* and hence antichrist* in contrast to the Christ of God. In contrast to the lamb who is slain, (5.6) the Beast has a death wound which was healed (13.3). This was influenced from the Nero legend according to which the Emperor was not dead, but would return from the East, or later from the dead. The number 666 (13.18) is most plausibly interpreted as Caesar Nero, though it may simply be a falling short three times of the perfect number 7. The Greek letters for Jesus added up to 888, one more than the perfect number. In Revelation 17 the seven heads of the Beast are interpreted as Emperors indicating that the end was near for they lived under the sixth.   C.T.C.

beatification: (Lat. beatus, blessed and facere, to make, do) The formal papal declaration that a deceased person, because of holiness of life, or heroic death, deserves to be called "blessed", that is, to be regarded as enjoying Heaven. See advocatus dei, advocatus diaboli; canonization.

L.R.W.

beatific vision: The supreme reward of the righteous, consisting of the unimpeded sight of God in heaven. So taught by both Jews (2 Esd 7 98) and Christians (1 Cor. 13 12, Rev. 22 4).

B.S.E.

beatitude: The name given to each of the nine sayings of Jesus in Mt. 5 3-11 or the four in Lk. 6 20-23, all of which begin with "Blessed are." They set forth the supreme ideal of character and are often used as the most succinct summary of Jesus' teaching. See blessedness.

B.S.E.

Bec: A famous monastic center of learning for Normandy and England, founded c. 1034 near Rouen. Immortalized by the incumbency of its great teacher-administrators, Lanfranc and Anselm, it was also distinguished by a roster of students later influential as theologians, legists, and archbishops.

R.C.P.

Beck, Johann Tobias: (1804-1874) Protestant theologian. Born Balingen, Wurtemberg, 1836. professor of N T. Basel, 1842, professor in Tubingen. Principal modern representative of Biblical realism. Equally fruitful in exegetical and theological works The idea of the Holy Spirit as agent of creative life from above is central in his theology. He saw the Spirit's work both in the history of the chosen people, interpreted as the growth of a supernatural organism, and in the making of the Bible Faithfulness to the Bible text in connection with his organistic view of church history enabled him equally successfully to oppose the selfcomplacency and the static views of 19th century orthodoxy and the moralism as well as the unhistorical speculations of theological liberalism. Through his followers, especially Ad. Schlatter and his disciples, Beck still exercises a profound influence upon Continental theology. Principal works Die christliche Lehrwissenschaft nach den biblischen Urkunden (Stuttgart, 1841, 2nd ed. 1875) . Umriss der biblischen Seelenkunde (Stuttgart, 1843 3rd ed. 1871) , Vorlesungen über christliche Ethik (Gutersloh, 3 v. 1882-1883) , Vorlesungen über christliche Glaubenslehre (Gutersloh, 1886) , Pastoral Theology of the New Testament (Edinburgh, 1885) ; Art. Beck, J. T , in Schaff-Herzog's Encyclopaedia, v II p. 20 f

O.A.P.

Becket, Thomas: (1118-70) Saint. Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England. He was born in London and died in Canterbury. The favorite of Henry II and a man distinguished as a soldier and as a statesman he was appointed by the king as Archbishop of Canterbury, while still a deacon. He was ordained a priest the day before his consecration. His loyalty to the Church and his opposition to the encroachments of the State in Church affairs merited for him the anger of the king. He was obliged to take refuge in France. A reconciliation was finally effected, and he returned to England, only to face new difficulties with the king. Becket was murdered in his cathedral of Canterbury by four retainers of Henry. He was canonized within three years after his death His burial place was one of the great pilgrimage shrines until it was violated by Henry VIII*. His feast is celebrated on Dec. 29 See Constitutions of Clarendon.

J.B.C.

Bede (Baeda), the Venerable: (673-735) English monk and scholar, author of An Ecclesiastical History of the English People (c 731). At the monastery of Jarrow, where he spent the greater part of his life, he was highly esteemed both for piety and learning, his fame extending to the Continent. His miscellaneous writings, about forty in number, are overshadowed by the History, which remains an important source book for the early English Church.

L W.C.

Bedlam: (contraction of Bethlehem) Famous hospital in London founded in 1247, for the Order of Our Lady of Bethlehem, as a general hospital for the poor. It became an insane asylum in 1405. After several changes of location it was finally removed to the present site in St. George's Fields, Southwark. It was managed in its Catholic days by religious who made every effort to cure their patients, but later it became the symbol of every abuse. In the 18th century its inmates were exhibited to visitors for an admission fee. Today it is known for its humane and successful treatment of the insane.

J.B.C.

Beecher, Henry Ward: (1813-1887) Congregational clergyman, was born in Litchfield, Conn. and was a son of Rev. Lyman* and Roxana Foote Beecher. He graduated from Amherst in 1834 and studied theology at Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio. For two years he was pastor of a small church at Lawrenceburg, Ind. and for eight years more of the Second Presbyterian Church in Indianapolis. In 1847 he was settled over the Plymouth Church (Congregational) in Brooklyn, N. Y. where he remained for the rest of his life.

Beecher is commonly rated as one of the most brilliant and influential preachers of modern times. He was a leader in the anti-slavery movement and other reforms and was a strong supporter of the Union whose cause he aided by a speaking tour in England in 1863. He supported Andrew Johnson and was violently opposed by the radical Republicans.

In 1874 occurred the famous trial in which charges of adultery were brought against him by Theodore Tilton, which ended in the disagreement of the jury. Later he was tried by an ecclesiastical council and acquitted.

He was a constant contributor to the press, edited the N. Y. Independent, 1861-1864 and the Christian Union, 1870-1881. Among his numerous books are Lectures to Young Men (1850); Star Papers (1855), Life Thoughts (1858), Royal Truths (1864); Norwood (1864), Life of Christ,

61

v. 1, (1871); Sermons on Evolution and Religion (1885).

In his latter years he became an advocate of the doctrines on evolution and theological modernism. He was a strong supporter of Grover Cleveland and probably contributed substantially to his election to the presidency in 1884.

On Aug. 3, 1837 he married Eunice White Bullard of West Sutton, Mass, and their family consisted of ten children. See New Theology, the. Dictionary of Am. Biog. v. 2, p. 129, Congreg. Yr. Bk. 1888, p. 19; L. Abbott, Henry Ward Beecher (1903); L. B. Stowe, Saints, Sinners and Beechers (1934); P. Hibben, Henry Ward Beecher, An American Portrait (1927). F.T.P.

Beecher, Lyman: (Oct. 12, 1775-Jan. 10, 1863) Congregational and Presbyterian clergyman, revivalist, educator, entered Yale College in 1793 and was greatly influenced by Timothy Dwight* who became its president in 1795. In 1799 he was ordained over the Presbyterian Church at East Hampton, L. I. Becoming widely known through the publication of his sermon on dueling, in 1810 he moved to the Congregational Church at Litchfield, Conn. As "Pope" Dwight's lieutenant and "field marshall" of Connecticut Congregationalism*, he organized that group to fight disestablishment, which, however, was accomplished in spite of his efforts in 1818. He then led the Connecticut orthodox to oppose the Unitarians and was effective in checking the spread of Unitarianism* in New England. A close friend of Nathaniel W. Taylor*, he collaborated with the Yale group in the development of the New Haven theology*—an evangelical Calvinism modified to meet the aspersions of infidels and Unitarians. In 1826 Beecher went to the newly formed Hanover Street Church in Boston, where his fiery anti-Catholic preaching was at least indirectly responsible for the mob sacking of the Ursuline convent in Charlestown in 1831. In 1832, sensing the great importance of the west, he went to Cincinnati to become president of Lane Seminary and minister of the Second Presbyterian Church. There followed a hectic period, during which most of the Lane student body was lost to Oberlin when the administration tried to suppress the discussion of abolitionism on the part of the students led by Theodore Dwight Weld, and Beecher was dragged through several trials on charges of heresy brought by Old School Presbyterians*. In 1850 he resigned his work in Cincinnati, and spent the remaining years of his life in the home of his famous son, Henry Ward Beecher*, in Brooklyn.

Lyman Beecher, Autobiography . . . , ed. Charles Beecher, 2 vols. (1866), F. B. Dexter, Biographical Sketches of the Graduates of Yale College, V (1911); C. C. Stowe, "Sketches and Recollections of Dr. Lyman Beecher," Congregational Q u a r t e r l y, VI (1864); Constance M. Rourke, Trumpets of Jubilee (1927); S. E. Mead, Nathaniel W. Taylor (1942). S.E.M.

Beecher Lectures, Lyman: A lectureship at the Yale University Divinity School, established May 2, 1872, in memory of the Reverend Lyman Beecher, B.A. 1797. The lectures are on preaching and the work of the Christian ministry, and have been delivered in all but four years since the date of the foundation. Among the courses have been those by Henry Ward Beecher, 1872-73-74, Phillips Brooks, 1877, A. M. Fairbairn, The Place of Christ in Modern Theology, 1892, Sir George Adam Smith, Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament, 1899, George A. Gordon, Ultimate Conceptions of Faith, 1903, Charles Sylvester Horne, The Romance of Preaching, 1914, Harry Emerson Fosdick, The Modern Use of the Bible, 1924, George A. Buttrick, Jesus Came Preaching, 1931, Ernest F. Tittle, Jesus After Nineteen Centuries, 1932, Albert E. Day, Jesus and Human Personality, 1934, Charles C. Morrison, What is Christianity, 1939. L.A.W.

Beelzebub: A NT name for the chief of the devils* (Matt. 10.25; 2. 24, 27; Mark 3.22, Luke 11. 15, 18, 19); therefore a synonym of Satan*, transmitted in Sept. as Beelzebul, but in Vul. as Beelzebub. In the O.T. Beelzebub (Baal Zebub) occurs only once (2 Ki. 1.2), as the name of the god of the Philistine city of Ekron. Baal Zebub probably means "lord of flies." J.M.

Beghards: Male counterpart of Beguines*. Earliest Flemish groups were weavers. Many members and groups became tertiaries of the mendicant orders. Others became associated with French wanderers who begged, so they were known as beggars. Condemned as heretics, they were persecuted and did not survive the 14th century. A.S.

Beguines: Name given to women of semi religious sisterhoods living in large or small enclosures, called beguinages. They engaged in weaving, lace making, care of sick with emphasis on devotional life; they took vows, not perpetual, of poverty, chastity and obedience, as a rule not mendicants, they controlled their own property. They often sought instruction as well as the protection of the mendicant friars. Founded c. 1170 by Lambert la Bégue, priest of Liege, the movement spread in western Europe with aid of clergy and rulers, for ex King Louis IX, France. One of the largest groups included 18 houses with 700 members. Beguines were variously regarded by popes, prominent clergy and scholars either as heretics to be severely punished, or as worthy religious persons. To this day, the beguinage at Bruges is well known A.S.

behaviorism: See psychology, schools of.

Behistun (or Bisutun): Village at the foot of a steep rock in the center of the Zagros range in Persia. The name was originally Bagistana ("place of the gods"). High upon the rock, Darius I (521-485) engraved a long inscription (in Old Persian, Babylonian, and Elamitic), describing how through the help of Ahura Mazda* he defeated Gaumata and nine rebel chiefs. A bas-relief above the inscriptions represents Darius and the captive rebels. R.H.P.

Beissel, Conrad: See Ephrata Society. Also see communistic settlements, religious.

Bel: See Baalism.

Bel and the Dragon: One of the three additions to the canonical Book of Daniel* found in the LXX*, comprising two tales further illustrating the cleverness and miraculous successes of Daniel, written in imitation of the stories in Dan. 1-6. Dates from c. 100 B.C. See apocrypha, Old Testament.   R.B.Y.S.

Belgic Confession: A Reformed creed of thirty-seven articles, prepared in 1561 by Guido de Bres; in amended form, adopted by various synods from 1566 to 1581, and finally by the great Synod of Dort*, 1619. It is a recognized symbol of the Reformed Churches of Holland and Belgium, and of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America. See Confessions, Formal.
P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom (1919), I pp. 502-508, III, pp. 383-436.   A.K.R.

Belial, Beliar: 1) In most of the O.T. belial is a Hebrew common noun meaning baseness, i.e., "man of baseness," "daughter of baseness," etc., covering a variety of types such as worthlessness, falsehood, wickedness, depravity, etc. 2) A new usage seems started in Nahum 1:15 (H. 2.1) where belial may be Belial, a personalized designation of the Assyrian conqueror. 3) In the N.T. it appears as Beliar, a proper noun, apparently referring to the prince of the devils and therefore a variant to the name Beelzebub. 4) In pseudepigrapha* it is a name applied to Satan*, the Anti-Christ*, or an emissary of Rome. 5) Milton adds to the figure by describing him as the lewdest of the spirits that fell from Heaven.   R.E.W.

Bellamy, Joseph: (1719-1790) Pupil and popular interpreter of Jonathan Edwards*. Famous for such paradoxes as the following:—"God does as he would be done by, when he punishes sinners to all eternity." "The more unable to love God we are, the more we are to blame." Introduced the Grotian theory of the Atonement (See Grotius) into New England theology. Chief works: True Religion Delineated and The Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin. See New England theology.   W.M.H.

Bellarmine, St. Robert: (1542-1621) Italian Jesuit, Archbishop of Capua and Cardinal. His De controversiis christianae fidei was the best Catholic discussion of the early Protestant position. Giving evidence of an understanding of Christian antiquity rare for the period and based on an exact knowledge of traditional theology and of the teachings of the adversaries, it won for its author an European reputation.   K.A.R.

bells: See carillon; peal ringing.

Belot, Gustave: (1859-1930) Firmly convinced of the impossibility of a priori speculation and the uselessness of metaphysics to establish a positive morality or a moral technique, he opposed the science of morals. He cited the example of Socrates, Jesus, socialism and Tolstoy as having gone contrary to all the morals of their epoch. He saw many similarities between the operations of morality and those of scientific techniques. Genuine morality he felt was a matter of growth.

L'idée et la methode de la philosophie scientifique chez A. Comte (Paris, 1902); Etudes sur la philosophie morale au XIX siècle (Paris, 1904); Etudes de morale positive (Paris, 1907).   H.H.

Beltane: (Irish, bealtaine) The spring festival, celebrated on May Day, in Celtic lands in pre-Christian times. It was one of the four major festivals of the year, with Samhain, Imbolc and Lugnasad. The May pole dance is a survival of its lost ceremonies.   P G.M.

Bender, Wilhelm: (1845-1901) He taught at the University of Bonn. He completed the anthropological twist of Ritschlianism*, which pushed God and His revelation to a secondary position, by coming an exponent of the illusionistic critique of religion.
Das Wesen der Religion (Bonn, 1886).   H.H.

Benedict of Aniane: (751-821) Called Witiza until he left soldiering for monastic life, was born at Maguelone of Visigothic race. He founded the monastery of Aniane (779), compiled monastic rules, and, having removed to the vicinity of Aachen, became general supervisor of the Frankish monasteries (817). W. Williams, Monastic Studies, (Manchester, 1938).   J.T.M.

Benedict XIV, Pope: (1740-58) Prospero Lorenzo Lambertini, born at Bologna, March 31, 1675 was created cardinal in 1726 (announced in 1728), named Bishop of Ancona 1727, and Archbishop of his native city in 1731. He ranks among the most learned of the popes and enjoyed the reputation of being an exceptionally gifted canonist even before his elevation to the papacy, Aug. 17, 1740. Without compromising principles, he met as far as possible the impirially inclined statesmen of his day with moderation and tactful concessions. Of all the popes, due to his good humor and understanding nature he probably had the most friends and the least openly-avowed enemies For which reason also he was able to settle differences between the Church and various countries, e.g., in Portugal (cf. "Innocent X") in Naples (1741), in Sardinia, Spain (Concordat of 1753), and Austria. The same good feeling prevailed in his dealings with Protestant and Mohammedan princes. He recognized the title, King of Prussia, assumed by the Elector of Brandenburg in 1701. He referred to the Sultan as the "Good Turk". Voltaire dedicated to him his work on "Mohammed". Benedict brought back into communion with Rome two Eastern Churches, the Greek Melchites* of Antioch and the Maronites*. He renewed, however, the prohibition of Clement XI against Freemasonry (Mar. 18, 1751 and condemned the system of Christian "accommodation" to heathen rites, employed mostly by the Jesuits in India and China (Molabar Rites). (See Chinese Religions). Benedict merited well also for the interior life of the Church. He practically suppressed usury in his day (Encyclical Vix pervenit, 1745). He promoted the Liberal Arts. Through the help of the learned Evodius Assemani he compiled a catalog of books in the Vatican Library, founded four Academies (cf "Pontifical College") or literary associations for the deeper study of 1) Roman and Christian Antiquities, 2) the History of the Church and Councils, 3) the study of Canon Law and 4) Sacred Liturgy, and enriched the collections of Museums in Rome and Bologna. He founded chairs for chemistry and mathematics in the Roman University, known as the Sapienza, and many others for painting, sculpture, etc., at other schools and colleges. Even though he had never become pope, his name would remain immortal in ecclesiastical circles in virtue of his famous works on the "Beatification and Canonization of Saints"; on the "Sacrifice of the Mass", the "Feastdays of Christ and of the Blessed Virgin Mary", etc. His "De Synodo Dioecesana" is classical. His literary works were collected and published at his wish by Emmanuel de Azevedo, S. J. (Rome, 1747 ff.) in 12 vols.; republ. at Prato, 1839-46 in 17 volumes. His letters were published by F. X. Kraus[2] in 1888. Additional works were published in 1904 by Heiner, and by R. de Martinis (Naples, 1888 ff.) His "Institutiones Ecclesiasticae", a collection of 107 documents on matters pertaining to pastoral, dogmatical and moral Theology were translated into Latin by P. Ildephonsus a S. Carlo.

Guarnacci, Vitae et Res Gestae Roman Pontif. et Card. a Clemente X usque ad Clementem XI (Rome, 1857), for biographies cf L Pastor's History of the Popes in either the original German or Italian · (German ed, 1931; Italian, Rome Desclee, 1933) the English transl has not as yet appeared, also L. Ranke-E Foster, The History of the Popes, 3 vols. (London, Bohn, 1853) Vol. II, 433 ff, Cath. Encyc. II 432-36 where a complete enumeration and good evaluation of his various literary works may be found.

                                       R.M.H.

Benedict XV, Pope: (1914-22) Born of an old (XIII century) noble family (della Chiesa), Nov. 21, 1854, the future Pope counted on his mother's side (Migliorati) as one of his predecessors in the Chair of Peter, Innocent VII. Giacomo Paolo Giovanni B. della Chiesa received his doctorate in Laws at the University of Genoa; studied (since 1875) Theology at the Gregorian University, Rome, was ordained priest in 1878; became an alumnus of the Academy for Noble Ecclesiastical Students in 1879 and in 1882 an Assistant in the Office of the Secretary of State. In 1883 he accompanied as personal secretary the famius nuncio (Cf. "Papal Legates") Rampolla, to Madrid. When Rampolla was recalled to Rome as Secretary of State by Leo XIII*, della Chiesa followed him. He remained in the Secretariate of State even after Pius X* had chosen the youthful Merry del Val to take Rampolla's place. Although his appointment as the new nuncio to Madrid was generally expected, Pius X preferred to give him the archbishopric of Bologna (1907) as successor to Cardinal Svampa. It was only in the Consistory of May 25, 1914 that Pius elevated him to the cardinalitial dignity Due undoubtedly to his training under the diplomatic Rampolla, (a prominent candidate for the papacy after the death of Leo, XIII) della Chiesa was elected pope (1914). Benedict XV's pontificate falls during the First World War (1914-18). Impartial and disinterested but with a heart filled alike with anguish and charity towards all, Benedict strove by every means conceivable—allocutions, addresses, encyclicals, protests, prayers, peace-feelers, etc., to induce the warring nations to foster thoughts of peace and reconciliation, or at least to avoid as far as possible, all inhuman methods of warfare Famous are his "Appeal to the Nations" of Aug. 1, 1917 and his "Fourteen Points of Peace" which bear a marked resemblance to those later adopted and proposed by President Woodrow Wilson. Although his offer of intermediation was not accepted and a place at the peace table of Versailles was denied him (due to the secret machinations of Italy, Russia and England) the prestige of the Vatican grew among the nations, especially when Benedict's fatherly solicitude ("cor paternum") became manifest to the world through his donations to the peoples of all countries (especially to Russia and the Orient) thus helping them to bind up the wounds of war; through his program for the exchange of incapacitated prisoners of war and the Vatican exchange of mail to missing loved ones—soldiers and relatives. Even during, and after the treaty of Versailles, Benedict warned that a change of sentiment in men's hearts was more important than a mere cessation of hostilities, because hatred conceived in injustice, said he, only generates new wars. (How true his teachings in the face of World War II now raging!). After the war was over, Benedict had the pleasure of seeing the official number of national representatives at the Vatican raised from 14 to 25, including England, France and Holland. Even between the Quirinal and the Vatican, due to the help Italy found in religion during the post-war embroglios, a closer rapprochment was clearly discernable. Among the more important inner activities of Benedict's pontificate must be mentioned the promulgation of the new Code of Canon Law* (begun under Pius X*) as of Pentecost, 1918, the encyclical for the XV century commemoration of the death of St. Jerome, the great biblical scholar (1920); the encyclical "Maximum illud" (1929) regulating anew the affairs of foreign missions which had been victimized by the World War (28 new Vicariates and Prefectures having been erected), the creation of the new Roman Curial Congregation for Seminaries and University Studies (1915); the new Oriental Congregation, of which the pope, as of the Holy Office and the Consistorial, remained Prefect (1917); and finally the institution of the Oriental Institute in the interest of theological unity and ecclesiastical union. Benedict XV will go down into history as the "Apostle of Peace during World War I". He lies buried in the crypt of St. Peter's, Rome, in a bronze tomb donated by his devoted people of Bologna, whereas a plaque describing his efforts for peace in a war-torn world surmounts his statue (in a kneeling posture) in the left aisle of the Basilica.

The official Acts of the Pontificate of Ben XV will be found in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Rome, 1914-22). Biographies and studies by A. Brennan (London, 1917), Francis Vistalli (Rome, 1928), cf Seppelt-Loffler, Papstgeschichte (Munich, 1933) pp 499-518, Engl. trans. by Frommelt (1932 of an earlier edition), pp 521-541, G. Quirico, Cor Paternum illustr. (Rome, 1919), Anoys, Papst, Kurie und Weltkrieg von einem Deutschen 2 (Berlin, 1921), G. Goyau, Papauté et chrétienité sous Bénédict XV (Paris, 1922); Cath. Encyc. Suppl of 1922 p 95, Premoli, O., Storia Eccles. Contemporanea. 1900-1925 (Torino-Rome, 1925) p 38-61 (also transl into Engl.).   R.M.H.

Benedict, St. of Monte Cassino: (of Nursia) (c. 480-543) Founder of the celebrated monastery at Monte Cassino, and author of the Rule of 529, he was to become known in later centuries as the legislator-in-chief of western monasticism*. Learning from his own costly experience of monastic rigors, he gave to the brethren of his religious house a simple guide, gathered from the best in the past, to the truly moderate way of renunciation through the dedicated common life. He capitalized the Roman genius for organization in thought and action to lay the basis for a program of service to God through Divine Worship, manual labor, and disciplined reading. From this humble beginning was to issue, later, the far-flung and socially reconstructive order of the Benedictines*. See Cenobite; itinerarium.

H B. Workman, The Evolution of the Monastic Ideal (London, 1927).   R.C.P.

Benedictines: The oldest religious order in the Occident, founded by St. Benedict of Nursia* in the sixth century and living according to the rule of life drawn up by him. By their vow of stability, these monks are attached for life to one monastery, so that each new foundation becomes a permanent center of religious activity and generally civilizing influence. This feature of the Benedictine life was of paramount importance especially during the early Middle Ages, and enabled the Order to preserve and extend western civilization during the centuries following the collapse of the Roman Empire, when all Europe was in turmoil. The Benedictines have ever been champions of religion, scholarship, and the cultivation of the arts. Cf. Olivetans. See Black monks, communistic settlements, religious; monasticism.

D. Knowles, The Monastic Order in England (1940).   C.V.

benediction: A blessing* of persons or things to dedicate them. For persons, an intercession for God's blessing that to Protestant thought has subjective effect on them, to Catholic thought also has objective effect. Blessing things to Protestant thought is by metonymy, to Catholic thought objectively effective in regard to their use. See laying on of hands.   T.J.B.

Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament: (Fr.: Salut; Ger.: Segen) A devotion before the Sacrament*, dating from the 14th century, of hymns and prayers composed by St. Thomas Aquinas, concluded by a Benediction with the Sacrament.

                                                    T.J B.

benedictus: (Latin) Part of the mass*, following immediately after the sanctus* and considered with that section.   E.H B.

benefice: An ecclesiastical office to which property or the revenue of property is annexed. The right of presentation to a benefice belongs to a patron, a person or corporation. The pation may present a clergyman to the ecclesiastical authority to be admitted to the benefice, if found qualified. Descending from conditions under the feudal system, the practice now prevails only where this once existed   Cf. regale.   R.H.N.

benefit of clergy: Signifies the exemption of clerical persons from jurisdiction of the secular courts. Practiced already to a limited extent in the Fourth Century, it reached a full development in the 12th and 13th centuries. The growth of clerical courts was due to belief in the separate character of the clergy, to generally better procedure in the clerical courts than in the secular, and to a prevailing desire of many to stand trial in them because of milder punishments. Those classed as clerics came to comprise not only priests and monks, but all who were connected in any way with churches, universities (e.g., students), in fact, all who could read. Theoretically the cases under clerical jurisdiction were those touching religion and morals only, but it was often successfully argued that these involved probating, breach of contract, etc. Benefit of clergy had a specially interesting history in England (see, particularly, Thomas A. Becket) till its abolition in 1827. The United States abolished it in 1789-90   See immunity, Canon Law, ecclesiastical courts.

Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (1937), Vol II, 511-513, has a good bibliography.   Q B

benevolence, disinterested: In New England theology*, the doctrine that true virtue is of the affections or passions and is to be defined as the unselfish love for intelligent being in general. Each particular being is to be loved according to its place in the scale of being. Hence love for God, the greatest being, is the supreme virtue. Sin is love for self to the exclusion of other beings.

Jonathan Edwards* (Nature of True Virtue) defined "being in general" as a certain quality of being, or the essence common to all being, insight into which is given to the regenerate alone. Samuel Hopkins* gave a more practical twist to the doctrine by defining it as "all being," or the simple summation of all individual beings. Hence the regenerate make their state manifest by their love for all beings. In this form the doctrine provided the motivation for a great deal of consecrated devotion to the great missionary and philanthropic crusades of the early nineteenth century.

Joseph G. Haroutunian, "Jonathan Edwards," Journal of Religion, XI (1931); Piety Versus Moralism (1932); C. H. Faust & Thomas H. Johnson, Jonathan

Edwards in American Writers Series (1935); Gilbert H. Barnes, The Anti-Slavery Impulse 1830 - 1844 (1933); Oliver W. Elsbree, Rise of the Missionary Spirit in America 1790-1815 (1928).   s.e.m.

Benevolent Societies: See anti-Benevolent Society agitation in the U. S.

Bengel, Johann Albrecht: (1687-1752) Protestant theologian· Born Winnenden, Wurtemberg. Active as minister, teacher and administrator in the Lutheran Church of Wurtemberg. Father of Swabian Pietism. Most influential as N.T. scholar. He was the first to arrange the N.T. manuscripts in families. His brief exposition of the N.T. (Gnomon Novi Testamenti, 1742) is remarkable for the author's thorough knowledge of the N.T. Greek idiom no less than for his terse and profound remarks on the spiritual implications of the text. The book has had great influence on N.T. exposition to the present day. Wesley was considerably indebted to it. Bengel's eschatology paved the way to a new Biblical interpretation of history (Heilsgeschichte). Through his prediction of the Parousia for 1837 Bengel became the father of modern premillennianism. An English translation of his Exposition of the Apocalypse, in which he developed his eschatological ideas, appeared as early as 1757.

Works
   Ordo Temporum (1741). Apparatus Criticus ad Novum Testamentum (2nd ed. Tübingen 1763). Gnomon Novi Testamenti (1742 Engl. tr. 4 v. Edinburgh 1859).

On Bengel.
   Eb. Nestle, Bengel als Gelehrter (1893); Friedrich Nolte, Joh. Albrecht Bengel (Gütersloh, 1913); Art. Bengel in Schaff-Herzog's Encyclopaedia, v II p. 52 ff. Albrecht Ritschl, Geschichte des Pietismus, v. III (Bonn, 1886).   o.a.p.

Bentham, Jeremy: (1748-1832) British writer on jurisprudence, ethics, economics, logic, and other subjects. His agitation did much to simplify laws and court procedure in England and other countries. His version of Utilitarianism* affirms a "hedonistic calculus" by which the relative worth of different pleasures can be measured quantitatively. Starting from psychological hedonism* as a fact, he believes that the four external sanctions (physical, political, moral, and religious) produce actions in accordance with his maxims of "the greatest good of the greatest number" and "each to count for one, and none for more than one". He championed laissez faire individualism in economics. His best known work is The Principles of Morals and Legislation (1789). See deontology.   w.x.w.

Berdyaev, Nikolai Alexandrovitch: (1874-) Threatened with expulsion from the Russian Orthodox Church in 1917, he became professor of philosophy at the University of Moscow. Expelled from the Soviet Union, he established in Berlin his Academy of Religious Philosophy. Later he moved his institute to Paris. He is the leading lay-theologian of the Russian Orthodox Church who has once been a revisionist Marxian. He is practically and theoretically active in the development of the ethical and social side of the orthodox faith. His works reveal penetrating criticisms of extreme rationalism and rationalistic liberalism. He is a trenchant critic of Communism, Thomistic scholasticism, atheistic humanism, democracy and capitalism. His thought resembles that of the Christian Gnostics. He favors the negative theology of the extreme mystics. His religious philosophy owes a great deal to German idealism and mysticism. His eschatological philosophy of history reminds one of Spengler. In his view, Christianity did not inaugurate a social millenium, but it introduced a potent tension in the historic process. It above all prepared the way for modern science and technology. Critical of the doctrine of progress, he visioned the rise of Fascism and Nazism.

   Russian Works. Subjectivism and Individualism in Social Philosophy (St. Petersburg, 1901), "The Ethical Problem in the Light of the Philosophic Idealism" in Problems of Idealism (Moscow, 1902), Sub Specie Aeternitatis (St. Petersburg, 1907), The New Religious Conscience and Society (St. Petersburg, 1907), The Philosophy of Liberty (Paris, 1911); Aleksei Stepanovitch Khomiakov (Moscow, 1912), The Meaning of Creation (Moscow, 1916); The Fate of Russia (Moscow, 1918); The Philosophy of Inequality (Berlin, 1923), The New Middle Ages (Berlin, 1924); The Philosophy of the Free Spirit (Paris, 1929). English translations: Christianity and Class War (1933); The Bourgeois Mind (1934); The End of Our Time (1935), The Fate of Man in the Modern World (London, 1935), Dostoievsky (1936), The Meaning of History (1936), Freedom and the Spirit (1937); The Destiny of Man (1937), Solitude and Society (1937), The Origin of Russian Communism (1937), Spirit and Reality (1939), Konstantin Leont'ev (London, 1940).   h h.

Berengar of Tours: (999-1086) An acute mind, but not a great character. On behalf of a rationalistic, yet profoundly personal and spiritual doctrine of the eucharist, he opened a ruinous fight against authority in the name of science. Cf. impanation, Lanfranc.

   Grabmann, M. Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, vol 1 (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1909), Schnitzer, J., Berengar von Tours (Stuttgart, 1892).   h.h.

Bergson, Henri: (1859-1941) Brilliant French Jew, one of the most notable and influential philosophers of contemporary time. He did not clearly declare the religious implications of his philosophy until the appearance of his last work. He arrived at a modified, non-scholastic theistic position, moving away from the absolute, static perfection of scholastic theology toward a God who is manifest in concrete events and in the intimate history of living individuals and organisms. He plainly rejected the absolute deity of Aristotle for a dynamic personal God of love, the a priori method for an empirical approach. Bergson was a temporalist theist, conceiving of God not as complete but as growing in knowledge, goodness, spiritual power and social awareness. As the self-identity of process, God is that which alters and in altering remains himself. Being the subject of change, he endures and escapes the ravages of time. The vital impetus is God operative in evolution and present in all life and reaching a higher level of attainment of his purposes in man. The reality of time, the waste in the onward movement of the vital impetus, the importance of freedom, novelty and struggle, connect God with the thought of a limited, but ever creative, cosmic force

Social processes, customs, mores and taboos, strengthened by religious beliefs and practices, in preventing man from using his newly acquired intellectual power or reason for individual ends detrimental to society, are the first, conservative influence of the two sources of morality and religion. Later on in social evolution the weight of customs is liable to hold mankind back, both by its inertia and rigor, by lack of deep inward emotion and aspiration, threatening freedom and making progress impossible. This is averted by a second, higher and intuitive source of morality and religion. Despite theological differences found among the great mystics, all basically agree in testifying that they have come into contact with a deeper spiritual reality than the majority of men. While only a few are capable of such profound inward experience, most individuals have felt something sufficiently approximating it and react sympathetically to the testimony of these souls. They follow to some extent their leadership. Bergson believed religion and morality can further spiritual, social, political and economic progress. Regarding human personal immortality as probable, he hoped psychic research would ultimately demonstrate it scientifically. See time.

Chief works: An Introduction to Metaphysics (1912), Time and Free Will (London, 1913); Matter and Memory (London, 1913), Creative Evolution (1913); The Two Sources of Morality and Religion (1935).   H.H.

Berkeley, George: (1685-1753) Irish Bishop, founder of subjective idealism (also set forth, perhaps independently, by Jonathan Edwards*). All thought depends upon concrete data, which are essentially "ideas" (also "notions", see below), entities given only as data-for-subjects. Data as they would be if not given at all, data as not ideas, are incapable of being given, hence also of being thought. "Matter", taken as independent of mind, is self-contradictory, since its properties are all ideas. We know ourselves as subjects by a special form of givenness yielding a "notion" rather than an idea (for it is active, not passive), and somehow we know from the pattern of our own data that there are other human subjects. Physical reality or nature is the fixed and shareable order of data. Ideas that are merely ours are under control of our wills, whereas what we perceive physically is forced upon us all according to a common system. The only force we know from the given is will. The only adequate will-cause of the orderly constraint we feel in perception is God. Thus all data are signs in a single vast language by which God communicates to us. See idealism, metaphysical.

G. Berkeley, Treatise on the Principles of Human Knowledge (1710); Three Dialogues Between Hylas and Philonous (1713); Siris (1744). Also J. Wild, George Berkeley (1936).   C.H.

Bernard of Clairvaux: Bernard was born at Fontaines-les-Dijon (Côte-d'Or) in 1090. He fled the world and entered Citeaux in 1112. Three years later he founded the Abbey of Clairvaux. From his solitude Bernard went forth to become the most powerful churchman of twelfth century Europe. Counsellor and critic of popes and kings, builder of monasteries, preacher of crusades and indefatigable pursuer of all whose orthodoxy was suspected, he yet found time for considerable writing—sermons, letters, and theological treatises. He was chiefly responsible for the condemnation of Abailard's* works at Sens in 1141. Arnold of Brescia and Gilbert Porrée knew the power of his pursuit. But it is unjust to accuse him of anti-intellectualism, though he feared the philosophical treatment of theological problems. His own theology was essentially mystical. Death came to him in 1153. See Knights Templar.   P.S.M.

A. Neander, Der heilige Bernhard und sein Zeitalter (Gotha, 1889-1890); J. Ries, Das geistliche Leben in seinen Entwicklungs stufen nach Bernhard (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1906); A Steiger, Der heilige Bernard (Brünn, 1908); E. Vacandard, Vie de S. Bernard, 2 vols. (Paris, 1895).   H.H.

Bernard of Cluny: (of Morlaix) A Benedictine poet of the early 12th century, author of the poem, On the Contempt of this World, satirizing the life and notables of his period. His work is dedicated to Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Cluny. He may have influenced Dante's Divina Commedia. Numerous hymns and possibly a treatise on the Trinity were written by him.   V.J.B.

Bernard of Tours: (B. Silvestris) A 12th century scholar, possibly of the school of Chartres author of the De mundi universitate, in alternate prose and verse. Gilson has shown that, contrary to the view of older histories, Bernard is interested in Christian theology, particularly in the interpretation of Genesis, but that he belongs to the tradition of Christian Platonists who tried to supplement the Christian account of creation with the doctrine of the Timaeus.

See E. Gilson, "La cosmogonie de B. Silvestris," Arch. d'hist. doct. et lit. du moyen age, III (1928), 5-24.   V.J.B.

Bernardine, St. of Siena: See Observants.

Berthold of Regensburg: (c. 1220-1272) Popular Franciscan* preacher whose deep missionary interest is reflected in his wide-ranging travels, his scriptural basis, and his powerful ethical appeal. His sermons were enlivened by all the fellow-feeling with simple men, the graphic challenge to spiritual inwardness, and the techniques of vital appeal, which make real preaching truly great at all times.   R.C.P.

Bes: An Egyptian god of pleasure, able to counteract witchcraft*. His prominence in the Saite period was doubtless instrumental in the adoption of his image as an amulet by the Gnostics.

                                                             P.G.M.

Besht: See Chasidism.

Bessarion: (1403-1472) Bessarion was born in Trapezous, Pontus. In his twenties he became a monk. He distinguished himself for his learning, deep insight, and his great intellect. He studied in Constantinople and Sparta under the famous Greek philosopher Gemistos. Later he became priest, bishop and Archbishop of Trapezous when he won great fame as a teacher and preacher of the Social Gospel of Christian Love. He was appointed as a representative of the Greek Church for the proposed Union of the Churches (1436) in the Conference of Pherraro, Italy. After the Fall of Constantinople the Catholic Church gave him the title of Cardinal, for his good services.

As a Cardinal of the Catholic Church in Rome he tried many times to organize a crusade against the Turks but failed. He wrote many theological, philosophical and philological books, the collection of his MSS was one of the best in his period. Bessarion still remains one of the great figures in the proposed Union of the Churches, but he failed in his attempts on account of his changed religious attitudes.   G.E.Z.

bestiaries: (Lat., bestia, wild beast) Books of prose or poetry giving illustrations or descriptions of animals, fabled and real Popular in the Middle Ages, they contributed to the animal decoration of Romanesque and Gothic sculptural ornamentation, where animals assumed a symbolical importance.   J.B.C.

bet hamidrash: Literally in Hebrew a house of study or a place where students gather to listen to the midrash*, the exposition of Scripture. It is frequently referred to as the Synagogue* as well, since synagogues always housed study groups in Bible and various Rabbinic studies.   B.Z.B.

Bet Hillel and Bet Shammai: Two schools, composed of the disciples of Hillel* and Shammai respectively, which flourished during the 1st century C. E. They reflect in the hundreds of legal questions disputed by them, the spirit of their founders. On the whole, the Hillelites were lenient in their interpretation of the Law* while the Shammaites were uncompromisingly severe. At first the legal decisions of Bet Shammai seem to have prevailed. However, about the year 100 it was decided that in all legal disputes between these two schools, the opinions of Bet Hillel should be followed.   E.B.—L.F.

Beth, Karl: (1872-) He is professor at the University of Vienna. He has investigated a great number of religious phenomena and principles in the light of contemporary philosophy, psychology and sociology. In his writings on miracles he adopts Reinhold Seeberg's* teachings that "Christ is so great the miracle becomes small in comparison with him". Defining religion as the natural "metabiontic determinant in human life", he made use of the various types of modern Ganzheitspsychologie, of psychoanalysis, of existential philosophy for the analyses of religious problems. He rejects Freud's* criticism of religion as well as Karl Barth's* dialectical theology, Wilhelm Hauer's, H. Mandel's* and Emmanuel Hirsch's secularisation of Christendom.

Die Grundanschauungen Schleiermachers in seinem ersten Entwurf der philosophischen Sittenlehre (Berlin, 1898), Die orientalische Christenheit der Mittelmeerlander (Berlin, 1902), Das Wesen des Christentums und die moderne historische Denkweise (Leipzig, 1904); Die Moderne und die Prinzipien der Theologie (Berlin, 1907); The Miracles of Jesus (1907); Das Wunder. Prinzipielle Erörterung des Problems (Gross Lichterfelde-Berlin, 1908); Urmensch, Welt und Religion (Gross Lichterfelde-Berlin, 1909); Hat Jesus gelebt? Eine Kritik der Drew' schen Christusmythe (Berlin, 1910); Die Entwicklung des Christentums zur Universalreligion (Leipzig, 1910); Religion und Magie bei den Naturvölkern (Leipzig-Berlin, 1914); Gesunddenken und Gesundbeten. Eine Beurteilung des Scientismus (Wien, 1918;) Einfuehrung in die vergleichende Religionsgeschichte (Leipzig, 1920); Religion und Magie. Ein religionsge-schichtlicher Beitrag zur psychologischen Grundlegung der religiösen Prinzipienlehre (Leipzig-Berlin, 1927); Frömmigkeit der Mystik und des Glaubens (Leipzig-Berlin, 1927); Die Krise des Protestantismus (Berlin, 1932)   H.H.

Bethlehem: Also called Bethlehem-Ephrathath, town of Judah, five miles South of Jerusalem, famous for the grave of Rachel shown on the road nearby (Gen. xxxv, 19; xlviii, 7) and more especially as the birth-place of David (I Sam. xvi, 1-18) and of the Messiah (Mic. v, 2), prophecy fulfilled for the Christians by the birth of Jesus-Christ (Mt. ii, 6; cf. Jn. vii, 42). See F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, vol. ii, (1938), pp. 276-277.   S.L.T.

Bethlehemites: 1) A military Order dedicated to Our Lady of Bethlehem which came to Bohemia in 1217 from Palestine. 2) An Order of knights dedicated to Our Lady of Bethlehem founded by Pope Pius II in 1453 to defend the island of Lemnos. 3) An Order of Hospitallers* founded in 1650 in Guatemala. At the time of their suppression by the government in 1820, they had 33 houses of monks and one of nuns in Central and South America.   J.B.C.

Beyschlag, Willibald: (1823-1900) Beyschlag was a leader in the "mediating theology," combatting both rigid orthodoxy and the radicalism of Strauss* and others; and working passionately for church unity. His best known works are his Life of Christ (1885 and later) and New Testament Theology (1891 and later).   B.S.E.

Beza, Theodore: (1519-1605) A friend and biographer of Calvin, his successor at the head of the government in Geneva, who published anonymously the pamphlet Du Droit des Magistrats sur leur Sujets (1574). The stress of circumstances drove Beza, as it had driven Knox, to reverse not only Calvin's teaching, but his own previous conviction in favor of passive obedience. He clearly, yet reluctantly, urged the right of inferior magistrates, though not of private citizens, to resist a tyrant, particularly in defense of true religion. See Gallican Confession; hymns.

J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, 1928); J. N. Figgis, Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius, 2 ed. (Cambridge, 1923); R. Treumann, Die Monarchomachen (Leipzig, 1895).   H.H.

Bhagavad Gita: India's most popular and best loved book of devotion. Although actually it is only one section of the great epic, the Mahabharata*, which is not "sruti"* or the completely inspired word of God, it is rated as "sruti" by some modern Hindus.

It is in form a dialogue between the warrior Arjuna and his charioteer the god Krishna in disguise. In the course of the 18 chapters it sets forth not one but many view points in religion. It is probably its eclectic character which gives it its almost universal appeal.

While expounding the way of knowledge and the way of works, its preeminent emphasis is on the way of faith or devotion (Bhakti) as the way of salvation which is open to all. "Be sure that none can perish, trusting me . . . though he be born from the very womb of sin, woman or man, sprung of the Vaisya caste or lowly disregarded Sudra". It is dated variously by competent scholars from 200 B.C. to 200 A.D. It has been more often translated into English than any other Hindu sacred writing.

For a list of translations see R. E. Hume Treasure House of the World's Religions (1935), pp. 424-428. See Hinduism.   C.S.B.

bhakti-marga: The way of devotion, love, faith. One of the three recognized ways of attaining moksha or salvation in Hinduism. It finds its noblest expression, perhaps, in the Bhagavad-Gita*, where Krishna promises salvation to all of whatever class who come to him. Bhaktas, i.e., those who follow the way of faith or devotion, are found in great numbers in both the Vishnu and Shiva sects of Hinduism. There is a great wealth of devotional literature expressive of this way of approach to deity.

See Psalms of the Marathi Saints, translated by Nicol, MacNicol, Association Press, Calcutta. Also Temple Bells, edited by Appasamy. See salvation, Hindu.   C.S.B.

Bible: See Biblion, Biblia; canon; canons of various churches, Old Testament; New Testament.

Bible, the: The word is derived from biblia, the plural of the Greek noun biblion, meaning book. That in turn was derived from the word for Egyptian papyrus*, the writing material on which books were written. The word was mistaken by Latin readers for the feminine singular. Hence we have a singular noun for what is really a library of 66 books. 39 books comprise the Old Testament*. This name arose through the wrong translation of the Greek diathēke; though that noun could be used as a "last will and testament", its biblical meaning is normally that of a sovereign dispensation by God. These Hebrew scriptures were read by the early Christians in the Greek translation or Septuagint*, and gradually 27 of their own writings were put beside them as the New Testament*.

The Jews divided their scripture into three sections, the Law, Prophets and Writings. The English Bible, however, follows the Septuagint in a rearrangement of the last two groups of books. The English New Testament follows the order of the Latin Vulgate*—gospels, Acts of the Apostles, Pauline Epistles, General Epistles, Revelation.

From the beginning of the Christian church, the Bible was given a high place of authority*. The Jews had believed that the Pentateuch* was divinely dictated to Moses*. The verbal inspiration of scripture was assumed in such passages as II Tim. 3.16 and II Pet. 1.19-21. Still, no biblical writer claims infallibility for himself. A high conception of inspiration was maintained by the early Fathers from Justin Martyr on, but authority was also ascribed to tradition.

In the Middle Ages, the Bible was authoritative in theory. In practice, however, the Church stood between the individual Christian and the Bible. The Reformers took a quite free attitude toward the letter of the Bible, not hesitating to criticize the limits of the canon*, and laying greater emphasis on content than on form. But the seventeenth century was a period of rigid definition and violent controversy. In conflict with Jesuits and Socinians, Protestant orthodoxy came to identify inspiration with infallibility.

With the rise of criticism under the stimulus of Rationalism in the latter half of the eighteenth century, that became increasingly impossible. Textual criticism had shown the uncertainty of many readings; deviating accounts of the same event were pointed out, the uncertainty of interpretation of many passages contributed to render any claim of infallibility incredible (See Biblical criticism).

Still, there remains today division in interpretation. There are fundamentalists* who hold that at least the original manuscripts* were literally dictated by the Holy Spirit. There are many conservatives who insist that since the Bible contains the revelation of God, only in the light of this assumption and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit can its pages be understood. On the other hand, there are devoted students of the Bible who approach it as a selection from the extant literature of the Hebrews and early Christians which must be investigated by trained scholars as any other literature from the ancient world. Judgments of value must come after its impartial study. Only then is anyone in a position to affirm its authority, inspiration or revelation. This is not on the basis of any pre-conceived theory, but from its discovered worth. See versions, Word of God.   C.T.C.

Bible Belt: American colloquialism for the more orthodox and fundamentalist South United States.   C.H.M.

Bible, Books of, in chronological order: See Books of the Old Testament, the, in chronological order; Books of the New Testament, dates of the.

Bible, chapters and verses: See chapters and verses.

Bible Churchman's Missionary Society, the: See Evangelicals.

Bible communism: See Oneida community, the.

Bible, English: The first translation of the complete Bible into English was the work of the reformer John Wyclif* and his assistants. It exists in two forms the early version, completed about 1382, by Wyclif and Hereford, and the revision by John Purvey, assigned to the year 1388. The great defect of this translation was that it was made from a translation—the Latin Vulgate*—rather than from the original languages, Hebrew and Greek. Following the Latin order, it included the books of the Apocrypha* scattered in Septuagint* fashion among the O.T. writings. Its circulation was in manuscript form, and it did not have much control on the subsequent history of the English Bible. Nevertheless, its long use by the Lollard* preachers made it a factor in preparing Englishmen for the Reformation.

Nearly a century and a half after Wyclif's time, important sections of the Bible were first translated into vernacular English from the original languages. William Tyndale's* New Testament of 1525, and his Pentateuch of 1530, were rendered in vigorous "plowboy" English from Greek and Hebrew texts. Both of them were incorporated into Myles Coverdale's* editorial cento of 1535, which was the very editio princeps of the printed English Bible. The Psalter of this first printing, as later re-edited by Coverdale himself, became the liturgical Psalter of the Book of Common Prayer.* As such it is still constantly and extensively used in public worship after four full centuries.

The salutary Tyndale increment in the English Bible was increased when his rendering of the historical books, from Joshua through Chronicles, was made a part of the "Thomas Matthew" Bible two years later. This version was further revised by Coverdale himself when he produced the Great Bible of 1539, the first English version to be definitely authorized for use in public worship. Unfortunately the Great Bible completely overshadowed the synchronous revision by Richard Taverner, for his editorial work was quite meritorious, especially in the Greek section.

From the very earliest printing of the Bible in English, the books of the Apocrypha were grouped together between the two Testaments, following the precedent established by Martin Luther*. Thus segregated, it was all the easier for Puritans* much later to accomplish the ultimate ostracism of the Apocrypha from Protestant printings of the Bible.

Partizan versions· Puritan, Anglican, and Catholic next made their appearance in sequence. Protestant exiles in Geneva, during the Marian period, produced the Puritan Geneva Bible* of 1560. In the latter part of the O.T. this version was more faithful to the Hebrew text than its predecessors had been. It had useful characteristics convenient size, clear type, verse divisions*, and explanatory notes. Its long-extended popularity with Puritans and Pilgrims was intelligible and creditable.

Already in the middle sixties the early popularity of the Geneva Bible forced Archbishop Parker to organize a hasty episcopal revision of the Great Bible. The result was a magnificent piece of folio printing, the second authorized English Bible "appointed to bee read in the Churches." For four decades the Bishops' Bible of 1568 continued in that favored position.

In the mid-Elizabethan era Catholic exiles at Rheims did for their co-religionists what Protestant exiles at Geneva had earlier accomplished. They backed the production of an English version from the Vulgate text. The methodical translator was Gregory Martin. He worked at the rate of exactly two chapters per day. A highly Latinized translation was approved. Only the Rheims New Testament was published at once in 1582. For sheer lack of funds the appearance of the Douay Old Testament was deferred until 1609. (See Douai Bible.)The Rheims work should be remembered as having had a modicum of influence on the King James version of 1611.

King James I of Great Britain (VI of Scotland) was deservedly the eponym of the third authorized English Bible. When at the Hampton Court Conference of 1604 the leader of the Puritans proposed a retranslation of the Bible, the king at once made the proposal effective by naming a translation committee composed of "the best learned in both the Universities " The outcome was not a retranslation, but a moderate revision of the Bishops' Bible. Even so, it epitomized the very best English efforts at Bible revision and translation to date. Moreover it was a convenient and noble summary of almost a full century of development in English language and literary style

Also it signalized the beginning of a new era as well. Immediately it succeeded the Bishops' Bible in church use. Ultimately it displaced the Geneva Bible, even, in home use. After three centuries and a third, it is still popularly the dominant and most revered version of the English Bible.

From 1615 to 1769 there were repeated revisions of the King James version. These were mainly in the direction of modernizing the spellings and contemporizing the usages. Bishop Lloyd, and Drs. T. Paris and B. Blayney, were among the conscientious editors of such recognized revisions. Thus the Authorized Version itself did not remain static. Even today the process of silent modernization continues—though in very great moderation.

A nearly forgotten section in the history of the English Bible is the story of the distinctive private translations that appeared with fair frequency during the centuries from the seventeenth to the nineteenth inclusive William Whiston, successor of Sir Isaac Newton at Cambridge; John Wesley, instigator of the Methodists; Archbishop Newcome, Anglican primate of Ireland, Charles Thomson, secretary of the Continental Congress; and Noah Webster, author of the Dictionary, were all reasonably proud of what they accomplished in Bible revision, or even translation.

These same centuries also saw the dramatic recovery of crucially important Biblical manuscripts*. This series of events began with the presentation of Codex Alexandrinus* by the ecumenical patriarch, Cyril Lucar, to the king of England, not long after the publication of the King James Bible. It culminated in the discovery of Codex Sinaiticus* by Tischendorf in the middle decades of the 19th century.

The effect of such discoveries in stimulating textual studies and developing the techniques of criticism was extremely invigorating. In the field of Bible translation they led to an overwhelming demand for a comprehensive revision of the Authorized Version which should make full use of the better Biblical texts now available. The Revised Versions of 1881 and 1901 were the English and American answers to this sound demand. See Bible, modern translations.

Samuel Bagster, The English Hexapla (London, 1846), Charles C. Butterworth, The Literary Lineage of the King James Bible, 1340-1611 (1941), Edgar J. Goodspeed, The Making of the English New Testament (1925), Richard Lovett, The English Bible in the John Rylands Library, 1525-1640 (Manchester, 1899); Ira M. Price, The Ancestry of Our English Bible (9th ed., 1934); Harold R. Willoughby, The Coverdale Psalter and the Quatrocentenary of the Printed English Bible (1935).   H.R.W.

Bible, Lost Books of: See Lost Books of the Bible.

Bible, manuscripts of: See manuscripts of the Bible.

Bible, modern translations of the: Modern speech translation of the Bible commonly refers to editions of Scripture in more or less colloquial English which have appeared since the English Revision of 1881-85, and largely since 1900. The emphasis on "modern speech" is relative, since every period has shown a desire for contemporary English translation. Rodolphus Dickinson expressed an attitude typical of his time when in his N.T. published at Boston in 1833, he stated his purpose to conform the Scriptures to the "revolution in the English language" since the days of King James. Also typical was his use of Griesbach as a critical text of his day. Rather unusual by contrast was the fact that his English, while faulty, showed considerable freedom from the language of the Authorized Version of 1611. Most translators after expounding the need for fresh translation, and emending the text, were content simply to revise the King James edition. By the close of the century, however, the general trend took a more liberal text for granted, and began to produce a simple, modern style of everyday English which the common man could easily read and understand.

Several purposes have served to motivate modern biblical translators· 1) As indicated, a primary aim has been to modernize the English of the Authorized Version. "Carriage" (Acts 21·15) no longer means "baggage" as it did in 1611. "By and by" and "presently" no longer signify "at once." Archaic pronoun and other stylistic forms, and the old verse paragraphing, hinder the reader's understanding. The modern papyri* discoveries in Egypt show the N.T. largely to have been written in the colloquial Greek of every-day speech, and there is no reason why we should not continue to translate the Bible for each generation into appropriate, but colloquial English.

2) The text of fresh translation must be adjusted to the continual progress made from new manuscript discoveries, and constantly improved methods and results.

3) In the Authorized Version, the O.T. was more inaccurately rendered than the Greek of the N.T. because Hebrew and Aramaic were then more imperfectly understood. In each of these languages there has been a tremendous advance since that date in the understanding of word meanings and principles of grammar and syntax. Much light has come in recent years from inscriptions, the papyri in Egypt, and other documents. Montgomery was able to give an unusually vivid translation of Hebrews 11·1 because the word translated "substance" in the Authorized Version was found in the papyri to be used of a "title-deed"to property.

4) Translation is necessarily interpretation; when for example the text offers several possible meanings, the translator must choose one. New translations must attempt to embody the best possible understanding and interpretation of the biblical writings themselves.

The English Revised Version offered no radical change, yet it marked the first more general departure from a rigid acceptance of the King James. It began formally in 1870 with action taken by the Upper House of the Southern Convocation. The actual work of revision, in which eventually sixty-five English scholars took part, was started the same year, with one company working on the Old, and one company on the N.T. Rules adopted required them to make as few alterations and to keep the Authorized Version language as far as possible, to go at least twice through the Bible, to make or retain no textual change on the second or final revision except by a vote of two-thirds of those present; to revise chapter and page headings, punctuations and paragraphing, and so far as possible to use the same English word for a given word in the text. Some three years later Old and N.T companies were organized in America with the cooperation of Philip Schaff, to make suggestions on the English Revision, a number of which were adopted. The N.T. was published in 1881, the O.T. four years later. The new revision evoked great enthusiasm, and sharp criticism. The N.T. text on the whole was much improved; the O.T. followed the Massoretic text with a few exceptions.

The American companies were more ready to introduce changes in text and style, and were also conscious of differences between the respective English of England and America. Bound by a pledge to wait at least fourteen years, they published in 1901 their own revision, which became known as the American Standard Edition.

By this time, actual modern speech translations had begun to appear in numbers. Probably the two most widely accepted modern speech translations in English today are the Smith-Goodspeed American Translation, and Moffatt's New Translation. Both are largely in ordinary English,. Moffatt gives us more of British flavor, the Smith-Goodspeed Bible, American. Goodspeed's N.T., published in 1923, used the Westcott and Hort text, and a free, pleasing colloquial American style. Smith and associated scholars issued their O T. in 1927, a little more conservative in English style, with some textual emendation. Both testaments were issued together in 1931, later re-edited, and the Apocrypha still later added by Professor Goodspeed to form the Complete Bible. Moffatt for his N.T. used Von Soden's text, and fortunately with considerable freedom. He also exercised greater freedom in arrangement of passages, and in emendation of the Hebrew.

Two N.T. translations which did much to popularize modern speech editions, and which still are widely used, are the Twentieth Century New Testament (1899-1900), and Weymouth's New Testament in Modern Speech, produced in 1903 or two years after Moffatt's Historical New Testament. Despite his title, Weymouth was more greatly influenced by King James style. Ferrar Fenton's Bible of 1900 performed a similar service of popularization, but did not stand up equally well under critical use. F. S. Ballentine's translation of the Gospels in 1897 and the Modern American Bible (1899-1901) which contained more of the N.T., were commendable though not widely known. Others worthy of particular mention are Wm. G. Ballantine's Riverside New Testament of 1923, based on Nestle's text, with a somewhat more conservative style, Helen B. Montgomery's Centenary Translation of the New Testament (1924), more popular today, and the New Testament in Basic English, which appeared in 1941. An excellent Jewish edition of the Holy Scriptures was published in 1917 as a revision by a company of Jewish scholars under the leadership of Max Margolis. Baer's Hebrew text was used with slight variations. Father Spencer produced his Gospels in 1898 and went on to translate the remainder of the N.T. It was edited and published in 1937, twenty-four years after his death, as a modern translation for popular use by Catholics. Many commendable and attractive features are vitiated by a poor text. These are only a few of the surprisingly large number of private English translations which have been made in the modern period.

As this is written, a new revision of the American Standard Version is nearing completion. Thomas Nelson and Sons assigned ownership of the copyright in 1929 to the International Council of Religious Education. A beginning was made in revision under Luther Weigle of Yale as chairman. The movement was halted by lack of funds, but was resumed in 1937. Some sixteen American scholars are now engaged in the task. The N T. committee has virtually finished. The text, though composite, will be a more critical one, and the English style more modern.

Ira M Price, The Ancestry of Our English Bible, 9th ed., Rev. (1934), pp. 283-322; John V. Madison, "English Versions of the New Testament: A Bibliographical list", Jr. of Biblical Lit., XLIV (1925), pp. 261-288; Edgar J Goodspeed, The Making of the English New Testament (1925), pp 62-124, Max L. Margolis, The Story of Bible Translations, Jewish Publication Society of America (1917), pp 79-106, John L Cheek, The Translation of the Greek New Testament in America (Unpublished dissertation at the University of Chicago, 1938), T W Chambers, A Companion to the Revised Old Testament (1885); Philip Schaff, A Companion to the Greek New Testament and English Version 4th ed (1894).   J.L.C.

Bible School: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

Bible Societies: There are four great parent Bible Societies of the world, the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, the National Bible Society of Scotland and the Netherlands Bible Society. They all came into being in the early years of the 19th Century as a part of the modern movement for World Missions. There are also many other smaller national societies.

In policy and practise the great Bible Societies are all essentially the same—being instituted to encourage the wider circulation of the Scriptures without note or comment and without purpose of profit. They are essentially missionary institutions, concerned principally with the supplying of the Scriptures to those who but for them would not be able to secure the Bible.

The work of a Bible Society so conceived, naturally falls into three principal categories, aiding translators, publishing and distributing.

Due mostly to the encouragement given by the Bible Societies to missionaries confronted with the necessity of translating the Scriptures, some part of the Bible has, since 1800, passed into over 900 languages of which 184 now have the whole Bible. Counting those translations made before 1800 the total number of languages now possessing some part of the Bible is 1058.

The four great Bible Societies publish and distribute annually about 17,000,000 volumes of Scripture throughout the world, an additional 8,000,000 being distributed by other organizations. The manufacturing of these books is done in hundreds of languages and in about forty different cities scattered throughout the world. In so-called "missionary" lands the distribution is carried on principally by colporteurs and missionaries, many of whom take the books into the uncultivated areas where regular missionaries have never been established. In the United States, the American Bible Society operates through its various District Offices and its special Agency among the Colored People. It maintains five depositories from which the books are circulated. The concern of the Society in the homeland is that the Scriptures shall reach the poor, the needy, the unevangelized, those in penitentiaries and almshouses. Thousands of bulky volumes in embossed systems and talking book records are also distributed for the blind. In times of war the Bible Societies supply the armed forces with appropriately bound pocket testaments, free, through the chaplains. In the present war the American Bible Society has furnished through its office in Geneva, Switzerland, about half a million Bibles, Testaments and Portions in over 25 different languages to prisoners of war in Germany and elsewhere.

With the rapid rise of literacy which is destined to follow the war, the demand for the Bible in so-called non-Christian lands and the dearth of the supply available in Europe will call for a prompt and extensive expansion of the production and operation of the Bible Societies. See Wilberforce, W. Cf anti-Bible Society agitation in the U. S.

The Book of A Thousand Tongues (1938), edited by Eric M. North. Annual Reports of the American Bible Society and the British and Foreign Bible Society.   F.C.S.

Bibles, polyglot: See polyglot Bibles.

Biblia pauperum: Pictured representations of scenes from the N.T. accompanied by those from the O.T. which were typologically associated with them. Circulated especially in the fifteenth century.   J.T.M.

Biblical archaeology: Biblical archaeology is concerned with the recovery of the cultural (including material and religious) life of those ancients who produced or influenced the Bible. Since the Bible is a portion of the literature of Israelite, Jewish, and Christian people, obviously its concepts, allusions, modes of thought, and history cannot be well understood without constant reference to the culture of the age which produced it.

Before the last century the history and life of the ancient Near East were but dimly known from classical sources, which often gave an entirely erroneous or distorted picture. From that background the Bible projected like a mysterious fossil, with little contemporary witness to its meaning or authenticity. The most fantastic canons of interpretation were often employed, and, lacking pertinent data, dogma was usually the final arbiter of what the Bible said and what it meant to life.

Today our perspective is vastly enriched with the recovery of the material and epigraphic remains of ancient civilizations. Egyptians, Canaanites (Phoenicians), and Philistines, Hittites, Horites, and Amorites; Babylonians, Assyrians, and Persians; Aramaeans, Nabataeans, and Arabians are only a few of the many ancient peoples who played a part in biblical history, remains of whom have been recovered. In addition, excavations in Palestine especially have illuminated the history of Israel from the Conquest through the Roman period, providing a background and a check for the biblical accounts and concepts.

Archaeology as a discipline employing the scientific method has had a history which may be divided into four main periods. 1) Before 1800, a period largely notable for the reports of travellers and the awakening of interest in the subject. 2) 1800-1890, the period of the decipherment of Egyptian and Accadian (cuneiform) in particular, the development of lexicography and grammar, the first great excavations in the palaces of Assyria, the first scientific exploration of Palestine by the American scholar, Edward Robinson (the first great biblical archaeologist), and the first excavations in various countries, including Asia Minor (Troy), Palestine, and Egypt. Excavations were little more than treasure hunts, and biblical archaeology largely apologetic. 3) 1890-1915, a period when scientific methods of excavation were developed (especially by Reisner and Fisher at Samaria), and the key to chronology, the study of pottery, was discovered (by Sir Flinders Petrie, 1890). 4) 1920-1940, the period of greatest development of methodology and of most intensive exploration, excavations, and interpretation. Up to this time most archaeological work had been dominated by a biblical interest, largely apologetic. A more general cultural interest is now dominating the field, and biblical archaeology among its leading adherents has liberated itself from a narrow view of its purpose and function

A few observations may now be noted as to the precise effect which the new information has had upon our view of the Bible.

1. The discoveries have demonstrated that far more trust in the substantial reliability of the narratives is now in order, and that lateness of written record does not necessarily mean complete unreliability. There are countless illustrations of this fact, though perhaps one of the most noteworthy is the recovery of the Patriarchal period. Our written sources for this period are 9th to 5th century in date, and the stories have generally been thought to reflect the age in which they were written, rather than the age which they purport to describe. Naturally, archaeology cannot prove the actual existence of the characters in question, and it has shown that details like camels, Philistines, and some of the Egyptian names in the Joseph story are later additions. Yet apart from such details the color and background of the stories can be shown from a large amount of evidence to fit perfectly in the age which is supposed to be described (cir. 2000-1700 B.C.), but imperfectly in any subsequent period.

This example is a good illustration of the use of archaeology in biblical study. Its aim is neither to "prove" or "disprove", but to find truth. In so doing, however, much is found to confirm, some not to confirm. Most of the discoveries do neither, but fill in the background which is needed for the understanding of the meaning and context. From the above it is also evident that questions concerning the validity of religious concepts and the actual existence of such historical characters as Isaiah and Jesus cannot often be expected to find either confirmation or denial from archaeological sources, for archaeology has its limitations. It is only an aid to history, not history itself. It has demonstrated, however, that a more conservative treatment of the sources is in order. There are still those who believe, for example, that it is impossible to write a history of Jesus, since the sources reflect to a greater or lesser degree the beliefs of the Early Church. It is improbable that archaeology will ever solve this problem directly; but those scholars who study the results of archaeology on oral tradition in the O.T. cannot fail to come to the conclusion that the hypercriticism of Formgeschichte has often been carried too far

2. The discovery of the literature of surrounding peoples and of more ancient texts and versions (especially the papyri) of the Bible has furthered the work of textual criticism immeasurably. Corrections of texts and the knowledge of the meaning of obscure words has advanced so far as to render all lexicons, especially those of the O T., out of date. The work of classifying MSS and versions into families and sub-families is proceeding, and a more accurate methodology has been developed for determining correct readings. It is interesting to note that the evidence for the text of the N.T. is much greater than for any other book from antiquity, and some of the papyri date not more than one hundred fifty years after the writing of the original MSS. Recent discoveries, by and large, have supported the text of our best Greek versions, and few new readings of much significance have been discovered. In the O.T. the discoveries have been of great lexicographical value, but it has become evident that for the most part the texts have been transmitted with remarkable fidelity, and our knowledge of the teaching of the great biblical figures has been little increased or altered.

3. The classic reconstruction of O.T. history and religion is that of the Graf-Wellhausen school, which in turn was based on a Hegelian scheme of progression pre-prophetic, prophetic, and legal, or (animistic) polytheistic, henotheistic, monotheistic. While there can be little doubt about the general nature and date of the documents of the Hexateuch (J,E,D,P), they must now be considered as mainly editions, employing far older material; and the evolutionary scheme, supposedly derived from them, is now known to be far too simple. For example, ancient religion by the time of the Patriarchs was far advanced beyond an animistic stage, though survivals of animism are common throughout the Bible. In fact, archaeology through its demonstration of the antiquity of "high gods" reveals that the whole question of a simple animism is open to some suspicion.

4. The sources and nature of Biblical borrowing from other cultures and syncretism are increasingly clear. Close study of this subject reveals, however, that the most important thing here to be noted is the remarkable transformation through which all that was borrowed underwent. The Israelite-Jewish people, though always relatively poor and contributing nothing to the material progress of mankind, nevertheless had a genius possessed by no other ancient people—a genius of which their religious leaders were fully and justifiably conscious. Today, as a result of a century of archaeological work, we are in possession of a vast literature from the ancient east. Taken as a whole, however, the Bible unquestionably represents the cream of this literature. In histrionic presentation, character delineation, and especially in religious insight into the nature of God and man, the Bible stands without peer in the ancient world; and, when confronted with it amid the ruins of other civilizations, the honest archaeologist can only stand amazed

5. Archaeological search into man's origin in the "cradle of civilization" now enables us also to view the Bible with a new temporal perspective. When the Israelite nation was founded, over 200,000 years at the least had elapsed since man began to make artifacts. This does not merely mean that a large amount of new data has been furnished for a study of the origin of religion. Rather, since only 2000 years have passed since the close of the Canon, the place of the Bible in human history is clearer, and on a priori grounds it can no longer be claimed that the Bible is merely an ancient literature of no relevance to modern man. This, of course, is not to be taken as support for obscurantist views of Scripture In fact, one view which archaeology has definitely disproved is that of verbal inspiration. In addition, it is quite evident to any reader that there is much that is temporal and relevant to its time alone. But archaeology has furnished a wealth of new data by which the changeless can be separated from the changing, the timeless from the temporal.

Much remains to be done, not only in further discovery, but in interpretation. Biblical lexicography is in need, as is also the study of religious concepts. Pioneer work has been accomplished, but we have only begun to understand these concepts in the wider setting now provided. See archaeological periods.

Archaeology has been much misused by well-meaning authors in their search for "confirmation" of Scripture In addition, progress has been so rapid within the last two decades that the results have been difficult to assimilate. Consequently, practically all of the handbooks now available are out of date or untrustworthy or both The greatest work to appear recently, one which attempts to view biblical history in the new perspective, is that of W F Albright, From the Old Stone Age to Christianity, (1940). Next should be placed the volume by Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones? (1941) These works contain references to all the pertinent source material.

Attention should be called also to the small quarterly journal, The Biblical Archaeologist (New Haven, American Schools of Oriental Research), designed to keep those who are not specialists informed Among the older handbooks, G A Barton, Archaeology and the Bible (Philadelphia, American Sunday School Union, 7th edition, 1937), though out of date, is still the best The best handbooks in other languages are A. G Barrois, Manuel d'archéologie biblique (Paris, 1939), K. Galling, Biblisches Reallexikon (Tübingen, 1937); and C Watzinger, Denkmäler Palästinas, I—II (Leipzig, 1933 and 1935).

G.E.W.

Biblical Commission, the: See Commission, the Biblical.

Biblical criticism: Biblical criticism denotes the application of sound historical methodology to the individual books of the Bible to establish their reliability and credibility as historical sources and to determine what meaning they had for their authors and first readers. This scholarly investigation of the Bible is a complex operation consisting of a number of mutually related disciplines which may be briefly summarized.

In view of the many errors, both deliberate and unintentional, which have corrupted the text of each book of the Bible, it is necessary to detect and correct these corruptions so as to restore as nearly as possible the actual wording of the original autograph or manuscript of the author. This specialized branch of study, termed textual or lower criticism, is prerequisite to the literary-historical study of the Bible, frequently but unfortunately referred to as higher criticism.

A second prerequisite is the intensive application of linguistic studies to the books of the Bible, with attention to every nuance of vocabulary and subtlety of expression, so that these books, written in ancient languages, may be adequately understood and properly translated.

With these basic requirements satisfied, the student should next localize a given book, determining the author, if possible, and all that can be learned about him (for his name alone is of little significance); the place and date of writing, the public to whom it is addressed, and the cause, purpose, or occasion of composition. Without this definite localization, no writing from the past can be adequately interpreted. Closely related to localization is the problem of genuineness, whether a work is pseudepigraphic*, or whether in the course of tradition it has been given a false ascription.

Further, in connection with the study of a number of Biblical books the problem of source analysis arises, since some may be based upon sources, both oral and written, which should be identified and localized if possible. Also, since certain books have been subjected to later redaction*, the work of the redactor must be taken into account.

The literary style of an author, together with his characteristic vocabulary and manner of expression, deserves consideration. Further, literary criticism classifies a given book, or its component parts, according to type or form, whether prose, poetry, liturgy, homily, legend, myth, oracle, apocalypse, drama, parable, allegory, chronicle, letter, and so on, for this has a direct bearing on purpose and meaning.

In addition, it is most important to consider a writing comparatively, with reference to its historical, social, cultural, political, economic, intellectual, and religious background, as this may be determined by a thoroughgoing study of all the available collateral evidence, literary, archaeological, epigraphic, geographical, numismatic, and the like. Only by such a social-historical or environmental integration can the original meaning and significance of a work for its own times be discovered.

Biblical criticism is complicated by the fact that unlike most other historical sources the books of the Bible have been considered canonical, that is, are the divine word of God revealed to mankind through inspiration. However, a critical study of the historical process by which these books became canonical should provide a corrective, if one is needed. See exegesis; manuscripts of the Bible.

E. Bernheim, Lehrbuch der historischen Methode (1894) ; C. V. Langlois, and C. Seignobos, Introduction to the Study of History (tr. from the French, 1898) ; R. L. Marshall, The Historical Criticism of Documents (1920) ; A. T. Olmstead, "History, Ancient World and the Bible Problems of Attitude and Method," Journal of Near Eastern Studies II (1943), 1-34, G. H Gilbert, Interpretation of the Bible A Short History (1908) , K Fullerton, Prophecy and Authority. A study in the History and interpretation of Scripture (1919) , E. C. Colwell, The Study of the Bible (1937)   M.R.

Biblical criticism, sketch of history of:

With the exception of the short-lived Antiochean* grammatico-historical school, the Bible has not been studied in a critical manner until relatively recent times. Down through the centuries most Bible study has been conditioned by dogmatic presuppositions and pragmatic considerations, and characterized by allegorical interpretation*and other fanciful methods of exegesis*. With the rise of humanism attention was directed to the Hebrew O T. and the Greek N T., and editions of both were printed. Furthermore, scholars began to study the Hebrew and Greek languages, and before long translations were made from the "original" tongues into modern European languages. Along with these developments it was noted that the text of both the O. and N. Testaments had been corrupted in the course of centuries of manuscript transmission. This occasioned textual or lower criticism, particularly of the N.T. where the manuscript evidence was richer and more varied, which in time resulted in the publication of critical texts. Interest was also aroused in the manner in which the various books of the Bible came to be regarded as scripture, and histories of the canon of both O. and N. Testament were produced

As early as the Reformation freedom in studying the Bible without dogmatic presuppositions was advocated, but actually in practice the bonds of dogmatism were but gradually loosened. However, attention was increasingly directed toward such problems as literary type, authorship, date, and possible sources. In the O T. the poetic sections were identified and studied as poetry, and still later the significance of other types, such as legends, sagas, and myths was noted. The literary types of the N T. were also given consideration, with special emphasis being placed at the present time upon the "forms" which the gospel tradition assumed. The traditional authorship of numerous books in the Bible, such as the Pentateuch, Daniel, various Psalms, the Pastoral Epistles, Hebrews, and the Gospel according to John was seriously questioned, and along with this line of inquiry many of the books were re-dated. In the application of source analysis the composite nature of books like Genesis and Isaiah was demonstrated, and in the N.T. attention was called to the synoptic* problem. More recently attempts to reconstruct the "gospel" before the gospels have been made.

The rise of science, with the discovery of natural laws, led to scepticism concerning the miraculous elements in the Bible. This at first resulted in the rationalization of miracles* and other supernatural evidences, but more lately these have been interpreted against the background of the supernaturalism that prevailed when the various books of the Bible were written. Darwin's theory of evolution*, which appeared in print in 1859, was soon reflected in Biblical studies, and scholars began to write about the evolution of Hebrew religion, of Hebrew literature, of early Christianity. Likewise, the discovery of the Assyrian Flood-tablets by George Adam Smith in 1872 gave impetus to the study of the O.T , of Hebrew religion and history, in the light of the literature, religion, and history of the neighbors of the Hebrews Similarly, the N.T., the early church, and Jesus and Paul have been studied against their historical and religious background. In this connection special emphasis has been placed upon Talmudic* writings, apocalypses, and Philo, and upon the evidences for Graeco-Roman religions. Furthermore, the arbitrary distinction between canonical and uncanonical has been overcome, with the result that uncanonical Christian writings more or less contemporaneous with the books of the N.T. have been studied alongside of the canonical works. In addition, the knowledge gained from the investigation of primitive cultures and religions is being utilized in the study of the more primitive areas of the O.T. Similarly, modern psychology is being reflected in psychological studies of the prophets and of Jesus and Paul which have been made.

To summarize, Biblical criticism has been influenced by the discoveries, theories, and methods which have first appeared in other fields of investigation The Bible is now considered to be a human record, not a record of revelation, and is being studied by the best methods of historical criticism applied to all the available sources of information. This is far removed from the traditional methods of Biblical study. Two final observations should be made· first, the study of the Bible has lagged behind secular studies of a similar nature, and second, the study of the N.T., regarded as the more sacred part of the Bible, has lagged behind that of the Old. See Biblical criticism.

G. H Gilbert, Interpretation of the Bible (1908) ; K. Fullerton, Prophecy and Authority· A Study in the History of the Doctrine and Interpretation of Scripture (1919) ; A. S Peake, The Nature of Scripture (1922) , G. B. Smith, editor, A Guide to the Study of the Christian Religion (1916), chapters ii-v.

M.R.

Biblical drama: See religious drama.

Biblical exegesis: See exegesis.

Biblical history in Christian instruction: It took nearly 1800 years before instruction in biblical history received that measure of attention which it deserves. Instruction in the catechism in this or that form dominated. And yet, there was no period in the church without some instruction in biblical history. In the early church the Endeixis of Irenaeus contained a good deal of it. The Chronica of Sulpicius Severus, the Libri Evangeliorum of Juvencus, the Carmen paschale of Sedulius—none of them a biblical history in the present understanding of this term—served as means of making the people, especially the catechumens, acquainted with much of the pertaining material. Augustine in De catechizandis rudibus demanded that the lecture preparatory for the catechumenate* should include a historical survey of the kingdom of God from creation to the present time. Chrysostom advised the Christian father to tell the principal facts of biblical history to his children, laid down fundamental principles for such narration and showed by examples how they are to be applied. During the Middle Ages Theodul's Ecloga, the Heliand and Krist, the Scholastica Historia of Peter Comestor in its Latin form and many translations served as means to make acquaintance with biblical history; their use, however, was limited to the Latin schools and the educated home. What the children and the common people learned of biblical history was offered to them by the many Passionalia, the *Biblia Pauperum (O.T. and N. T. pictures placed side by side with brief explanations), the Speculum Humanae Salvationis (a biblical picturebook), the mural and window paintings in the church, the observance of the church year and the various postillae, i.e., sections from the O.T. and N.T. for the Sundays and some week days, containing sometimes up to 500 biblical sections. Description of this material is given in M. Reu, Luther's German Bible (1934). But there was no regular instruction in biblical history.

Luther's Passionale of 1529 can be called the first biblical history for the Christian home. It was a collection of 49 biblical pictures with explanatory texts in the words of Scripture and arranged in historical sequence with special emphasis upon the passion and resurrection story. In 1555 followed Hartmann Beier's History Bible, likewise designed for the Christian home, but very extensive. In the Latin schools were used Dialogi Sacri by Castellio, the Historia Sacra by Fabricius, and the pericopes of the church year. So the common assumption that the 16th century had no instruction in biblical history at all is no longer tenable. (Cf. M. Reu, Quellen zur Geschichte des kirchlichen Unterrichts (1906), vol. II.) In 1656 Justus Gesenius published "Bible stories of the Old and New Testaments chronologically arranged for the benefit of the young and unlearned, divided into two parts each with 54 lessons." Ernest the Pious of Gotha introduced biblical history into his Christian public schools (1662). "Twice 52 Stories from the Old and New Testaments" by Johann Huebner appeared in 1714 and helped very much to make biblical history a regular branch of study in the common schools. With the awakening of the Christian life after 1830 the understanding for the historical foundation of Christianity increased and helped to open the eyes for the importance of instruction in biblical history so that it obtained afterwards a larger place in the school curricula than instruction in catechism, resulting even in a complete exclusion of the catechism. This much is true, we should start with biblical history, should later deduce the principal truths of the catechism from the bible stories and finally use the catechism as the concluding unifying material. Isaac Watts gave us in 1732 with his Scripture

History the first bible history in English, used in England and America. Later the Sunday school movement helped to obtain for biblical history a regular place in religious instruction, in the Lutheran Church often supplemented by a course in regular biblical history.

Concerning the method of instruction see M Reu, Catechetics (1927), pp. 285-308 See also A Schmieding, Teaching the Bible Story (1935), Th. Heckel, How to teach Evangelical Christianity (1935), tr by N E. Richardson and H. J. Stratemeier.   M. REU

Biblical Introduction: This title is still retained for that branch of theological study which deals with literary and historical criticism. It was the ancient custom to prefix to each biblical writing a brief note concerning the author, the place of origin, the destination. These and similar data were formerly taken over from vague tradition or from mere conjecture. They are now found to involve elaborate enquiry, and to have the most important bearings on the nature and value of the books themselves. Thus an "Introduction" to the prophecies of Isaiah or the Fourth Gospel, once confined to one or two sentences, may run to a large volume, or a whole library of volumes.
                                                                                    E.F.S.

Biblical theology: Until near the close of the 18th century it was taken for granted that the creeds approved by the church were in full correspondence with the Bible teaching, or differed from it only in so far as the scriptural ideas were elucidated and harmonised. With the progress of criticism it became apparent that later theologies were largely based on philosophical ideas which were foreign to the biblical writers. The effort was made to construct a theology which should be wholly derived from the Bible teaching. This effort was doomed to failure, for reasons which have become ever more cogent as the true nature of the Bible has been more clearly understood. 1) The Old and New Testaments are separate, and represent two religions, differing in some of their essential principles. 2) The O.T. covers a period of a thousand years, during which all religious ideas underwent profound changes. 3) The N.T. likewise is found to offer a number of different interpretations of the Christian message, and they cannot be simply fused together and considered as a whole. The term "Biblical Theology" has therefore been largely abandoned, not only because it is inaccurate but because it rests on a false conception of the Bible. The book is read as if it were all of one piece, the manifesto of a single religious system, while it stands for a wide variety of religious thinking. This is one of the secrets of its greatness. It makes room for many different attitudes, all of them true and legitimate, in man's relation to God.

Not only has biblical thought ceased to be viewed as a whole but its frontiers are no longer sharply defined. We are now aware that Hebrew religion was exposed to Babylonian and Persian influences, that early Christianity borrowed largely from the cults and philosophies of the Hellenistic world. We know, too, that in the period between the Testaments there had been a great development in Judaism, and that Rabbinical and apocalyptic ideas must be studied along with those of the canonical writings. For that part, the canon itself was fixed in a more or less arbitrary fashion, and for theological purposes the Bible must include the apocrypha and those early Christian books which belong to the same general period as the N.T. The idea of a biblical theology has still, however a real value, all the more so as the field which it once covered has been so much divided. In the effort to distinguish between the separate types of thought there is always a danger of forgetting that there is an underlying continuity, and in some respects an identity. Certain broad conceptions, religious, ethical, philosophical, run through the whole Bible. While allowing for all the diversities which appear in the biblical writings it is necessary to remember that they are inter-related, and belong to a single movement. From this point of view the idea of a biblical theology is still a valid and helpful one.
                                                                                    E.F.S.

Biblicism and Bibliolatry: Biblicism denotes adherence to the strict letter of the Bible; in its most extreme form called "Bibliolatry" ("Bible worship").   B.S.E.

Biblion, Biblia: From Biblos, "papyrus". Biblion is a length of papyrus suitable for a Greek roll or scroll, some eight or nine yards long, a convenient length of practical use, and capable of accommodating the Gospel of Matthew, or of Luke, or the Acts. It came to mean a book, always in the roll form. The plural, Biblia, "the papyrus rolls," came to be used of the Christian sacred books of the O.T. and N.T., and passing into Latin as a feminine singular became our word Bible.   E.J.G.

bidding prayer: In Anglican service books, a series of requests for intercessions with the response of the Lord's prayer. Derived from Gallican* sources, it was the chief vernacular worship in pre-Reformation England.   T.J.B.

Biddle, John: (1615-1662) "The father of the English Unitarians," b. Gloucestershire; educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, Master of Crypt School, Gloucester; d. London. Profoundly versed in the Bible he became convinced that the common doctrine of the Trinity accords with neither Scripture nor reason. Charged with heresy he published in defence four small tracts, which created a profound sensation and called forth several extensive refutations in both England and Holland. Prosecuted for heresy he spent the greater part of the last seventeen years of his life in intermittent imprisonment, but whenever at liberty held religious meetings for his followers in London, the earliest Unitarian congregation in England. Did not deny the Trinity, but aimed to purify the doctrine of unscriptural corruptions that seemed to him to approach tritheism. A man of exalted personal character and devout piety. His congregation did not survive him, but his influence was continued by his writings, republished by the Anglican philanthropist, Thomas Firmin, which did much to stimulate the Trinitarian Controversy of the two following generations and thus pave the way for Unitarianism*.

See Joshua Toulmin, Life of Biddle (1789) ; Robert Wallace, Antitrinitarian Biography (1850), III, 173-206.   E M W.

Biedermann, Alois Emmanuel: (1819-1885) Was for many years professor of theology at the University of Zurich, Switzerland Infinity and spirituality are central to the idea of God. Together they form the concept of the absolute spirit, to which the term personality is not applicable. The ground of the world is as goallessly eternal as it is spacelessly ideal. Religion is not completely merged with the religious idea.

Die freie Theologie oder Philosophie und Christentum in Streit und Frieden (Tubingen, 1845), Christliche Dogmatik, 2 ed. 2 vols. (Zurich, 1884-85), Th. Moosherr, A. E. Biedermann nach seiner allgemeinen Philosophischen Stellung (Berlin, 1893) ; O. Pfister, Die Genesis der Religions philosophie A. E. Biedermanns untersucht nach Seiten ihres psychologischen Aufbaues (Zurich, 1898), A. Fleisch, Die erkenntnistheoretischen und metaphysischen Grundlagen der dogmatischen Systeme von. A. E Biedermann und R. A. Lipsius (Zurich, 1902).   H.H.

Biel, Gabriel: (d. 1495) Professor at Tuebingen. Occamist nominalist. Wrote commentary on Sentences of Lombard, also treatise on money. Luther was introduced to theology through his writings.   E.C.K.

bigamy: (Lat. bis, twice; and Gr. gamos, marriage) a) In criminal law the act of contracting marriage while married; b) in church law, a word for a valid marriage after the death of the first spouse.   L.R.W.

Billing, Einar Magnus: (1871-1939) Billing exercised a deep influence as teacher of theology at Upsala, 1900-1920. Opposing current trends he interpreted Christianity as a dramatic force in history, in conflict with evil, expressing itself in Church as a present struggle. Bishop of Västeras, 1920, he won new freedom for church by obtaining freedom to leave for those not interested. He contributed much to the religious education program of Sweden.   C.J.B.

bilocation: (Lat., bis, twice, and locatio, place) The doctrine that although a corporeal being can be in only one place at a time, a spiritual being may conceivably be in some way in many places at once, and Christ in the Eucharist, though under the form of bread, is really and substantially present in every consecrated host. Alleged cases of bilocation on the part of saints are regarded by St. Thomas, Vasquez and others as explicable as phantasmal replication.   L.R.W.

bilocation: (Lat. bi, twice, doubly, and locus, place) In psychic research and in thaumaturgy, the phenomenon wherein a body occupies or seems to be present in two (bilocation) or more (multilocation) places simultaneously. Theologians and philosophers endeavor to explain or at least describe the reports of hagiographers by distinguishing real presences fiom apparitions and also by differentiating definitive, circumscriptive and mixed replications. It should be noted that there are various modes of presence, ubication, location or occupation of a place and that the latter is a derivative or secondary effect of quantity whose primary or essential effect is the possession (not the extension or distribution) of integral parts.   D.C.O'G bination: (Lat., binarius, bini, two by two, two at a time) Offering Mass twice by one person on the same day. At least as early as St. Augustine's time (d. 430) Mass was offered daily, and later two or three times daily; later it was restricted to once a day, priests now may say two Masses on Sundays or holydays if otherwise many would have to miss Mass.   L.R.W.

Bimeler (Baümeler), Joseph Michael: Leader of Zoar settlement. See communistic settlements, religious.

Biran, Maine de: (1766-1824) Recognized as the most important French psychologist of the nineteenth century and as the profoundest French thinker before Comte*, he was the patron saint of French spiritualism which roughly corresponds to our idealism. Reaching independently views on the unconscious mental processes, he held the immediate consciousness of our own self-activity as the foundation of knowledge For him religion is primarily feeling rather than faith. In later years the unsettled question for him was how it is possible to distinguish between that which springs out of the soul's own soil and that which is due to the influence of divine powers.

Oeuvres philosophiques (Paris, 1841) ; G. Barbillion, De l'idée de Dieu dans la philosophie de Maine de Biran (Grenoble, 1927), V Delbos, Maine de Biran et son oeuvre philosophique (Paris, 1931), G LeRoy, L'expérience de l'effort et de la grace chez Maine de Biran (Paris, 1937) ; E Naville, Maine de Biran, sa vie et ses pensées (Paris, 1857), Oeuvres inédites de M. Biran (Paris, 1859) ; E Rostan, La religion de Maine de Biran (Paris, 1890).   H.H.

biretta: (It., originally a cloak and hood) A clergyman's headdress worn during parts of certain ceremonies; at first it was a skull cap, then a soft cap, now a square cap with three or four ridges.   L.R.W.

Birgitta, Saint: (1303-1373) Also called St. Bridget. Born in Uppland, Sweden, of noble family, and married to one of king's councillors, Birgitta moved in highest circles, applying sternly her interpretation of God's will for church and kingdom. After her husband's death in 1344, she thought of herself as Bride of Christ, receiving from Christ and the Virgin revelations, which, after her removal to Rome in 1349, concerned the reformation of the Church and the return of the Popes from Avignon. Partial fulfilment of her long efforts to establish a new order came in 1370—Vadstena, Sweden, became the center, with many daughter institutions in Europe. Following a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, she died in Rome in 1373. She was canonized in 1391. Her visions were not so much of a mystic nature as of direct ethical commands for reformation of abuses in church and state. Her writings were published in Latin, in Lubeck, in 1492. See Brigittines bishop: "Bishop" is derived from the Greek episkopos ("over-seer"), a wholly non-technical word applicable to anyone holding any authority over others. In I Pet 2·25 it is a divine title. In Phil. 1.1 it groups together the ruling authorities of a Christian community, in Acts 20 28 (compare v. 17) and Tit. 1.7 (compare v. 5) "bishop" is a precise synonym of "elder" and the same must be true of I Tim. 3.2 likewise. But, beginning with the Ignatian* epistles (not yet in Clement) the word assumes a highly technical sense and describes the single "monarchical" head of a local church; an office (without the title) that may have N.T. antecedents in that held by the addressees of the Pastoral Epistles* and seized by Diotrephes in 3 John. During the second century this form of church organization made wide progress, except perhaps in Egypt, Irenaeus* (III, iii) maintains that the bishops are in a very real sense successors of the apostles, both in teaching and ruling authority, while Hippolytus* (Apostolic Tradition 9·8) asserts that they alone have the power of ordination.

C.J.B.

In the first centuries each locality had its own bishop, so that in most places the office was little more than that of a congregation's pastor. But in the larger cities the bishops presided over many congregations and they gradually extended this rule over surrounding communities, whose own bishops disappeared, in this way the office was changed from a local into a territorial ("diocesan") dignity. And higher degrees within the episcopate were created, the bishops of the more important places becoming "archbishops," "metropolitans" or "patriarchs," with unique and universal claims made by the bishop of Rome.

Catholic theology holds that bishops are necessary for the very existence of the Christian church; in them exclusively are vested ruling authority, teaching authority and ordaining authority. But only the third of these functions is wholly inseparable from the office; in the Irish medieval church, for instance, it was the sole prerogative allowed the bishops, who in other regards were subject to abbots. And in the modern Anglo-Catholic* revival the ruling and teaching authority of bishops is often lightly regarded. In any case ruling authority is everywhere controlled by church law, while teaching authority obviously depends on individual capacity; only the collective teaching authority of the episcopate as a whole is regarded as infallible.

A subsidiary prerogative of bishops is confirmation*. But in the Eastern churches the right to confirm is regularly delegated by the episcopate to the lower clergy and a similar delegation is occasionally, although much more rarely, granted in the Roman communion; never, however, in the Anglican communion.

In various Protestant denominations, apart from Anglicanism, the episcopate has been retained (as by certain Lutheran bodies) or revived (as by the Methodists). But these bishops have only certain restricted ruling authority, exclusive power to ordain is attributed to them, if at all, only in very small and uninfluential sects. See autocephali; clergy, Evodius, patriarch.

B.S.E.

Bishop Hill colony: See communistic settlements, religious.

Bishops' Bible: See Bible, English.

bismillah: An Arabic term meaning in the name of God. "In the name of Allah", is a common exclamation among Mohammedans.

P.E.J.

Black Book, the: See Devil Worshipers.

Black Fast, the: A name given to an austerity practiced until the tenth century during Lent and just preceding ordination. On such fast days the quantity and quality of the food was limited as on other fast days; but in addition the time wherein such food might be eaten was designated as only in the evening. Only one meal was allowed at which flesh meat, eggs, butter, cheese, milk, and wine were forbidden. In the tenth century the custom of taking this one meal at three in the afternoon arose, in the fourteenth century the time was advanced to noon. Gradually the black fast disappeared as the practice arose of taking a small breakfast and an evening collation on fast days. See Feasts and Fasts, R. C.

T.T.M.

Black Fathers and Black Sisters, the: The name popularly applied to the religious, male and female, who follow the "Rule of St. Augustine." They are properly called the Canons and Canonnesses Regular of St. Augustine. The congregations following this rule came into being in and after the eleventh century. See Augustinians.

T.T.M.

Black Friars, the: The name commonly applied to the Dominican* friars in England because of the black cloak (cappa) and hood which they wear when outside the monastery. The cloak and hood are not worn as much in the United States as in countries where the garb is worn publicly.

T.T.M.

Black monks, the: The name popularly applied to the Benedictine* monks because of their entirely black habit.

T.T.M.

Black Rubric: While Edward's Second Prayer Book was in the process of preparation in 1552, a controversy developed over the practice of kneeling at the communion. It was asserted that the posture suggested an idolatrous attitude toward the elements. At the insistence of John Knox, though kneeling was still prescribed, an explanatory declaration was inserted. This statement, that the act did not imply any belief in the doctrine of transubstantiation, was later called the "Black Rubric" by High Churchmen.

W.S.H.

Blavatsky, Madame: See theosophy.

blessedness: The state of being blessed, of enjoying happiness or favor, especially divine favor. In the last sense used in the AV of Rom 4.6, 9 (RV "blessing"); almost in the sense of "self esteem" in the AV of Gal 4.15 (RV "gratulation"). See happiness.   B.S.E.

blessing and cursing: A blessing or a curse is a wish in words winged with the energy of emotion. Belief in the efficacy of the spoken words probably came from the feeling of satisfaction following emotional release. The effectiveness of a blessing or curse varied with the status of the individual uttering it. The words of a religious official, a patriarch, a parent or a dying man had more power than those of an ordinary person. Aryan and Semite alike dreaded especially the curse of those individuals who had no other redress—beggars, women, slaves and the oppressed poor. Gestures which express anger or affection became formalized accompaniments of cursing and blessing. Pointing directed the energy to its object. Blessing or cursing was usually a private affair but both were used as public rituals in higher religions. The protection of property by a curse applied to landmarks or tombs was an extension of the original usage. An oath* was often worded in the form of a curse to take effect upon the speaker if he failed to fulfill certain conditions. When a blessing or a curse was routed through a god it became a prayer. A qualified person could destroy the effect of a curse by a blessing or a counter-curse. A god might turn an undeserved curse into a blessing. See laying on of hands.
     A.E.H.

blessing, priestly: The blessing of the people by the Aaronites (the priests who were the descendents of Aaron), prescribed in Numbers 6.22-27, is an important part of the Temple service in Jerusalem and is still included in many synagogue* rituals. The priests were required to discard their footwear and wash their hands before facing the congregation to chant the blessing with upraised hands. Some synagogues no longer have a descendent of the Aaronites recite this blessing, but it is frequently used by the minister as a benediction following a religious service.   B.Z.B.

bliss: (A.S. blis) Unmixed happiness and joy; more particularly the supreme happiness and joy of heaven. See blessedness.   B.S.E.

Blondus, Flavius: (Flavio Biondo, 1392-1463) Humanist historian and archeologist, secretary to four popes. His posthumously published works on ancient Rome and Italy and on the medieval era make him one of the chief founders of modern historiography.   J.T.M.

blood: In the early stages of all cultures blood has been treated with awed circumspection. It had a mysterious potency which could be dangerous unless properly handled. Warriors after battle and women after menstruation or childbirth carried a contagion and required ceremonial cleansing. The Semites* identified the blood with the life, forbad the eating of it, and carefully channelled the blood of sacrifice* on the sacred altar*, deposited it in a holy place, covered it with earth, or applied it to a stone representing the god. In this way the mysterious danger was controlled. Other peoples drained the blood into a trench or strangled the sacrificial animal to avoid the spilling of blood. On the other hand, blood could be efficacious for good. It was a powerful protective agent when sprinkled on doorposts or other objects. It could carry strength and healing. Youthful blood was used to give renewal of life to the aged. Blood poured into the grave served to revive the shades of the Grecian dead who were pictured as hungry for blood. The blood bath was a cure for epilepsy. Blood was an effective means of purification* from all forms of contagion, physical or moral. The blood baptism of the mysteries illustrates this use in a highly developed form.

The qualities of one person could be transferred to another who drank or was sprinkled with his blood. Reconciliation after a quarrel or a pledge of loyalty was sometimes sealed by the drinking of blood. On all the continents, when the idea of blood relationship was established, an outsider could be admitted to kinship in a clan by the exchange of blood with one of its members. A solemn covenant* was made binding in the same manner. See law.   A.E.H.

blood revenge: The duty of a kinsman to kill the killer of his kin. By this method, tribal societies enforced a rough justice by exacting a life for a life according to strict rules of justice. Responsibility fell first upon the next of kin, then on the family, then on the tribe. The Hebrews provided cities of refuge to protect the accidental killer from death. See lex talionis.   A.E.H.

Blumhardts, the: Christoph Blumhardt (1805-1880), the father, growing out of Swabian pietistic circles, was first a teacher at the Basel Missions School. Later as pastor of a rural community in Southern Germany, he came face to face with the depths of demonic powers, in the victorious struggle of which he was instrumental in leading a spiritual awakening that reminded one of a return of the world of the New Testament.

Christoph Blumhardt (1842-1919), the son, left the pastorate of the official state church, threw off all pietistic theological mannerisms and placed himself boldly into the affairs of the contemporary world. He saw in the secular movements the workings of the living God, pregnant fermentations in creating a new world. He particularly discerned in the early social movement his hope of a redeemed material and human world. He joined Social Democracy not as a party member, but as a free Christian, and sat for a time in the diet as its representative. He served socialistic ideas at a time when it took courage to declare oneself for social democracy.

Until twenty years ago only a small circle of men had heard of the two Blumhardts, of the spiritual events that transpired at Mottlingen and at Bad Boll, the places of their struggles and victories Men and women of high and low stations in life received there new depths of meaning, felt the victorious testimony of the reality of Jesus, a wonderful commentary to the Gospels Since the days of the prophets and apostles few individuals spoke as luminously, freely and potently out of God's word.

Fr Zundel, Johann Christoph Blumhardt, 9th ed (Giessen and Basel, 1922) , L Ragaz, Der Kampf um das Reich Gottes in Blumhardt, Vater und Sohn und weiter (Erlenbach, Switzerland, 1922) , E Jackh, Blumhardt Vater und Sohn und ihre Botschaft 2 ed (Berlin, 1925).   H.H.

B'nai B'rith: See student religious organizations.

Boccaccio, Giovanni: (1313-1375) Italian poet and novelist who shares with Petrarch* the honor of being the earliest humanist. Although he was a life-long student and admirer of Dante*, and wrote many poems clearly showing the influence of his master, he is best known for his Decameron. The work has merited for him the title of creator of the novel as an art-form and of Italian prose. Boccaccio later deplored the licentiousness of certain pasasges in his writings. See Renaissance.   C.V.

Bodelschwing, Friedrich von: (1831-1910) Son of an old Prussian family, skilled in finances and religiously charitable, Bodelschwing became a theologian of childlike faith, a pastor of wide compassion who chose to live amidst the poor. He was a military chaplain from 1866-1870 From 1872 to the close of his life, he organized and administered "a colony of mercy", Bethel in Bielefeld, Westphalia. Here for more than seventy years, thousands of afflicted persons mostly epileptics have lived in family groups. All their needs such as food, clothing, shelter, medicine, books, are met by each working as he is able. Nearby are a labor colony for unemployed, a farm colony, hostels for migrant laborers,—these became models for similar groups throughout Germany. The headworkers are given training in Bethel in two schools for deacons and deaconesses*. The beautiful cruciform church in the woods is the center or heart of the activities of this large commonwealth of sufferers.   A.S.

G. v. Bodelschwing, Friedrich von Bodelschwingh (Berlin, 1922).   H.H.

Bodhidharma: See Buddhist Terminology.

Boehm, Martin: (1725-1812) Expelled from the Mennonites because of his evangelistic zeal and enthusiasm, became co-founder with Otterbein* of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ*. Bishop, 1800-1812.   W.E.R.

Boehme, Jacob: (1575-1624) A German Protestant mystic, a Görlitz shoemaker by trade, and the composer of an obscure religious and philosophical system whose influence is still operative in Germany, England, and the United States through his effect upon such religious movements as German pietism* and English Quakerism* and through his influence upon such men as William Law* and William Blake in England and on Hegel, Schelling, Baader, and Schopenhauer in Germany. Boehme's suggestive doctrine of the play of contraries within the will at the heart of all creation furnishes a Christian theosophy which has still to be fathomed. His writings are obscured by terminology and analogies that borrow heavily from the alchemist literature of his time

The Signature of All Things (London, 1912) , Six Theosophic Points (London, 1919) , The Way to Christ (London, 1911) , Howard Brinton, The Mystic Will (1930) , Alexandre Kayre, La Philosophie de Jacob Boehme (Paris, 1929)   D.V S.

Boethius: Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius was born of patrician family around the year 480 He received the best education possible in the Rome of his day. He early rose to political eminence, and in 510 he became consul. Twelve years later his two sons were raised to the consular dignity, and on him was conferred the title, Magister Officiorum. But his fortune was soon to change. Charged with treasonable relations with the Byzantine Court, he lost the friendship of Theodoric and was exiled to Pavia After lingering some months there in prison he was cruelly put to death in 524/25. Boethius knew Greek, and his early ambition was to make the works of Plato and Aristotle accessible to his Latin contemporaries. In this he was little successful, but in compensation he wrote several original works in the arts, in philosophy, and in theology. He was especially influential in mediaeval music, while his translations of the On Interpretation and the Categories were the only logical works of Aristotle known to the West until the twelfth century. His great philosophical work is the On the Consolation of Philosophy, written while he languished at Pavia Boethius was a Christian and the theological works attributed to him are now known to be authentic.   P.S M

M Grabmann, Geschichte der scholastischen Methode 2 vols. (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1909, 1911) , F. Überweg, Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. II (Berlin, 1905).   H.H.

Bohemian (or Czech) Brethren: In this organization the native Czech Reform found its best expression. Its spiritual father is Peter of Chelcic (c. 1390-c. 1460), who appeared on the religious scene in 1420. His first treatise, The Spiritual Struggle, 1421, demands clerical poverty, repudiation of war, of political power, of human laws, and of the papacy. His most important work, The Net of Faith, repudiates all connection between the spiritual and secular powers, and affirms that the church must completely separate itself from the state.

These notions were accepted by a group of pious folk under the leadership of a poor noble, Gregory, a nephew of the Utraquist Archbishop, John of Rokycany. The group withdrew in 1458 to a village of Kunwald in eastern Bohemia in order to live according to their strict principles. But King George of Podebrady disliked to tolerate any religious groups beyond those acknowledged by law, hence the small brotherhood suffered repeated and cruel persecution. Finally, they were driven, contrary to their original intention, to separate themselves from both the Utraquists and the Catholics by setting up their own church organization. This occurred in 1467. They repudiated the doctrine of the apostolic succession*, and chose three priests one of whom, Matthew, became the head of the church, an office later called episcopal.

The Unity repudiated all participation in the political life and held world-renouncing views in general. But in 1490 a liberal party broke down the old barriers, and since then the group attracted to itself some of the best elements in the nation. Nevertheless, it remained outside the law, and suffered periodic persecution. The most severe occurred in 1547, when King Ferdinand I proscribed all adherents from the country. They found refuge mainly in Poland. Since then, the center of gravity was shifted to Moravia.

But their fortunes improved when in 1575 they were recognized by Emperor Maximillian II as a legal communion, since they adhered to the Confessio Bohemica put forth by the Lutheranized Czech Utraquists. They were likewise included in the religious liberties granted in 1609 by Emperor Rudolph II in his "Letter of Majesty." However, all Czech Protestants, including the Czech and Moravian Brethren, lost their right to exist in the territories of the Bohemian Crown after the Battle of White Mountain (1620). Their last bishop, John Amos Comenius* (1592-1670), was the world-famed "father of modern educational theory and practice."

The organization was renewed when a small group of the Brethren from Moravia settled on the estates of Count Nicholas von Zinzendorf* at Herrnhut in Saxony. This reorganized Unity of Brethren (1722) known under the title of the Moravian Church*, exists to this day.

J. Th. Muller, Geschichte der böhmischen Brüder (3 vols. Herrnhut, 1922-31), J. Goll, Chelcicky a Jednota v. XV stoleti (Praha, 1916); E de Schweinitz, The History of the Church known as the Unitas Fratrum (Bethlehem, 1885).   M.S.

Bohlen Lectures, The: Established in 1875 by Mr. John Bohlen of Philadelphia with a capital sum of $10,000 at the Philadelphia Divinity School and, with frequent exceptions, given annually. "The subject of such lectures shall be such as is within the terms set forth in the will of the Rev. John Bampton for the delivery of what are known as the 'Bampton Lectures' at Oxford, or any other subject distinctively connected with or relating to the Christian religion." A few of the lecturers: Fleming James, "The Personalities of the Psalter"; George A. Barton, "Formative Ideas and Influences of the Apostolic Age"; Walter Lowrie, "Theology of Crisis".

(Data furnished by the chairman of the lectureship committee.)   V.F.

Böhmer, Heinrich: (1869-1927) As professor in Bonn, Marburg and Leipzig, he was one of several theological minds who added to the understanding of the Reformation. His observations about the Christianization of Germany were later tested by a new generation of investigators.

Luther im Lichte der neueren Forschung (Leipzig, 1905, 5 ed 1918); Der junge Luther (Leipzig, 1925)   H.H.

Bois, Henri: (1862-) Dean of the Theological Faculty at Montaban, France. He defends a personalistic theism, (See Personalism) aiming to satisfy to the full the religious need and describing a God endowed not unlike man with sentiments, passions and will. Pantheistic and agnostic philosophies, in particular, stress the negation of all personal relations with the deity. The appearance of Jesus Christ marks the culmination of a progressive evolution of piety towards a most exalted conception of divinity. Bois attributes the extreme reserve of a great many religious thinkers regarding the possibility of a divine personality to the eternal temptation of pantheism and monism. He is convinced that Renouvier's* neo-critical personalism alone develops the true solution of the problem of God.

"L'eternité de Dieu", Revue de théologique et des questions religieuses. vol. VI. (Montaban, 1898), La personne et l'oeuvre de Jésus Christ. (Paris, 1907).   H.H.

Bollandists: Society of Belgian Jesuits, initiators of the systematic criticism of historical source-material in their Acta Sanctorum (1634-1794, 1837-). They take their name from Jean Bolland (1596-1665), one of their first directors. The work was begun by Heribert Rosweyde. Arranged according to feast days of the saints and beginning with January 1st, the collection has reached November 10th in 64 volumes. See hagiography.   E.A.R.

Bonald, Louis Gabriel Ambroise, Vicomte de: (1754-1840) Along with Joseph de Maistre* Bonald was the founder of the "traditionalist" movement in French Catholic thought. All error, both in politics and in religion, is traceable to deviation from an original "primitive revelation", to which the fundamental unity of all languages bears witness, but of which the Catholic Church is now the supreme repository. Principal works Théorie du pouvoir politique et religieux (3 vols., 1796), Legislation primitive (1802), Recherches philosophiques (2 vols., 1818).   W.M.H.

Bonar, Horatius: (1808-1889) Best known for his hymns, this Scotch Presbyterian minister wrote "I heard the Voice of Jesus say", "What a Friend we have in Jesus" and many others familiar to users of Protestant hymn-books.   V.F.

Bonaventura, St.: (1221-1274) Of irenic and mediating nature, he was always ready to recognize the truth elements of rejected opinions, to reconcile different views, or to refrain from final decision. His favorite authority was St. Augustine*, in whom he saw the synthesis between Plato and Aristotle. In his religious, as well as in his general epistemology, he subscribes to the theory of illumination. A mystical-contemplative theology of experience unites itself as with Augustine, Anselm and Hugo of St. Victor, with a rigorous voluntarism An ecclesiastical positivism combines with an authoritative faith, a strict orthodoxy, a ready adaptibility to the reality of actual church life, and a lively ethical and mystical interest. See scholasticism.

E. Gilson, La philosophie de S. Bonaventura (Paris, 1924) ; E Lutz, Die Psychologie Bonaventuras (Munster, 1909).   H.H.

Boniface VIII: (Pope, 1294-1303) Sought to reestablish the supremacy of Papacy as asserted by Innocent III*. His chief conflict was with Philip the Fair of France who at War with England, taxed his clergy and refused to make peace at the Pope's command. Boniface issued the bull "Unam Sanctam"* purporting to prove absolute papal dominion. Agents of Philip took him prisoner and shortly thereafter he died. See Clericis Laicos, Doctor of the Church.   R.E.E.H.

Boniface, Saint: Martyr. (675-755) Apostle of Germany, he was born in Devonshire, England, and died at Dokkum, Netherlands. He was educated in Exeter, joined the Benedictines and was ordained a priest in 705. In 719 he was sent by Pope Gregory II to preach to the Germans east of the Rhine. In 722 he was consecrated a bishop by Gregory who gave him the name of Boniface, perhaps the latinized form for Wilfrid, his original name. He dealt a final blow to heathenism in Germany by destroying the sacred oak of Thor, at Geismar. In 732, Gregory III made him an archbishop. He founded bishoprics, reformed the whole Frankish Church, held Councils, and in 748 was made archbishop of Mainz which see he resigned in 754 to evangelize the people of Friesland. He was slain by pagan savages and today is buried in the cathedral at Fulda. His feast is celebrated on June 5. Having unified the Church in Germany, he is not only its apostle but its patron.   J.B C.

Bonosians: Followers of Bishop Bonosus of Sardica (4th-5th cent.), condemned for denying the perpetual virginity of Mary. Survived in Spain and Gaul till the seventh century.   M.S.

Book of Changes, The: See I Ching.

Book of Common Prayer: The Anglican book of public worship and administration of the sacraments and other rites. Its primary sources were the medieval Latin service books used in England prior to the Reformation—Missal, Breviary, Manual, Pontifical. The skill with which these were simplified, combined, reformed, and rendered into the language of the people, reveals the genius of Archb'p. Cranmer*. The first P.B. of Edward VI (1549) clung closely to tradition, the second Edwardine Book (1552) reflects a decided swing toward the Reformed churches, as the influence of Geneva replaced that of the Lutheran reformers. Subsequent revisions (1559, 1604, 1662) have taken their starting point from the P.B. of 1552. The present official P.B. of the Church of England* is that of 1662, Parliament having refused its assent to alternatives adopted by the Church Assembly in 1927-28.

The Episcopal Church in America adopted its first P.B. in 1789 and has twice revised it. The present American Book dates from 1928. Other constituent churches of the Anglican communion have undertaken liturgical revisions in the interest of enrichment, flexibility, and adaptation to modern life. The general trend is toward the recovery of much of the liturgical tradition that was sacrificed in the P.B. of 1552. See Bible, English, catechism, Sarum use.

F. Procter and W. H. Frere, New History of the Book of Common Prayer (London, 1905)*, L Pullan, History of the Book of Common Prayer (London, 1900) ; W, K Clarke and C. Harris, editors, Liturgy and Worship 1932).   P.V.N.

Book of Concord: The collected confessional documents of Lutheranism*, consisting of the three ecumenical creeds, Augsburg Confession*, Apology of the Augsburg Confession, Schmalkald Articles*, Luther's Small and Large Catechisms, and Formula of Concord*. Published by joint agreement of the Lutheran potentates of Germany in 1580 to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Augsburg Confession and to put an end to internal doctrinal controversies, the Book of Concord has been accepted as authoritative by the majority of Lutherans throughout the world. Large bodies of Lutherans, however, e.g., the state churches of Sweden and Norway, have never formally subscribed to the whole Book of Concord. See Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church.   T.A.K.

Book of the Dead: One among the sacred books of the religion of ancient Egypt consisting of magic, ritual and myth. See Egypt, religions of; sacred literatures.   V.F.

Book of Homilies: See homily.

Books of the New Testament, dates of the: The determination of the dates of the various books of the N.T. is beset with difficulties and uncertainties. In the first place, none of these works is explicitly and definitely dated by its author. Nor does any writing contain unmistakable references by which it might be accurately dated. Further, it is highly probable that most of the authors are unknown to us, save for Paul, for apart from his letters the books in the New Testament are almost without exception either anonymous, or, what is worse, pseudonymous. Finally, the external attestation to their authorship and date is meager and as a rule unreliable. Despite all this, approximate dates which have been generally if not universally accepted have been assigned to the books of the N.T. through the application of historical criticism to all the available data.

It is generally admitted that the genuine letters of Paul (I Thessalonians, Galatians, I-II Corinthians, Romans, Colossians, Philemon, and Philippians) are the earliest writings in the N.T. However, there is no certainty concerning their exact date or chronological sequence. I Thessalonians, usually considered the first of Paul's extant letters, is dated as early as the summer of A.D. 50 through the correlation of a Delphic inscription, which gives the time of the proconsulship of Gallio in Greece, with the relevant data in Acts 16-18. The so-called imprisonment epistles (Colossians, Philemon, and Philippians) are the latest if they were actually written during Paul's imprisonment in Rome during the early part of the sixth decade. However, if, as many think, they were composed during a previous imprisonment in Caesarea or Ephesus they must be given an earlier date. (For a recent reconstruction of the sequence of Paul's letters see Riddle, Paul, Man of Conflict, 1940, pp. 201-211).

The authenticity of II Thessalonians has long been questioned. It was probably composed in the name of Paul a generation or two after the apostle's death to account for the delay in the promised coming of Christ. According to most authorities Ephesians is also pseudonymous. An increasing number are receptive to Goodspeed's suggestion that it was written as an introductory or covering letter for the corpus of Paul's letters which was collected and published in Ephesus towards the end of the century. (Cf. Goodspeed, The Meaning of Ephesians, 1933).

While the gospels contain material that is earlier than the letters of Paul, the oldest written gospel, Mark, which is used as a major source by the other three, is no earlier than the siege of Jerusalem (A.D. 66-70) to which it refers, and may be a decade or so later. The two-volume work Luke-Acts is now seen to be an apology for Christianity written in a time of increasing tension between the Roman Empire and the Church. If it is dependent upon certain passages in Josephus' Antiquities its terminus a quo is A.D. 93-94. This agrees with other data pointing to the close of the reign of Domitian (d. A.D. 96), but a later period is by no means precluded. Matthew, which reflects a developed, ecclesiastical interest, is probably no earlier than Luke-Acts. John, using Luke and possibly Matthew in addition to Mark as sources, was probably composed in the first part of the second century. Its Hellenized Christology, refutation of heresies, and apologetic motif (on this point see Colwell, John Defends the Gospel, 1936) tend to corroborate this conclusion. In connection with the gospels it should be borne in mind that they are anonymous; the authors, and dates, traditionally assigned to them stem from the piety and credulity of the latter half of the second century.

I Peter, Hebrews, and Revelation obviously come from periods of persecution. I Peter, dependent as it is upon the letters of Paul, is not by Peter. Rather, it dates from the reign of Domitian, or, as some assert, from that of Trajan (d. A.D. 117). The later date is supported by data in the correspondence between Pliny and Trajan relative to the status of the Christians in Bithynia. (Cf. Case, "Peter, the Epistles of," Dictionary of the Apostolic Church). Hebrews, of unknown authorship, may be from the time of Domitian. The use of Hebrews by I Clement, usually assigned to this period, tends to confirm this opinion. (Cf. Riddle, "Hebrews, I Clement, and the Persecution of Domitian," Journal of Biblical Literature XLIII, 1924). Revelation is also ascribed to the reign of Domitian, in whose reign Christians were persecuted for their refusal to worship him as a divinity, but a Trajanic date is not impossible.

I John, which is anonymous, together with II and III John, attributed to an otherwise unknown presbyter, may be contemporaneous with the gospel. They seem to be directed against schisms and heresies similar to those combatted by Ignatius (who died as a martyr in the reign of Trajan) The authority claimed by the writers closely resembles that claimed by the bishop of Antioch.

Very few today argue for the Pauline authorship of I-II Timothy and Titus. Quite obviously the Pastorals were written in the name of Paul, not by him, to counteract heresies, including that of Marcion (all but mentioned by name in I Timothy 6.20), which flourished in the middle of the second century. (Cf. Rist, "Pseudepigraphic Refutations of Marcionism," Journal of Religion, XXII, 1942). Likewise Jude and II Peter, which uses Jude as a source, are pseudepigraphs like the Pastorals, composed in this same period to refute similar heresies in the name of the apostles. In verse 17 the writer of Jude inadvertently refers to the apostolic age as being long past, while II Peter warns against certain heretics, apparently Marcionites, who are twisting Paul's letters to their own destruction (3 16). James, largely didactic in content, is difficult to date. However its language and style definitely preclude the authorship traditionally assigned to it. As with other works mentioned above, its pseudonymous character, its late appearance in the writings of the church fathers, and its tardy acceptance in the canon indicate a second century date. See under specific books; NT., literature.

Limitations of space have prevented the presentation of the evidence for the conclusions which have been given in this summary treatment. For further information see the standard commentaries and the following introductions. J. Moffatt. Introduction to the Literature of the New Testament, 3rd ed. (1918); A. Julicher: Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 7th ed. rev. by E. Fascher (1931); P. Feine Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 8th ed. rev. by J Behm (1936) .M. S Enslin. Christian Beginnings (1938); E. J Goodspeed: An Introduction to the New Testament (1938); E F. Scott· The Literature of the New Testament (1932); D. W. Riddle Early Christian Life as Reflected in its Literature (1936); M Dibelius: Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur (1926), Eng. tr., A Fresh Approach to the New Testament and Early Christian Literature (1936).

M.R.

Books of the Old Testament, the, in chronological order: Genesis (1200-450); Exodus (1200-450); Judges (1150-550); I-II Samuel (1000-500); Numbers (850-400), Joshua (850-350); Kings (850-350); Amos (750); Hosea (745-735); Isaiah 1-39 (740-700; 550-250); Micah (702; 500-250); Deuteronomy (630); Jeremiah (626-586); Zephaniah (625; 600-300);

Nahum (614, 300), Habakkuk (600); Job (600), Proverbs (600-200), Ezekiel (593-571), Lamentations (570-450), Leviticus (560-450); Isaiah 40-66 (546-400), Haggai (520); Zechariah 1-8 (520-518), Psalms (500-100), Obadiah (470), Malachi (460), Nehemiah (432), Ruth (400), Joel (350), Jonah (350-300), Zechariah 9-14 (300-200), Song of Songs (250), I-II Chronicles (250), Ezra (250), Daniel (164), Ecclesiastes (160), Esther (125).

Note—All dates are of course B.C The books earlier than 300 contain additions made later than the dates given, which in most cases are of necessity approximate When a book contains writings of various dates, the period covered by the most important of them is indicated. The Apocrypha*date from 180 (when Ecclesiasticus was written) to the beginning of our era.   R H.P.

Booth, Ballington: See Volunteers of America.

Booth, William: See Salvation Army.

Bornhausen, Karl: (1882-) He taught first in Breslau. Now he is professor in Frankfurt a. M. A pupil of Herrmann and Troeltsch, he aimed at a Jesus-centered Christianity, free from historical ballast, and in intimate union with the deepest roots of classical idealism.
Religion in Amerika (Giessen, 1914); Pascal (Basel, 1920); Vom christlichen Sinn des Deutschen Idealismus (Gotha, 1924); Der christliche Aktivismus Nordamerikas in der Gegenwart (Giessen, 1925); Der Erlöser (Leipzig, 1927); Die Offenbarung (Leipzig, 1928); Schöpfung (Leipzig, 1930).   H.H.

Bornholmians: (from the Danish island, Bornholm) Influenced by the revivalist movement of the mid-nineteenth century in Sweden, under Hedberg and Rosenius*, followers of these men on the island of Bornholm around 1860 joined a group headed by a Bornholm preacher, P. L. Trandberg. Emphasis was on the free gift of grace independent of man's condition. Trandberg broke with state church but he gradually lost leadership Other lay preachers carried Rosenian doctrines into Denmark and Slesvig, and the name Bornholmians also used indiscriminately of revival followers. The movement gradually tended to merge with the Danish Inner Mission.   C.J.B.

Bossuet, Jacques Bénigne: (1627-1704) Bishop, orator, controversialist, ascetic writer, and philosopher of history; born in Dijon, educated there by Jesuits, ordained a priest in 1652, and after seven years went to Paris and gave his whole time to preaching; in bitter controversy against Fénelon on Quietism.   L.R.W.

Bouglé, Celestin Charles Alfred: (1870-1940) Rejecting the economic, familial and racial theories as unsatisfactory in explaining the origin of the Hindu caste system, he attempted to correlate religion with a political and social system. He maintained also that a moral code can never become pure and wholly responsive to the needs of a changing society unless it grows dissociated from the special sanctions of religion.

C. C. A Bouglé, Essai sur le régime des castes (Paris, 1908), The Evolution of Values (1926).   H.H.

Bourdaloue, Louis: (1632-1704) French Jesuit and pulpit orator. His influence was due to his saintly character and to the simplicity and coherence of his sermons, which appealed to all classes.   E.A.R.

bourgeoisie: A name for the middle class, originally expressing the superior or patronizing but not wholly unkind attitude of a feudal aristocracy toward the supposedly somewhat vulgar manners and pursuits of shopkeepers and business people generally. It was appropriated by the Marxian socialists or communists to designate the employing group to which they attribute certain crafty, calculating and oppressive tactics. In this sense it carries considerable bitterness of feeling and revolutionary intentions. The term is not frequently heard in America, perhaps because of its foreign sound and because in the absence of a feudal heritage it has less significance. Americans pride themselves upon their social capillarity and still dislike class distinctions. But some accounts of the ruthlessness and buccaneering methods of our captains of industry and of the materialism and cultural deficiencies of "Main Street" suggest the same critical attitude. Cf. capitalism; proletariat.
H W. Laidler, A History of Socialist Thought (1927), ch. xiv and pp. 484 ff ; W. Sombart Quintessence of Capitalism, trans. (1915) ; Cf. Charles and Mary Beard, The Rise of American Civilization (1927), vol. ii, ch. xx and xxv.   W.B.C.

Bourignon, Mme. Antoinette: (1616-1680) French mystic of the school of Quietism.*   V.F.

Bousset, Johann Franz Wilhelm: (1865-1920) He taught at the universities of Göttingen and Giessen. With Hermann Gunkel* he was a leader of the religious-historical theological group of scholars. With brilliant investigations he shed light upon the whole N.T. and the early centuries of the history of the Christian church.
Jesu Predigt im Gegensatz zum Judentum (Göttingen, 1892) ; Der Antichrist in der Überlieferung des Judentums. des Neuen Testaments und der alten Kirche (Göttingen. 1895) ; Kommentar zur johannischen Apokalypse (Göttingen, 1896, 2 ed., Göttingen, 1906) ; Die Religion des Judentums im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter (Berlin, 1903, 3 ed., by H. Gressmann, Tubingen, 1926) ; Kyrios Christos. Geschichte des Christenglaubens von den Anfängen des Christentums bis auf Irenäus (Gottingen, 1913, 2 ed. by G. Kruger und R. Bultmann, Göttingen, 1921, 4 ed., Göttingen, 1935) ; Das Wesen der Religion (Halle, 1903, 4 ed., Tübingen, 1920) , Jesus (Halle, 1904, 4 ed., Tübingen, 1927).   H.H.

Boutroux, Emile: (1845-1921) Was the eminent teacher of the history of philosophy at the Ecole Normale Superieure and at the Sorbonne. His works have proved a potent stimulus to the movement which aims at a criticism of exact science. They were a continuation of that spiritual metaphysical philosophy whose pioneers were Biran*, Ravaisson and Lachelier. For him the basic reality is freedom. There are stages of freedom in nature. Whatever happens, happens freely, and is the expression of an eternally creative activity, of cosmic consciousness and cosmic reason. The laws of nature have no absolute existence, no iron necessity. Religion being the soul of Boutroux's philosophy, he lays stress upon the free creative power of the deity as immanent God. God is the perfect being of supreme goodness and beauty. Religion must show man that the supreme ideal is for him to realize in his own nature the idea of God. Religion, not being a matter of blind faith, it must necessarily be intellectually satisfying.

De la contingence des lois de la nature (Paris, 1874), Pascal (Manchester, Eng., 1902), Science and religion in contemporary philosophy (London, 1909), Historical studies in philosophy (London, 1912), Education and ethics (London, 1913), Natural law in science and philosophy (London, 1914); Morale et religion (Paris, 1925); Schyns, M., La philosophie d'Emile Boutroux (Paris, 1924).   H.H.

Bouvier, Ami Auguste Oscar: (1826-1893) A Genevese theologian for whom the personality of God is a great hypothesis and which it is necessary to verify by speculation. Whenever he speaks the language of piety his explanations of God are personal. When he speaks the language of philosophical speculation his explanations of God are impersonal. In the description of the divine attributes he frequently slips into an immanentism in which the spirit of the world, of man and of God are identical. Bouvier is opposed to the traditional formulas of the doctrine of trinity. He conceives the trinity as consisting of three successive states, levels, or phases of the divine life: an expression of an evolution of God. God is an absolute personality. The personal state precedes the impersonal state in the divine order. Jesus is a relative personality, the exclusive subject of the religious realm. The Holy Spirit is impersonal. He constantly speaks of divine paternity both in terms of philosophical speculation and also of the Christian who knows, having experienced the religious realities of his profound intuitions.

Dogmatique chréttenne (Paris, 1903).   H.H.

Bovet, Pierre: (1878-) He is co-founder with E. Claparede of the Institute de Jean Jacques Rousseau in Geneva, Switzerland. He interprets moral, social and religious forms of life as a sublimation of the fighting and sexual instincts. Moreover, the religious sentiment is an alteration of filial love, the projection upon divinity of the attributes that children confer upon those whom they cherish.

Le dieu de Platon (Geneve et Paris, 1908), Fighting Instinct (London, 1923); The child's religion; a study of the development of the religious sentiment (1928).   H.H.

Bovon, Jules: (1852-1904) A native of Vaud, French Switzerland, he was professor of theology at the University of Lausanne.

God as an infinite personality is infinite in respect to the physical phenomena, and personal from the point of view of spiritual life. The divine personality is obtained by analogy with an incomplete description of human personality. As Heavenly Father God is personal, and as principle of the universe He is infinite. Bovon distinguishes two kinds of divine attributes. The metaphysical attributes picture God as infinite, beyond all our efforts to comprehend him. The personal attributes picture God as resembling us.

Dogmatique chréttenne (Lausanne, 1895)   H.H.

Bowne, Borden Parker: (1847-1910) Born at Leonardville, New Jersey. After graduation from New York University in 1871, he pursued further studies in Paris, Halle, and Gottingen. Martin (of New York), Ulrici and Lotze were his chief teachers. His first book, The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer (1874), a penetrating critique, was published while Bowne was still a student at Halle. In 1875 he was on the editorial staff of the Independent. In 1876 he was called to Boston University, where he remained as professor of philosophy, and from 1888 on, as Dean of the Graduate School, until his death. He developed an independent form of Lotzean idealism, which he called Kantianized Berkeleianism, transcendental empiricism, and personalism*. He trained many teachers of philosophy and theology, and exerted a liberalizing influence on religious thought and philosophy of science.

See F. J. McConnell, Borden Parker Bowne (1929). His chief works are The Principles of Ethics (1892), The Theory of Thought and Knowledge (1897), Metaphysics (2nd ed., 1898), Theism (1902), Personalism (1908), Studies in Christianity (1909), and Kant and Spencer (posthumous, 1912).   E.S.B.

Boyle, Robert: (1627-1691) Regarding atomism as an instrument of method, not as a philosophical theory of the universe, Boyle held that the facts of human reason and intelligence, of order, beauty and adaptation in the universe at large, point to an intelligent creator and designer, who initiated motion. He was eager that others might undertake the work of science in the worshipful spirit of religion.

T. Birch, The Works of the Honourable Robert Boyle. 6 vols. (London, 1672); J Meier, Robert Boyles Naturphilosophie (München, 1907); S Mendelsohn, Robert Boyle als Naturphilosoph (Würzburg, 1902); L. T. More, Life and Works of Robert Boyle (1942).   H.H.

Bradley, Francis Herbert: (1846-1924) Prevented by ill-health from assuming the duties of an academic career, Bradley spent the greater part of his life in seclusion as a research fellow of Merton College at Oxford, England. As an acute dialectician and objective idealist he waged war on contemporary naturalism and the British empirical and utilitarian tradition. As he had the wit to see that the Absolute cannot serve as an object of religious worship, God cannot be the all-inclusive absolute. God must be finite. As such He is not the whole; but He is limited by that in the Absolute which is external to God. Although religion needs the peace that only an Absolute can give; yet the only God religion can have is heroic, finite and unsatisfying. See neo-Hegelianism.

Appearance and Reality (London, 1914); Essays on Truth and Reality (Oxford, 1914); C. A. Campbell, Scepticism and construction; Bradley's sceptical principle as the basis of constructive philosophy (London, 1931); H. Rashdall, The Metaphysic of F. H. Brad- ley (London, 1912) ; R G. Ross, Scepticism and dogma; a study in the philosophy of F. H. Bradley (1940) ; T. K. Segerstedt, Value and reality in Bradley's philosophy (Lund, 1934).   H.H.

Bradwardine, Thomas: (ca. 1300-1349) English mathematician, theologian and prelate. By a conversion experience he became a high predestinarian. His De Causa Dei contra Pelagium influenced Wyclif and many others. He died of plague immediately after his appointment as archbishop of Canterbury.   J.T.M.

Brahmā: A personal creator god, one of the great Hindu trimurti, Brahmā, Vishnu and Shiva. He is of comparatively little importance as a cult figure It is said that there is but one temple to him in all India. The neuter Brahman, on the other hand, of which he is the personalized form, plays a major role in philosophic Hinduism*.
                                                                          C.S.B.

Brāhman: Signifying only prayer or the prayer spell in the Rig-Veda, the term came to represent the power behind that spell and finally in the Upanishads it came to stand for the ultimate world-ground or reality. Brāhman is absolute, impersonal, and ultimately indescribable, "neti, neti", "not that, not that," as one of the Upanishads declares. Identified with Atman in the Brahman-Atman equation, Brahman-Atman became the monistic, or as some scholars prefer, the pantheistic world soul which informs Hinduism as a whole, and particularly its more intellectual expressions. All the gods, Brahmā the creator, Vishnu, Shiva, Krishna and even the lesser deities of popular religion may be assimilated to Brāhman as personal manifestations of a reality which is itself impersonal or super-personal.
   Brāhman is also the name of the highest caste in India. (Spelled also as caste designation Brāhmin.)
   See atman, also Hinduism—gods P. Deussen, Philosophy of the Upanishads (1906) ; S. Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy, Vol. I., (1923) ; S. Dasgupta, History of Indian Philosophy, (1922, 1932, 1940).
                                                                          C.S.B.

Brāhmanas: Hindu priestly writings attached to the Vedas* and produced probably sometime between 800 and 600 B.C. which reflect the increasing complexity of the Vedic ritual. They contain directions for the sacrifices and purport to explain the significance of the ritual. Infinitely detailed and repetitious, they are dull and uninteresting in the extreme, yet they also contain not a little mythological lore and theological speculation. They represent a transition stage between Vedic religion and the rise of philosophic Hinduism*.   C.S.B.

Brahmanaspati: Literally Lord of prayer. An abstract Vedic deity closely related both to Indra and Agni*, the apotheosis of the mysterious power that is in Brāhman*, or the prayer spell.   C.S.B.

Brahmanism: See Hinduism.

Brahma Samaj: A modern eclectic reform movement in Hinduism founded by Ram Mohan Roy* in 1828, called first Brahma Sabha, but soon afterward changed to the Brahma Samaj. The founder, a wealthy Indian who had been one of the earliest students of comparative religions, was much influenced by Islam toward a monotheistic view of God, and by Christianity in its Unitarian form. Associated with him was Dwarka Nath Tagore, grandfather of the poet Rabindra Nath Tagore, while the poet's father Debendra Nath Tagore was one of its most distinguished leaders. Another prominent figure of the movement was Keshub Chunder Sen who, more deeply influenced by Christianity than the rest, formed in 1881 the Church of the New Dispensation, one of the several sects into which the society has divided. The chief emphasis of the Samaj as a whole has been on the non-idolatrous worship of but one god, the practice of congregational worship, and the furtherance of moral reform largely in accord with Christian ethics, of which it has been one of the most influential exponents in modern India. Never a numerous body, it has nevertheless, because of the quality of its membership, exercised a profound influence on Indian religion and life. According to the last census (1931) there were 5,378 members of the Society, a substantial decline from the 1921 census report of 6,388.

   Related movements which were either sects of, or outgrowths of the Brahma Samaj are the Prarthana Samaj (literally prayer society) with headquarters in Bombay, the Adi Brahma Samaj, or the original Brahma Samaj, the Brahma Samaj of India (Bharatvarshiya Brahma Samaj), The New Dispensation Church, or Nava Vidhan, and the Sadharan Brahma Samaj.
   Manilal C Parekh, The Brahma Samaj, A Short History, Rajkot, Kathiawad, India (1929) , J. N. Farquhar, Modern Religious Movements in India (1918).   C.S.B.

Breeches Bible: The popular name given to the Geneva Bible* because of the fact that in Genesis 3·7 it says that Adam and Eve "Made themselves breeches."   W.S.H.

Brentano, Franz: (1838-1917) Taught at Würzburg and Vienna, for a time (1862-66) member of a Dominican convent, later a leader of the liberal party in the Church, he finally (1873) resigned his priesthood. His first published work was on Aristotle. He became a founder of the "act" psychology which, opposed to the "content" psychology of Wundt, described all mental life as activity, experience as a way of acting rather than a body of content. A psychical act implies an object since it always points at one or "intends" it. To love is to love an object, to judge is to judge concerning an object. It is the task of psychology to discover what this pointing at objects or "intending" them means. Brentano is noted for his personal courage and honesty as well as his psychological insight. He had a great influence on his two most famous pupils, Stumpf and Husserl, and, through the latter, on the phenomenologists, especially Scheler and Hartmann. See psychology, schools of.
   Chief Works· Vom Dasein Gottes (1868) ; Psychologie vom empirischen Standpunkt (1874) ; Vom Ursprung sittlicher Erkenntnis (1884) ; Über die Zukunft der Philosophie (1893) ; Von der Klassifikation der psychischen Phänomene (1911).   J.S.B.

Brethren Church ("Progressive"): See Dunkers.

Brethren, Church of the ("Conservative"): See Dunkers.

Brethren of the Common Life: A modified monastic order without vows which was founded during the fourteenth century by Gerard Groote* and Florentius Radewijns. It consisted of both Brotherhoods and Sisterhoods and it included both lay and clerical members. The principal aim was to secure a revival of practical personal religion and its members were deeply devoted to the cause of education. See Albert Hyma, The Christian Renaissance (1924). See Imitation of Christ.
W.S.H.

Brethren in Christ: See River Brethren.

Brethren, German Baptist: See Dunkers.

Brethren, United: See United Brethren.

Bretschneider, Karl Gottlieb: (1776-1848) He was general church superintendent in Gotha. Many-sidedly productive, he wrote a systematic survey on the dogmatics of German Protestantism which is today still indispensable. Notwithstanding the all-determining concept of revelation, he never transcended the orthodox intellectualism of the Enlightenment.
Handbuch der Dogmatik der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche, 2 vols (Leipzig, 1814, 4 ed., Leipzig, 1838); Systematische Entwickelung aller in der Dogmatik vorkommenden Begriffe nach den symbolischen Schriften der evangelisch-lutherischen und reformierten Kirche und den wichtigsten dogmatischen Lehrbüchern ihrer Theologen (Leipzig, 1804, 4 ed., Leipzig, 1841).
H.H.

Breviary: (Lat., breviarium, abridgement or compendium) The book containing the psalms, hymns, lections, prayers, etc., of the Divine Office*, according to the Roman rite. Usually printed in four volumes for the four seasons of the year. Prior to the 12th and 13th centuries the material now included in the Breviary was contained in several books arranged for the various persons participating in the Choir Office. See Hours.
P.V.N.

Brewster, William: (c. 1560-1644, known as "Elder Brewster") Was the leader of the Pilgrims who came over in the Mayflower in 1620. He was born at Scrooby in Nottinghamshire and studied for a time at Cambridge. About 1587 he settled in Scrooby Manor House where he held the position of "post" entertaining travellers, attending to the mails, etc. It was in this house that the Separatists* held their services. Brewster removed to Holland in 1608 and engaged in the publication of puritan* literature. In 1619 he secured a patent from the Virginia Company for a tract of land in America. He was the leader and Ruling Elder of the Plymouth Colony till his death and was their Teacher and Preacher till 1629; but owing to his lack of ordination did not administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. His Memoirs of Elder Brewster are a valuable source. See Congregationalism.
Dictionary of Am. Biography v 3, p 29; Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, v. 2, p 264.
F.T P.

Bridel, Philippe: (1852-) Professor of theology at the University of Lausanne, Switzerland. The theses of his thought are The notion of a personal God represents above all a reaction against the spiritual dangers of pantheism. The human terms as applied to God are inadequate and relative. Divine paternity is in fact the essential character of God, the attribute by which we are able to learn something of His nature. Rather than philosophy, so attractive to the magic of present-day gnosticism, Bridel prefers the revelation of the Heavenly Father in Jesus Christ.
L'humanité et son chef, essais d'apologétique et de morale chrétiennes (Lausanne, 1925); Clerc, C., Portrait de Philippe Bridel (Lausanne, 1938).
H.H.

Bridget, Saint: See Birgitta, Saint.

Bridget, Saint: (452-523) A daughter of a prince of Ulster, Ireland She spent her life in seclusion, in a cell on a site believed to be the modern Kildare. Her remains finally placed beside bodies of St. Patrick and St. Columba. In England and Scotland her legends are associated with the name of St. Bride. Her feast day is February 1.
C.J.B.

Bridgewater Treatises: Eight treatises "on the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation," published in the years 1833-36 with funds provided by the will of the eighth earl of Bridgewater.
W.S.H.

brief: (Latin, breve, short) A bull is a papal or royal document addressed to some group, the bull or bulla being its leaden seal, the Brief is a simpler and less formal letter. See bulls, papal.
L.R.W.

Briggs, Charles Augustus: (1841-1913) Semitics scholar and author of numerous monographs and books upon the Old Testament. Founder and American editor of International Theological Library and International Critical Commentary. Defender of the theory of the Virgin Birth of Jesus. Professor at the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, 1874-1913. Tried for heresy by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, 1892, and suspended from the Presbyterian ministry, he was ordained by the Protestant Episcopal Church, 1898. See A. C. McGiffert and H. P. Smith.
C.H.M.

Brigittines: Nuns of the Order of St. Savior, founded by St. Bridget* of Sweden in 1344. The Order is contemplative, and observes strict enclosure. The nuns devote themselves to prayer for the souls in Purgatory*, and engage in literary work of a religious and devotional nature.
C.V.

Brihaspati: Literally "lord of speech". One of the abstract deities which appear in late Vedic* literature. Closely related to Agni*.
C.S.B.

Brinsers: See River Brethren.

British Council of Churches: Formed in 1942, this federation unites the major church bodies of Great Britain and Ireland (except Roman Catholic) for conference and cooperation.   E.R.H.

British Moralists: British Moralists of the 18th century, mark an important step in the history of Ethics*. They confined themselves almost entirely to empirical and rational methods, and thereby made ethics an autonomous discipline, no longer subordinate to revealed religion and theology. These latter they did not usually attack. Important names are· Anthony Ashley Cooper, third Earl of Shaftesbury (usually known as Shaftesbury) 1671-1713, Francis Hutcheson, 1694-1746, Joseph Butler, 1692-1752, William Paley, 1743-1805, Richard Price, 1723-1791; William Wollaston, 1659-1724, David Hume, 1711-1776; Adam Smith, 1723-1790.
    Cf. British Moralists, edited by L. A. Selby-Bigge, 2 vols. (1897).   w.k.w.

Broad Churchmen: The term was first used about 1850 to describe those Anglicans for whom comprehensiveness was the outstanding characteristic of the Church of England*. It is a simplification of the 18th century term Latitudinarian*, and the tradition goes back to the desire of the Cambridge Platonists* and others to get away from the harshness of 17th century controversies. Erasmus' stay in England enables Broad Churchmen to claim a pre-Reformation precedent as well. For some Latitudinarians liberal principles were a cloak for indifference, often combined with an unedifying struggle for preferment. Others did good service in defending the main principles of theism and Christian ethics, though less interested in positive theology, most of them desired the Church to be as broadly national as possible, paying little attention to its specific traditions. Thomas Arnold (1795-1842), headmaster of Rugby, brought a zeal for personal righteousness into liberal churchmanship as well as into English education. The Broad Churchmen of the 1850's were largely pupils or admirers of Arnold, the movement rose to prominence in the Church when A. P. Stanley became Dean of Westminster (1864-1881) and A. C. Tait Archbishop of Canterbury (1868-1881). Such men added to the tolerant Broad Church spirit something of the Catholic sense of the historic and corporate and the Evangelical emphasis on personal religion. Broad Churchmanship was attacked in the condemnation of Essays and Reviews by Convocation, but won a victory in the relaxation of the subscription required of the clergy in 1865. An analogous movement in America was in origin largely a reaction against Evangelical Calvinism (Latitudinarianism had influenced the Proposed American Prayer Book of 1785, but did not survive); the preaching of Phillips Brooks (died 1893) gave it great influence in the Episcopal Church. In England Broad Churchmanship was further advanced by the Biblical and historical scholars of the Cambridge School (Lightfoot, Westcott, and Hort). Since about 1900 it has been in part replaced by a definite Modernism, in part fused with the comprehensive central churchmanship of modern Anglicanism.
    N Sykes, Church and State in England in the XVIII Century (1934) ; L. E Binns, Religion in the Victorian Era (1936).   E.R.H

Broadus, John A.: (1827-1895) Baptist minister, New Testament scholar, president Louisville Theological Seminary, delivered Lyman Beecher Lectures at Yale.   C.H M.

Brook Farm (Mass.) community: See communistic settlements, secular; social gospel.

Brooke, Stopford Augustus: (1832-1916) Writer and preacher, born in County Donegal, Ireland, priest of the Church of England and a chaplain to the Queen, left the Church of England in 1880 and became an independent churchman of Unitarian sympathies. Author of books and plays, including a collection of Irish poetry with introduction.   W.N.P.

Brorson, Hans Adolf: (1694-1764) Brorson, one of Denmark's three great hymnodists (see Kingo, Grundtvig). Ordained 1722, he served as parish priest and after 1741 as bishop. Especially successful as writer of Christmas hymns, all his verse is marked by pietistic sincerity and simple beauty, as well as unusual singability.   C.J.B.

Bross Foundation, The: Established by William Bross in 1879 at the Lake Forest College, Lake Forest, Illinois, this memorial lectureship was founded "to call out the best efforts of the highest talent and the ripest scholarship of the world" and to reward more generously those who make significant contributions to Christian thought. The donor's plan was to produce a continuing series of books by means of competitions and by publication of lectures at Lake Forest. Since its inception the Foundation has presented eleven series of lectures ranging over a wide variety of subjects. The capital sum of $40,000 was completed in 1890. Among the distinctive volumes associated with the name of this Foundation are:
    J. A. Thomson, The Bible of Nature (1907) , Josiah Royce, Sources of Religious Insight (1911) ; D. C. Macintosh, The Reasonableness of Christianity (1925) ; and H. F. Rall, Christianity (1941) (Data from the Office of the Acting President of Lake Forest College.)   V.F

Brothers of Christ: See Christadelphians.

Brothers of the Common Life: See Brethren of the Common Life.

Browne, Robert (1550-1633) and Brownism: Brown was born at Tolethorpe near Stamford, England, and was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He gathered a dissenting congregation at Norwich and for his denunciation of Episcopacy was imprisoned in 1581 and escaped to Middleburg in Holland the following year. Here he produced his famous Reformation without Tarrying for Any and his Free Christians in which he set forth his theory of Congregational Indepen-dency. (See Independency) He recanted his Separatist* views, was ordained to the Anglican priesthood in 1591 and was rector of Ashchurch-cum-Thorpe for the remaining forty-two years of his life. His changed views were set forth in his Reproof of Certain Schismatical Persons and their Doctrine concerning the Teaching and Hearing of the Word of God, (1587-1588).

Brown considered a church to be a body of believers united by a voluntary covenant, choosing its own officers and owning allegiance to Christ only. Each church is absolutely independent in government, discipline and the choice of its officers. This system is strongly opposed to the union of church and state and contains in germ at least, the Congregational principle of fellowship. See Congregationalism.

W. Walker, A History of the Congregational Churches in the U. S. (1894) ; G. G. Atkins & F. L.
Fagley, History of American Congregationalism
(1942) Schaff - Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, v. 2, p. 279.   F.T.P.

Browne, Sir Thomas: (1605-1682) English prose writer. By profession a physician, Browne brought to his meditations on religion an innate mysticism qualified by the eclecticism of studies at Oxford, Montpellier, Padua, and Leyden. His most notable work, Religio Medici (1643), is at once a confession of faith and a collection of curiously compounded opinions. Among his other writings are Pseudodoxia Epidemica (1646), better known as Vulgar Errors, and Urn Burial (1658).   L.W.C.

brownie: See fairy.

Browning, Robert: (1812-1899) English poet and dramatist. Religious in training (English Dissent) and conviction, Robert Browning became one of the most discerning and vital modern interpreters of Christianity through the medium of poetry. In "Cleon," "Imperante Augusto," and "A Strange Epistle" he made vivid and real the Jesus of history; while in "Christmas Eve," "Easter Day" and "A Death in the Desert" he gave a lucid and profound interpretation of the spiritual meaning of incarnation and revelation.

The reality and power of a future life received fresh and impressive affirmation in "Saul," "Evelyn Hope" and "Prospice," and the too far obsolescent doctrine of providence* gained a unique and suggestive revalescence in "Ferishtah's Fancies." Browning was one of the first to grasp the spiritual meaning in evolution, and in "Paracelsus" and other poems he gave to us the law of development a strikingly humanistic and Christian construction.

Browning is par excellence the poet of the development of the soul—which appeared to him to be the one thing of supreme interest. In "Rabbi Ben Ezra," "The Ring and the Book," "One Word More," the dramas, Bishop Blougram and many other poems, his portraiture of character is remarkable for sympathetic understanding and deft delineation.

His Christian optimism and confidence in spiritual values as expressed in "Pippa Passes," "Abt Vogler," "The Grammarian's Funeral," "Love

Among the Ruins," "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came" are ardent and appealing and should prove greatly enheartening in rebuilding a shattered civilization.   J.W.B.

Bruederhof (Huterite) communities: See communistic settlements, religious; Mennonites.

Brunner, Emil: Protestant theologian. Born 1889, Winterthur, Switzerland. Since 1924 professor of Systematic Theology in Zurich, Switzerland. 1938-39 guest professor, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J. The clearest and most systematic thinker of the school of Dialectical Theology. (See Dialectic.) Opposed to Schleiermacher and 'Erlebnis' theology as much as to theological intellectualism his theology places the person of Jesus Christ into its center and interprets his work in classical terms. But theology to Brunner is subservient to living religion. He simplifies orthodoxy by eliminating all topics that in his view have no bearing on spiritual life (Virgin Birth, most of the N.T. miracle tales). Moreover, unlike his more aggressive friends he shows a tendency to conciliate theology and the modern mind. His system of ethics is an interesting combination of Kant's criticism with the realism of the Bible and modern Lutheranism. He is an independent supporter of the Oxford Group Movement*. See Barth, Karl.

Works: Die Mystik und das Wort (Tübingen, 1924, 2nd ed. 1928) ; (Criticism of Schleiermacher) ; Der Mittler (Tübingen, 1927), Engl. tr. The Mediator: A study of the central doctrine of the Christian faith (London, 1934) ; Religions philosophie evangel-ischer Theologie (München, 1927), Engl. tr. The Philosophy of Religion from the Standpoint of Protestant Theology (London, 1937) ; The Theology of Crisis (1929) ; The Word and the World (London, 1931) ; Das Gebot und die Ordnungen (Tubingen, 1932), Engl. tr. The Divine Imperative: A study in Christian ethics (1937) ; Natur und Gnade. Zum Gespräch mit Karl Barth (Tubingen, 1934, 2nd ed.
1935) ; Our Faith (1936) , God and Man: Four essays on the nature of personality (London, 1936) ;
The Church and the Oxford Group (1937) ; Der Mensch im Widerspruch (1937), Engl. tr. *Man in Revolt:
A Christian Anthropology* (1939) ; Wahrheit als Begegnung (Berlin, 1938) ; Offenbarung und Vern-unft. Die Lehre von der christlichen Glaubenserkenntnis (Zürich, 1942).   O.A.P.

Bruno, Giordano: (1548-1600) Neapolitan insurgent who began his career a Dominican, was forced by his ardent and imaginative nature, by his adherence to Copernican theory, and by his anti-Aristotelianism, into constant friction with the Church. He was finally burned at the stake, convinced that the Church should not dictate truth.

Essentially an inconsistent rationalist, Bruno changed from pantheism to a deterministic system in which graded animate monads were given some independence from the "informing" Source. The transcendent God is known by faith, but the immanent is reflected in myriad animate unities which constitute reality. Bruno especially influenced Spinoza, Leibniz, Descartes, and Schelling.

Della Causa (1584) ; Del Infinito (1584) ; Spaccio della Bestia Trionfante (1584).   P.A.B.

Brunschvicg, Léon: (1869-) He is the leading champion of the French school of critical idealism.

Reality is for him a part of the mind's inner development, a plastic product of the spirit. To know is to impose on objectivity the forms of subjectivity. Man's true progress is towards the form of inwardness. Science in adding nothing to naive experience, transforms it. Philosophy in adding nothing to the increase of human knowledge only reflects about it. Brunschvicg develops a rational humanism, stressing the immanent conception of God. He rejects an anthropomorphism which projects the human soul into things and God Himself.

La modalité du judgement (Paris, 1894), Les étapes de la philosophie mathématique (Paris, 1912); L'idéalisme contemporain (Paris, 1905); Nature et liberté (Paris, 1921), L'expérience humaine et la causalité physique (Paris, 1923); Le progrés de la conscience dans la philosophie occidentale (Paris, 1927)

Spinoza 2 ed. (Paris, 1906); Oeuvres de Blaise Pascal 11 vols (Paris, 1903-1914); Spinoza et ses contemporains 3 ed (Paris. 1923); Le génie de Pascal (Paris, 1924); Pascal (Paris, 1932); "De la vraie et de la fausse conversions", Revue de Metaphysique et de Morale (Paris, 1930, 1931, 1932); De la Connaisance de soi (Paris, 1931).

Pierre Boutroux et Félix Gazier were coeditors with Brunschvicg of the Oeuvres de Blaise Pascal.

                              H.H.

Bucer, Martin: (1491-1551) Protestant Reformer. While minister at Strasbourg he earnestly sought for a formula to reconcile Protestant views of the Lord's Supper. He became a professor at Cambridge, and was influential in English theological life. See Tetrapolitan Confession.

                              G.R.C.

Buchanan, George: (1506-1582) The Scottish poet and scholar who in his revolutionary De jure regni apud Scotos (1579) placed central stress upon the right to resist. Outspoken in justifying tyrannicide*, he argued that power is derived from the community and must therefore be exercised in accordance with the law of the community.

J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, 1928); J. N. Figgis, "Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century" Cambridge Modern History, vol. III (1904).   H.H.

Buchmanism: See Oxford Group.

Budde, Karl: (1850-1935) Professor of O.T. for thirty-five years at Marburg, scholar, commentator, Orientalist, theologian, and prolific writer; one of the great masters of biblical studies.   R.E.W.

Buddha, Gotama: See Buddhist Terminology.

Buddhahood: See Buddhist Terminology.

Buddha-Mind School: See Meditation School.

                              W.T.C.

Buddhism: See Buddhist Terminology.

BUDDHIST TERMINOLOGY:

Abhidharmakośa School: Idem   Kośa School*.

Amita: (Skr. immeasurable, Chin. A-mi-t'o, Jap. Amida) According to the smaller Sukhāvatī-vyūha Sutra, Amita is so named because "His light is boundless, penetrating without impediment the ten quarters," and because "His life and the life of his people is boundless in countless length of time." Thus he is Amitābha, the Buddha of Infinite Light (space), and also Amitāyus, the Buddha of Infinite Life (time), corresponding respectively to the Law-body and the Enjoyment-body of the Buddha, and representing Buddha's Perfect Enlightenment and ideal Buddahood. In the Mystical School, he is also the King of Sweet Dew (Amrta), the Transformation-body.

Buddhist scriptures call this most popular deity by many names. The larger Sukhāvatī-vyūha gives thirteen. Various schools interpret him differently. In the T'ien-t'ai and Mystical Schools, he is one of the five Wisdom-Buddhas. As such, he is the Buddha of the West in the Mystical School, called Amitāyus in the Realm of "Matrix Repository" and Amitābha in the Realm of "Diamond Element," thus in a sense identical with the Great Sun Buddha in the center. In other schools, he is considered the ninth son of Mahābhijñā Jñānabhidhu, the Great Buddha of Supreme Penetration and Wisdom. Avalokiteśvara is often regarded as one of his incarnations. He appears in various combinations in the Buddhist Triad*, usually in the center, with Avalokiteśvara, the embodiment of mercy, on the left, and Mahasthamprata, the embodiment of wisdom, on the right. He is usually in the standing position, on the lotus throne, with long ears symbolizing wisdom, a white curl on the forehead indicating his manifest teaching, and a long arm to guide and welcome people In the group of five, Kshitigarbha and Nāgārjuna are added.

Specifically Amita is the object of devotion in the Pure Land School*, who, as the Lord of the Western Quarters, welcomes all faithful to the Pure Land (Sukhāvatī) where they will eventually become Buddhas. When he was a bodhisattva he made forty-eight vows, promising not to attain Buddhahood until all people are saved. His Pure Land, fully described in the Sukhāvatī texts, is to many devout Buddhists the final abode of life, although strictly speaking it is but a stage towards Nirvāna.

araham (Pāli), arhat (Skr.), lohan (Chin.), arakan (Jap.): One "who has removed worldly attachments," or "who is worthy to receive alms." The Worthy One or saint of Hīnayāna, who has attained self-salvation instead of universal salvation sought by the bodhisattva* of Mahāyāna. There are two, three, six, seven, and nine kinds of arhat, according to various ways of moral and religious endeavour, and there are groups of sixteen, eighteen, and 500 supposedly appointed by the Buddha to save the world. To attain arhatship, a follower goes through the Four Paths and enjoys the Four Fruits· 1) Entering the Stream (sotāpanna). He is free from the first three of the Ten Fetters, namely, the delusion of self, doubt, and the belief in the efficacy of ceremonials, and has joined the movement of the holy ones, never to be born in the Realms of Hells, Animals, and "Hungry ghosts." 2) The Once-Returner (sakadāgāmın). He is rid of two additional Fetters of the delusion of the sense and ill-will, and will return to be born on earth only once more. 3) The Non-Returner (anāgāmın). He is free from the Fetters of attachment to life on earth (Realm of Form) and the desire for future life (Formless Realm), and will never be born again in any realm of desires. 4) The arhat. He is free from the last three Fetters of pride, self-righteousness, and ignorance, and will never suffer rebirth. See vehicles.

Asaṅga: (c. 410-500?) Founder of the Buddhist Idealistic School* in India. See Vasubandhu.

Aśoka: Indian king who united India and reigned c. 240 B.C. Converted to Buddhism, he spread Buddhism over India, made it known from the borders of China to Macedonia and Egypt, took many religious tours himself throughout India, probably sent his son to promulgate Buddhism in Ceylon, and erected many Rock-Edicts to teach Buddhist morality. He was chiefly interested in morality. Because of this he retained his respect for non-Buddhist religions.

Aśvaghosha: (c. 100 A.D.) a) A learned Brahmin converted to Buddhism, the author of Buddha-carita, Eng. tr. by S. Beal, The Fo-Sho-Hıng-Tsan-Kıng, a Life of Buddha (1879), Mahāyāna-śraddhotpada, Eng. tr. by D. T. Suzuki, Aśvoghosha's Discourses or the Awakening of Faith in the Mahāyāna (1900); and by T Richard & Yang Wen-hwuı, The Awakening of Faith in the Mahāyāna Doctrine (1894), and other works. He accepted the doctrines of ālaya-consciousness and thusness*, and laid the foundation of Mahāyāna. His authorship of the Mahayana-śraddhotpāda is not accepted by some scholars. b) Names of several other Indian teachers.

Avalokiteśvara: (Skr.) The most widely revered bodhisattva* in the Far East, especially in the T'ien-t'ai, Mystical, and Meditation (Zen) Schools. He is the embodiment of mercy and compassion. He goes through much suffering, assumes various forms of a Buddha, an arhat, and even an animal, and goes everywhere, including heavens and hells, to save all beings who hear his name or bear it in mind, to free them from pain and evil passions, to bestow on them offsprings and other blessings, and to lead them to the Pure Land of Amita*. According to the 25th chapter of the Lotus Sūtra (Chin. trans. 406 A.D.) which is entirely devoted to him, he appears in thirty-three transformations to suit his audience in teaching the Doctrine.

"Avalokiteśvara," taken as avalokita-īśvara, means either "the Lord of avalokıta (to look at)" or "the Lord who is avalokita," and is generally interpreted as the Lord Who Is Seen, but may denote the Lord of What We See (the present world) or the Lord Who Looks. Hsuan-tsang (596-664) correctly understood its meaning when he translated it as Kuan-tzŭ-tsai (see-self-exist).

The earlier translation as Kwan-yin (Chin.) or Kwannon (Jap.) meaning "seeing the sound," from avalokıtaśvara, is definitely wrong.

Avalokiteśvara was worshipped in India from the third to the twelfth century, became popular in China in the eighth. In Tibet, the Dalai Lāma is believed to be his incarnation. As he possesses many aspects of Hindu gods, especially Śiva, he is probably a development of Indian bhakts (devotion). Efforts have been made, however, to connect him with Sumana of Ceylon, Istar of Babylon, Apollo Patareus of Asia Minor, Suñ worship, and many others. Certainly, he attained eminence when Buddha worship was extended to bodhisattva worship. Significantly he is the attendant of Amita.

The feminine form of Avalokiteśvara (Goddess of Mercy) is peculiar to China and Japan, and did not appear in China until the eleventh century. In China he became identified with Miao-shan, who, according to the vulgar story invented by an ignorant monk in the Yuan dynasty (1280-1368), was a young (mıao) and virtuous (shan) girl who vowed to serve the Buddha, fled to a nunnery when her father forced her to marry, was killed in a temple which was burned by her father's agents, became an immortal. Her father was made blind as a punishment for his evil deeds. She plucked her own eyes to restore the sight of her father. Because of this, she became the Goddess of Mercy.

Avalokiteśvara is also confused with the Goddess of the Sea. P'ut'o has been regarded as the port where she landed from India or as the birth place of Miao-shan, evidently a confusion of Potaraka in Northern India, the mythic residing place of Avalokiteśvara.

No educated Buddhist takes these stories seriously. In Buddhism, Avalokiteśvara appears in 6, 8, 33, and 37 forms, the most standard representation in temples, especially in those of the Mystical School, being the Six Transformations. These are 1) the Holy Avalokiteśvara (Jap. Sho Kwannon), the embodiment of Great Kindness and savior of the Realm of "Hungry Ghosts," the original and the most Buddhist of all, generally in feminine form, with Amita's image on the head, 2) the Thousand-armed Avalokiteśvara, the embodiment of Great Mercy and savior of the Realm of Hells, the thousand hands symbolizing universality, each of which having an eye and some implement to see and save all; 3) the Horse-headed Avalokiteśvara, the embodiment of Courage and savior of the Realm of Animals, 4) the Eleven-faced Avalokiteśvara, the embodiment of Universal Illumination and savior of the Realm of Asuras; 5) Chandī, in feminine form, the embodiment of Heroism and savior of the Realm of Men; and 6) Avalokiteśvara with a Wishing Wheel, embodiment of Far-reaching Penetration and saviour of the Realm of Heavenly Beings. Other popular representations are the white robed Kwan-yin, the Kwan-yin Crossing the Sea, the Willow-leafed Kwan-yin, the Fish-basket Kwan-yin, the Child-bestowing Kwan-yin, and the Bamboo Kwan-yin.

Avalokiteśvara usually holds a lotus, symbol of the life-giving principle, a dish or vase to collect morning dew symbolic of life and purity, a willow branch to sprinkle the dew over all, the Lotus Sūtra, or a roll of prayer. He occupies an important place in the Buddhist Triad*. Special days of worship are the 19th day of the second, sixth and ninth months. See Lāmaism.

Avatansaka: (Skr. "Wreath" School) See Hua-yen School.

Bodhidharma: (d. between 534 & 537) A native of South India (of Persia according to the Loyang Chia-lan Chi), the 28th patriarch of the Meditation School in India, who arrived in Nan Yueh (present Canton area), China, in the Liu Sung period, 420-479 A.D. (instead of 520 as generally believed), and became the First Chinese Patriarch. In answer to the Chinese Emperor, he said that the pious deeds of the Emperor "have no merit," that the "Noble Truths have no nobility," and that he "did not know the one who was facing the Emperor." He advocated the doctrine that Buddha-mind or Buddha-nature is pure unity, devoid of all specific character, and identical with the True State, Thusness, or Nirvāna*. His way of meditation involved 1) "direct intuition" of truth, an intuition as direct as "facing the wall," and 2) religious conduct. According to tradition, he went to the Wu-t'ai ("five terraces") Mountain where for nine years he "faced a wall" and meditated. Finally he gave a robe and a bowl as the sign of transmission to Hui-k'o and recommended the Lankāvatāra Sūtra (the four-part version) as the essence of Buddhist teaching. See Meditation School.

bodhisattva: (Skr. being of enlightenment, Pāli bodhisatta, Chin. p'u sa, Jap. bosatsu) A Buddha-to-be, a "being of enlightenment" who has attained the pāramitās or perfections, has gone through the ten stages* and is therefore qualified to enter nirvāna* and become a Buddha* but prefers to remain a bodhisattva in order to work for the salvation of all beings. He takes many vows, among which are these famous ten· 1-6) To abstain from violating the discipline, from being haughty, from anger, from envy, from jealousy, and from attachment to material things, 7) to practice the four acceptances, charity, loving words, benefiting deeds, and working together in order to help others, and to abide in non-attachment; 8) to free all beings from sufferings; 9) to protest against the violation of discipline, and 10) to keep the true law. He is distinguished by the tremendous amount of suffering and toil which he goes through, and by his great compassion and heroism in working for the salvation of all people. Because of these he is revered, and even worshiped in temples. He is the ideal of Mahāyāna in contrast to the arhat (See araham) of Hīnayāna who works for his own salvation. Popular bodhisattvas are Avalokiteśvara, Mañjuśrī, Samantabhadra, and Mahāsthāma. In China and Japan the term is also applied to non-Buddhist deities. See incarnations.

Bön: Indigenous, pre-Buddhist, animistic, devil-dancing, and Shamanist religion of Tibet, a debased form of Tantrism, with two sects, Black and White, strong in Northeastern Tibet. It has been to a great extent assimilated into un-reformed Lāmaism*. See Ling Chos.

Buddha, Gotama: It is difficult to distinguish facts from fiction about a man who was one of the greatest ever to have lived on this earth and who has influenced the life and thought of more than half the human race. Because of the nobility of his character, the vastness of his vision, the depth of his compassion, and the profundity of his teachings, idealization of his life was inevitable Imaginative tales and outright myths crept into the most primitive account of him. Even the recognized facts of this account are not entirely reliable, for the Pāli Canon in which this account was contained was 200 years later than the events it described, and it represents only one of the several schools that sprang up in the meantime. Some scholars, like Przuluski, even reject the account as primitive.

But no scholar except Senart and one or two others would discard the Pāli record entirely. Even Kern, who regarded the story of the Buddha as a sun-myth, did not rule out the historicity of the hero. It is safe to go at least as far as Mrs. Rhys Davids and accept the essential parts of the Pāli document. We are reasonably sure that the Buddha was born of the warrior caste, son of Suddhodana ("having pure rice"), a rājā, or chief, of the Śakya tribe whose principal town was Kapilavastu, about 100 miles north of Benares in North India. Whether he was born when his mother (called Māyā?) was on a journey is not certain. He was called Siddhattha (Skr. Siddhārtha, "he who has accomplished his aim"), Śākyamuni ("sage of the Śākya tribe"), and Gotama (Skr. Gautama) which was his family name, and later honored as the Buddha (see Buddhahood) or the Enlightened One, Bhagavat or the Lord, and Tathāgata or He Who Has Thus Come or He Who Has Thus Gone. His mother died when he was young, but not seven days after his birth, as ordinarily believed, and he was raised by his aunt Pajāpatī. Presumably, at nineteen he married his cousin Yasodharā. They had a son, Rāhula.

In his youth, he was seriously thinking over the problems and meanings of life. He decided to seek the counsel of the wandering wise men who moved over all India at the time. According to Mrs Davids, he had no idea of forsaking his home, but intended to return after he had gone as far as Vesāli. Tradition has dramatized this episode as the "great renunciation," and says that he, at the age of twenty-nine, first saw the sights of sickness, old age, and death, then resolved to sacrifice his home together with all its comforts and luxuries, and finally took a last glimpse of his young son in the arms of his sleeping mother and fled in the darkness of the night. He met Alāra Kālama in Rajagaha (in Vesāli, Mrs. Davids said), who recommended to him the dualistic philosophy of Sānkhya, and later Uddaka Rāmaputta, who urged asceticism. Not satisfied with these ways of life, he decided to become a Wanderer himself and kept on searching, striving, and meditating. In time his five companions scattered (or deserted him). After six years of continuous and strenuous effort, he finally found the true Path. Tradition has also turned this "Great Enlightenment" into a romance, saying that the first philosopher taught the Buddha the doctrine of nothingness and the second taught him the doctrine of neither consciousness nor non-consciousness, that he attained nirvāṇa*, i.e., Enlightenment, under a bo tree or tree of Wisdom, at sunset, after conquering the temptation of Māra, and that afterwards he fasted for seven times seven days.

Desirous of sharing the newly discovered Truth with others, especially his five former companions, he went to the Deer Park near Benares and preached his first "sermon" in which he neatly stated his fundamental principles (see Buddhism). These were accepted by the five ascetics, and in three months, some fifty more people followed him. Twelve years after he left home, his father sent for him. He met his father outside the city, in accordance with a Wanderer's etiquette, but went begging inside the city the next day, met his parents, wife, and son, who later adopted his Way of a mendicant's life. For forty-five years he worked hard to spread his doctrine, travelling up and down the Valley of the Ganges. In the twentieth year his cousin Ānanda joined him and eventually became his most favored pupil. Altogether there were 1,000 or 1,200 disciples. They lived as mendicants, gradually forming an Order with established rules governing their activities. Women were admitted to the Order though not from the beginning. During all these years, the Buddha always paid close attention to the layman, for, as Mrs. Davids emphasized, his mission was not to tell people to renounce the world, but to live in the world as a great brotherhood according to the Eightfold Noble Path (see Buddhism).

Scholars do not agree on the dates of the Buddha. His birthday is variously given at 568 B.C. (T. W. Rhys Davids), 563 B.C. (E. J. Thomas), 566 B.C. (Takakusu), etc. The date of his death is variously given as 483 B.C. (the Theravāda School), 477 B.C. (Cunningham, Max Müller, Buhler), 483 B.C. (Geiger), 486 B.C. (Takakusu), c. 480 B.C. (Oldenburg), 386 B.C. (Ui), etc. Records of the Theravāda School give 534 B.C. as the year of the Buddha's departure from home, and 528 B.C. as the year of his Enlightenment.

Most scholars, however, agree that the Buddha died at the age of eighty, after eating some pork when he was a guest of Chunda the smith. To these facts, tradition has added that he prophesied his own Nirvāna, that he entered into four trances, and that he died between two sāla trees outside of Kusinārā (identified with Kasia in the Gorakhpur District, North India).

As he arrived at Nirvāṇa, he said, "Now then, monks, I address you. subject to decay are all compound things. Strive with earnestness" Or, according to Mrs. Davids, "The Way in the worlds —that is my message to you! Make it known! Let it never be forgotten! The Way in the worlds .   ." See miracles in non Christian religions.

H Oldenberg, Buddha, His Life, His Doctrine, His Order (1881), tr. by W. Hoey (1882), E. J. Thomas, The Life of Buddha as Legend and History (1927), C. A. F. Rhys Davids, Gotama the Man (1928).

Buddhaghosa: Born in central India, he went to Ceylon in "about 430 A.D.," translated many Buddhist works from Sinhalese into Pāli, wrote Visuddhi-magga, Eng. tr. by P. M. Tin, The Path of Purity (1923-1931) and other works, and became a great systematizer of early Buddhism. Almost all the Pāli commentaries existent are ascribed to him.

Buddhahood: The term "buddha" (from budh) is interpreted in the two senses of awareness and awakening, the former denoting perfect wisdom and the latter denoting self-awakening, awakening others, and the perfect unity of awakening and ultimate truth. Thus a Buddha is an Enlightened One, who possesses Supreme, Correct, Universal, and Perfect Wisdom (anuttara-samyak-sambodhi). He has the Ten Powers, including those of omniscience and abiding release in this life. He has the thirty-two characteristic marks of the Great Man, such as hands reaching below the knees, golden-color body, a ten-foot halo around him, a white ūrnā or curl between the eyebrows symbolizing wisdom, etc., as we see in Buddha images He has 108 names, including the Ten Titles of Tathāgāta, Arhat, The World-Honored One, etc. He is supramundane, omnipotent, and "immensely benevolent" and "immensely merciful."

The Buddha appears from time to time as the need arises. The Dialogues of Gotama Buddha* mentioned six Past Buddhas, other parts of the Pāli Canon add twenty-eight more. Gotama himself prophesied a Future Buddha, Maitreya*. Hīnayāna admits only one Buddha at a time. Mahāyāna, on the other hand, accepts a multitude of contemporaneous Buddhas each with a world of his own. They exist as one or all of from one to ten "bodies," the most common being one of the Three Bodies or trikāya, under the different names of Śākyamuni, Amitābha, Maitreya, Locana, Vairocana, etc. They are, however, but various aspects of the same Eternal, Supreme, Primal Buddha (Ādi-Buddha), who appears in numerous transformations to preach the Law which is his "mother," and to save all beings who are his "sons." To most Mahāyāna schools, all beings possess the same nature and essence as the Buddha and therefore everyone except the icchantika in some cases—can become Buddha, and so do right in this world. Some schools make him identical with the universe, thusness* or the True State.

Buddhism: I. Teachings of Gotama Buddha. Buddhism, the system of Gotama Buddha, arose as a protest against the animistic superstition, the Upanishadic* pantheism, the ethics of asceticism and hedonism, the philosophies of eternalism and annihilationism, and above all, the sat-cit-ānanda, or Being-Knowledge-Joy ideal of Brahmanism* in India in the sixth century B.C. In opposition to these, the Buddha* taught the Four Noble Truths.

The first of the Noble Truths (ārya-satyāni) is the Truth of Suffering. Existence is pain, according to the Buddha, because it is irrevocably bound to sansāra or the cycle of births and deaths. Such an idea was not peculiar to the Buddha, it was also the conviction of the Sānkhya and Yoga Schools. Mrs. Rhys Davids maintained that the Buddha never taught the doctrine of suffering (dukkha), instead, he taught happiness (sukha). There is no doubt that the Buddha taught the way to bliss, and bliss is to be attained by the removal of suffering.

The second Noble Truth is the Truth of the Cause of Suffering. This cause is craving, which is in turn due to ignorance, as explained by the twelvefold Chain of Causation (pratiya-samutpāda): Ignorance is the cause of the aggregates; the aggregates are the causes of consciousness, consciousness is the cause of name and form or body and mind, name and form are the causes of the six sense-organs, the six sense-organs are the causes of contact; contact is the cause of sensation; sensation is the cause of craving, craving is the cause of grasping, grasping is the cause of coming into existence, coming into existence is the cause of birth; and birth is the cause of old age and death. This chain bears a striking resemblance to the Sānkhya categories, but it may (said Keith) or may not (said Thomas) have been borrowed from Sānkhya. At any rate, the Buddha was not interested in the deduction of categories; he was wholly concerned with the practical problem of removing the cause of suffering. To this end he put forth the doctrines of Impermanence (Pāli anicca, Skr. anitya) and Non-ego (Pāli anatta, Skr. anātman), in direct contrast with the Brahman ideals of Being (sat) and Self (ātman). The Buddha declared that things, as compounds, are always in the processes of Production, Stagnation, Deterioration, and Extinction, and are therefore impermanent. Neither is the self permanent, because it is but an aggregate (skandha) of elements. This does not mean, as Mrs. Davids has emphatically pointed out, the denial of the empirical self, but a refutation of the permanent, abiding personal identity. These doctrines suggest no nihilism; they were intended to reveal the true nature of existence, which to the Buddha was dynamic Becoming instead of static Being or Non-being.

The third Noble Truth is the Truth of the Cessation of Suffering. When suffering is destroyed, nirvāna*, negatively the extinction of passions and positively the state of bliss, is attained. One then becomes an arhat or the Worthy One, either in this life or after death.

The fourth Noble Truth is the Truth of the Way (mārga) to remove Suffering. This involves a comprehensive system of moral cultivation, but the fundamental way is the Noble Eightfold Path (ārya-mārga) right views (of the Four Noble Truths), right intention (to renounce sensual pleasure, to bear no malice, to do no harm, etc.), right speech, right action (such as love, joy, abstinence from immorality), right livelihood, right effort (to avoid evil state and produce good state of mind through the practice of Morality, Meditation, and Wisdom), right mindfulness (to be alert with regard to sensations, ideas, etc.), and right concentration. These form the standard of our threefold karma (action-energy) or conduct, speech, and thought. In reduced form, the Eightfold Path becomes the Threefold Learning (sikshā), i e., Discipline or Morality, Meditation, and Wisdom. Morality (sila) demands right volition, right mental states, and a highly developed moral consciousness (see Disciplinary School). Meditation (samādhi) as in all Indian systems, means concentration. That is to say that through the meditation on the forty objects such as the ten universals, the ten impurities, the four sublime states, etc., and through the experience of the four trances, one can attain both "calmness" and "insight." This is Wisdom (prajñā), the insight into the Supreme Truth.

The most important element of these teachings is the Middle Path (madhyamā-pratipad) between the extremes of passions and asceticism, the Way to realize the Four Noble Truths which the Buddha elucidated in his first sermon at Benares. Throughout the entire history of Buddhism, the Middle Path has remained the central concept, although its interpretation varies with different schools. To the Buddha, it was a way of life, a sensible, moderate, comprehensive, and practical system of ethics. He called the Truths "noble" (ārya) because he regarded nobility as a moral, and not a racial (Aryan), quality. His Order was established on moral principles, a Brotherhood without distinction of castes. Karma*, which to the Brahmins was hardly more than a mechanical, superstitious, fatalistic operation of retribution, was transformed by the Buddha to mean moral energy with which a man may exercise his free will, break the Chain of Causation, chart the course of his future, and produce the meritorious fruits of his own conduct. The Buddha was primarily concerned with a good life. This spirit is characteristic of all his Dialogues. He urged the removal of the Ten Fetters, the Four Intoxications (bodily passions, becoming, delusions, and ignorance), the Five Hindrances (hankering after worldly advantages, the corruptions arising out of the wish to injure, torpor of mind, fretfulness and worry, and wavering of mind), etc. He taught the novice the Ten Precepts (abstinence from taking life, from theft, from impurity or sensuality, from lying and harsh speech and foolish talk, from intoxication, from irregular eating, from dancing and similar entertainments, from garlands and ornaments, from high and broad couches, and from accepting gifts of gold and silver) as the minimum requirements of a mendicant's moral life. For a fuller life, whether for the monk or layman, he taught virtue, kindness, love, compassion, non-injury in the broadest sense of the term, liberality, moderation, temperance, consideracy, the Golden Rule, the mutual duty of human relationships, etc. A good life and a moral life was the goal of his preaching. He shunned metaphysical speculation and condemned ritualistic practices as non-conducive to wholesome living. His system was neither religion nor philosophy.

II. Religious and Philosophical Development. Nevertheless, the potentiality of his Way was too great to remain purely an ethical system. It was inevitable that his followers attempted to place it on a philosophical foundation and to give it the emotional content centralizing on their teacher. Consequently, even before the death of the Buddha, signs of both religious and philosophical developments were already evident. Whether or not we accept the legend that his disciples made an image of him for the purpose of offering veneration during his absence, we cannot doubt the fact that they regarded him as supernatural, called him the Bhagavat (the Lord), Tathāgata (One Who Has Thus Come), etc., and believed in his omniscience. Their reverence for his relics was definitely religious. By the first century A.D., the original, simple cult of the worship of relics had developed to be a cult of image worship. Before this, a series of Councils* had already formulated the Doctrine, regulated the discipline, and fixed the Scripture (see Canon, Buddhist). The missionary efforts of King Aśoka, c. 240 B.C. had spread Buddhism from the Ganges Valley over all India and Ceylon. As the religion developed, it took over the rituals and deities of Hinduism*, and, in the fifth century A.D., adopted the magic and spells of Tantrism*. Two hundred years later, its rapid decline began. By the time of the Mohammedan invasion in the twelfth century, it practically ceased to be a religion of any potency. Today there are only 233,000 uninfluential Buddhists in India. (See India, Religions of.)

While Buddhism developed along religious lines, its philosophy also gradually unfolded. The tendency to grow along diverse directions was apparent in the First Council right after the Buddha's death. At the Second Council (c. 383 B.C.), the liberal Mahāsaṅghikas or the "Great Community" broke away from the conservative Theravādas (Sthaviravādas) or Elders. In time each of the two branches split further into more schools, so that by 200 B.C. there were eighteen or twenty including the two mother schools. The Southern or Pāli tradition and the Northern or Sanskrit tradition differ in the number and names of these schools and the reasons for their division.

The most orthodox, the most powerful, and the most lasting school was the realistic Sarvāstivāda*, which regarded all dharmas (elements) as real but the self as unreal.

In the first century A.D., a new movement, which can be traced to the progressive Mahāsaṅghikas, got under way. It was given impetus by Aśvaghosha*, c. 100 A.D. who laid the foundation with his doctrine of ālaya-consciousness and thusness*. This movement was later labeled Mahāyāna, or the Great Vehicle (see vehicles), in contradistinction to Hīnayāna, or the Small Vehicle, the name given to the eighteen earlier schools. In the second century, the Mādhyamika School of Nāgārjuna*, c. 100-200 A.D., came into prominence with the interpretation of the Middle Path as the Ultimate Void which is "devoid" of all specific characters (see Middle Doctrine School). Four hundred years later, another great system appeared, namely, the Yogācāra School* of Asanga (c. 410-500?) and his brother Vasubandhu* (c. 420-500?), which regarded the Middle Path as Thusness or the Absolute, and considered consciousness alone as real (see Idealistic School). Thus, according to Stcherbatsky, there were three successive movements of Buddhism in the first 1,500 years of its history— Hīnayāna pluralistic realism (the denial of the self) from 500 B.C. to the beginning of the Christian era, Mahāyāna Negativism (the denial of all elements) of the Mādhyamika School from the first to the fifth century, and Mahāyāna Idealism (the denial of the external world) of the Yogācāra School from 500 to 1000 A.D. Hīnayāna and Mahāyana co-existed until the former declined in the fifth century. Mādhyamika and Yogācāra, the two wings of Mahāyana, rivaled each other for a long time but eventually both disappeared from India.

This decline was inevitable. Buddhism was too deeply confounded with Hinduism and Tantrism. Its central emphasis on the Order deprived it of the popular support of the mass. Its philosophical progress had reached the point where new soil was necessary for further growth. Long before this, Buddhism had begun to shift to China. The final collapse in India made the transplantation complete.

III. Buddhism in China. Just when Buddhism first reached China is uncertain, but undoubtedly years, perhaps centuries, before 67 A.D., the traditional date of introduction, it had penetrated China. Records show that Buddhist sūtras existed in China in the reign of Ai-ti (6-1 B.C.). At any rate, by the first century A.D., Buddhism had already spread from the Loyang area to South and East China. It existed as a system of worship, charms and spells, and similar practices, side by side with the Taoist* religion.

Soon great masters successively arrived from India; important scriptures were gradually translated; and Chinese talents quickly exhibited themselves. Disciplinary rules, the practice of meditation, and the philosophy of the Void as embodied in the Prajñāpāramitā literature were popular, especially with the Taoists who cherished Lao Tsü's ideal of Non-being. Then one doctrine after another was introduced by such great Buddhists as Kumārajīva*, 344-413 A.D., and Hsuan-tsang*, 596-664, until there were ten schools. These were. Kośa, Satyasiddhi, Vinaya, Mādhyamika, Yogācara, Meditation School, Mystical School, Hua-yen, T'ien-t'ai, and Pure Land. The history and doctrines of these schools are briefly outlined elsewhere in this volume. Suffice it here to note three significant points about them, namely, the development of Mahāyāna in China, the Chinese transformation of Buddhism, and its changes in Japan

IV. Growth of Mahāyāna in China. Although among the ten schools, three—Abhidharmakośa, Satyasiddhi, and Vinaya—were Hīnayāna, the story of Chinese Buddhism has been essentially that of Mahāyāna. The three Hīnayana schools neither lasted long nor underwent any development. Mādhyamika, on the other hand, was elaborated and completed by Chi-tsang*, 549-623, and Yogācāra by Hsuan-tsang and his pupil K'uei-chi, 632-682. Although the Meditation and Mystical doctrines were essentially Indian in spirit, they were largely systematized in China by Bodhidharma* (d. between 534 & 537) and Subhakarasimha, etc., respectively. Hua-yen, T'ien-t'ai, and Pure Land were purely Chinese products

Along with these developments, new doctrines were promulgated. The distinctive features of Mahāyāna—idealism, negativism, thusness, void*, ālaya-consciousness*, Twofold Truth, Three Vehicles, pāramitās, Transcendental Wisdom, fourfold nirvāna*, the universality of Buddha-nature, salvation for all, salvation by faith, vows, abrupt enlightenment, the transfer of merits, expediency (upayā), mass for the dead (ullambana), the emphasis on positive ethical ideals such as compassion, charity, benefiting others, loving words, effort, tolerance (see bodhisattva, stages), the absolute prohibition of meat-eating, etc,—either originated or were perfected on Chinese soil. Even the Buddha and bodhisattva doctrines, which germinated in Hīnayāna, so vastly expanded in Mahāyāna and developed so many new aspects such as paradise, trikāya, triad, and *triratna, that they can no longer be considered Hinayanistic. From these it is clear that the difference between Hīnayāna and Mahāyana is not limited to the distinction that Hīnayāna, or Pāli Buddhism, is the Small Vehicle because it entertains the ideals of arhatship and salvation for the self, and that Mahāyāna, or Sanskrit Buddhism, is the Great Vehicle because it seeks the goal of bodhisattvahood and salvation for all. Many doctrinal and practical variations separate the two Vehicles Even the directions of their geographical expansion have been different Hīnayāna went southward to Ceylon, Indo-China, Siam, and Java, where it flourishes today, whereas Mahāyāna went eastward to China, Korea, and thence to Japan, and northward to Tibet and Mongolia (see Lāmaism).

V. Chinese transformation of Buddhism. As to the Chinese transformation of Buddhism, it is sufficient to say that in its Mahāyāna development, Buddhism almost completely changed its complexion in China, becoming less Indian and more Chinese. The development of the ten schools shows the Chinese character even more clearly. None of the realistic Kośa (Chü-shê) which held that "all exists," the nihilistic Satyasiddhi (Chêng-shih) which insisted that "both the dharmas and the self are unreal," or the formalistic Vinava (Lü) had a long history in China. Also, neither the idealistic Yogācāra (Fa-hsiang) which reduced everything to "consciousness only" nor the negativistic Mādhyamika (San-lun) which regarded reality as "Void" flourished in China for long. Even the esoteric Mystical (Chên-yen) and the intuitional Meditation (Ch'an) Schools, which were formed and developed in China, did not last. They were either too extreme or too mystical for the Chinese. From the earliest days of Buddhism in China to the present, the Chinese have clung to the more practical and more moderate aspects of the system. As early as the fourth century A.D., before any Buddhist school became a concerted movement in China, Tao-an promoted, and Hui-yuan* 334-416, completed the T'ien-t'ai system and its doctrines of the identity of the One and the Many, the harmony of phenomenon and noumenon, the universality of Buddha-nature, and salvation for all. In the fifth century Tao shêng founded the Pure Land (Ch'ing-t'u) movement on the simple idea of salvation by faith. These movements were supported by the philosophy of the Hua-yen School based on the theory of "universal causation of the Elements of the Principle" and the ideal of "grand harmony without obstacle" or All-in-One and One-in-All Today the T'ien-t'ai and the Pure Land Schools are still the strongest in China, the two combining to a great extent into one movement. Of the 738,000 monks and nuns, 267,000 temples, some 3,000,000 "home disciples," and an unknown number of Buddha-worshipers in China proper today, it is safe to say that a great majority belong to these two Schools. (See Chinese Religions.)

VI. Buddhism in Japan. All the ten schools were introduced into Japan. Due to the efforts of Prince Shotoku (573-621) and such Great Masters as Kobo Daishi, 774-835 and Dengyo Daishi (767-822), Buddhism prospered. In Japan the Pure Land School developed into four sects, Jodo, Shin, Yūzunembutsu, and Ji, and Tendai (T'ien-t'ai) gave rise to the Nichiren School*. Among the specially Japanese features of Buddhism, we may mention its identification with the national life, especially in the case of the extremely nationalistic Nichiren, its mysticism as indicated by the popularity of the Mystical (Shingon) and Meditation (Zen) Schools (which have almost entirely disappeared from China), its modern reforms including the sanction of marriage for priests in most schools, and its vitality in general. Truly Japan is the land of Buddhism, where there are 42,249,229 adherents, 71,326 temples and 7,753 churches, where most Buddhist schools still flourish, where Buddhist literature has been best preserved, where Buddhist study is most active, and where many world-renowned scholars have emerged. See cosmogonies, cycles of time, Japanese Religions, sacred literatures; temples, Far Eastern, transmigration.

E. J. Thomas, Early Buddhist Scriptures (1935); Aśvaghosha. The Awakening of Faith in the Mahayana (1900), tr. by D T. Suzuki; Saddharma-pundarika, or the Lotus of the True Law (1884), tr. by H Kern; Th. Stcherbatsky, The Central Conception of Buddhism and the Meaning of the Word "Dharma" (1923); E. J. Thomas, The History of Buddhist Thought (1933), D. T Suzuki, Studies in the Lankavatara Sutra (1930), C. Eliot, Hinduism and Buddhism, 3 vols (1921), J B Pratt, The Pilgrimage of Buddhism and a Buddhist Pilgrimage (1928), B L Suzuki, Mahayana Buddhism (1938)

Canon, Buddhist: The Buddhist Canon, called Tripitaka (Skr.) or Tipitaka (Pāli), literally "three baskets (pitaka), contains 1) sūtras (Pāli sutta) or the discourses of the Buddha, 2) vinaya (Pāli & Skr.) or rules, and 3) śāstras (Abhidharma) or treatises. The Pāli version is accepted by Hīnayāna The Sanskrit version, which differs considerably from the Pāli Tipitaka, is followed by Mahāyāna and has been rendered into Chinese, Tibetan, Mongolian, and Manchurian Of all the editions, from the first Chinese edition of 968 A D. on, the most complete one is the Taishō Shinshu Daizokyo, or the Taisho edition of the Tripitaka in Chinese, ed. by J. Takakusu, K. Watanabe, & G. Ono, containing 13,520 chuans or parts in 100 volumes of 1,000 pages each (Tokyo, 1924). The Tibetan Canon (Kanjur or Ka-gyur) comprises the Tripitaka and some Tantric works in seven parts totaling 108 volumes, and is supplemented by a collection of commentaries called Tanjur (or Tan-gyur), in 225 volumes, altogether making 5102 chuans. This Tibetan version was rendered into Mongolian, and its Kanjur portion was translated into Manchurian Only a very small portion of either the Pāli Tipitaka or the Sanskrit Tripitaka has been translated into Western languages. See Councils, Buddhist.

Councils, Buddhist: The First Council, of 500 monks, was held in Rājagaha immediately after the death of the Buddha (c. 483 B.C.) and lasted for seven months. Presided over by the disciple Mahākassapa (Mahākaśyapa), the Council heard Ānanda recite the Dhamma (doctrines) and Upāli the Vinaya (rules), made a collection of scriptures, and fixed the number of Buddha's discourses. The Second Council of 700 was held 100 years later (c. 383 B C.) at Vesāli to uphold the original discipline and condemn the ten illegal practices which had spread among the Vesāli monks. This Council lasted for eighteen months. Simultaneously a liberal group of 10,000, called the Mahāsanghikas, held a rival council outside the city in opposition to the orthodox Elders or Theravādas. The third Council, participated by 1,000, took place during King Aśoka's reign (c. 240 B.C.) at Pātaliputta and lasted for nine months. At this Council, the Abhidhamma literature (collection of treatises) was added to the Dhamma and Vinaya, completing the "three baskets" of the Canon, or Tripitaka. Thus the Canon was fixed, though not written down until later.

All schools accept the first two Councils Although the third is not mentioned in Pāli works or in the works of the Sarvastivādins, most scholars do not doubt it. Details about the three Councils, however, greatly differ among the various records, which were not written until several centuries later. The tradition of Northern Buddhism adds a Fourth Council in Kashmīr in c.

70 A.D., at which time the Mahāyāna doctrine was promulgated and commentaries on the three divisions of the Canon were compiled, using Sanskrit for the first time instead of Pāli. See Buddhism.

Chi-tsang: (549-623) Great patriarch and systematizer of the Middle Doctrine School of Buddhism, honored as the Great Master of Chiahsiang, and author of many important works, including the standard commentaries of the three Treatises of the School.

Disciplinary School: (Pāli & Skr. Vinaya; Chin. Lu, Jap. Ritsu) The school is called Disciplinary because it is based on the Vinaya section of the Canon (see Canon, Buddhist), the Four-Division School because it follows particularly the Rules in Four Divisions, and the Nanshan or South Mountain School because it was elaborated and completed in China by Tao-hsuan, 596-667 A.D., in that mountain.

Vinaya aims at the discipline of action, speech, and thought. It includes "prohibitive precepts," 250 for monks and 348 for nuns, and "precepts for performance" or rules governing ordination, convocations, etc. There are four aspects of discipline first, the "rules of discipline" laid down by the Buddha, secondly the "substance of discipline" or the moral consciousness aroused by taking vows in ordination, which is ever active in dictating meritorious deeds, thirdly the "action of discipline" expressed in action, speech, and thought, and fourthly the "character of discipline" which should be so good as to be exemplary. The earlier Four-Division tradition, following the "void of dharma-nature" doctrine that neither dharmas (elements) nor the ego are existent, conceived the substance of discipline as neither the material element nor mind, while the South Mountain School, following the Idealistic doctrine that consciousness alone is real, interpreted it as seeds in the ālaya-consciousness.

The School belongs to the Hīnayāna and hardly exists in China as an independent sect. It has 23 temples and 58,000 adherents in Japan where it is called Shin Ritsu (New Disciplinary School) since it was reformed by Eison, 1201-1290, who put it on the basis of "self-vow discipline," i.e., a vow taken privately instead of at ordination is valid.

Forty-two Chapter Sūtra: Subject of intensive research by both Chinese and Occidental scholars in recent years, the Sūtra, according to latest findings, is not a translation of any Sanskrit text but a translation of selected fragments of various Hīnayāna scriptures. It was first quoted in 166 A.D. There were two Chinese translations, one made in the Han dynasty (206 B.C.-220 A.D.), which was lost after the Liu Sung period (420-479), the other by Chih-ch'ien of the Wu era (222-280 A.D.). This latter translation has gone through many editions, each time undergoing some changes and accumulating Mahāyāna ideas and Taoist concepts. The edition containing a commentary by Emperor Chêntsung (998-1022) is the oldest, probably going back to the Southern and Northern Dynasties (420-589) The popularly accepted edition is much later, and has evidently been greatly altered by Buddhists of the Meditation School*. Eng. tr. by S Beal, "Sūtra of Forty-two Sections," in his Catena of Buddhist Scriptures from the Chinese (1871), and by D. T. Suzuki, "The Sūtra of Forty-two Chapters," in Soyen Shaku's Sermons of a Buddhist Abbot (1906).

Hinayāna: See Buddhism.

Hsüan-tsang: (596-664) Founder of the Idealistic School* of Buddhism in China and the most important figure in the Mahāyāna* development in the Far East. Ordained at thirteen, Hsuan-tsang early became familiar with Buddhist philosophy. He traveled extensively to study under many masters, but was not satisfied with their explanation and the translations they used. In 629, accompanied by a small group, he secretly set out on a long, hazardous trip to India against governmental order He overcame many insuperable hardships on his way, and finally arrived at the homeland of Buddhism. He studied under, and deliberated with, all great Indian philosophers of the time in practically all the great Indian universities Thus he not only acquired a firsthand knowledge of Indian philosophies and religions, both Buddhist and non-Buddhist, but also became the most important historian of the thought and conditions of India in the seventh century. He visited Ceylon and returned to China by way of Persia in 646 after seventeen years of study and travel, bringing with him seven images of the Buddha and 657 Buddhist works, mostly new to China. His return was the occasion of a warm Imperial welcome and marked a new epoch of Buddhist history. Upon Imperial command, he resided, taught, and worked in the Tz'ü-ên Monastery. Here he introduced many new trends of Buddhist thought, translated 75 basic Buddhist texts totaling 1,335 chapters, which have been accepted as standard, and produced many outstanding Buddhist scholars. See Buddhism.

Hua-yen School: (Skr. Avataṅsaka, Chin. Hua-yen, Jap. Kegon, all meaning "Wreath" or "Flowery Splendor") This Mahāyāna* school, as far as we know, never existed in India. Its name is derived from the title of its chief scripture, the Avataṅsaka Sūtra. One chapter of the Sūtra was translated separately as the Gandā-vyūha and another as the Daśa-bhumika. With the translation of the latter in 512 A.D., the Ti-lun or Dasabhumi School came into being in China. This was replaced by Hua-yen which was nominally founded by Tu-shun (557-640). The real founder of Hua-yen, however, was its patriarch Fa-tsang (643-712), the Great Master Hsien-shou, who completed the system and after whom the School is also called the Hsien-shou School.

The main tenet of the Avataṅsaka doctrine is the Universal Causation by the Dharma-dhātu.

Literally the Realm of the Law, Dharmadhātu means on the one hand Ultimate Truth, i.e., the Realm of Principle, and on the other the universe itself, i.e, the Realm of All Elements. Universal Causation is the mutual causation of all dharmas (elements) which are inter-related, inter-dependent, and inter-originating. The universe is conceived to be fourfold the World of Facts, the World of Principle, the World of Principle Realized in Facts, and the World of the Harmony of these Facts. This harmony is achieved through "inter-identification" and "inter-penetration" of all facts and principles, resulting in the Universe of One-Truth.

To explain the possibility of such world of Harmony, the School advances the "Ten Profound Propositions" 1) All things are co-existent, corresponding to one another. 2) The intension and extension of one thing involve those of others without any obstacle. 3) The One and the Many are mutually inclusive. 4) All things are identical with one another. 5) The hidden and the manifested mutually perfect each other. 6) All minute and abstruse things penetrate one another. 7) All things reflect one another. 8) Truth is manifested in facts and facts are the source of Enlightenment 9) The past, present, and future are inter-penetrating. 10) All things are manifestations and transformations of the Mind.

The Ten Profound Propositions are based on the Doctrine of the Sixfold Character of Dharmas to the effect that each dharma has the six characteristics of Universality, Speciality, Similarity, Diversity, Integration, and Differentiation. These characteristics make possible the universal inter-relations as well as the individuality of all things, thus making them both One and Many, and resulting in a world of "Perfect Harmony without Obstacle." Such world of Harmony is called the Realm of the Lotus-store or the World Illumined by the Buddha of Perfect Enlightenment, in which all beings will be carried to Buddhahood through the One vehicle*.

The Hua-yen doctrine was brought to Japan by Shinsho (Shên-hsiang) in 736. The School has now 35 temples and 23,000 adherents in Japan but very few in China.

Hui-yüan: (334-416 A.D.) Established the White Lotus Society in the Lu Mountain, advocated the doctrine that nirvāna* and the nature of dharmas (elements) are unchangeable, taught "thinking of Buddha" which involves meditation as well as repetition of Buddha's name, wrote "Monks Need Have No Respect For Kings" in which he stressed the indestructibility of the spirit and the transcending character of the Ultimate which is above life and death, and being and non-being, and founded the Pure Land School* on pietism originally advocated by his teacher Tao-an.

Idealistic School, Buddhist: One of the two wings of Mahāyāna Buddhism* in India, the Yogācāra (Self-concentration) School was founded by Asaṅga (c. 410-500 A.D.?), author of the Yogācāra-bhūmi Śastra and the verses of both the Mahāyāna-saṁparigrapha and the Madhyanta-vi- bhanga. The Yogācāra doctrine was elaborated by his brother Vasubandhu* who wrote the Viṃśātikā, Eng. tr. by C. H Hamilton, Wei Shih Er Shih Lun (1938), the Trimsikā, Fr. tr. by S. Lévi, Matériaux pour l'etude du système vijñaptimātra (1932), and the commentaries on both the Mahāyāna-samparigrapha, partial Fr. tr. by E. Lamotte, La somme du Grand Véhicule (1907, 1911) and the Madhyānta-vibhanga, Ch. I tr. by Stcherbatsky, Discourse on the Doctrine of the Middle and the Extreme (1937). With the translation of the Mahāyāna-samparigrapha by Paramārtha (499-569), the Shê-lun (Samparigrapha) School came into existence. Eventually it was absorbed by the Fa-hsiang (Dharma-Character, Jap. Hosso) School founded by Hsuan-tsang* (596-664). Hsuan-tsang visited India, examined all Buddhist philosophies, returned to summarize, select, and translate the important works of ten great idealists, especially Dharmapāla (439-507), in his Ch'êng Wei-shih Lun, Fr. tr. by L. de La Vallée Poussin, Vijñapti-mātrātasiddhi, le siddhie de Hiuentsang (1928-1929), in which he developed and completed the Yogācāra system in China. His pupil K'uei-chi (Ki) (632-682), profound author of standard treatises, carried the idealistic doctrine to new heights. As the basis of these Chinese works, the Idealistic School in China and Japan follows six Sanskrit sūtras, of which the Sandhi-nirmacana Sutra, Fr tr. by E. Lamotte, Explication du mystère (1936) is the fundamental, and eleven Indian treatises, of which the Yogācāra-bhūmi is regarded as primary. The important tenets of the major works of the School, however, are contained in Hsuan-tsang's Ch'êng Wei-shih Lun (Completion Mere-Ideation Treatise), which gave rise to another Chinese name Wei-shih (Skr. Vijñānavāda, Jap. Yuishiki). In English, Fa-hsiang or Wei-shih is often called the Mere-Ideation or Consciousness-only School.

The School reduces existence to 100 dharmas (elements) in five divisions, somewhat similar to those of the Kośa School*. Instead of regarding the mind as one dharma, however, the School analyzes it into eight consciousnesses (vijñāna), namely, the five sense-consciousnesses, the sixth consciousness (Mano-vijñāna) or the sense-center which forms conceptions, the seventh consciousness or the mind-consciousness (Manas) which wills and reasons on a self-centered basis, and the eighth consciousness which is called the ālaya-vijñāna (citta) or "store-consciousness." The last consciousness is so-called because it stores the "seeds" or effects of good and evil deeds which exist from time immemorial and become the energy to produce manifestations.

The ideation-store consciousness is the "first transformation" of ideation, forever in the state of instantaneous change, the seeds perpetually influencing or "perfuming" external manifestations and manifestations perpetually "perfuming" seeds. These three elements—seeds, manifestations, and perfuming—keep on evolving and influencing one another eternally, acting at the same time as cause and effect. The mind-consciousness is the "second transformation," which depends on the ideation-store consciousness but in turn conditions it. Its nature and characteristics consist of intellection, and it is always accompanied by the evils of self-interest. The first six consciousnesses are the "third transformation," which consist of the discrimination of the objective world. Thus the self and all the dharmas are instantaneously issued from the ālaya-consciousness and restored to it at once, thereby constituting our life and the world.

Each of the consciousnesses has four "functional aspects," the objective aspect, the subjective aspect, the self-witnessing aspect in which the mind sees and acknowledges its subjectivity, and the rewitnessing aspect in which the mind witnesses itself once more. The objective aspect originates from the subjective aspect, which alone is the fundamental function of consciousness. In other words, all dharmas of the objective world are products of ideation.

With regard to the nature of dharmas, the School classifies them into three species. Those of the "character of sole imagination" have only "false existence." Those of the "character of dependence" have "temporary existence," as things produced by causal combination enjoy neither self-nature nor permanent reality. Only those of the "character of ultimate reality" have "true existence" This ultimate nature is thusness*, the true noumenon transcending all specific characters. It is the Middle Path which rises above both Reality and the Void. It is Nirvāna.

In order to reach this state, spiritual development through the ten stages (see stages) and the attainment of the Ten Pāramitās are prerequisite. These will lead to Perfect Wisdom, or the Fourfold Wisdom of the Buddha. In other words, the first five consciousnesses will become the "wisdom of action," the sixth consciousness will become the "wisdom of insight," the mind consciousness will become the "wisdom of equanimity", and the ālaya consciousness will become the "wisdom of magnificent mirror."

Not all people can reach Nirvāna, however. Of the Five Species of men, the three species corresponding to the three vehicles* and the "indeterminate species" can attain Nirvāna, while those having passions but no Buddha-nature, called icchantika, are beyond salvation.

The Fa-hsiang School in China began to decline in the eighth century and disappeared several hundred years afterwards. Recently Buddhist scholars have made an attempt to revive the idealistic philosophy. The Fa-hsiang Doctrine was taken into Japan by Dosho (628-700), a Japanese priest who studied under Hsuan-tsang. Today it is a very small institution, having only 42 Hosso temples and 19,000 adherents. See nirvāna.

A. B Keith, Buddhist Philosophy in India and Ceylon (1923). E J. Thomas, The History of Buddhist Thought (1933).

Ji(Shu): (Jap. Time Sect) A branch of the Pure Land School* of Buddhism in Japan, founded by Ippen in 1276 on the doctrine that reciting the hymns of Zendo (d. 681, Chin. Shan-tao) six times a day will lead to the Western Heaven.

karma, karman: (Skr.) Action, action-influence, deed. It is the dynamic manifestation of mental and physical energy in deeds, speech, or thought, inevitably producing the good, evil, or neutral effect, either immediately or in the future, according as the action is good, evil, or indifferent. The effect itself becomes the cause of further effect, making the self, in the case of an individual, a process of unceasing transformation from one life to another in the wheel* of transmigration*, and the world, in the case of the universe, a process of perpetual becoming. Thus karma is 1) action-energy, past or present, latent or manifest, actual or potential, 2) a self-operating law of causality and retribution, 3) the entity of the individual or the universe carried along in the series of the Wheel of Life (*samsāra).

Kobo Daishi: (Jap. The Great Master Kobo, 774-835) Was in China from 805 to 806 as pupil of Hui-kuo, returned to Japan to found the Shingon School (see Mystical School, Buddhist) in the East Temple (Toji). He was the foremost Japanese calligrapher, originator of popular education, and possibly the inventor of the Japanese alphabet (in the form of the "Iroha" poem).

Kosa (Abhidharmakosa) School: (Chin. Chu-shê, Jap. Kusha) Buddhist Hīnayāna Realism, an outgrowth of the Sautrāntika branch of Sarvāstivāda (All-Exists School). Named after Vasubandhu's Abhidharma-kosa Sāstra ("The Store of the Higher Dharma or Law"), the Realistic School in China followed Hsuan-tsang's* translation (651-654) and replaced the Pi-t'an School which had promulgated the Sarvāstivāda* doctrine. The Kosa teaching was first brought to Japan by Chitsū and Chitatsu in 658 and again by Gembo in 735. In neither China nor Japan did it exist for more than a few centuries.

The chief tenets of Kosa are summed up in two propositions "The reality of the three periods of time and the entity of all dharmas or elements" and "The unreality of the self and the reality of all dharmas." These dharmas are reduced to 75 and classified under two categories, the Created and the Non-created. The Non-created Dharmas or elements of negative becoming form one group and include the three dharmas of Space, "Extinction through Intellectual Power," and "Extinction without a Productive Cause." The Created Dharmas fall into four groups 1) Form (rūpa, material elements)—the five sense-organs, the five sense-objects, and "form-with-no-manifestation" (11 dharmas), 2) Mind (citta), 3) Concomitant Mental Functions—46 dharmas in six subdivisions, and 4) Elements which are Neither Substantial Forms Nor Mental Functions—14 dharmas.

All Created Elements co-exist in the actual world, and they exist only momentarily. They, the mind included, are regarded as objects, since the School is concerned with objects only and does not recognize any subject. To the Buddhist realists, the self is nothing but the fivefold Aggregate of Form, Sensation, Conception, Volition, and Consciousness. As such it has no reality.

To explain the momentariness of dharmas, Kosa offers the theory of Six Causes. These are 1) the Active Cause or the effective factor in the production of a dharma, 2) the Co-existent Cause such as the Four Great Elements (Earth, Water, Wind, Fire) always working together, 3) the Similar-species Cause or a cause helping other causes of its kind, 4) the Concomitant Cause like associated causes of mind and mental conditions, 5) the Universally Prevalent Cause or human ignorance, and 6) the Cause Ripening in a Different Life or the cause that produces the effect. In addition to these, there are the Four Conditions or Secondary Causes, namely, the Cause Condition or the chief cause, the Continuous Condition which immediately follows a preceding condition, the Objective Condition which has an object or environment as a concurring cause, and the Upheaving Condition which brings all the abiding causes to a culmination. Since these Causes and Conditions are always operating and producing new situations, a dharma remains in a state only for one single moment. The actual world is real and it is real as a dynamic becoming.

Kwan-yin: (Chin.) Idem Avalokitesvara*

Kumārajīva: (343 or 344-413 A.D.) An Indian born in Kucha, founder of the Middle Doctrine School* in China, who arrived in 401 A.D. and translated some 300 stitched volumes of important Buddhist texts into Chinese, including the basic Treatises of his School, the fundamental Satyasiddhi Sāstra of the Satyasiddhi School*, and the widely followed Lotus Sūtra of the T'ien-t'ai School*. While he translated, he elucidated the various doctrines of the texts to the 500 or 800 who assisted him, and to the thousands of scholars who gathered around him from all parts of China. Aside from rejecting realism and firmly establishing the negativism of the Three Treatises in China, he made clear for the first time there the Buddhist doctrine of the unreality of the self and put the doctrine of the Ultimate void* on a firm foundation. His pupils, the most brilliant scholars of the time, started several Buddhist currents. the Three-treatise Negativism by Sêng-chao, the Nirvāna doctrine by Tao-shêng*, and Satyasiddhi Nihilism by Sêng-tao and Sêng-sung. Among his pupils were the "Four Sages," the "Eight Eminent Ones," and the "Ten Wise Men."

Lāmaism: A popular term for Tibetan Buddhism, an appellation not used by the Buddhists themselves. Mahāyāna Buddhism in the form of Yogācāra idealism was first introduced into Tibet about 650 A.D by King Srong-btsan Gam-po through the influence of his two Buddhist wives. It was firmly established under King Khri-srong De-btsan who invited Padma Sambhava (or Padmākara) from Northwestern India in 747. He came from a center of Mantrayāna, or ritualistic, mystic, Tantric, and esoteric Buddhism. He gained popular support by subduing native heathen chiefs with the aid of spells and charms and by incorporating into Buddhism a great deal of the indigenous animistic, phallic, neocromantic, devil-dancing, and demon-worshiping Bon* religion In philosophy, he replaced Yogācāra idealism with Mādhyamika* Negativism. Systematic translation of the Canon (see Canon, Buddhist) was carried out with remarkable accuracy. A system of patriarchal succession was inaugurated, calling the high priests "lāma" (bla-ma) or "elders."

In the tenth century, following the chaos created by persecution, Lāmaism gained temporal power and purged itself of Bon corruptions. The religious reform was carried out by the Indian monk Atīśa who arrived in 1038, continued the translation of the Canon, and established the Kādam-pa (Order of the Unity of Discipline) which later split into several sects. Priests were allowed to marry, and the system of transmission of head-ship from father to son was started. Kā-dam exerted tremendous political influence, and in the thirteenth century finally achieved political supremacy through alliance with Kubhlai Khān, then emperor of China, who made Lāmaism the state religion of his empire.

In time the religion became highly corrupted, involving outright adultery in the name of "mysterious, blissful, meditative calmness" and "perfect harmony without obstacle." Radical reform was inevitable. This was accomplished by Tsong-khapa (c. 1356) of Northeastern Tibet, who founded the reformed sect of Ge-lug-pa, "the virtuous sect," which later split into several sub-sects. In place of the old red attire, sect members wore yellow hats and robes, which practice gave rise to the name Yellow Hats. Celibacy was enforced, fortnightly recitations of rules were resumed, religious assemblies and retreats were held. Ceremonies, fasts, confessions, the use of bells, ro-saries, and holy water, the worship of saints, the division into dioceses, the concentration of power in the central authority, etc., bear striking similarity to Catholicism. However, there is no evidence of borrowing, though influence from Nestorianism in China cannot be ruled out. The reform was distinguished by the adoption of the yellow attire, the reaffirmation of karma or retribution, and the practice of celibacy. Philosophically, Tsong-kha-pa continued the compromise of Mādhyamika Negativism and esoteric Mantrayāna.

In the fifteenth century, the church was divided under two Grand Lāmas, the origin of the division having been attributed by native historians to Tsong-kha-pa's son, his two pupils, or his elder contemporary. The Dalai Lāma (Gyal-wa-rin-po-ch'e, vast as the "ocean") is the temporal ruler residing in Potala at Lhāsa, regarded as the incarnation of Avalokiteśvara*. The Panchen Lāma (panchen-rin-po-ch'e, "great jewel pandit"), or Tashi Lāma after his residence at Tashi, is the spiritual head with divine power and infallible authority over doctrinal matters, and is regarded as the incarnation of Amitābha (see Amita). A new lāma is selected by discovering the infant born at approximately the same time the previous lāma died, of whom the infant is supposed to be his incarnation.

Tibetan Buddhism, whether in its original or reconstructed form, is based on Vairocana as the Law-body (see trikaya) of the Buddha, Amitābha as the Supreme Being, and Avalokiteśvara as the chief bodhisattva. It is a mystical system of "secrets," with the "seeing of self-nature and the mind of supreme wisdom" as the cause of the religious life, and the salvation of all beings as the result. In practice it emphasizes the "fourfold teaching," including 1) confession, 2) worship of images, 3) recitation of the six-syllabled magic formula om manipadme hūm which constitutes the "true words" that bring about the perfect communion between the Buddha or the bodhisattva and the aspirant, and 4) discipline. These are supported by a wealth of magic verses, rituals, charms, and other esoteric practices, and the extensive use of the praying wheel.

Yellow Hat Lāmaism is prevalent in Tibet, Sinkiang, Mongolia, Manchuria, the Western border of China, and parts of Siberia and European Caucasus, with a total of some 1,000,000 priests and followers in Tibet alone. Red Hat Lāmaism exists in Mongolia and Kokonor. See Buddhism; death and burial practices.

C. Bell, The Religion of Tibet (1931), J. E El-lam, The Religion of Tibet (1927) ; L. A Waddell,
The Buddhism of Tibet (1895) , F. D. Lessing, Jung
Ho Kung (1942)

Lotus Sūtra: (Skr. Saddharma-pundarīka, true-doctrine lotus) The most popular Buddhist scriptures in the Far East, containing the tenets of the Mahāyāna schools of T'ien-t'ai and Nichiren, which regard the sūtra as the king of all sūtras and the embodiment of the Ultimate Doctrine. It teaches salvation for all creatures, reducing the Three Vehicles* to One Vehicle, on the principle of "One is all and All is One." We know nothing of its authorship or its place of origin, but its first translation into Chinese is dated c. 255 A D. Of the three existent Chinese translations, that by Kumārajīva* in 406 A.D. is universally used in China and Japan, along with important commentaries by Chih-k'ai. Eng tr., H. Kern, The Saddharma-pundarīka, or the Lotus of the True Law (1884), W E Soothill, (abridged), The Lotus of the Wonderful Law
(1930).

Mādhyamaka: See Middle Doctrine School.

Mahāvairocana: (Skr. The Great Sun Buddha) The Buddha of the Mystical School* "who illumines the whole world as the sun does." The universe is his Law-body (see trikaya), forever preaching his truth, and all phenomena are his manifestations. The "Realm of Matrix Repository" is his Law-body of Principle, while the "Realm of Diamond Element" is his Law-body of Wisdom, both being aspects of the same Law-body. These two Realms are pictorially represented in "Circles" (mandala). In the mandala of the Repository Realm, Mahāvairocana has the "sign of meditation," whereas in the mandala of the Diamond Realm where he is the first of the Five Wisdom-Buddhas, he has the "sign of wisdom-fist." In both mandalas he sits in the center, surrounded by Buddhas and bodhisattvas, all of whom are his manifestations.

He has many transformations, but the Mystical School is emphatic in denying the identity of Mahāvairocana and Sākyamuni (see Buddha), insisting that the three bodies of each are different. The Law-body of the former is the reality of the Six Great Elements, whereas that of the latter is an abstract principle. See Vairocana.

Mahāyāna: See Buddhism.

Maitreya (Skr.), Metteya (Pāli): (Chin. Mi-lê; Jap. Miroku) a) A bodhisattva* who was the direct or indirect teacher of Asanga, (c 410-500 A.D.?) b) The Future Buddha prophesied by Gotama Buddha, who is to come after 5,670,000,-000 years to spread the Doctrine and to save all beings. His name means benevolence, and another name, Ajita, means invincibility. Definitely a mythological figure, he is said by tradition to have been born in South India, and is often confused with Asanga's teacher. In Buddhist temples, he is represented in the hall of the Four Heavenly Guardians as the Future Buddha, fat and laughing, facing outward and welcoming all worshipers, one hand holding a flower or rosary, each bead of which represents 1,000 years he spent in doing merciful deeds during previous existence, and the other hand holding a mystic bag containing future happiness for all See Buddha; Buddhahood, incarnations.

Mañjusri: a) (Skr., Chin. Wên-shu, Jap. Monju) A bodhisattva*, symbolic of Wisdom, is usually placed on the left of Śākyamuni in temples, while Samantabhadra, representing Compassion, is on his right. There are six interpretations of the name, but the most generally accepted is "wonderful and auspicious." His standard representation includes five curls to his hair, representing the fivefold Wisdom of the Buddha, a sword in his hand, suggesting the penetrative quality of Wisdom, and a lion, indicating the power of Wisdom. Sometimes he rides on a peacock and holds a sūtra instead. He is regarded as the parent of many Buddhas, the ninth predecessor of Śākyamuni, the head of the bodhisattvas, the chief disciple of the Buddha, the son of the Buddha, etc. His most famous center is the Wu-t'ai ("five terraces") Mountain in Shansi, China, the Mecca of many Buddhists. b) A Tantric god.

Meditation School: (Skr. Dhyāna, Chin. Ch'an, Jap Zen) Buddhist meditation has been specially developed in the Ch'an School in China, better known to the West by its Japanese equivalent Zen. The doctrine of Zen is "not founded on words or scriptures," but is "a special transmission outside of the Sacred Teaching," a "transmission from mind to mind." Based on the theories of the "universality of Buddha-nature" and the possibility of "becoming a Buddha in this very body," Zen teaches "directly pointing to the human mind and to become a Buddha by seeing one's nature." Nature denotes the "Store of the All-seeing True Law and the Profound Mind of nirvāna,"* i.e., the Buddha-mind in its highest attributes and true essence. The Buddha-mind knows no distinction of manifestation and silence, mind and its objects, enlightenment and ignorance, or Buddha and sentient beings. It is identical with the "Highest Vehicle," the "Supreme Truth," the "True State," and the "Universal Realm of the One-Truth" of other schools. When this Buddha-mind is penetrated, Buddhahood* is attained.

Interpretations of the Buddha-mind among Zen Masters vary, but in general it is conceived as the void* which is "neither holy nor unholy, neither cause nor effect, neither good nor evil, neither form nor characteristic, neither the root nor the attachment of feelings, and neither the Buddha nor sentient beings." The world of multiplicity, with all its specific characters and distinctions, is the result of our ignorance and attachment, and as such is but a dream. Consequently, to penetrate the Buddha-mind some Masters urged "wu-nien" or absence of thought in the sense that the mind is not in any way to be attached to or influenced by objects. Others advocated "wang ch'ing" or "ignoring our feelings." Still others, contending that the phenomenal world was after all the manifestation of the Buddha-mind and therefore even ignorance involved Buddha-nature, recommended "jên hsin," i.e., letting the mind take its own course.

The fundamental method of attaining Buddhahood, however, is meditation, which the School distinguishes into Tathāgata Meditation and Patriarchal Meditation. The former, the Buddha's way of meditating as set forth in the Lankāvatāra Sūtra, presupposes keen deliberation and a clear understanding of the identity of the Buddha and the originally undefiled mind, whereas the latter, the way of meditation as taught by the Patriarch Bodhidharma*, requires no intellectual effort in bringing about the intuition of the Buddha-mind. Although one can meditate in any position, the regular way is meditation while sitting cross-legged (Jap zazen). Enlightenment (Jap. satori), or the culmination of meditation, may be either gradual or abrupt. It may come before, after, or simultaneously with the cultivation of the religious life. The major tradition, however, is that of "abrupt enlightenment preceding gradual cultivation," on the theory that cultivation must be gradual and guided by the perfect understanding of Truth.

To sharpen the imagination and to sensitize the consciousness so that the Buddha-mind can be more readily intuited, different sects of the School developed different "styles." These include "questions and answers" (Jap. mondo) and also "public problems" (Jap. koan), which are strange and non-logical and are intended to quicken intuition. The Linchi (Jap. Rinzai) Sect employs the "lightning" method, which involves scolding and beating as a way of awakening consciousness, while the Ts'ao-tung (Jap. Soto) Sect prefers careful instruction and gentle guidance.

Zen attributes the mystical beginning of the School to the Buddha* himself, who, so the Zen story goes, one day in the Spirit Vulture Peak imparted to his disciple Mahākāśyapa (Pali, Mahakassapa) the Doctrine of the Buddha-mind by merely plucking a flower without a word. Consequently the School is also called the Buddha-Mind School. It was formally established in China by Bodhidharma in the Liu Sung period, 420-479 A.D., (and not in 520 as generally believed), when the meditation doctrine had been widely accepted and practiced ever since it was first advocated by An Shih-kao (c 150 A.D.), and when the novel doctrine of "Abrupt Enlightenment" had been advanced by Tao-shêng* and had anticipated a heated controversy among Chinese Buddhists. Bodhidharma passed on to Hui-k'o (Jap. Eka), thus starting the "patriarch transmission." This transmission terminated with the sixth patriarch Hui-nêng (638-713) and was replaced by "special transmissions," namely, the Northern School of Gradual Enlightenment and the Southern School of Abrupt Enlightenment. The Northern School, founded by Shên-hsiu (605-706), soon disappeared, but the Southern School, founded by Hui-nêng, developed into seven sects. Since the eleventh century, however, only the Lin-chi and the Ts'ao-tung Sects have continued in China. In Japan, Zen was introduced several times from the seventh to the ninth century. Eisai founded the Rinzai Sect in Japan in 1191, and Dogen founded the Soto Sect in 1227. The former promulgated Zen as the "protection of the nation," while the latter advocated the restoration of power to the Throne, thus linking Zen with the Japanese national life. The Fuke Sect, founded by Kakushin in 1255, eventually became a community of ronins ("lordless warriors") and was abolished in 1868 The Japanese Obaku Sect, founded by Ingen in 1654, has 587 temples and 120,000 adherents, while Soto has 14,257 and 6,848,000 and Rinzai has 5,979 and 2,530,000 respectively. See Buddhism.

D T. Suzuki, An Introduction to Zen Buddhism (1934) ; Essays in Zen Buddhism, First Series (1927), Second Series (1933), Third Series (1934), Fourth Series (1938) ; Studies in the Lankavatara Sutra (1930).

Middle Doctrine School: The Mādhyamaka (Skr. Middle Doctrine) School of Nāgārjuna (c. 100-200 A D.), one of the two wings of Mahāyāna Buddhism* in India, was introduced into China by Kumārajīva* (d. 413 A.D.) who translated Nāgārjuna's three Treatises into Chinese, namely, the Mādhyamika Śāstra, Ger. tr. by Walleser, Die Mittlere Lerhe (1912), partial Eng. tr. by Stcherbatsky, The Conception of Buddhist Nirvāṇa (1927), the Dvādasa Śastra ("Twelve Gates"), and the Śata Śāstra, tr. by G. Tucci, in Pre-Dinnāga Buddhist Texts on Logic from Chinese Sources (1930). Consequently the School is also called Three-Treatise (Chin. San-lun, Jap. Sanron) School.

The doctrines of the School, transmitted through Sêng-chao (383-414 A.D.) were so greatly elaborated and systematized by Chi-tsang (549-623) that beginning from him the School was known as the New San-lun. It rapidly declined after the eighth century and soon disappeared. Introduced into Japan by Ekwan in 625, it never existed there as an independent sect.

This School has been variously characterized as Nihilism, Relativity (by Stcherbatsky), and Negativism. Its ideal is the Absolute or Ultimate Void. From the standpoint of "common truth," dharmas (elements) may be said to be real. From the standpoint of the "higher truth," however, they are merely relative since they are produced through causation. They are phenomenally real, but have no independent reality or self-nature. Reality is therefore the total absence of specific character. It is the "Middle Path of Eightfold Negation" which recognizes "no production, no extinction, no annihilation, no permanence, no unity, no diversity, no coming, and no departure." That production, extinction, etc., are unreal can be proved by the use of the "Four Points of Argument," i.e., by refuting an idea as ens, as non-ens, as either ens or non-ens, and as neither ens nor non-ens.

The belief of being or non-being is an extreme which must be replaced by a "middle" which affirms both being and non-being. But this "middle" is merely a "relative middle," itself an extreme, and must be rejected in favor of a "middle devoid of extremes." The result of this dialectic method is the Absolute Middle which is the "Middle Path of the Eightfold Negation."

The "True State of the Middle Path" is the total negation of self-nature and all specific characters. It is the "inexplicable in speech and inconceivable in thought" It is nirvāna*. It is the Ultimate Void.

Void* as interpreted by this School is negatively non-entity but positively Reality "devoid" of specific nature, which means "absence of nature" (svabhāva-abhāva) or Dharma-nature (Dharma-svabhāva). The Void is first of all the Void in the sense of "antithesis of being," secondly the Void "devoid of specific character," and thirdly the "Void in the Highest Sense," the highest synthesis of all oppositions. In short, it is the Absolute Middle, the Ultimate Void See śūnya.

Mystical School, Buddhist: The School, a branch of Mahāyāna*, considers the universe itself to be the Great Sun Buddha (Mahāvairocana*, who has the two aspects of Principle, which corresponds to the "Realm of Matrix Repository (Garbhakośa-dhātu)," and Wisdom, which corresponds to the "Realm of Diamond Element (Vajra-dhātu)." "Diamond Element" means hardness and utility, suggesting that the ever-present Secret Truth cannot be destroyed and that the power of Wisdom removes every obstacle on the way to Enlightenment. This Realm is Buddha's Law-body (see trikaya), of Wisdom, the realm of clear discrimination, of mental dharmas (elements), of the vertical cross-section of the universe, of Effect, of Great Enlightenment, and of the Buddha. "Matrix Repository" means to hold and to cover, i.e., to keep things within the original body of being, like keeping a child in the mother's womb. This Realm is Buddha's Law-body of Principle, the realm of absolute equality, of the dharmas, of form, of the horizontal cross-section of the universe, of Cause, of Great Compassion, and of sentient beings. But the two Realms constitute one universe; they are but two aspects of the same Law-body. "They are two and yet not two."

The nature of the universe consists of the Six Great Elements, namely, Earth, Water, Fire, Air, Space, and Consciousness, which are called the "Six Great Originations." They are mutually dependent and penetrating, so that none can exist without the others, as, for example, no Buddha exists outside of sentient beings and no sentient being exists outside of Buddha. This is the principle of the "Harmony of the Six Elements Without Obstacle."

The character of the universe is described in terms of the "Four Circles (mandala)," meaning the fourfold perfection of the character, form, name, and function of things. Each of these in any or all levels of existence involves all of them in all levels of existence.

The activity of the universe consists of the "Three Mysteries," i.e., the Mysteries of Action, Speech, and Thought. All phenomena are the action, speech, and thought of the Great Sun Buddha. For human beings, the "Three Mysteries" are "finger-intertwining" and other activities of the body, "mystical verse" and other "true words," and yoga concentration. This threefold ritual is considered the only effectual means of communion with the Buddha, and it is from the second "Mystery" that the School gets its names True-Word (Chin. Chên-yen, Jap. Shingon) and Mantra (Secret, Chin. Mi Tsung). Concentration leads to identification with the Buddha, resulting in "Buddha-in-me and I-in-Buddha." This takes place in the present world, as one can "become the Great Sun Buddha right in this body." Because of these mystical tendencies, the School has always regarded itself as esoteric and others as exoteric.

The Mystical Doctrine was transmitted in China by three Indian teachers, Subhakarasimha (637-735) who came to China in 716 and translated the basic scripture of the School, the Mahāvairocana Sūtra; Vajrabodhi (663-723) who arrived in 720 and translated the Vajra-śekhara Sūtra; and Amoghavajra (705-774) who came with his teacher Vajrabodhi and translated the Tattvasaṅgraha Sūtra. The School rapidly declined after the ninth century. Today only certain of its rituals are practiced in Lāmaism*.

In Japan, on the other hand, the School (Shingon) is the second largest Buddhist sect, having 11,947 temples and 9,117,000 adherents with the Koya Mountain as the center. The doctrine was brought from China by several Great Masters, among whom was Kobo Daishi (Kūkai, 774-835) who organized and systematized the School, becoming its founder. This is the mystical doctrine handed down by him in the East Temple (Toji), called Tomitsu, as distinguished from Taimitsu*. See trikāya.

Nāgārjuna: (c. 100-200 A.D.) A native of South India, pupil of Aśvaghosha's follower Kapimala, and teacher of Āryadeva (Deva). He wrote many important Buddhist treatises, and founded one of the two major Mahāyāna movements, namely, the Middle Doctrine School*. The Mystical School* is also traced to him.

Nichiren: (Jap. Sun Lotus) The Nichiren School, an offshoot of the Tendai School* of Mahāyāna Buddhism, is indigenous to Japan and is distinguished by its fighting attitude and nationalistic spirit. It is based on Kumārajīva's Chinese version of the Lotus Sūtra, but more significantly on the personality of its founder Nichiren (1222-1282). Son of a fisherman, Nichiren determined to revive the Tendai doctrine, viciously attacked other schools, saying that "the Jodo School is hell, Zen is devil, Shingon will cause national collapse, and Ritsu is an enemy of the country." He wanted the government to suppress these sects by force. Eventually his militant attitude led first to his exile and later to his death sentence, which he managed to escape. He identified his religion with the destiny of his nation, and called himself "the pillar, the eye, and the vessel" of Japan.

While Nichiren aimed at the revival of Tendai, he differed from the Tendai of Dengyo Daishi in his interpretation of the Lotus. He regarded all other Buddhist scriptures and the first fourteen chapters of the Lotus as the "trace doctrines of the Trace Buddha," i.e., doctrines of the incarnate Buddha, and asserted that the last fourteen chapters contained the "essential original doctrine of the Original Buddha." In these latter chapters the Buddha speaks of his own personality, saying that his historical existence was but a manifestation of his original person which is his Lawbody (see trikaya). As the School purports to promulgate the original doctrine of the Original Buddha contained in the Lotus, it also calls itself the Hommon-Hokke (Original Lotus) School.

Furthermore, Tendai considered thought as important, in which all the "three thousand worlds" are imminent. Nichiren, on the other hand, contended that all worlds centered around the personality of the Buddha. He went back to the original Tendai doctrine of the identity of principle and fact, and emphasized not only right thought, but also right practice, which would lead to "Buddhahood in this very body."

There are at present eight branches in Japan, with 5,031 temples and 7,376,000 adherents. The Nichiren School proper and the Kempon-Hokke (Elucidating the Original Lotus) branch are the most influential. See Buddhism.

M. Anesaki, Nichiren, the Buddhist Prophet (1916).

nirvana (Skr.), nibbāna (Pāli): A term of various interpretations according to different possible stems. Nirvāṇa in general means "blown out" as of a lamp, i.e., one having attained enlightenment through extinguishing all of his desires. The Chinese translate it as "emancipation," "tranquil extinction," "non-production" of the cause of life and death, "non-creation" of the conditions of karma, "bliss," and more generally "extinction and ferrying across," i.e., extinguishing the cause and effect of reincarnation and crossing the sea of saṅsāra or the cycle of birth and rebirths.

Although the Buddha was silent on the subject, nirvāna has become the goal of all arhats, bodhisattvas*, and the followers of the Buddha. Hinayanists confine it to monks, conceiving it as extinction of evil passions and false views and as freedom from saṅsāra. This does not mean annihilation of individual existence as often supposed, but the cessation of rebirth, the extinction of passions, and the replacement of suffering by bliss.

There are two kinds of nirvāna, both leading to arhatship. One is the "Nirvāna with Remainder," or nirvāna with the material and immaterial conditions of being (upādhi) remaining, with the cause, but not all the effects, of reincarnation destroyed. The other is "Nirvāna without Remainder," or total extinction of conditions of life, with both the cause and effect of reincarnation destroyed. The former is attainable during life, the latter occurs at death. The Vijñaptimātratā-siddhi of the Idealists School distinguished four kinds of Nirvāna 1) the "Nirvāna of originally Pure Self-nature" equivalent to the Law-body or the reality underlying existence that is present in all human beings, 2) & 3) as above, and 4) "Nirvāna without Abode" or thusness*.

While Hīnayāna regards Nirvāna and sansara as incompatible, Mahāyāna regards them as identical just as the ocean and the waves are inseparable. The nirvāna of Hīnayāna means non-being, transcendence of the human cycle of life and death, emancipation, bliss, and purity. Nirvāna in Mahāyāna, on the other hand, is above being and non-being, transcends all cycles of life and death, involves the Law-body and Supreme Wisdom in addition to emancipation, and denotes personality as well as the three conditions mentioned above. The emphasis on the fourfold meaning of permanency, bliss, self, and purity gives the nirvāna of Mahāyāna a positive character. These are to be interpreted as transcendental qualities of the Buddha, who as the Tathāgata in nirvāna, is entirely free from desires, abides eternally, is above life and death as well as subjectivity and objectivity. Nirvāna is after all transcendental. It is neither existent, nor non-existent, nor either existent and non-existent, nor non-existent and not non-existent. It is the Law-body, thusness, the void, the True State, attainable in this world, by achieving Supreme Wisdom and "seeing into the abode of Reality as it is." It is attainable by all people, even the icchantika (i.e., devoid of Buddha-nature).

L. de La Vallée Poussin, The Way to Nirvana (1917); Th. Stcherbatsky, The Conception of Buddhist Nirvana (1927).

Obaku Shu: A branch of the Meditation School* of Buddhism in Japan.

Pure Land School: (Chin. Ching-t'u, Jap. Jodo) Buddhist Mahāyāna pietism, most popular school in China and Japan. Founded in China by Hui-yüan, 334-416 A.D., and in Japan by Honen, 1173-1212, the School aims at birth in the Pure Land (Skr. Sukhāvatī), the Land of Bliss, the Western Heaven of Amita*. Following the teachings of its three scriptures, the larger and the smaller Sukhāvatī-vyūha Sutras and the Amitāyur-dhyāna Sutra (all translated in the Sacred Books of the East, XLIX), the School teaches absolute faith in Amita and salvation through "Other's Power" as the "Easy Way" or the "Pure Land Path," instead of salvation through "One's Own Power" as taught by other schools, which is the "Difficult Way" or the "Holy Path." Reliance on Amita is expressed in the daily repetition of "Namo Amitābha" nembutsu, and in the recitation of the 48 vows of the Buddha described in the larger Sukhāvatī, especially the three fundamental ones, namely, the eighteenth which promises birth in the Pure Land to the faithful, the nineteenth which promises a personal welcome by Amita to all good people at their death, and the twentieth which assures birth in the Pure Land as the result of the repetition of Buddha's name. In the Pure Land, attainment of nirvāna* is sure and easy. Though least philosophical of all Buddhist schools, the Pure Land doctrines of salvation by faith and salvation for all are based on the Infinity of the Buddha, the presence of Buddha-nature in all creatures, and the idea of One-in-all and All-in-one. Minor differences exist in the four Japanese sects of Jodo (8,245 temples & 3,646,000 adherents), Shin (19,815 & 13,327,000), Yūzunembutsu (357 & 153,000), and Ji (494 & 350,000).

Rinzai Shu: A branch of the Meditation School* of Buddhism in Japan

Sarvāstivāda (Skr.), Sabbatthivada (Pali): The "All-Exists" School, also called Hetuvāda and Vibhajyavāda Realism in Hīnayāna Buddhism, a branch of Theravāda (see Councils, Buddhist), which regarded all dharmas (elements) and the three times (past, present, and future) as real. It flourished in Northern India, especially in Kāshmīr and Gandhāra, in the fifth century B C. and ultimately divided into some seven schools, among which was Sautrāntika*, forerunner of Kośa*.

Satyasiddhi School: (Skr. completion of truth, Chin. Ch'êng-shis, Jap. Jojitsu) Buddhist Nihilism. Based on the Satyasiddhi Śāstra by Harivarman (c. 250-350 A.D.) of Central India, the School purported to "complete" the Four Noble Truths (see Buddhism) by showing that not only dharmas (elements), of which the School recognized 84, but also the ego are non-existent. This Twofold void* is established on the doctrine of Twofold Truth to the effect that from the standpoint of Worldly Truth, the ego and the elements are real as "temporary names," temporary because 1) they are produced by causes, 2) they are transitory, and 3) they are dependent on other factors, whereas from the standpoint of the Supreme Truth, Nirvāna* alone is real. Nirvāna is conceived as the Ultimate Void and the total "annihilation" of the "consciousness of temporary names," the "consciousness of the elements," and even the "consciousness of the Void itself."

Whether there was ever a Satyasiddhi School in India is not known. Its doctrine was introduced into China when the Śāstra was translated into Chinese by Kumārajīva* in 411 A.D., becoming one of the earliest Buddhist schools of thought in China, and exceedingly popular in the fifth and sixth centuries. At first it was regarded as Mahāyānistic, but Tao-hsuan (596-667) finally traced it to the Indian Sautrāntika School of Hīnayāna. Since the ninth century, it was absorbed by the Middle Doctrine School*. It always existed as a branch of that School in Japan where it was introduced by the Korean priest Ekwan in 625 A.D. Today it is no longer an active sect in either country.

Sautrāntika: (Skr. "Sūtra" School) Early Buddhist school which regarded the sūtras or dialogues of the Buddha as the only authority, in opposition to both the Abhidharmikas who relied on the Abhidhamma literature three or five hundred years after the Buddha*, and the Vaibhāṣikas who relied on its commentaries. See Canon, Buddhist.

Shin (Shu): (Jap. True Sect) Most popular Buddhist sect in Japan, founded by Shinran (1173-1262), a branch of the Japanese Pure Land School*. It differs from the orthodox Pure Land in that it takes only the eighteenth vow of the larger Sukhāvatī-vyūha Sutra to be necessary, teaches absolute reliance on Amitābha (Buddha of Infinite Light), instead of one's own act, considers the repetition of "Namo Amitābha" merely as thanksgiving instead of a necessity for salvation, and allows priests to live an ordinary life including marriage and eating meat.

Soto Shu: (Jap.) A branch of the Meditation School* of Buddhism in Japan.

stages, ten: (Skr. daśa-bhūmi) Stages of a bodhisattva's* spiritual development towards Buddhahood*. The Hīnayāna* schools of Mahāsaṅghika and Theravāda and the Mahāyana* schools of Mysticism (see Mystical School, Buddhist) and Idealism (see above) have their own Ten Stages. There are also Ten Stages for each of the Mahāyāna Vehicles* as well as the Ten Stages common to the Three Vehicles. The most widely accepted set in Mahāyāna, however, is that for the bodhisattva, set forth in the Daśa-bhūmi Śāstra of the Hua-yen School*. It includes. 1) The Stage of Joy, in which the bodhisattva develops his holy nature, removes wrong views, and realizes the principle of the Twofold Void, 2) The Stage of Purity, in which he attains the Perfection of Morality, 3) The Stage of Illumination, in which he attains the Perfection of Patience or Humility and also the deepest introspective insight; 4) The Stage of Flaming Wisdom, in which he achieves the Perfection of Energy; 5) The Stage of Utmost Invincibility, in which he achieves the Perfection of Meditation and realizes the harmony of the Worldly Truth and the Supreme Truth; 6) The Stage of Presence, in which he achieves the Perfection of Wisdom, thereby eliminating the discrimination of purity and impurity, 7) The Stage of Far-going, in which he attains the Perfection of Expediency by going afar to save all beings, 8) The Stage of Immovability, in which he attains the Perfection of Vow and realizes the principle that all specific characters of dharmas (elements) are unreal; 9) The Stage of Good Wisdom, in which the bodhisattva achieves the Perfection of Effort, attains the Ten Holy Powers, and preaches to both the redeemable and the unredeemable, and 10) The Stage of the Cloud of the Law, in which he completes the pāramitā of Perfect Knowledge and preaches the Law to save all creatures, like the cloud drops rain over all.

śūnya, śūnyatā: (Skr.) Empty, emptiness; Void. The doctrine of Void is especially promulgated by the two Buddhist "Void" Schools, Satyasiddhi* Nihilism of Hīnayāna*, which affirms the Twofold Void of the self and dharmas (elements), and Mādhyamaka* Negativism of Mahāyāna*, which asserts the Ultimate Void which has no specific character. The doctrine, however, is common to all Mahāyāna schools, which have analyzed the Void under as many as eighteen categories. It has been variously interpreted as Nihilism, Negativism, and Absolutism. In the Treatises by Nāgārjuna*, who first formulated the doctrine, causal relations and the entities they produce are dialectically negated, leaving the Void above all specific characters and partial or temporary existence. In the Prajña-paramitā literature, especially in the Vajracchedika (Diamond Sūtra; several Eng trs., including one by Max Muller, "Sūtra of Transcendental Wisdom," in the Sacred Books of the East, XLIX, 1894), the Tathāgata is emphatically stated to "have no marks" or characteristics, which are illusory and have no independent reality. Ultimate Reality, whether called the Tathāgata, the True State, thusness, nirvāna, the Middle Path, or the Void, is above all specific qualities, including the quality of being Void itself. Thus the Void essentially involves the negation of names, characters, self-nature, and independent reality for things, which are accepted as phenomenally and temporarily real but not ultimately real. To the Hua-yen* and T'ien-t'ai Schools*, however, Temporariness and Void are identical.

D. T. Suzuki insists that the Void not only has the negative aspect of unreality, but also the positive aspect of Suchness or Thusness (tathatā) or the Absolute. Th. Stcherbatsky interprets the Void as Relativity, in the sense that a thing can be identified only by relating it to the Absolute. J. Takakusu prefers the Chinese word k'ung which connotes all the necessary phases of meaning: first, Void in the sense of antithesis of being; second, the state of being "devoid" of specific character, third, Void in the highest sense, or Transcendental Void, i.e., all oppositions synthesized (as in Hua-yen and T'ien-t'ai), and fourth, the Absolute Void or the Unconditioned.

As Absolute, the Void cannot be expressed in words or apprehended by "common knowledge," but can only be described by "Neti! Neti!" (not so, not so) and attained by direct intuition.

Taimitsu: (Jap. Tendai Mysticism) There are two doctrines of Buddhist Mysticism in Japan. One was handed down by Kobo Daishi (774-835) in Toji (East Temple), called Tomitsu or Eastern Mysticism. The other was handed down by Jikaku Daishi (794-864) of the Tendai School, called Taimitsu or Tendai Mysticism. The former considers the Great Sun Buddha* to be different from Śākyamuni, while the latter regards them as identical. The former relies on the teaching of the Great Sun Sūtra which teaches that there are two aspects of the universe (see Mystical School, Buddhist), whereas the latter follows the Lotus Sūtra which insists on the One-True. Hence the different sects of Ryobu (Double Aspect) Shinto and Ichijitsu (One-True) Shinto based on the two doctrines respectively.

Tao-shêng: (d. 434 A.D.) A pupil of Ku-mārajīva*. He exerted tremendous influence on Chinese Buddhist thought along four lines· 1) He violently opposed the "icchantika" doctrine of the six-chapter Nirvāna Sūtra to the effect that this class of people can never become Buddha. He maintained that Buddha-nature is all-pervading and therefore even the icchantika can attain Buddahood*. His novel idea so shocked and enraged his fellow Buddhists that he was excommunicated in 428 or 429. Later his theory was upheld by the Mahāparinirvāna Sūtra subsequently introduced, and became the foundation of the Mahāyāna* doctrine of "salvation for all" promulgated in the T'ien-t'ai, Pure Land, and Meditation Schools. 2) He completed the "abrupt enlightenment" doctrine which became exceedingly strong in the T'ang dynasty (618-907), especially in the Meditation School. He argued that Truth, being a unity, must be intuited all at once. 3) He maintained that nirvāna* is above the distinction of life and death—it is the True State or the Law-body (see trikaya) of the Buddha, which has no specific character. Holding such distinctions as purity and impurity, or cause and effect, to be unreal, he declared that "the Buddha has no Pure Land," and that "goodness should not be rewarded." 4) He denied that Buddha-nature was identical with the soul, thus overthrowing the traditional interpretation ever since the Han dynasty (206 B.C.-220 A.D.).

Tendai School: (Jap.) Idem T'ien-t'ai School.*

thusness, suchness: (Skr. bhūtatathatā, tathatā, Chin. chên ju, Jap. shinnyo) a) The state of nature, which is 1) real in the sense of transcending appearance and specific characters, and 2) eternal. Thusness is neither produced nor annihilated, neither one nor differentiated, neither being nor non-being nor both or either. It is the Absolute, identical with Self-nature, Buddha-nature, the Law-body (see trikaya), the Tathāgata, the Void*, dharma-dhātu, Dharma-nature, the True State, and nirvāna*. b) Truth in the Buddhistic sense.

T'ien-t'ai School: (Chin.) The T'ien-t'ai doctrine centers around the principle of the Perfectly Harmonious Threefold Truth, i.e., the truth of the void*, the truth of Temporariness, and the truth of the Mean. All things are Void because they depend on causes and therefore have no independent reality, but because they are produced they enjoy temporary existence. Being both Void and Temporary is the nature of dharmas (elements), and as such is the Mean. Thus the Void, Temporariness, and the Mean involve one another—they are both three and one.

From the standpoint of Temporariness, the phenomenal world consists of ten Realms, those of the Buddhas, Would-be-Buddhas, Buddhas-for-Themselves, Direct Disciples of the Buddha, heavenly beings, spirits, human beings, departed beings, beasts, and depraved men. Each Realm has the characteristics of all ten Realms, thus giving the total of 100 Realms. Each of these in turn are characterized by ten features in the sense that all their dharmas are "thus-characterized, thus-natured, thus-substantiated, thus-caused, thus-forced, thus-activated, thus-conditioned, thus-remunerated, and thus-completed-from-beginning-to-end." Again, each of these one thousand Realms consists of the three divisions of living beings, of space, and of the aggregates which constitute being, thus making a total of 3,000 Realms.

But the Realm of Temporariness or the phenomenal world is at the same time the Realm of the Void, the noumenon, and also the Realm of the Mean which is both phenomenon and noumenon. These Realms are so interwoven, so inter-penetrating, and so inter-related that they may be considered to be "immanent in a single instant of consciousness." This does not mean that they are produced by the thought of man or the Buddha, although the T'ien-t'ai doctrine does have definite connection with the Idealistic theory. It rather means that in every thought-moment all the possible worlds are involved.

The Realms exist by virtue of their own dharma-nature, they are "immanent in principle". As they come into being through causes and conditions, they are also "immanent in fact." "Immanence in principle" and "immanence in fact," however, are identical. The dharmas of beings, the dharmas of the Buddhas, and the dharmas of consciousness are in the final analysis the same. Cause and effect are but two aspects of the same process, and the material element and mind are fundamentally one. This One-is-All and All-is-One philosophy is crystallized in the saying that "Every color or fragrance is none other than the Middle Path." In other words, every dharma is the embodiment of the real essence of the True State, which is also called Absolute Reality, Ultimate void, thusness, or nirvāna*.

As everything involves everything else, it follows that even the nature of Buddha is not free from evil, and the nature of the depraved man is also good. "Buddha-nature is everywhere over the world." This being the case, all beings are qualified to become Buddha. The School therefore strongly insists on the doctrine of "salvation for all," and completely rejects the "icchantika"

(i e, devoid of Buddha-nature) theory Only one vehicle*, the Buddha Vehicle, is recognized instead of three.

The T'ien-t'ai School has developed a special formula of meditation called "calmness and insight" Calmness, literally "at rest," connotes putting the wrong mind at rest by realizing that dharmas are neither produced nor annihilated, and insight means the intuition of both the Void and the Temporariness of Reality

This Mahāvāna School*, also called the Lotus School, was founded in China by Chih-k'ai, the Great Master of T'ien-t'ai (Chih-i, 531-597) in the T'ien-t'ai ("heavenly terrace") Mountain on the authority of the *Lotus Sūtra The doctrine is traced to Hui-wên (d 577) who was inspired by the Mādhyamika Śāstra and the Mahaprajñapārāmsta Sūtra At present T'ien-t'ai is very popular in China, and is to a large extent combined with the Pure Land Sect* In Japan where it was founded in 804 by Dengyo Daishi (Saicho, 767-822), the School (Tendai) has three branches (Sammon, Jimon, and Shinsei) with 4,438 temples and 2,141,000 followers. See trikāya, Triad.

Triad, Buddhist: The Buddhist Triad has different meaning from the Christian trinity. It means a) the Triple Body or *trikāya, b) the Three Precious Ones or Triratna, and c) the Three Honored Ones, groups like 1) Mañjuśri representing Wisdom, Śākyamuni, and Samantabhadra representing the Principle (called the Three Holy Ones of the Hua-yen School*, 2) Mahāsthāma(prata), the embodiment of Wisdom, Amitābha, and Avalokiteśvara* the embodiment of Compassion (T'ien-t'ai School*), 3) Bhaishajvaguru as the Lord of the Lost Paradise, Śākyamuni as the Lord of the present world, (often with minor figures of Ānanda and Mahākassapa on his sides), and Amitābha as the Lord of the Future Paradise (Meditation School*), 4) Samantabhadra, Avalokiteśvara, and Mahāsthāmaprata, 5) Manjusri, Avalokitesvara and Vajrapani, embodiment of power.

trikāya: (Skr. triple body) A Mahāyāna* doctrine arising about the second century and crystalizing in the fifth century A D., the trikāya idea has not only theological, but also ontological and cosmological meanings. The Buddha is conceived to have three bodies· 1) Dharma-kāya or the Lawbody, interpreted by Hīnayāna* as the soul of the Buddha, but by Mahāyāna as reality as such, identical with suchness, Tathāgata, the void*, the Middle Path, the Absolute. It is the embodiment of Law both transcending and immanent in all phenomena. It is the same for all Buddhas. The Mystical School* alone treats the Law-body as personal. 2) Sambhogakāya, the Enjoyment-body, Reward-body, or Body of Bliss. Not mentioned in the Hīnayāna Canon, this is the embodiment of Wisdom, the Buddha who enjoys and makes others enjoy the fruits of his saving efforts as a bodhisattva*, the Buddha forever preaching to the bodhisattvas, the Tathāgata personified, the chief object of worship. 3) Nirmāna-kāya or Transformation-body. This is the embodiment of Compassion. In general this means the historical Buddha Śākyamuni. Since the transformation of the Tathāgata is not limited to Śākyamuni, however, Nirmāna-kāya Buddhas are to be found everywhere and at all times The Three Bodies are really not separate Bodies, but three aspects of the same Buddha, one involving the other two There are also further divisions into four, five, six, and ten Bodies See nirvana, thusness; Triad, Buddhist, Triratna.

Triratna: (Skr. three treasures) The Three Precious Ones Buddha, Dharma (Doctrine), and Sangha (Order). They are understood in various ways 1) The trikāya as represented in temples, generally Amitābha, Vairocana, and Locana respectively 2) These three treasures embodied in every Buddha and every member of the Order. 3) These three treasures embodied in thusness*. 4) Dharma-kāya, the One Vehicle Doctrine, and bodhisattvas of the One Vehicle (T'ien-t'ai School*). 5) The Trikāya, the Three Vehicle Doctrine, and followers of the Three Vehicles*. 6) The Trikāya, the six pāramitas, and the saints of the Ten Stages (see stages, ten). 7) The Transformation Buddha, the Four Noble Truths and the Twelvefold Chain of Causation, and the Four Effects of Enlightenment 8) Buddha image, Scripture, and the shaved hair of monks and nuns. The last three groups are common to Hīnayāna*. See Triad, Buddhist.

Vairocana: (Skr.) a) The true Buddha-body, i.e., Godhead Interpretations vary· 1) Meaning "omnipresent" and "purity" respectively, Vairocana and Locana are Law-body and Enjoyment-body in the trikāya, corresponding to the Principle or Law and Wisdom. (T'ien-t'ai & Idealistic Schools.) 2) Vairocana and Locana are identical, the two names being the same and meaning "light illumining everywhere." They are the Enjoyment-body of the Buddha. (Hua-yen School) 3) Vairocana, interpreted as "The Great Sun" and "universal illumination," is Mahāvairocana* (Mystical School*) b) In *Triratna, he represents the Doctrine, while Locana symbolizes the Order. The former has hands folded over the breast while the latter has the right hand resting in his lap. See Buddha.

Vasubandhu: (c. 420-500 A.D.) (Takakusu), or d. 350 A.D. (Péri) A native of North India, and younger brother of Asanga who converted him from Hīnayāna to Mahāyana. He was the author of the fundamental treatises of the Hinayanistic Kośa* and the Mahayanistic Idealistic Schools*, and some fifteen other works representative of various phases of Buddhist philosophy. As such he was not only the central figure of both Buddhist Realism and Idealism but also a great philosopher of Buddhism in general.

vehicles: (Skr. yāna, originally meaning "career," extended to connote a vehicle that carries living beings across the sea of life and death to nirvāna*). There are divisions from One Vehicle to Five Vehicles. Among the most important are. 1) The Three Vehicles (Triyāna) of Mahāyāna a) Śravaka or "hearer," i e, the direct disciples of the Buddha or obedient followers This is also called Hīnayāna or Small Vehicle, as the aim is for the individual to become an arhat (see araham) through the realization of the Four Noble Truths b) Pratyeka-buddha or "Buddha for oneself" through the realization of the Twelve-fold Chain of Causation. This is also called Mādhyamayāna or Middle Vehicle. c) Bodhisattva* or Future Buddha who leads all beings to salvation. This is also called Mahāyāna or Great Vehicle. 2) The One Vehicle (Ekayāna) or Mahāyāna, as advocated in the Hua-yen and T'ien-t'ai Schools. These Schools consider the various Vehicles as merely "expedient" ways, and the One Vehicle, i.e., the Buddha Vehicle (Buddhayāna) as set forth in the *Lotus Sūtra, as the inclusive, final, and "true" Vehicle which carries all beings to nirvāṇa.

Vinaya School: See Disciplinary School.

void: See sūnya; Middle Doctrine School.

Yogācāra: (Skr.) See Idealistic School, Buddhist.

Yūzūnembutsu Shu: (Jap. All-Permeating-Faith-in-Amita Sect) A branch of the Pure Land School* of Buddhism in Japan, founded by Ryonin (1071-1132), with the doctrine that merits of faith are transferable to others, based on the teaching of faith of the Pure Land School, the One-and-All idea of the *Avataṅsaka Sūtra, and the salvation-for-all idea of the *Lotus Sūtra.

Zen: (Jap.) See Meditation School.   w.t c.

Bugenhagen, Johann: (1485-1558) German Protestant Reformer. A distinguished scholar and close friend of Luther, he was chiefly remembered as an able organizer of the Reformation in Northern Germany and Denmark.   G R.C.

Bulgaria, Church of: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

bull, papal: The name given to the official letters published by the Sovereign Pontiff in the most solemn form. Written in the most solemn style, they begin with the words "Episcopus Servus Servorum Dei" and contain usually decrees about doctrinal matters, decrees of canonization, decrees on matters of ecclesiastical discipline, proclamations of jubilees, the promulgation of general indulgences, the concession of the pallium, and other matters of general importance. The name is derived from the Latin word bulla which signified a small circular ball of metal which has been used with varying imitations for centuries for sealing the more important papal documents. The oldest known usage dates back to the seventh century, and these early seals were made of lead. Until the time of Pope Leo XIII bulls were sealed with lead and briefs with red wax seals stamped with "the Fisherman's ring." But Pope Leo XIII* changed the usage and limited the use of lead seals to such documents as the election, suppression or provision of bishoprics. These lead seals now have on one side the images of SS. Peter and Paul and on the other the name of the reigning pontiff. Since that time the other bulls are sealed with red wax seals bearing the images of SS. Peter and Paul and around them the name of the reigning pontiff. Classed frequently with bulls are papal briefs Briefs*, the name of which comes from the Latin word breve signifying short, came into use during the Middle Ages and were used indifferently for titles, judicial acts, and similar documents of all kinds formally drawn up. This word brief with time lost its original meaning and it has come to mean lesser kinds of papal documents bearing the papal seal and dealing with dispensations of all kinds, with the permission to keep the Blessed Sacrament, to give Holy Communion, etc. Briefs have their importance from the matter with which they deal, as bulls have their greater importance because of the weightier matters with which they are concerned. Outside of these distinctions the main difference between brief and bull are matters of usage and of form. Briefs usually begin with the name of the pope, such as "Benedictus papa XV" and end with the words "sub annulo piscatoris." In addition to these ordinary bulls there exist "demi-bulls" (Bullae Demidiatae), which are solemn formal papal documents issued by a newly elected pope between the time of his election and coronation; the seal bears on one side the heads of the apostles Peter and Paul, but the other side is blank. "Little bulls" were papal documents in which smaller leaden seals were attached to the parchment. This custom held during the Middle Ages, and so-called "little bulls" should be distinguished from briefs. "Bulls of gold" were seals in which gold replaced the lead, these, however, were used only on exceptional occasions such as when addressing rulers, etc. Bulls and briefs are distinct from a motu proprio and rescripts. A motu proprio is a papal letter without the seal and usually drawn up on the initiative of the pope himself and signed by him personally. It usually deals with matters of lesser importance. A rescript is a document answering a question or petition to the Pope or one of the sacred congregations and usually affects only the persons or person to whom it is addressed. See encyclicals.   T.T.M.

Bullaria: See Decretals.

Bullinger, Heinrich: (1504-1575) Swiss Reformer. After experience as a teacher and pastor, he succeeded Zwingli* as chief pastor of Zurich in 1531. He was an able writer and forceful thinker, but in a controversial age he showed himself able to understand others and anxious to find grounds of agreement with them. His controversial works show dignity and restraint. Responsible for the Helvetic Confession* (1566); influential in English religious life. See Zürich, Concensus of.
          G.R.C.

bull-roarer: A piece of wood, tied to the end of a string, which makes a roaring sound when it is whirled about   It was used by Australian aborigines in religious ceremonies   See Spencer & Gillen.   P.G.M.

Bultmann, Rudolf: (1884-   ) He first taught in Breslau and Giessen.   Now he is professor in Marburg   He is a working member of the dialectical* theologians, one of the most radical groups that has prophetic significance in our day.   Bultmann has also been active in the historical and form-historical study of the gospels   See Form Criticism Die Geschichte der Synoptischen Tradition (Göttingen, 1921), Der Begriff der Offenbarung im Neuen Testament (Tübingen, 1929); Die Erforschung der synoptischen Evangelien, 2 ed , (Giessen, 1930), Glauben und Verstehen (Tübingen, 1933), Jesus and the Word (1934).   H.H.

Bunyan, John:(1628-1688) English preacher and prose writer, remembered chiefly as the author of Pilgrim's Progress (Part I, 1678, Part II, 1684). Despite poverty, lack of formal education, and a twelve year imprisonment resulting from his activities as leader of a Nonconformist congregation at Bedford, he produced nearly sixty books and tracts on religious subjects   Aside from his masterpiece, which has had a circulation second only to the Bible, his most important works are Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666), The Life and Death of Mr Badman (1680), and The Holy War (1682).   L W C.

Burchard of Worms: (ca. 965-1025) Bishop of Worms (1000-   ). Canonist and ecclesiastic. Rescued the see of Worms from disorder   Author of the Decretum in twenty books (Migne, P. L. CXL), probably the most important collection of disciplinary canons before the work of Gratian.
                                                    J.T.M.

Buréau Paul: (1865-1921) Vigorously rejecting sociolatry and sociocracy, his moral and sociological works were an expression of the religious revival in Catholicism.
La crise morale des temps nouveaux (Paris, 1907), L'indiscipline de moeurs (Paris, 1920), Introduction a la methode sociologique (Paris, 1923).
                                                    H.H.

burial practice, Roman Catholic: The practice includes the bringing of the body to the church, divine services in the church, and interment of the body in consecrated ground. The liturgical service expresses sorrow over the bereavement, a plea for God's mercy toward the departed soul, and a buoyant confidence in the promised resurrection.   The service for baptized infants is entirely joyous, since they are assured of heaven.   As Catholic burial is a privilege of union with the Church, it is not granted to unbaptized persons, to baptized non-Catholics (unless either of these had expressed a desire to become Catholics), or to nominal Catholics who died as unrepentant public sinners.   c.v.

burial practices: See death and burial practices.

Buridan, John (Jean): A scholastic philosopher, born circa 1288 in Béthune, France.   Studied at the Univ of Paris under William of Occam*, the Nominalist, among whose followers he is numbered as one of the more famous dialecticians. He maintained, despite ecclesiastical condemnation, that the will and the intellect are basically the same, and that human freedom consists in the power of choosing between two or more desirable alternatives   hence, the will is "determined" by the strongest motive.   Attributed to him, but with probable falsity, is the famous dilemma of "Buridan's Ass", which would starve because of its inability to choose between two loads of hay, equal as to quantity and quality and equi-distant.   In his Compendium Logicae he developed at length the art of finding the middle term of a demonstration, which eventually came to be called the "Bridge of Asses", i.e., the bridge by which stupid scholars were enabled to pass from the minor or major, to the middle, term of a syllogism   His alleged rectorship of the Univ. of Paris and his connection with the founding of the Univ. of Vienna are both considered hypothetical.   J.F.T.

Burke, Edmund: (1729-1797) An Irish born leader of the most enlightened group of the Whigs, combining in his politico-philosophical outlook conservatism and liberalism   Reverential in attitude toward the state, he practically united politics with religion.   He believed good citizenship to be inseparable from religious piety, defending the establishment of the Anglican church as a consecration of the nation.   He looked upon the social structure, its history, its institutions, it many duties and loyalties with a reverence akin to religious awe.   As every individual has his place in the state, continuing order of his nation, so every nation has its place in a world-wide civilization unfolding in accord with "a divine tactic".
   L. Stephen, English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, 2nd ed. 2 vols. (London, 1881); J. MacCunn, The Political Philosophy of Burke (London, 1913), H. J. Laski, Political Thought in England from Locke to Bentham (London, 1920), A. Cobban, Edmund Burke and the Revolt against the Eighteenth Century (London, 1929); F. J. C. Hearnshaw, The Social and Political Ideas of some Representative Thinkers of the Revolutionary Age (London, 1931).   H.H.

burnt-offering (O.T.) An animal sacrifice wholly consumed on the altar, as distinguished from cereal offerings and from animal sacrifices of which only the blood and fat were put on the altar, while the flesh was (cooked and) eaten by priests and worshippers.   See holocaust, sacrifice, Hebrew and Jewish.   R B.Y.S.

Burton, E. D.: (1856-1925) Baptist educator. Author Syntax of the Moods and Tenses in the New Testament Greek (1893). Editor Biblical World and American Journal of Theology. At University of Chicago, 1892-1925 (President 1923-25).   C.H.M.

Bushido: (Lit. "The Way of the Knight") The code of the Japanese warrior, compiled on a basis of Confucian ethics and Zen discipline.   D.C.H.

Bushnell, Horace: (1802-1876) American preacher and theologian, graduate of Yale College and Divinity School, pastor of North Church in Hartford. His work marks the passing of the "New England theology"* He helped to emancipate the churches, says his biographer, Dr. Munger "first, from a revivalism that ignored the law of Christian growth, second, from a conception of the Trinity bordering on tritheism, third, from a view of miracles that implied a suspension of natural law, and fourth, from a theory of the atonement that . . failed to declare the law of human life" In Christian Nurture (1846, rewritten 1861) he sharply criticised the prevalent individualism, the reliance upon revivals, and insistence upon a dated, emotional experience of conversion, and set forth what he called the true principle of Christian education "That the child is to grow up a Christian, and never know himself as being otherwise." He dealt with the doctrine of the Trinity in God in Christ (1849) and Christ in Theology (1851), and prefaced the former volume by a remarkable Dissertation on Language as Related to Thought and Spirit. He published Nature and the Supernatural in 1858, and two works on the atonement, Vicarious Sacrifice (1865) and Forgiveness and Law (1874). Bushnell "challenged men to a new habit of thought." He turned away from the formal and precise definitions, mathematically-minded demonstrations, and the sterile formulae of the old New England theology, and sought to interpret life itself as lived in the power of the Spirit of God. For him, theology had its starting-point in experience, its basis in moral right, and its center in Christ. There is something intuitive, given, mystical in all true religion, and it is the business of theology to see and interpret this. Christian doctrine, he said, should be "formulated Christian experience." He was one of the greatest preachers of his century, and his published sermons will long continue to be read. See Christian Nurture, American theology, early, New England theology, New theology.

Life and Letters of Horace Bushnell (1880), T. T Munger, Horace Bushnell (1899).   L.A.W.

Butler, Joseph: (1692-1752) An Anglican theologian and moralist. He was born of Presbyterian parentage, but chose to prepare himself for service in the Established Church. He wrote Fifteen Sermons, when he was preacher at Rolls Chapel, and the Analogy (1736) while he was Clerk of the Closet for Queen Caroline. (See Deism.) He became bishop of Durham and some say he declined to become Archbishop of Canterbury. Butler believed that there is a sound way of life which has a rational foundation in nature, that the mandates of natural law harmonize with Revelation, and both unite to impose an inescapable moral responsibility. Nature holds all phenomena in causal connection, and relates them to the purpose of organic unity. The order and beauty of lifeless things disclose an intelligence creating and manipulating all objects with some conscious design in view. See teleology.

                                                                              W G H.

Byzantine Church: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

Byzantine Empire: Comprised the Eastern portion of the Roman Empire after its final division into two parts by Emp. Theodosius in 395. In theory, the two portions, the Western, or Latin, and the Eastern, Byzantine, were one But for a variety of reasons, the separation of the two was inevitable, and politically this was signified by the assumption, on the part of Charlemagne (800), of the title of the Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. Religiously, they were separated in 1054 by the Great Schism*. The Byzantine Empire long continued to be the dominant economic and cultural unit in Europe. But the Arab conquests (7th cent) and later the Crusades (11th to 13th centuries) and finally the Turkish conquests (11th to the 15th centuries) brought about its ultimate downfall. Its last stronghold, Constantinople was taken by Sultan Mohammed II in 1453

A A Vasiliev, History of the Byzantine Empire, 2 vols. (1928-29), R Byron, The Byzantine Achievement, A. D. 330-1453 (London, 1929), C Diehl, History of the Byzantine Empire (1925).   M.S.

Byzantine Rite: Originally the liturgical forms of the Patriarchate of Constantinople, which by the end of the thirteenth century were extended to the other three ancient Eastern patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. It is now used by the entire Eastern Orthodox Church* including some Uniate churches*. No one liturgical language is exclusively in use. The liturgy in ordinary use is that of St. Chrysostom*. See liturgy.

                                                                              M.S.

Byzantine Style: See art, ecclesiastical, Christian.

Byzantium: The city founded c. 658 B.C. by a colony of Megarians led by Byzas, after whom the settlement was named. Emperor Constantine chose it, in 325, as the new capital of the Roman Empire and rebuilt it to suit the new purpose. The new city of Constantinople was dedicated in May 11, 330 A.D.   M.S.

C

Cabala: See Kabbalah.

Cabet, Etienne: See communistic settlements, secular.

Caesarius of Arles: (c. 470-542) Devout Gallican monk, preacher, and monastic legislator. In addition to long service in monasteries of Lerins and Arles, he was, from 502 to his death, bishop in the latter city. He left a Rule for monks and another for nuns. In these, as in his whole career, there was a truly remarkable emphasis upon renunciatory discipline, prayer, and the primacy of God's Word. R.C.P.

Caesarius of Heisterbach: (d. c. 1240) Loyal Cistercian* monk most famous for his attempt to eradicate social and economic corruptions of his order and for that invaluable commentary on medieval life and religion, The Dialogue on Miracles. See the translation by H. v. E. Scott and C. C. Swinton Bland, 2 vols. (London, 1929). R.C.P.

caesaropapism: Supremacy of state over church (as in the Byzantine Empire, and in Russia till 1917), is generally considered to be the converse of ecclesiastical hegemony over states (as of Innocent III*). By definition, thus, the relation of church and state* in England and Protestant Germany (16th century seq.) has been that of caesaropapism. The term may be misleading, for the issue is rather one of freedom for both church and state in their respective spheres. Churches have been relatively free or unfree in Roman Catholic and in Protestant states. See Erastianism
For fruitful discussion, cf J. N Figgis, "Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century", Cambridge Modern History, Vol. III. ch. XXII, and bibliography. Q B.

Caird, Edward: (1835-1908) A Scottish philosopher and theologian, brother of John Caird*. He was professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow (1866-93) and Master of Balliol College Oxford (1893-1906), following Jowett. His personal influence upon his students was exceptional. He was interested in social reforms, in the education of workingmen, and in the extension of university education to women. He is known as one of the founders of neo-Hegelianism* in England and as an outstanding critic and interpreter of Kant from the Hegelian point of view His chief works are A Critical Account of the Philosophy of Kant (1877), The Social Philosophy and Religion of Comte (1885), The Evolution of Religion, Gifford Lectures at St. Andrews (pub. 1893), and The Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers, Gifford Lectures at Glasgow (pub. 1904). J.E.N.

Caird, John: (1820-1898) A Scottish clergyman, brother of Edward Caird*. He became Principal of the University of Glasgow in 1873. In An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion (1880) he expounded his neo-Hegelianism*. He delivered two series of Gifford Lectures at Glasgow on The Fundamental Ideas of Christianity (pub. 1899). He was also the author of an excellent little work on Spinoza (1888). J.E N.

calendar, church: See church year, church year cycle, festivals and holy days, Christian.

calendar, Julian and Gregorian: See Gregorian calendar

calendar, Moslem: See hegira.

caliph or khalif: (Fr calife, Arabic Khalifa, successor) The title of Mohammed's successors in temporal and spiritual power. The first four caliphs (A D. 632-661) Aleu Bekr, Omar, Othman and Ali were generally recognized as true successors, as all were closely associated with the Prophet. Later the caliphate became a prize for ambitious rivals and led to factional strife. See Mohammedanism. P.E.J.

Calixtines: See Hussitism.

Calixtus, Georg: (1586-1656) Lutheran theologian, notable for his attempts to reconcile Christendom by removing all unimportant differences. His attempts at reconciliation between different bodies made him suspect by all, and gave rise to the Syncretistic* controversy. G.R.C.

Calixtus II, Pope: See Worms, Concordat of.

call: See vocation.

Calvary: (Lat. calvaria, a translation of the Gr. kranion, in turn a translation of the Aramaic golgotha, "skull") The name given to the place of the Crucifixion in the AV of Lk 23 33, taken from the Latin Vulgate. The other Gospels have the Aramaic form. The word is usually explained as "skull shaped knoll," but this explanation is not certain.   B.S.E.

Calvary Pentecostal Church: See pentecostal sects.

Calvin, John: (1509-1564) Born at Noyon, Picardy, educated for the Church, and then the legal profession, but had begun a literary career and published his commentary on Seneca's de Clementia when he experienced his "sudden conversion", 1532. A fugitive for his new faith in France and the Rhine cities until Farel* persuaded him to settle in Geneva, 1536, and guide the Reformation that had already begun there, he yet managed to publish The Sleep of the Soul (Orleans, 1534), and the first edition of The Institutes (Basel, 1536). Banished, with Farel and Courauld, from Geneva in 1538, he settled in Strassburg, working as professor, pastor, author and delegate to the various Colloquys, until, in 1541, at the repeated urging of the Genevan Councils, he returned to Geneva, remaining till his death in 1564. There, in addition to advising the Councils on the organization and discipline of the whole life of the town, he guided the Church and many of the Churches throughout Protestantism, and published controversial tracts, and commentaries on most of the books of Scripture. See Calvinism, catechism, catechumenate
P. Schaff, History of the Christian Church (1923), Vol VII, pp 223ff ; B B Warfield, Calvin and Calvinism (1931).   A K R.

Calvinism: That system of theology and of Church organization and practice which grew out of the work of John Calvin* Theologically it is marked by the acceptance of the supreme role of Scripture in revelation, the interpretation of the same being under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. It affirms a lesser degree of revelation in both nature and reason. From Scripture it deduces the doctrine of the total sovereignty of God, its basic doctrine. With these presuppositions the system evolves logically To do God's will is man's first duty, in Adam this was possible, in the Fall this power was destroyed, all are rightfully damned, God in Christ redeems whom He wills, i.e., the elect, these live by faith in union with Christ, they find themselves able to do God's will in the world; His purpose moves through history to its destined end. A solid basis for ethics is established in the concept that the ability to live the Christian Law is evidence of probable election. The Church, the sacraments, (Baptism and The Lord's Supper), and the Civil Government are divine institutions. Abuse of the system is frequently by means of over-emphasis upon a single unit, but the whole is powerful and effective. Historically it worked itself out in the Church-State of Geneva, the Huguenots of France, the Reformed Churches of the Rhineland, the Presbyterians of Scotland, the Puritans of England and New England, and other groups. See five points of Calvinism; libertarianism; New England theology, predestination, Reformed Churches, reprobation.

John Calvin, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, Thomas Lindsay, A History of the Reformation in Lands beyond Germany (1917), Williston Walker, A History of the Christian Church (1918).   E.P.B.

Calvinistic Methodists: At first a number of entirely independent revivalistic movements originating about 1735 in South Wales and in England, similar to those which soon sprang up under the Wesleys* in being popular in appeal, and connected with the Church of England, but differing in being Calvinistic. An early tendency to form a loose organization under Whitefield's* leadership ended about 1748. After 1790 the movement received a fresh impulse, and began to organize—a process which came to fruition when the first General Assembly of the Welsh* Calvinistic Methodists was held in 1864. They are often called Presbyterians, and a branch established in American united with the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. in 1920. See Huntingdon's Connexion.   A.K.R

Calvinists, consistent: See Calvinists, old; means

Calvinists, old or moderate: In New England, the theological party that took the middle position between the liberals of eastern Massachusetts who rejected basic tenets of Calvinism*, and the Consistent Calvinists or Hopkinsians* who, with inexorable logic, pushed the doctrines of Calvinism to their harshest forms. All shades of Calvinists emphasized the sovereignty of God, but in opposition to the Consistent Calvinists, the moderates held that it was preserved in "appointed means" (see "Means"). The party emerged after the great colonial revivals in defense of the moderate position against "consistent Calvinism", especially that of the Hopkinsians. Always the majority party, its basic principles prevailed in the evangelical Calvinism (New Haven Theology*,) developed after the Revolution. See New England theology.
G. L. Walker, Some Aspects of the Religious Life of New England (1897) ; Joseph Haroutunian, Piety Versus Moralism (1932), F. H Foster, Genetic History of the New England Theology (1907) ; S E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor (1942).   S.E.M.

Camaldolese (Camaldolites, Camaldulians, Camaldulensians): A Roman Catholic order of hermits and cenobites*, founded by St. Romuald at the beginning of the 11th century. The original hermitage was at Camaldoli (Campus Maldoli) in Tuscany. After the death of the founder, some houses became cenobitic. Pope Alexander II first recognized the Order in 1072. The original austere rule, maintained by oral tradition, has been modified in cenobitic establishments to an approximation of the Benedictine* regulations. The habit is white, outdoors the Camaldolese are distinguished by very full, long white cloaks. A few Italian convents of nuns follow the same rule. Not devoted to preaching or teaching, the Order has not profoundly influenced Catholic theology.   V.J.B.

Cambridge Arminians: See Latitudinarians.

Cambridge Platform, The: The New England model of church government adopted by a Synod in 1648 and, guardedly, approved by the Massachusetts General Court in October, 1651 and recommended to the churches. It remained the standard of Congregationalism* in Massachusetts throughout the colonial period, and in Connecticut until the Saybrook Platform* was adopted in 1708.

Pointed inquiries about the New England way from ministers in the mother country, the troubles with Roger Williams and Anne Hutchinson, the appearance of Baptist views, the assertion of strong Presbyterian sentiments in the colony, and other factors all combined to make the leaders in the Bay Colony recognize the necessity to define their position. Hence at the instigation of a group of ministers the Court called a synod to do so. The Platform adopted in August, 1648 was written by Richard Mather, modified in synod, and provided with a preface by John Cotton. It approves "for the substance thereof" the doctrinal parts of the Westminster Confession, and, on the assumption that "the partes of Church-Government are all of them exactly described in the word of God," it attempts to define the Scripture pattern of the Church. Carefully deliberated, the Platform's seventeen chapters are a summary of the best thought of the New Englanders on Congregationalism, after almost twenty years experience in its practical administration. As Williston Walker says, it states clearly the "abiding principles of Congregationalism. The covenant as the basis of the local church, the autonomy of each congregation, coupled with its dependence on other churches for fellowship and counsel, the representative character of the ministry, above all the absence of all final authority in doctrine or polity save the Word of God, are the essential features."
W. Walker, History of the Congregational Churches in the United States (1899); Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism (1893).   S.E.M.

Cambridge Platonists: A group of ethical scholars led by Cudworth* with headquarters in Cambridge. The movement was designed to promote the traditional philosophy of the Humanistic era. It was born out of antagonism against Hobbes who advocated a mechanical theory of ethics. The Cambridge Platonists sought to refute this theory with renewed emphasis on teleology Henry More (1614-1687), John Norris (1628-1677), Samuel Clarke (1675-1729), William Wollaston (1659-1724), Richard Price (1723-1791), Richard Cumberland (1632-1718), were members of this group. See Platonism.   W.G.H.

Cameron, John: (1579-1623) Born in Glasgow, where he received his early education, and where he later served for less than a year as Principal of the University. Most of his life, however, was spent in the service of the French Protestant Church, as professor of divinity at Saumur and at Montauban. He was basically a Calvinist, but approached the Arminian position on the doctrine of grace, thus becoming the founder of a party within the French Protestant Church, often called Amyraldians.   A.K.R.

Cameronians: The most resolute and irreconcilable of the Scotch Presbyterians who, refusing to accede to the effort of Charles II to establish his supremacy in the Scottish Church*, were ousted in 1622. Neither the bitter persecutions of Charles, nor the indulgence of James II, nor even the restoration of full Presbyterianism under William of Orange, could win them all They continued as a separate Church, usually called the Reformed Presbyterians, until most of them united with the Free Church* in 1876. See Covenanters.   A.K.R.

Camisards (Barbets, Assemblers, Children of God): Protestant peasants of Cévennes who, under the leadership of Jean Cavalier, teen-aged son of a baker, fought Roman Catholics because of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes*, from 1702 to 1705 and after. Described in Clement XI's* bull as the "ancient Albigenses*," they did spring from the same soil as did those medieval heretics. The movement was fanatical, accompanied by ecstatic prophecies, prodigies, voices, preternatural lights in the sky, and was stirred by the publication of Pierre Jurieu's L'accomplissement des prophéties (1689). The excesses were deplored by the other French Huguenots*.   A.C.

campanile: (Lat. campana, a bell) An Italian bell tower usually detached from the rest of the building. Sometimes used in the case of other towers.   F.T.P.

Campbell, Alexander: (1788-1866) Leader in a reformatory movement which, designed to promote the unity of Christians by restoring primitive Christianity and especially the primitive conditions of Christian fellowship, issued in a separate religious body, the Disciples of Christ*. Born in County Antrim, Ireland, son of Thomas Campbell, he spent a year in Glasgow University and came in 1809 to America whither his father had preceded him. He settled in what is now the panhandle of West Virginia and took up the work which Thomas Campbell had already initiated. He was ordained, preached widely, founded and edited two monthly magazines, the Christian Baptist (1823-30) and the Millennial Harbinger (1830 until his death in 1866), was a member of the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1829, founded Bethany College, of which he was president for twenty years, engaged in five great debates which were subsequently published, and all the while conducted a large and profitable farm which was the source of a considerable fortune.
Robert Richardson, M e m o i r s of A. Campbell (1868); Benjamin Lyon Smith Alexander Campbell (1930).   W.E.G.

Campbell, John McLeod: (1800-1872) Best known for his work on The Nature of the Atonement (1856) in which he held that Christ had effected the requisite repentance on behalf of humanity and fulfilled the conditions of forgiveness. Christ's sufferings were not penal (as held by his contemporaries). His theory paved the way to an ethical and away from the legal interpretation of the doctrine of the atonement. In 1830 his views were pronounced heretical by the Presbyterian General Assembly but he continued his theological studies and a career in an undenominational church.   V F.

Campbell, R. J.: See New theology, the.

Campbell, Thomas: (1763-1854) An Irish Seceder Presbyterian minister, of Scottish descent, who came to America in 1807, became dissatisfied with the doctrines and practices of his church and, for the promotion of Christian union, organized the Christian Association of Washington, Pa , and wrote "A Declaration and Address" which embodied the principles upon which his son Alexander* built the movement which became the Disciples of Christ*.
W. H Hanna, Thomas Campbell (1935) , R Richardson, Memoirs of Alexander Campbell (1868)
                                                       W E.G.

Campbellites: A term sometimes applied to Disciples of Christ* a) whimsically, by themselves, b) ignorantly, by the non-church public, c) viciously, as well as ignorantly, by the less enlightened members of the less enlightened sects. Obsolescent, with the general advance of religious intelligence and interdenominational courtesy.
                                                       W.E.G.

Canaanite religion: See Baalism

Canaanites: Ancient people of Palestine, kindred to the Phoenicians* and to the Hebrews, often mentioned in the O.T. Also called Amorites.
See W. F. Albright, "The Present State of Syro-Palestinian Archeology", in The Haverford Symposium on Archeology and the Bible (1938), edited by E. Grant, pp. 1-46. See Tell-el-Amarna Tablets
                                                       S.L.T.

Canada, the United Church of: See United Church of Canada, the.

Candlemas: The feast of the presentation of Christ in the temple (St. Luke 2 22), known in the West as the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary* and in the East as the Meeting with Simeon and Anna. Celebrated since Justinian on February 2nd, this date in Rome coincided with the penitential processions* derived from the pagan Amburbale in which the officiants carried lights. That custom and the reference in Simeon's song have made this the day for the blessing of candles for the year and a procession with candles, whence the name.   T.J.B

Canisius, St. Peter: (1521-1597) Dutch Jesuit, leader of Counter-Reformation in Germany. The friend of bishops and princes, he was influential in revitalizing German Catholic universities, and founded a dozen Jesuit institutions which remained for centuries centers of culture. In addition he was an indefatigable preacher and writer. His catechism became standard in Catholic Germany.
                                                       E.A.R.

cannibalism: Eating by man of human flesh. The practice seems to have been universal in the early stages of culture. Hunger was the primary motive. The first limitation came when the tribal law "do not kill kinsmen" was extended to "do not eat them". Yet the desire to keep the powers of a person of outstanding qualities in the clan often led to the eating of his body. Enemies were eaten as a pleasant way of treating them with anger and contempt. Members of the tribe who had broken the group code sometimes suffered the same fate The desirable qualities of an enemy might be acquired by eating a part of his body. When a man was sacrificed as the embodiment of a god he was eaten in a kind of communion. Sorcerers sometimes qualified for office by eating putrid human flesh. Holy men might show their contempt for the world in the same way.
                                                       A.E.H

canon: In music, a polyphonic* composition in which a melody repeats itself at a definite interval of pitch and of time. A common example is a canon at the interval of an octave and the distance of one measure   E.H.B.

canon: (Gr. kanon, "rule" "standard") Usually an ecclesiastical law pertaining to doctrine or, more generally, discipline, the codified laws of the Roman Catholic, Anglican and possibly other communions are "canons" or "canon laws " In liturgics* a part of the service especially in accord with rule, among Roman Catholics the part of the Mass* following the Sanctus* and concluding before the Lord's Prayer (or after the priest's communion), in the Orthodox church "canons" are certain canticles or litanies. In a quite different sense (from the Lat. canonicus) certain clergymen are "canons", originally because their names were entered on the "canon" or list of a large church. The title is now reserved for members of a cathedral staff or of certain religious orders.   B.S.E.

Canon, Buddhist: See Buddhist Terminology.

canon, Old and New Testament: The list of books accepted as scripture by the Christian church, usually reckoned by Protestants at 39 in the O.T. and 27 in the N.T. While Jewish piety pushed back the beginning of its scripture to Moses himself, it probably began with the finding of Deuteronomy in the temple in the course of Josiah's reformation in B.C. 621. It was accepted as the text book of the reformation and became the literary nucleus of the Jewish Law, Gen.-Deut., which reached its full development early in the fourth century before Christ. It was regarded as the full expression of the will of God.
The Prophets, Former and Latter, came to be recognized as authoritative between B.C. 250 and 175. The Former Prophets were the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, the Latter were Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the Twelve Minor prophets, grouped as one, since by reason of their brevity they made a roll shorter than either Isaiah or Jeremiah. By B.C. 175 other books were coming to be accepted by the Jews as scripture Sirach speaks of the "rest of the books," and by the latter part of the first century Luke could speak of the Law, the prophets and the Psalms, as making up the Jewish scriptures. It was not until the end of that century however that the Hebrew canon reached completion, the third section of it consisting of the Psalms, Proverbs, Job and the Five Rolls,—Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes and Esther, each of which was read at one of the five feasts, from Passover to Purim, and finally of Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles. This made a total, as the Jews counted, of twenty-four sacred books in their scriptures. Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes remained longest in doubt, and even after the Synod of Jamnia, in A D. 90, some rabbis would not accept Esther as scripture.

The early church very soon adopted the Jewish scriptures, but in the Greek version, which included a number of other books, Judith, Tobit, the Wisdom of Solomon, the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), I Esdras, I, II, III and IV Maccabees, Baruch, an expanded form of Esther, and the additions to Daniel—Susanna, the Song of the Three Children, and Bel and the Dragon. There were other additions too, in some lists and manuscripts· the Psalms of Solomon, the Prayer of Manasseh, the Book of Enoch, etc. Melito of Sardis pointed out the narrower proportions of the Hebrew canon, and Jerome was aware of them and designated the Greek additions to it "Apocrypha," not by way of condemnation, but simply as secret or hidden books, perhaps overlooked by the Jewish canonists. He admitted them to the Latin vulgate version, and through it they passed more or less completely into the German Catholic Bible and Wyclif's and Purvey's English version, 1382-88.

But when Luther had completed his translation of the Hebrew O.T., there remained a dozen pieces familiar from the Vulgate and the Old German versions which had to be dealt with, and these Luther and the Zwingli Bible of 1530 treated separately, as the Apocrypha. The first printed English Bibles followed this procedure— Coverdale, Rogers, Taverner, Great, Geneva, Bishops', King James. But by 1599 the Puritans began to omit them from some printings of the Geneva, and in 1629 copies of King James began to appear without them. The Bible Societies, both British and American, since 1827 have declined to use their funds to print them, and one seldom sees a hand copy of King James that contains them. The English revisers (1895) gave them very slight attention, and the American (1900) none at all. They have great value however as giving us the Jewish religious background of N.T. times. The standard list in complete English Bibles is I and II Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Additions to Esther, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, Song of the Three Children, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manasseh, I and II Maccabees.

Christianity began as a religion not of the letter but of the spirit, and inherited a rich religious literature, moreover its keen apocalyptic expectations were unfavorable to literary composition And yet it found its way in no long time to a scripture of its own, in addition to its great inheritance. The first unconscious step in that direction was the collection of the Letters of Paul, not long after A.D. 90. Of this we may be sure, since the early gospels and the Acts are so clearly unacquainted with them, while almost every Christian work written after that time shows their influence. They were collected not as scripture, but purely for their obvious religious usefulness. The collection of the four gospels, some twenty-five years later, was a second step toward a Christian scripture, though it was not so intended. It was probably meant to further the influence of the new Gospel of John. Marcion's* movement toward uniting and organizing the churches involved the rejection of the O.T. and putting in its place a Christian scripture consisting of the Gospel of Luke and ten letters of Paul. These were to be read in church instead of the Law and the Prophets. Christians of the more standard type preferred to retain the O.T., and to put with it the Four Gospels, this is the stage reflected in Justin Martyr, A.D. 150-160.

That was the blooming time of the sects, as Harnack put it, and when Marcionism and Gnosticism were followed by Montanism with its extravagant prophetic claims, the non-schismatic churches united under Roman leadership, into a standard, general, "Catholic" church, with a creed denying the chief heresies of the time (substantially what we know as the Apostles' Creed*), a three-fold ministry (bishop-elders-deacons), and a N.T. scripture, to stand beside, not in place of, the Old.

This consisted of the two great collections of the four gospels and the Pauline letters; the latter had already begun to be read in some churches, as the Acts of the Martyrs of Scilli shows, they were now supplemented by the Pastoral Letters (to Timothy and Titus), which disowned the main positions of Marcionism, and provide rules for church officers and organization. These two collections were united by the book of Acts which related them to each other and showed the apostolic foundation of the church. And with Acts stood a small group of minor letters bearing the names of apostles, I Peter, I John, Jude. There were also a few apocalypses,—the Revelations of John and of Peter, and the Shepherd of Hermas. These books (no one seems to have accepted more than twenty-two of them) were to be read in church along with the Greek O.T., and resorted to as authorities in doctrinal controversies.

This was the situation about A.D. 180, at least in the west, where Irenaeus at Lyons, and Tertullian at Carthage in the following decades reflect it, and expressly acknowledge the leadership of the Roman church in their course. This was a N.T. of twenty-two books. But Christian leaders of Egypt were not satisfied with so small a N.T. Clement of Alexandria around the end of the second century added Hebrews to the Pauline letters, and the letters of Barnabas and of Clement of Rome to the general or Catholic Letters. He accepted the Preaching of Peter (now lost) without question, so that he had a N.T. of at least thirty books, and perhaps more, for some which he quotes as scripture are now nowhere to be found. Origen, in the first half of the third century living first at Alexandria and then at Caesarea, had twenty-nine books in his N.T,—our twenty-seven and Barnabas and the Shepherd. Syria on the other hand held to twenty-two books, accepting only three Catholic letters and no apocalypse.

In general however, the east accepted Hebrews, while the west did not, Hilary (367) was the first western father to accept it, and Jerome a few years later declared the custom of the Latins did not receive it, but nevertheless included it in his Vulgate version. The west had no doubts about Revelation, which the east was divided upon, after Dionysius of Alexandria about the middle of the third century had shown the difficulty of assigning it and the Gospel of John to the same author.

The canon of Eusebius was substantially ours (A.D. 326) but there was no little difference of opinion in the fourth and early fifth centuries. But the voice of Athanasius in his Easter letter of A.D. 367 went far to settle the matter, in favor of the N.T. of twenty-seven books which we know. That was also the list of the Latin Vulgate a generation later. The Greek N.T. was seldom gathered into one manuscript volume, but better book-making in the west made it possible to put the Latin N.T. into one small leaf-book, and that physical presentation of the N.T. went far to clinch its victory, which was completed by the printed forms of the Greek and the new translations from 1516 onward. In general, the growth of the N.T. was not the work of councils, but a response to the practical needs of the churches. See under specific books mentioned. See Apocrypha, Old Testament; O.T. Lit., N.T. Lit.

B. F. Westcott, A General Survey of the History of the Canon of the New Testament (London, 7th ed, 1896); J Leipoldt, Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Kanons (2 vols. Leipsic, 1908); A. Souter, The Text and Canon of the New Testament (1913), A. Harnack, The Origin of the New Testament (1925); E. J. Goodspeed, The Formation of the New Testament (1926).   E.J.G.

canon and canoness: (Gr. canon, rule) Canons are men half way (a quid medium as Erasmus said), between monks and the secular clergy, their work is neither that of the monastic life nor that of the parish priest, but simply the celebration of the sacred mysteries. They claim to have originated with St. Augustine. Since the eighth century, the title canoness is given to women professing a common life though not following the rule of St. Augustine, their work is contemplation, or nursing the sick, or educating children.

                                                                L.R.W.

Canon Law: The law of the Catholic, especially the Roman-Catholic Church, law being understood in the sense of a system of norms of conduct emanating from an authority claiming unquestioning obedience, and sought to be formulated with precision. Such a system of law became necessary as soon as the Church aspired at being an ecumenical organization and as such the sole and institutionalized dispenser of divine grace and teacher of the word.

Canon law is a species of the wider concept of ecclesiastical law which signifies either any type of law autonomously developed for its own regulation by a church or a law imposed upon a church by the state. In a different and narrower sense the term canon law is occasionally used in the Roman-Catholic Church as signifying the rules contained in the Corpus Juris Canonici or now in the Codex Juris Canonici as distinguished from Church Law expressed in such other sources as non-codified papal decretals and leges, church regulations emanating from bishops and other subordinate authorities, concordats concluded between the Church and state governments and uncodified general or particular Church customary law.

The essential bases of the Canon Law are thought to consist of divine law, i.e., of norms directly established for His Church and directly revealed by God Himself and therefore of immutable character. This character is ascribed especially to the rules establishing the Pope's infallibility and plenitude of jurisdiction, the juristic personality of the Church and the Holy See, and the hierarchia ordinis as well as jurisdictionis, also the rules concerning the nature of the sacraments, among them those establishing the indissolubility of marriage and prohibiting mixed marriages involving periculum perversionis for the Catholic part or the offspring. The bulk of rules established upon the basis of the divine law is recognized as man-made and therefore changeable ius positivum.

The unwieldy mass of papal decretals and conciliar canons that had accumulated in the course of the centuries and had been sought to be assembled in such collections as the Dionysio-Hadriana (6th century), the Hispana (8th century) and the Pseudo-Isidoriana, (a successful forgery of the 9th century) were finally and systematically digested around 1140 in the Concordantia discordantium canonum of Gratian of Bologna. Subsequently recognized as authoritative this epochal work became the first part of the Corpus Juris Canonici, the monumental counterpart to the Emperor Justinian's Corpus Juris Civilis (533-565). The legislative efforts of three-and-a-half centuries were expended on the canonical law book which, in addition to Gratian's* work commonly called the Decretum, consists of the following parts Liber Extra, issued in 1234 by Gregory IX, the Liber Sextus of Boniface VIII (1298), the Clementinae, originally published by Clement V in 1313 and revised by John XXII in 1317, and, finally, the originally private collection of the Extravagantes Ioannis XXII and the Extravagantes communes which contain decretals down to the end of the pontificate of Sixtus IV in 1484. The whole work was officially published as editio Romana in 1582 by Gregory XIII. The accumulation of such new materials as later papal constitutiones, leges, and rescripta, decrees and instructions of the Sacred Congregations, offices and tribunals of the Holy See and the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent (1545-1563) and the Vatican Council (1869-1870) made a new codification desirable. This work was begun under Piux X and completed under Benedict XV, by whom it was promulgated under the date of Pentecost 1917. The new Codex Juris Canonici is substantially the work of Cardinal P. Gasparri. Profiting from the techniques developed in the elaboration of such temporal codifications as the Code Napoleon of 1804, the German Civil Code of 1896 and the Swiss Code of 1907, the new Codex shows a much higher technical perfection than the bulky old Corpus Juris Canonici. The entire mass of materials has been condensed into 2414 canones, which are expressed in monumental Latin and distributed among the following five Books Normae generales, De personis, De rebus, De processibus, De delictis et poenis.

New laws of the Church which, according to the express Papal pronouncement of the Motuproprio "Cum juris canonici" of 1917 are to be issued but sparingly, are ordinarily promulgated in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, the official gazette of the Church.

Today the Canon law contents itself with covering the constitution of the Church, its organization and administration, the discipline of the clergy, the religious orders and the Catholic, i e, on general principle, still the entire Christian, laity, and the administration of the sacraments, among them marriage, and of the sacramentals Topics of mere doctrine or liturgy do not fall within the scope of the law In the days of the Church's aspiration at world domination the scope of the canon law was considerably wider. Claiming not only criminal and civil jurisdiction over the clergy and church property but also an extensive jurisdiction over the laity in criminal and civil matters touching sin the Church became involved in a century-long struggle with the temporal powers. Being successful in this struggle for long periods the Church found occasion to elaborate rules on such topics as contracts, civil and criminal procedure, wills and administration of decedent estates. For these topics the Church, elaborating and modernizing traditions of Roman law, developed rules and techniques which were far in advance of contemporary temporal law and became exemplary for the temporal lawyers. See decretals; ecclesiastical courts; jurisprudence, law.

A Cicognani, Canon Law (1934), S Woywood, Practical Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, 5th ed., 3 vols. (1939), C. A Bachoten, Commentary on the New Code of Canon Law, 6th ed , 8 vols. (1937); H A. Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law (1918); U. Stutz, Der Geist des Codex juris Canonici (1918), The Jurist, publ. by the School of Canon Law of the Catholic Univ. of America (1941 et sq); F W Maitland, Roman Canon Law in the Church of England (1898); Carl Zollmann, American Church Law (1933); H D. Hazeltine, "Canon Law" vol 3, Enc. Soc. Sc. p. 179.   M.Rh canon law of Islam: See fiqh. Cf. Sunna.

canonical hours: See divine office.   E.R.H.

canonization: (from the Gr., kanon, rule) Official proclamation on the part of the Pope that some person is to be venerated everywhere as a saint. The papal statement is made only after beatification*, or the decree permitting the person to be honored in a limited area, and after at least two miracles through the blessed one's intercession are authenticated   See saints, veneration canons, Anglican: The revision of canon law* ordered in 1534 was never completed (though a draft Reformatio legum ecclesiasticarum was published in 1571, and so technically mediaeval canons are in force in England unless revised. But in 1604 the English Convocations adopted a code of canons embracing the most practically needed parts of mediaeval and later ecclesiastical legislation; this has been slightly amended since 1865, but more affected by a legal decision of 1736 which denied the power of Convocation to bind the laity. Outside England the Anglican Churches have, as voluntary societies, their own codes, though the mediaeval and 1604 canons may be appealed to as precedents. The American Canons, first issued in 1789, have been frequently amended since.
                                                       L R W

                                                       E.R.H.

Canons, Collections of Apostolic: (Gr. kanon, rule) An ancient collection of decrees for the government of the Church.   L.R.W.

canons of various churches: The Bible of Jesus was the Hebrew O.T * which when closed in the second century of the Christian era contained thirty-nine books according to the Christian enumeration but twenty-four as the Jews counted. The Bible of Paul* and the early Gentile* Christians was the Greek translation of the Hebrew O.T still expanding and containing additional books, now known as Apocrypha*. Catholicism followed the Alexandrian* tradition, Protestantism returned to the shorter Bible of Palestine

The Council of Trent*, 1546, included Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, I, II. Maccabees plus Additions to Daniel, Rest of Esther, Baruch with the Epistle of Jeremiah in its list and published III Ezra, IV Ezra and the Prayer of Manasses in an appendix to the N T. The Vatican Council* devoted an anathema to anyone either failing to acknowledge the list of Trent or denying their inspiration. After earlier hesitation the Greek Church, Synod of Jerusalem 1672, granted canonical standing to Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit and Judith. Codex Vaticanus* interweaves these four books with the other 39 books of the Palestinian list. Codex Alexandrinus* does the same for the additions to Jeremiah, Daniel and Esther, Tobit, Judith and I —IV Maccabees. Wyclif* similarly lists III Ezra, Tobit, Judith, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch. Some of the "Pseudepigrapha"* of the O.T. were accepted in the separate churches, especially the Ethiopic church. The question is further complicated because the N.T. itself not only quotes from the Apocrypha but from Jewish apo-calypses* (I Cor. 2 9, Jude 9, 14 ff) as well.

Regarding the limits of the N.T, Catholicism and Protestantism are in general agreement but the Provincial Churches often dissent

The seven Catholic epistles and Revelation waited long for admission to the canon of both Eastern and Western Catholicism, and the old questions were debated anew in the sixteenth century. Revelation is not read in worship in the Eastern Church. The Nestorian and Syrian Churches have not received II, III John, II Peter, Jude and Revelation but the latter uses III Corinthians, Testament of the Lord, six books of Clement, etc. The Ethiopian Church has 46 books in the O.T. and 35 in the N.T. The Armenian Church*, 1276, added 5 books of Clement*, Ananias of Damascus, book of James, 2 books of the Canons of the Apostles, 3 sermons of Justus, 4 books of Dionysius the Areopagite*, and 5 books of the Preaching of Peter*. Codex Sinaiticus* contains the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas and Codex Alexandrinus, I, II Clement. The Coptic Church* did not read Revelation but was fond of the Apostolic Fathers*, apocryphal gospels and acts, homilies of the Greek fathers, etc See apocrypha in the N T. church.

J A Bewer, The Literature of the O. T, in its Historical setting (1927), R H Charles, The Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha, of O. T. (1913), O Eisfeldt, Einleitung in das A. T. (1934), E J Goodspeed, An Introduction to the N. T. (1937), C R Gregory, Canon and Text of N. T (1907), W. O E. Oesterley, An Intro. to the Books of the Apocrypha (1934).   C.H.M

cantata: The 17th century cantata, given definitive form by Carissimi, consisted in a series of arias for one or two solo voices accompanied by harpsichord and a few other instruments such as violoncello, lute, or oboe. Other composers who followed this practice were Alessandro and Domenico Scarlatti and Handel.

The church cantata of the 18th century reached its culmination in the 295 cantatas of Bach. In about 40 cases Bach used only solo voices but employed an orchestral accompaniment. In the majority of cases the works open with a large chorus, continue with a series of recitatives and arias, and conclude with a simple chorale in which the congregation took part.

The modern cantata makes greater use of the chorus and may be either sacred, like a small oratorio*, or secular, a lyric drama or story not intended to be acted.   E.H.B.

canticle of the Blessed Virgin: (Lat., canticum, song) The magnificat* found in St. Luke, I, 46-55; sung or recited every day at Vespers. L.R.W.

canticles: Hymns of praise from Biblical texts other than the Psalms which are sung in the Roman liturgy. Among the most familiar are the Nunc dimittis (Luke 2:29); the Benedicite omnia opera (Daniel 3:57); the Magnificat (Luke 1·46); and the Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel (Luke 1:68).   E.H.B.

cantionale: (Lat. cantus, song) A collection of church music for complete liturgical worship, including appropriate material for the pastor, the choir, and the congregation Originating in the Lutheran Reformation, the classical cantionales were compiled during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Outstanding among them are those of Spangenberg (1545) and Lossius (1561) and the Kralitz Cantionale of the Bohemian Brethren (1576). The Mecklenburg Cantionale (four volumes, 1868-1887) is the most complete modern work. In a looser connotation the term has been used as a synonym for hymn book.   T.A.K.

cantor: (A word taken from the Assyrian Hazzan, overseer) Originally "the servant" of the synagogue. He is a synagogue official who leads the congregation in prayer.   N.G.

capitalism: The system of production and exchange which has prevailed in Great Britain since the Industrial Revolution of the eighteenth century, and which has since been adopted in turn by and among most advanced industrial countries. The term evidently originated as an epithet with the socialist critics of the system, but for lack of a better descriptive word has now become largely innocuous and is used quite generally by economists Different writers, however, have emphasized different features Werner Sombart, whose Der Moderne Kapitalismus (1902, 1928) is the most comprehensive analysis, assigns a major role to the business organizer and his consuming zeal for profit. Karl Marx was chiefly struck with the trend toward concentration and its disastrous effects upon the workingman. Eugen v. Bohm-Bawerk (Positive Theory of Capital, trans. London, 1891) thought he had found the secret of capitalistic efficiency in the time factor or roundaboutness characteristic of the system. John A. Hobson (The Evolution of Modern Capitalism, London, 1895, 1901) deliberately selects machinery and its effects upon economic and social life as the salient point. Others stress the price economy and the expansion of the market. Certainly capital itself, although it furnishes the stem word for "capitalism", need no longer be regarded as a mark of identification since in Russia we now see it used in large masses and highly technical forms under communistic control.

The fundamental assumption of capitalism, as we know it, is that private property in the means of production and private enterprise, operating under competitive conditions and with a minimum of governmental interference, will redound to the best economic interests of a people—the fullest and most rapid development of natural resources, the most rapid advancement in technology and the practical arts, the maximum production of commodities suited to the needs of all classes of consumers at the most reasonable prices, fair payment and abundant opportunity for advancement to wage-earners, and the achievement of high rank as a world power. The motives behind business activity are admittedly self-centered, but it is held by the defenders of the capitalistic system that the public is none the less well served, and that the consumer and the workingman are adequately protected by competition and the alternatives open to them.

High capitalism, as Sombart uses the term, is usually dated in Great Britain from about 1760, in our North Atlantic States from the first quarter of the nineteenth century, in France from about 1830, although France has never committed itself fully to the system, in Germany after 1850 and mainly since 1870, in our southern states since the last quarter of the nineteenth century, and in Japan within the present century. The conditions and the course of evolution have been strikingly similar in all areas. Four factors, in addition to such stimulus as governments may have given, have been at work and each of them has been partly cause and partly effect 1) The growth of population, particularly where swarming or migration was not easy, has from the first been a reason for the more intensive use of resources and the development of new methods of production. It creates a demand for more goods and furnishes the labor supply to carry out larger enterprises But the most rapid increase in population in England and in other capitalist countries has come since rather than before the factory system. 2) The growth of commerce, drawing raw materials and foodstuffs from all over the world and distributing the products of industry to every nook and corner, has been a much more potent influence. It made mass production possible and brought about a higher standard of living. 3) Invention and the progress of technology, while they had to wait upon the advancement of science, were largely the outcome of this growing market. They made it possible to harness great natural forces—water-power, heat, electricity—which had hitherto lain dormant and useless. 4) The accumulation of capital to finance the system was made possible by the profits of trade and the establishment of some degree of law and order. Once started, capitalism has largely financed itself from its own earnings.

Present-day democracies are by no means so confident as were the laissez faire economists of the last century that the blessings of capitalism will be automatically bestowed upon an expectant and gullible world. Where consumer and producer are so widely separated there are too many chances 'for what Professor E. A. Ross calls "smokeless sin". We are not sure but that monopoly is as natural, at least in some industries, as is competition. Labor, especially, cannot take it for granted that "the Universe is friendly", and must stand up for its rights. Hence the rise of consumer movements, the labor movement, and the demand for regulation, even for government ownership in some fields.

See bourgeoise, labor movements; proletariat. Cf. Puritan ethics.

W. Sombart and J. A. Hobson, as above; F. L. Nussbaum, A History of the Economic Institutions of Modern Europe (1933), W Cunningham, Growth of English Industry and C o m m e r c e (Cambridge, 1912), vol. iii.   w.b.c

capitularies: Royal edicts issued by Merovingian and Carolingian kings dealing with matters of legislation and administration So called because divided into chapters (capitula). Were codified in collections of ecclesiastical and secular capitularies.
                              k.h.c.

Cappadocians, the three: The "three lights of Cappadocia" (inland province in Asia Minor) were Basil the Great, his brother Gregory of Nyssa and Gregory of Nazianzen. As their major contribution to the solution of the Trinitarian problem was practically identical, they are treated as one.

In working out a new theory of Trinity*, the Cappadocians took their point of departure from the three divine hypostases* which they tried to bring under the concept of the one divine being or nature. The former have concrete separate existence, and the latter is the common substance. Each concrete existence of the three divine hypostases has certain distinctive characteristics. As the characteristics refer to the descent of the hypostases from one another, they at the same time reciprocally unite the hypostases. The individual existence of the hypostases rests thus upon the peculiarity of their reciprocal relation. The Father, the Son and the Spirit are in relation to one another like principle, realization, and completion.

The Cappadocians labored with great energy for the unabridged divinity of Christ and of the Spirit They had a lively interest in the absolute deity of these as in them the absolute really became operative, intelligible and tangible. The Cappadocians determined the difference of the divine hypostases out of their inner divine origin, and not out of their different operations. The three persons of the deity have not only the identical energy, but also have equality of dignity and nature. The Cappadocian conception of the Triune Deity preserves both the hypostatic distinction and the substantial unity. They were radical in their new theory of the absolute unity of God. God is eternal nature, who as Father through the Son and in Spirit is unitarily operative. The Cappadocians brought to a close the Trinitarian problem. Although they fully assured the reality of the three divine hypostases, they had difficulty to prove their unity. In helplessly vacillating between unity and triad, Arian* polemics accused them of the tritheistic heresy. As creators of Greek orthodoxy they interpreted Athanasius* in the spirit of a modified Origen*.

F. Diekamp, Die Trinitätslehre des hl Gregor von Nyssa (Munster, 1896); J Hergenrother, Die Lehre von der göttlichen Dreieinigkeit nach dem hl. Gregor von Nazianz (Ratisbon, 1850), F. Nager, Die Trinitätslehre des hl. Basilius des Grossen (Paderborn, 1912).   h.h.

captivity of the popes: See Avignon.

Capuchins: This autonomous branch of the Roman Catholic mendicant Order of Franciscans (Friars Minor*) dates from the reform of 1525 in Italy. Friar Matteo di Bassi, founder of the reformed group, aimed at a return to the original high-minded spirituality and austere rule of St. Francis of Assisi*. The long, pointed hood (capuche), similar to that worn by St Francis, was adopted as a symbol of this reform and was the source of the name, Capuchin. The habit is brown and coarse-textured Theologically, the Capuchins generally prefer the thought of St Bonaventura* to that of the other great Franciscan theologian, Duns Scotus*. Their missionary activities have taken them all over the world, the early spread of Christianity in the Americas owes much to their labors   V.J B cardinal: An ecclesiastical title and office. The cardinal, originally the title of great clergymen in important cities such as Constantinople, ranks before all other prelates The chief functions of cardinals are to elect the Pope, to advise and assist him in governing the church, and to vote at oecumenical councils. See clergy, College of Cardinals.   L R W cardinal virtue: (Lat. cardo, hinge; Lat. virtus, strength, excellence, virtue) The four chief virtues on which all other moral virtues are said to hinge. The four are justice, temperance, fortitude and prudence, a division found in Greek philosophy, the custom of calling them cardinal goes back at least to St. Ambrose.   L R.W

Carew Lectureship: Presented annually at Hartford Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn., and established in 1873 by Joseph and Eliza B. Carew. Its capital sum is $5,000. A special lectureship "for the benefit of the students and public."   V.F.

Carey, William: (1761-1834) An English Baptist minister who was largely responsible for the formation in 1792 of the earliest English foreign missionary society. He was the first missionary sent out by the society, arriving in India in 1794 and remaining there until his death. While in India he distinguished himself in the field of linguistics.   W.S H.

carillon: (car-re-yon) A carillon is a progression of true bells, ascending chromatically through at least two octaves, and containing not less than 23 bells. A carillon differs from a chime of bells, in that it contains five chromatic notes in each octave, although in large carillons, the lowest C♯ is sometimes omitted. A carillon differs from a ringing peal in that its bells are always "hung dead", that is, bolted firmly to a framework of steel beams, and played from rows of hand levers; while in a ringing peal, the bells are swung until mouth upward, by means of a rope, wheel, headstock, stay and slider.

The smallest possible carillon contains 23 bells, while the largest may contain as many as six octaves, or 72 bells including the chromatic notes. There are some fifty carillons in America, the largest of which is in New York. The bourdon bell of this carillon is ten feet in diameter and weighs 20½ tons. The smallest bell of many carillons is but six inches in diameter, and weighs about eleven pounds.

A carillon is played manually, from a keyboard containing two rows of levers, spaced about 1¾ inches on centers, and an additional row of foot levers corresponding to the pedal board of a church organ. This clavier is connected to the bells by means of a delicately adjusted series of steel wires, treated so as to resist corrosion, roller boards, springs and balanced clappers The bell hangs stationary, while the clapper is drawn quickly against the sound-bow of the bell, traveling but an inch or two

Most American carillons are to be found in church and college towers, with a few in civic centers. Almost all of them were built either by Gillett & Johnston, of Croydon, England, or by John Taylor & Sons, of Loughborough, Leics, England. Interest in the carillon is due largely to the labors of the Hon. William Gorham Rice, of Albany, and his books and magazine articles on the subject

The carillon's home was in Belgium, Holland and French Flanders, where almost every village had its fine carillon, and where carillon recitals attracted widespread interest. The most famous of these is the carillon of 43 bells in the great tower of St. Rombaut, in Malines, whose carillonneur for forty years or more was the late Jef Denyn.

Almost any music that can be played on a church organ may be played on a carillon, in three-part or four-part harmony. There is a famous school of carillon playing at Malines, Belgium, where many of America's best known carillonneurs have been trained See peal ringing

                                                                           F.R.W.

Carlstadt, Andreas Rudolf Bodenstein: (1480-1541) Notable as one of the pioneers of the Protestant Reformation. He held an important position at Wittenberg, and on some important points anticipated Luther's development. He had the courage of his convictions, but lacked balance of mind and steady common sense, and some of his efforts at applying reformed principles, at Wittenberg and elsewhere, nearly led to chaos. In his earlier years he was inclined to be an extremist, and the animosity he aroused repeatedly led to exile and much suffering.   G R C.

Carlyle, Thomas: (1795-1881) British man of letters. Born at Ecclefechan, Scotland, and educated at the University of Edinburgh, he underwent in youth an intense spiritual struggle, of which Sartor Resartus (1833-34) is in part the record. After 1834 he lived in London Although much of his energy was expended on such historical and biographical works as The French Revolution (1837) and Frederick the Great (1858-65), he became most widely known for his essays in political and social criticism. Chartism (1839), Heroes, Hero-Worship and the Heroic in History (1841), Past and Present (1843), and Latter-Day Pamphlets (1850) were influential. Sartor Resartus, however, is the most fully representative of his genius.

Among many editions of Carlyle's Works, perhaps the best is by H. D. Traill (31 vols, 1897-1901). The standard biography is by J. A. Froude (1884).

                                                                          L.W.C.

Carmelites: (Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel) A Roman Catholic mendicant order* founded about the middle of the 12th century, in the Holy Land. Albert, Patriarch of Jerusalem formulated the original rule in 1210 Carmelite historians have endeavoured to trace the antecedents of the Order to Pre-Christian, Jewish brotherhoods. First recognized by the Church, in 1274, on the recommendation of the second Council of Lyons, the Carmelites adopted their characteristic white wool mantle in 1287, hence the English name "Whitefriars." There are two divisions of the Order 1) Calced, the older and less rigorous branch, 2) Discalced, now more numerous, dating from the reforms of St. Teresa* of Avila, c. 1560. Theologically, the Carmelites have been noted for their opposition to Wyclifism and their rather close adherence to pure Thomism. See John of the Cross.   v.j.b

Carneades: (c. 215-125 B C.) Gr. philosopher, founder of the Third Academy, the outstanding sceptic* of ancient times (Zeller) and the first to bring out the difficulties in the idea of God (when defined as living and rational but also absolute and immutable). Held that logic must take account of free will and the probable indeterminateness of the future thus "x will occur" may be neither true nor false, since there may at present exist no cause to make it so Really, "x will occur" and "x will not occur" are both false if the truth is, x may-or-may-not occur. As Levi ben Gerson* insisted, where there is no determinate reality, all determinate assertions are false (See foreknowledge, divine.) No writings survive.
See E Zeller, Philosophie der Griechen III.I, pp 514ff. (1909).   c.h.

Caro, Joseph: (1488-1575) Born in Spain, died in Safed, Palestine Known chiefly as the author of the Shulhan Aruk, which since the seventeenth century, became the standard authority for Jewish law, ritual and observance. Caro was also a mystic as may be inferred from the diary compiled by him which deals with the discussion he had with his heavenly mentor.
Louis Ginzberg, Jewish Encyclopedia Vol III (1903), pp. 583-588, Boaz Cohen, The Shulhan Aruk as Guide for Religious Practice Today (1941).   b.c.

Caroline Books: Document issued towards end of 8th century under name of Charlemagne attacking the authority and findings of 2nd Council of Nicaea (787) and vigorously opposing image* worship.   k.h.c.

carols: See hymns

Cartesianism: The philosophical position of R Descartes* and his followers has many points of contact with theology. In methodology, the mathematical rationalism and use of an initial doubt paved the way for free-thinking, religious rationalism and a critical approach to dogma. The psychological dualism of mind and body, coupled with a mechanical interpretation of physiology, placed greater emphasis on the intentional nature of sin The cosmic dualism of nature and supernature, of the two types of finite substance (mind and matter) as contrasted with the Infinite Substance (God) made the rôle of Divine Grace obscure. A tendency (eventually explicit in the Occasionalists* Malebranche, 1638-1715, and Geulincx, 1625-1669) to minimize the work of secondary, natural causes and to expand the function of primary (Divine) causality is evident. The dynamic theory of substance leads to a less-realistic explanation of Eucharistic transsubstantion* than that of Thomism Demonstrations of the existence of God resemble the a priori argument of St Anselm*, or start with facts of consciousness rather than with an a posteriori knowledge of the physical world The Will of God is the ultimate reason, or ground, for the truth and goodness of reality, somewhat after the fashion of Ockham's* voluntarism. The influence of Descartes on orthodox Catholic theology is largely negative. Later Ontologism may owe something to him. The theological views of Leibniz and Spinoza are influenced by Cartesianism
E Gilson, La doctrine cartésienne de la liberté et la théologie (Paris, 1913), H Gouhier, La pensée religieuse de Descartes (Paris, 1924).   v.j.b.

Carthage, Synods of: Ancient greatness of Carthage gave city a prestige which made it the main centre of the North African church. Frequent meetings of the bishops and clergy were held there from c 220 until fall of Carthage to Vandals (439), and again from recovery by Byzantine Empire until Moslem invasion in 7th century. These dealt with questions of baptism by heretics, readmission of the lapsed and heresy. A somewhat independent attitude was taken towards Rome. Among the most influential figures were Cyprian and Augustine. The most important decisions were those taken in opposition to the Donatists and Pelagians.   k h c.

Carthusians: A Roman Catholic Order of monks founded by St Bruno in 1084. The original establishment was at Chartreuse in the diocese of Grenoble (Cartusia in late Latin, corrupted as *Charterhouse in England). The Carthusians live as solitary hermits, only coming together for certain religious ceremonies The habit is white. In spite of a regimen which is not calculated to produce scholars, the Carthusians have had several noted theologians, of whom Dionysius Rickel (1402-1471) is best known His works constitute a veritable encyclopedia of previous Scholastic thought. Popularly, the Order is known for the manufacture of chartreuse, a fine liqueur, revenues from which are devoted to charitable purposes v.j.b.

Cartwright, Peter: (1785-1872) Colorful Methodist frontier preacher and enthusiastic evangelist ("the jerks"). Presiding elder over four decades A member of Illinois legislature for two terms. In 1846, defeated for Congress by Lincoln. Author of anti-Calvinist letter to the devil.   c.h.m.

Cartwright, Thomas: (1535-1603) Leader of the Elizabethan Puritan party and opponent of Whitgift

See A F S Pearson, Thomas Cartwright and Elizabeth Puritanism (1925)   W.S.H.

Cassian, John: (ca. 360- ca. 435) A monk of Southern Gaul who introduced rules of Eastern monasticism* into the West and who led a memorial protest against the fatalism of Augustine's doctrine of predestination*. See seven deadly sins

S.M.G.

Cassiodorus, Magnus Aurelius: (c. 480-575) Scholar, churchman, and administrator who, upon the completion of his service as minister of state to Theodoric the Ostrogoth in 540, retired to his own monastic foundation of Vivarium in Southern Italy. Here he continued his versatile, scholarly pursuits, inaugurated the work of the monastic scriptorium, facilitated the acquisition of a remarkable library, and, in general, provided monasticism* with a challenge to learning and cultural preservation hitherto lacking. He was the author of such works as The Chronicle, The Tripartite History, Letters and State Papers, The Institutions, and The Gothic History. The last is now preserved only in Jordane's vastly inferior work by the same title.   R.C.P.

caste: A social system best represented by India. It is believed that caste was a color line imposed by the conquering Aryans on the darker Dravidians, as the Sanskrit varna (caste) means color. The Aryans* composed the priestly and the warrior caste, while the lower ones were formed by the native populations.   P.G.M.

casuistry: (Lat. casus, case) 1) The application of ethical principles to specific cases. 2) Quibbling, rationalization, sophistry or an attempt to justify what does not merit justification, this meaning is often associated with methods used by Jesuits. See equivocation.   E.S.B.

catacombs: Catacombs is a term applied to the ancient underground burial chambers that are especially numerous in the vicinity of Rome. The vast majority of these cemeteries belonged to the Christians who constructed them during the second, third and fourth centuries. At present some thirty-five of these ancient burying grounds have been discovered. Each consists of a complicated network of subterranean passages from three to four feet wide and six or more feet high, with excavations in the walls for several tiers of bodies each carefully sealed in with cemented slabs or tiles. These corridors occupy two or more levels, sometimes even seven, and their total length has been estimated at several hundred miles. The once common notion that the catacombs were originally designed as hiding places for the early Christians in time of persecution is no longer tenable. Rather, they were publically recognized cemeteries used by the Christians who, due to their belief in physical resurrection, were unwilling to adopt the current Roman practice of cremation. See art, ecclesiastical, Christian, crypt

W Lowrie, Monuments of the Early Church (1901), O. Beyer, Die Katakombenwelt (1927)

s J C.

catechesis: (Gr. ēchein to sound, ring, peal, kata downwards, katēchein tina to reach one by sound from above, as from the platform of the speaker or the desk of the teacher, impart knowledge by oral transmission) In the general sense of imparting oral information the verb katēchein is used by Luke 1 4, Acts 18 25, 21 21. Paul uses it in the more definite sense of giving oral instruction in religion. Rom. 2 18, I Cor. 14 19, Gal. 6 60 So the noun catechesis became the technical term for instruction and training preparatory for baptism, and still later for all religious instruction and training preparatory for the reception into the full membership of the church in whatever form it is given. Sometimes it denotes every individual lecture or lesson in religious education, e.g., the 18 catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem, or 96 catecheses (or catechisations) on Luther's Catechism.   M.REU.

catechetics: Abbreviation for katchetikē techne, the art of imparting knowledge in oral form, especially religious knowledge preparatory for full membership in the Christian church. So catechetics is what we call theory and practise of religious education*. It treats the historical development of religious education, its subject (the pupil and his inner life), the aim, the material, the method and the close of religious education.

M Reu, Catechetics or Theory and Practise of Religious Education (rev. ed. 1927).   M.REU.

catechism: Catechism means originally the action of oral instruction in religion, later, the book which contains the rudiments of religious instruction in whatever form they are given, whether in thetical form or in the form of questions and answers. To limit the term to the latter form is based on the wrong derivation from echo, the echo, nevertheless the majority of the catechisms are written in that form. Catechisms are as old as the catechumenate*. The first six chapters of the Didache* containing the way of life and death have been rightly called a catechism of the post-apostolic age. The epideixis of Irenaeus offering much Biblical History besides its creedal statements, Tertullian's explanation of the Lord's Prayer, the Testimonia of Cyprian, mostly a collection of Scripture passages for the catechumens, the catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem, sermonic material for the competentes, the illustration added to Augustine's De Catechizandis Rudibus, Augustine's and others' explanation of the Creed for the competentes, all these can be called catechisms of the Ancient Church. Writings which have been called catechisms have come down to us from the time of Charlemagne. We mention only two of the most important ones the so-called Weissenburg Catechism of 789, containing the following five parts 1. The Lord's Prayer in German with a brief explanation based on Tertullian and Cyprian, 2. an enumeration of mortal sins according to Gal. 5 19-21, 3 the Apostolic Creed in German and Latin, 4, the Athanasian Creed in German and Latin, 5. the Gloria in Excelsis in German and Latin, and the Disputatio puerorum per interrogationes et responsiones, which is an explanation of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in question and answer form, used for centuries and attributed to Alcuin   A number of catechetical writings from Thomas Aquinas down to Gerson mentioned in Reu's Catechetics pp. 71 and 75, belong to the second half of the Middle Ages. We name only three intended especially for the instruction of the children primarily in the home ABC des simples gens, by John Gerson (about 1420), Tafel des christlichen Lebens, by an unknown author of the latter part of the 15th century, the Cathechyzon, 1510, by John Colet of London. Besides these we should not forget to mention Wiclif's Poor caitif, tracts on the Creed, Decalogue and Lord's Prayer for the home, the first Hussite Catechism (between 1420 and 1436), the Catechism of the Moravian Brethren (before 1502) and Las interrogacions menors for the Waldenses in Bohemia.

A new period in the history of the Catechism began with Luther's emphasis on the religious education of the Church's youth. Cohrs describes about thirty catechetical writings for the home, the school and the church that appeared between 1520 and 1529. Near the end of 1528 and early in 1529 Luther published the first three parts of his later so-called Small Catechism in the form of sheets or tablets that could be fastened to the walls of the home, the church and the school. These tablets were followed in May by the first Wittenberg book edition of the whole Small Catechism. The Large Catechism based on his three series of sermons on catechetical material delivered in the fall of 1528 was published in April. It was intended primarily for the pastors and the adult congregation   The Small Catechism was written pro pueris et familia and consisted primarily in an explanation of the Ten Commandments, the Apostolic Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, there were, however, also sections on confession and daily prayers and a Table of Duties (consisting in Scripture passages concerning the various "holy orders and estates" of life in which the Christian has to prove his Evangelical morality). The new feature in Luther's Small Catechism was not its question and answer form—this was applied already by Alcuin and others during the Middle Ages, nor the assemblage of the Ten Commandments, the Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the other material for the religious instruction of the youth—we find these parts used for the same purpose before Luther's time; nor the fact that he added an explanation of these texts—even in the Middle Ages we find similar attempts, but entirely new and surpassing all the labors of the Early Church as well as the Middle Ages was the deep Evangelical interpretation of this material, an interpretation that centers in the article of justification. Because of its elimination of the polemical element, its limitation to what is necessary for salvation, its emphasis on evangelical life, its religious warmth and its simple diction, it is unsurpassed. This feature, the name of the author and a few other facts explain the triumphant march of this catechism through the countries of Europe, and why it is still today the basis of religious instruction in the Lutheran churches and missionfields in all the world. Compare Reu, Quellen zur Geschichte der Kirchlichen Unterichts, (Gutersloh, 1904-1935), and Reu, Dr. M. Luther's Small Catechism. A History of its Origin, its Distribution and its Use (1929).

Heidelberg, Zuerich and Geneva were not less active in this field than Wittenberg. The Heidelberg Catechism* appeared in 1563. Originally intended for the Palatinate alone and written by its theologians, Ursinus and Olevianus, it later became the official catechism of all the Reformed churches in Germany, Poland, Hungary, Transylvania and especially in the Netherlands, and is still today being used either as a textbook for religion or at least recognized as confessional writing. It has found its way into Reformed churches even beyond Europe (e.g, United States of America). Although rather dogmatical, it is justly renowned for the answer to its first question and its whole structure treating 1. of man's misery, 2 of man's redemption, 3. of man's gratitude—a structure borrowed from an earlier Lutheran catechism. Of Leo Jud's two catechisms the shorter one (1535) became Zuerich's official catechism, although still rather extensive, it is permeated by a sound evangelical spirit and written in simple popular diction. Calvin wrote two catechisms in French, 1537 and 1541. The Latin translation of this latter catechism by Calvin himself in 1545 as well as other translations were used in many churches, the English translation became through the "Book of Discipline" of 1560, the official textbook for the church of Scotland. It is less polemical than the catechism of 1537 and barely touches the question of eternal predestination, while the one of 1537 had a special section on this doctrine with emphasis on the gemina praedestinatio. It falls into four parts 1. The Creed, 2. The Obedience towards the Law of God, 3. The Prayer, 4. The Word of God and the Sacraments. It is surprising how near it tries to come to the Lutheran doctrine of the Sacraments. In England Marshall's Goodly Primer in its second edition (1535) contained, besides much other material, Luther's Short Form of 1520, this forerunner of his Small Catechism, and in 1548 Cranmer translated Luther's Small Catechism together with its excellent explanation as it is found in the Nuernberg Sermons for Children of 1533 and published it under the title. A Short Instruction into the Christian Religion for the Syngular Commoditie and Profite of Children and Young People. But ultimately it was not Luther's catechism which came into general use, but the "Instruction to be Learned of Every Child" of 1549, somewhat changed in 1552 and supplemented by questions concerning the Sacraments added in 1604. Although very brief and in the form of 1549 containing only the text of the Creed, the Decalogue and the Lord's Prayer with a very short explanation, its characteristic mark is that it starts with a statement concerning sponsorship and thus views the entire contents from the standpoint of Confirmation where the children themselves confess and promise what was confessed and promised by the sponsors in their stead. This catechism is still a part of the Book of Common Prayer* and is official in all Episcopal churches in the world When in the Westminster Assembly of Divines (1643-49) the opposition to the episcopal system of the Church of England was victorious, there were adopted besides the Westminster Confession, also two catechisms, the Larger and the Shorter Westminster Catechism. They exerted very little influence, however in the Church of England because Charles II in 1660 restored episcopacy with the Thirty-nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer (including the catechism of 1549) But they were adopted by the Church of Scotland* and the Shorter Catechism is recognized as confessional writing in the Presbyterian churches of the world still today, although no longer in general use as a textbook in religious education and practically given up entirely by the liberal wing of this church. The Shorter Catechism has often been regarded as the ripest fruit of Puritan experience and theology. Ph. Schaff "It exceeds all other catechisms by the terse brevity and precision of the questions and answers, and differs from most by the following peculiarities   1. It embodies the question in the answer, so as to make this a complete statement, 2. It substitutes a new and logical order of topics for the old historic order of the Apostolic Creed, 3. It deals in dogmas rather than facts and addresses the intellect rather than the heart, 4. It puts the questions in an impersonal form, instead of addressing the learner directly, 5. To this may be added the theological and metaphysical character of the answers."

In 1693 the General Assembly of the Particular Baptists in London requested Wm. Collins to draw up a catechism "containing the substance of the Christian religion for the instruction of children and servants." It has been reproduced in Confessions of Faith and other Documents by E. B Underhill (London, 1854). In the United States among Baptists the catechisms of A. C. Dayton and J. A. Broadus have been widely used in the last century. These are the principal catechisms of historical Protestantism. The scope of this Dictionary does not permit mentioning all the other Protestant catechisms used in the various denominations; still less does it permit a history of all those many catechetical writings based on the catechisms mentioned. Their number is legion. Reu in his Quellen filled not less than nine large volumes and yet told only the story of catechetical literature and instruction in Germany from 1530 to 1600.

A word, however, must be added concerning the catechisms in the Roman Catholic Church. The educational efforts of the churches of the reformation induced the Roman Church to make some earnest endeavors of her own toward providing more general and thorough instruction for the young   A considerable number of catechisms appeared in the sixteenth century, especially after the Jesuits* (1540) began to devote themselves to this work. Canisius, the father confessor of Emperor Ferdinand I, deserves special mention.   In 1556 he issued a small catechism (i.e, a synopsis of his Summa Doctrinae Christianae) under the title, Summa Doctrinae Christianae per quaestiones tradita et ad captum rudiorum accommodata. This catechism was soon also issued in German and translated into many other languages   For more than two centuries this book was the chief catechism of the Roman Church.

In 1559 Canisius wrote a catechism for higher schools of learning which despite its bulky size bore the title, Parvus Catechismus Catholicorum, and which became the standard exposition of the smaller Summa   Even the Catechismus Romanus (also called Catechismus Tridentinus) though composed by the order of the Council of Trent and intended to be a manual for priests, or the textbooks consequently based on this catechism and designated for exclusive use (1598) did not succeed in dethroning the textbooks of Canisius.   In its German form his catechism was republished even in 1810 in Philadelphia and was widely used in this country.   In 1847 Jos Deharbe published Katholischer Katechismus oder Lehrbegriff, based on the Catechismus Romanus.   It was translated into many modern languages and up to the present time has been the most widely used catechism of the Roman Church.   In the Orthodox Church of Russia there appeared in 1721 a rather rudimentary catechism.   During the whole 19th century and later a more extensive book was used which divided the material into three parts Faith (Nicaenum, Sacraments), Hope (Lord's Prayer, Beatitudes), Love (Ten Commandments).   See catechumenate.

M Reu, Catechetics (rev ed. 1927); Ferd Cohrs, Katechismen, und Katechismus Untericht, Real encyclopadie, vol. X, (Leipzig, 1901), Compare also the article on Catechisms in Schaff,Herzog, Vol II, pp. 442-449; Fr Procter and W. H. Frere, New History of the Book of Common Prayer (London, 1905), W Carruthers, The Shorter Catechism of the Westminster Divines, with Historical Account and Bibliography (London, 1897); Ph Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols. (New York, 1877); Ferd Cohrs, Die evangelischen Katechismusversuche vor Luther's Enchiridion (Berlin, 1900-1907), M Reu Quellen zur Geshichte des kirchlichen Unterichts im evangelischen Deutschland zwischen 1530 und 1600 (Guetersloh, 1904-1935); A. Lang, Der Heidelberger Katechismus und vier verwandte Katechismen (Leipzig, 1907); Fr. H. Thalhofer, Entwicklung des katolischen Katechismus in Deutschland von Canisius bis Deharbe (Freiburg, 1898); T B Scannell, "Doctrine Christian", The Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. V, pp. 75-88, (1913).   M.REU.

catechism: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

catechumen: The term means literally "one who is taught by word of mouth", and was applied to a convert who received instruction with a view to baptism. It happened constantly that men and women were emotionally stirred by the preaching of missionaries without any clear idea of the truths involved in it. Before they could be received as Christians it was necessary that some definite knowledge should be imparted to them. Paul refers to "him who occupies the place of the unlearned" (I Cor 14 16), and seems to imply that particular seats were assigned in the weekly meeting to those who were still in process of instruction. This is known to have been the practice at a later time. We learn from the book of Acts that Aquila and Priscilla gave private teaching "in the way of God" (Ac. 18 26). Luke dedicates his Gospel to Theophilus, and speaks of him as a "catechumen", to whom he wishes to impart fuller and more accurate knowledge. From the notice in Luke it seems evident that the instruction was largely concerned with the historical facts on which Christianity was founded. It also dealt with matters of doctrine, as may be gathered from the account of Aquila and Priscilla. With the spread of heresy in the second century the need for grounding all converts in sound doctrine became ever more urgent, and the chief emphasis in the Pastoral Epistles is on this requirement. The catechumens, properly speaking, were Christians not yet baptised, who had to be trained in the elements of the faith, but the term could be so extended as to include mature and gifted converts, who were preparing to be teachers. Paul speaks of a higher wisdom which he communicated to a select group at Corinth (I Cor. 2 6ff.). The Ep. to Heb. seems to be addressed to a similar group at Rome. At Alexandria there grew up a regular "catechetical school",—what would now be called a theological college,—which played an all-important part in the development of doctrine. Among its teachers were Clement and Origen.

L. Duchesne, Early History of the Church (1924), R. B. Tollinton, Clement of Alexandria (1914), Bigg, Christian Platonism of Alexandria (1886).

E.r.s.

catechumenate: This term denotes that institution by which the church, in agreement with Matt. 28 18-20 and John 21 15-17, prepares the catechumens, that is, those who are instructed in religion, for full membership in her midst, either adults coming from the outside or children born and baptised in her midst. In this wide sense the history of the catechumenate is identical with the history of religious education*.

The catechumenate in the Early Church primarily dealt with adults coming from the synagogue or from paganism. Jews or proselytes, since they were well acquainted with the O.T. were admitted to baptism and membership when they accepted Christ as the promised Messiah (Acts 2 37-39, 8 26-28), and even the preparation of the Gentiles was very brief (Acts 16.25-33). Later, when persecution set in and relapses occurred, the preparatory instruction and training became more extensive in time and more thorough in character. The Didache (Chap. 1-6), Justin Martyr (First Apology), Irenaeus (Epideixis), Tertullian (Lectures for Catechumens), Hippolytus (Canones), Cyprian (Testimonia), Origen (Contra Celsum), and Lucian Martyr (Didascalia) testify to this greater emphasis on religious training in the various parts of the church during the second and third centuries. We find the catechumenate in its perfected form between 325 and 450 (so-called Apostolic Constitutions). The applicant for church membership was oriented in a general way by a special lecture concerning the history and nature of the church (Augustine's De Catechizandis Rudibus) and then enrolled as a catechumen. As such he was permitted and expected to be present at the first part of the regular Sunday worship (not at the missa fidelium), and to read the Bible and other religious books. After two years or more (some postponed it until their old age or approaching death) these catechumens entered the class of Competentes or catechumens in the narrow sense. Here during several, often seven, weeks of ascetic, educational and liturgical training they were prepared for baptism. The educational training consisted usually in lectures on the Apostolic Creed and the significance of baptism (Cyril's Catecheses, Augustine's De Symbolo ad Catechumenos). This training culminated usually at Easter with Baptism and their first participation in the Lord's Supper. During the week following Easter they were expected to hear lectures explaining the Lord's Prayer and the liturgical forms of baptism and the Lord's Supper. On the first Sunday after Easter (Quasimodogeniti) they put off their white baptismal robe. The catechumenate had come to an end, they had entered full membership in the church. After 450 this catechumenate decayed rapidly. It was shortened in point of time and the religious instruction was so completely overshadowed by liturgical elements that often not more remained than the memorization of some creedal forms and prayers. The Early Church did not possess nor create a special agency for the religious education of those born in the church and baptized in infancy or childhood. The Christian home was entrusted with this task. In sermons and tracts the parents were repeatedly admonished to fulfill this obligation, and a man like Chrysostom showed them by way of example when and how they should carry it out. Some Fathers of the Early Church even advised the parents to have their children educated in convents.

During the Middle Ages the missionaries among the heathen followed the suggestions of Augustine in his De Catechizandis Rudibus, but too often they were satisfied with the mere memorization of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer and the subjection under the rules of the church. At home infant baptism had become the universal rule. Charlemagne, following the example of the Early Church, held the parents and sponsors responsible for teaching the baptized children the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, and in connection with the Confessional the church could control how far this duty was fulfilled. In the parish school, still more in the cathedral and convent schools, established by Charlemagne, the texts of the Lord's Prayer and the Creed were explained at least to those children who were fortunate enough to attend these schools, some psalms and hymns were memorized and now and then the pericopes prescribed for the Sundays of the church year were read. At that time the first catechisms, often bilingual (German or French or English and Latin), appeared and were used. In the following centuries many of these institutions decayed, but were revived in the thirteenth century. Helps for the domestic catechumenate appeared, a few even designed for children, as well as helps for the priests enabling them to supplement in the Confessional the meager domestic instruction. Many cities established Latin schools or at least schools for reading and writing the mother tongue, where training in participation in the religious life was given. In some places even Biblical history found its place in the curriculum. Compare M. Reu, Luther's German Bible (1934) However, as far as the common people were concerned their religious knowledge did not as a rule advance further than a mechanical memorizing of the Ten Commandments (more generally used since the 14th century), the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, the catalogue of the so-called deadly sins and a few prayers (morning, evening and table prayers), and very often not even this minimum was accomplished, especially in the country where the rule to read these parts Sunday for Sunday before the assembled congregation was often not observed. There was, indeed, room for reformation. Wiclif (Poor caitiff), Hus, the Moravian Brethren and the Waldenses did much for their circles, but the real reformation was brought about by Luther.

Luther's great merit in the field of religious education does not primarily consist in the establishment of new institutions and agencies, but in this, that he revived institutions formerly created, made them universal in the whole Evangelical Church and filled them with new evangelical life. Under his guidance it became a general rule that the Ten Commandments, Creed, Lord's Prayer and the words of the institution of Baptism and the Lord's Supper were recited every Sunday, that these texts were explained in short sermons four times during the year, and in more extensive sermons in the matin or vesper services, that no one was admitted to the Lord's Supper without knowledge concerning its significance and examination of his proper preparation; that the sexton drilled that part of the catechism with the children of the parish every Saturday and taught them to sing the hymns of the church and to read, that often on Sunday afternoon instead of the vesper sermon, exercises in the catechism were held, that the children were examined by the pastor in the catechism before they were admitted to the Lord's Supper for the first time, that the vernacular schools in the towns not only opened and closed with a short religious service, but taught besides reading and writing also the catechism and the hymns of the church; that the Latin schools in the cities increased greatly in number, and were transformed from primarily humanistic schools into real Christian schools in which the Gospel permeated the entire curriculum; that Luther's most excellent Small Catechism was used in the home, the school and the church, whereby streams of sound Evangelical knowledge and divine blessing found their way into the whole church. From Wittenberg and Germany these forms of religious education spread into all the other Lutheran countries Moreover also Bucer at Strassburg, Leo Jud at Zuerich and Calvin at Geneva were very active in this direction and laid the foundation for similar forms of instruction in the various parts of the Reformed church on the continent and in England At times even their followers surpassed the Lutherans in their zeal for thorough religious education.

In Germany the Thirty Years' War destroyed what had been built up so carefully by Luther and the sixteenth century. And yet in the midst of its terrors Duke Ernest the Pious of Gotha in Thuringia (1601-1675) moved by such eminent pedagogues as Ratichius and Comenius and by the lamentable condition of his subjects, not only revived the former institutions, but established in all towns and villages of his duchy Christian public schools which had to be attended by all boys and girls from five to twelve years of age. He is the real founder, not of our religiously neutral, but of the Christian public school. The Bible, Catechism and Biblical History were the foundation stones of this school, besides these, the three R's and even rudiments of geography and natural science were taught. Through August Hermann Francke (1663-1729) and the teachers prepared at his Teacher's Seminary at Halle, this type of Christian Public School remained during the entire parts of Germany and the continent When in 1763 its principal features had been incorporated in the Prussian School Regulations it had conquered nearly all of Germany and had found its way into all those parts of the continent where the state-church system obtained. At the same time a movement set in, influenced by Rousseau and started by Basedow, to loosen the bond between the church and the school by seeking to free it from the church's authority. While the Christian Public School remained during the entire 19th century bringing forth some splendid fruits, the opposition movement became stronger and stronger and in wide circles created a situation which made it possible for Hitler to sever completely the bond between school and church and thus make an end to the Christian or Confessional Public School, leaving it to the church to find new ways for the religious education of her youth.

In the Reformed churches of Hungary, Transylvania, in the Palatinate, and in the Netherlands the Heidelberg Catechism of 1563 was the basis of religious instruction. Since 1585 it was divided into 52 lessons, one for every Sunday. In the German speaking sections of Switzerland Leo Jud and Bullinger's catechetical works were of influence, in Geneva and in the Reformed church in France Calvin's catechism of 1545 became the basis. In England after Lutheran beginnings (Marshall's Goodly Primer of 1535; Cranmer's Catechism of 1548 being a translation of Luther's Catechism and the Nuernberg Sermons for Children of 1533) the state-church introduced, 1549 the "Instruction" to be Learned of Every Child" printed in the Book of Common Prayer and enlarged by the section on the sacraments in 1604, which is still today to be recited at the time of confirmation The "Book of Discipline" edited by Knox in 1560 for Scotland followed the Geneva pattern of instruction and introduced his catechism of 1545 In 1548 the Presbyterian church of England adopted the "Shorter Westminster Catechism" which is still today the official text for religious instruction in England, Scotland and all true Presbyterian churches in the (English speaking) world, although in practical use it has often been replaced by others Space does not permit a detailed account of the religious education of all the other Evangelical churches of Great Britain. During the last century a good deal of religious instruction was given by the modern Sunday school system, which was in many cases the only agency for religious education.

In America it was primarily the home where religious instruction was given, usually on the basis of those catechisms that had been brought along from Europe or on the basis of John Cotton's "Milk for Babes" (1646) which together with the "Shorter Westminster Catechism", made a part of the "New England Primer" (about 1690) and Isaac Watts' "Divine Songs", his two "Plain and Easy Catechisms" (1730) and his "Scripture History" (1732). This instruction in the home was often supplemented by instruction given in the church. Thus the Pilgrim Church at Plymouth resolved in 1680, "that the deacons of the church be requested to assist the minister in teaching the children during the intermission of the Sabbath" (i.e., between the forenoon and the afternoon services). Where the state established schools (as in Massachusetts, 1647) the principal texts were religious books (comp. the New England Primer). The same holds true for many "neighborhood schools" in Pennsylvania, and especially for the regular church schools of the various Christian denominations. The church, as was so often the case in Europe, was the leader in education, and in Pennsylvania she provided nearly all the elementary education available down to 1834. The Sunday School movement was transplanted from England to America in 1791 and changed from an elementary school for neglected children to a religious school for all children and adults. And when the ever improving secular school had in many places crowded the religious day school out of existence, the Sunday school became the only religious school. In many denominations it was and is, however, supplemented by special classes of preparation for Confirmation or—where there is no Confirmation—for admission to full membership in the church,—this is what we might call the present day catechumenate. In the Lutheran church this confirmation* instruction is given with special care, often extending for two years and supplemented by the Vacation Bible School and Saturday School. In some parts of the Lutheran church the Parochial* or Christian Day School is still fostered with excellent care and great sacrifices. It is the glory of the Lutheran Synod of Missouri* extending over all the United States and beyond to have established and to have kept in force a system of parochial schools which in all secular branches stands on the same level with our best Public Schools and at the same time does not only have special hours for strictly religious education but allows the Christian spirit to permeate also all other instruction and the whole school life. See Biblical history in Christian instruction, catechism, Pantaenus, Sunday School movement in the U S categorical imperative: According to Kant,* the ultimate moral obligation that applies a priori to every one under all circumstances. He states it in three different formulations· 1) act according to that maxim which you could wish to be a universal law of nature upon which every one should act at all times, 2) always treat humanity in yourself and others as an end and never as merely means; 3) act always as if you were a member of a merely possible kingdom of ends. The three formulations Kant thought identical in import and application.   W.K.W.

M Reu, Catechetics, or Theory and Practice of Religious Education (rev ed. 1927) (Here extensive bibliographies) ; S. Ch. Parker, A Textbook in the History of Modern Elementary Education (1912) , C L Maurer, Early Lutheran Education in Pennsylvania (1932) ; F. G Livingood, Eighteenth-century Reformed Church-schools (Harvard thesis, 1930) , W H Beck, Lutheran Elementary Schools in the United States (1939) , H. Shelton Smith, Faith and Nurture (1941).   M.REU.

category: (Gr. kategoria, originally an accusation, derivatively, predication) 1) Fundamental mode of predication*, irreducible type of grammatical relation expressed in language (so Aristotle). 2) Fundamental mode of being, as substance, quantity, quality, relation, place, time, position, state, action, or affection (Aristotle, Categoriae, 4). 3) A principle essential to the very being of a given universe of discourse. E.g., the categories of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason are the principles essential to the realm of experience defined by Newton's physics, while the categorical imperative* is essential to the universe of moral experience Hegel's categories are the principles essential to the being of the all-inclusive universe of discourse (the Absolute). Thus we may also speak of categories of logic, ethics, physics, religion, etc 4) Popularly, used as equivalent to class or general idea (so Royce in Baldwin).   E.S.B.

catena: (Lat., a chain) A collection of excerpts from early ecclesiastical writers, strong together to exhibit a connected interpretation of some Scriptural passage.   S.M.G.

Cathari: (Also known as Albigenses*) A medieval, puritannical and heretical movement ruthlessly exterminated. A repristination of Manichaeism* and Gnostic christology*, maintaining to be the only true church of a holy hierarchy and efficacious sacraments.

J. J. v. Dollinger, Beiträge zur Sektengeschichte des Mittelalters, Vol. II (Munchen, 1890), Ch. Schmidt, Histoire et doctrine de la secte des Cathares ou Albigeois (Paris, 1849) ; J L. v. Mosheim, Versuch einer unparteiischen und gründlichen Ketzergeschichte (Helmstedt, 1746).   H.H

cathedra: (Gr. a chair) The official seat or throne of the bishop in a church. See chair of St. Peter, ex cathedra.   F.T.P.

cathedral: (Gr. cathedra, a chair) The church in which is set up the bishop's throne. The principal church of a diocese. See duomo.   F.T.P.

A cathedral is the chief church of a diocese, and connected with it are a bishop, a dean and chapter, and various other dignitaries. The term must not be applied loosely to a large parish church.

The best known cathedral church in America is St. John the Divine, New York. This church, 601 feet in length, was begun in 1892, and is still unfinished. The chancel, choir, nave, baptistery and seven apsidal chapels are practically complete and in use. The two transepts and the great central tower are yet to be built, while the two western towers rise to but one-half their final height. The cathedral has cost $20,000,000 to date, and to complete it will cost $10,000,000 more. When complete, it will be the third largest cathedral in the world. St. Peter's at Rome has an area of 227,069 square feet, Seville Cathedral 128,570, while St. John the Divine has an area of 109,082 square feet. In exterior length it will stand second, for St. Peter's exceeds it by 109 feet.

Washington Cathedral, begun in 1907, is but partially completed. It will be 500 feet in length and its area will be 63,500 square feet In size it will compare favorably with Reims, which has an area of 65,000 square feet, York, with an area of 63,800 square feet and Canterbury, with an area of 57,200 square feet.

There are a number of other cathedrals in America, and while each is a true cathedral, with its bishop, dean and other cathedral clergy, yet the buildings themselves, in size and arrangement, frequently are but large parish churches serving the purpose of a cathedral. See norman.
                                                                F.R.W.

Catherine of Alexandria, Saint: A virgin and martyr whose feast is celebrated on November 25. Scarcely a single alleged fact concerning her withstands critical scrutiny. She is venerated as the patron saint of philosophers. According to unsubstantiated tradition she defeated fifty philosophers in public debate at Alexandria. Legend states that at her martyrdom the spiked wheel on which she was to be mangled broke into pieces at her touch, and that then she was beheaded, sometime toward the beginning of the fourth century.
                                                                C.V.

Catherine de' Medici: (1519-1589) Queen of France, and regent during the period of the religious wars. Devoid of moral sense, she used the contending religious forces as counter-poise to each other—a policy which led to constant trouble. She was ready to use assassination or even massacre as political weapons—as in the massacre of St. Bartholomew*. See wars of religion.   G.R.C.

Catherine of Siena, Saint: (1347-1380) Of humble birth and little education, Catherine through her radiant faith and many works of mercy, became a political leader admonishing leaders in church and state, a travelling emissary between local governments and popes, had many disciples and achieved sainthood. Canonized 1461. Learned disciples edited her writings, of which more than three hundred letters are of historical, literary value.

Dialogue of the Seraphic Virgin, Trans. by Algar Thorold (London, 1896), S. Catherine of Siena as seen in her letters, trans. by Vida D. Scudder (London 1906).   A.S.

catholic: A term used to describe the universal character of Christian beliefs, worship, and of the Church. Derived from kath holou, its original meaning is "integral" (cf. The Church of God, 1934 ed., by E. L. Mascall); later it came to imply "the great Church" as against schismatic or heretical bodies. The word is often employed to distinguish Roman, or Roman, Anglican and Greek, Churches, from the Protestant denominations dating from the Reformation.   W.N P.

Catholic: See Roman Catholic.

Catholic Apostolic Church (Irvingites): A religious organization in part growing out of the prophetic preaching of Edward Irving*, the noted Scotch divine (1792-1834). Irving had taught that the gifts Christ bestowed on the Apostolic Church, such as prophecy, miracles, healing, and speaking in diverse tongues, were meant for all who in later times should have the living faith. After his death in 1834, some of his followers, feeling personally called as "prophets", established a church in London with a full hierarchy of apostles, prophets, evangelists, and pastors. The church was from the beginning ritualistic, making use of vestments, candles, holy oils, and chrism in its services.

Begun in America through immigration of members, the church has two divisions: the Catholic Apostolic Church and the New Apostolic Church, the latter differing in the number of "apostles" each church may have. The last census reports available listed 25 churches and 4,000 members for both bodies in the United States. See pentecostal sects.

Mrs. M. Oliphant Wilson, Life of Edward Irving (London, 1862); W. Wilks, Edward Irving (London, 1854); S. T. Coleridge, Notes on English Divines (London, 1853); E. Miller, History and Doctrine of Irvingism (London, 1878).   M.G.R.—W.W.S.

Catholic charities: See social work of the churches.

Catholic Church, Liberal: See Liberal Catholic Church.

Catholic Clubs, College: See student religious organizations.

Catholic Directory: See Directory, Catholic.

Catholic emancipation act, the: Or the Catholic Relief Act, was an act of the British Parliament in 1829 by which the laws imposing certain civil disabilities upon Roman Catholics in England were repealed. Henceforth, Catholics (with the exception of clerics) were allowed to hold civil and military offices and to sit in Parliament. This measure had special reference to Ireland The emancipation was forced by the repeated election of Daniel O'Connell (1775-1847), thereafter called the Liberator, to Parliament from Ireland. The repeal of the disabilities was necessary before he could take his seat in Parliament.   T.T M

Catholic Epistles: The title given to the group James, I-II Peter, I-III John and Jude, because most of them are not addressed to a single church but have a more "catholic" or general destination. See canons of various churches   B.S.E.

Catholic Journalism: Dates practically from the invention of printing in western Europe. The types of Catholic periodical literature are so varied that there are no set categories in which they may be classified. Most represent only the opinion of that Catholic institution or group which publishes them. The *Acta Apostolicae Sedis, which is issued monthly from the Vatican Press, is the chief authentic publication. It contains the official letters of the Holy Father and the decrees of the various congregations and other public documents Its predecessor, before the reorganization of the Papal Curia under Piux X, was the Acta Sanctae Sedis. Of general interest to the Church throughout the world are monthly and quarterly periodicals, such as Biblica, which contain authoritative commentaries on Catholic doctrine and decrees. Most of these are published in Rome but some come from papal universities. Next in authenticity are the publications of Catholic universities and research bodies, although the authority of these publications is that solely of the contributors. Each country and nearly every language has its own Catholic press. The publications of these presses include quarterlies, monthlies, weeklies and, in countries having compact Catholic populations, dailies. The nearest to an authoritative Catholic daily is the Osservatore Romano, published in Vatican City, but even that does not have the authority of the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, although its editorials are usually in close sympathy with Papal opinions. In the United States there is no Catholic daily. Most of the dioceses have diocesan weeklies which are edited under the supervision of the bishop. Some of the editors are laymen and are usually allowed considerable latitude in expression of opinion on contemporary events. The nearest to an official publication for the hierarchy is Catholic Action published under the direction of the National Catholic Welfare Conference which chronicles chiefly the activities of the Conference and the pastorals of the hierarchy. The other publications of national interest are sponsored by Catholic universities, or religious communities and have only the authority of their editors and contributors. The Commonweal is published weekly by a group of Catholic laymen. The best known Catholic weeklies are America and the Ave Maria; and generally read Catholic monthlies are the Sign and the Catholic World.
A. W. Baumgartner, Catholic Journalism: A Study of its development in the U. S. 1789-1920; Paul J.

Foik, Pioneer Catholic Journalism in the United States (1930).   T.T.M.

Catholic parochial schools: See parochial schools, Catholic.

Catholic Reformation, The: The Catholic Reformation was the answer of the Papacy to the challenge of the Lutheran revolt against Rome at the beginning of the XVI century. Clement VII (1523-34), although as resolute against the Emperor as towards the King of England, fearing a renewal of the conciliar theory of the superiority of General Councils over the Primacy, refused to convene a General Council as planned by his predecessor, Hadrian VI (1522-23), but Paul III (1534-49), who might rightly be looked upon as the transition between the Renaissance-and Reformation popes, finally convoked the Council of Trent* "ad reformationem cleri et populi christiani". From the V to the XXV (or final) session, a section "de reformatione" ran concurrently with the section "de fide". Every phase of Catholic doctrine attacked by the reformers was re-defined, especially the whole system of justification, involving original sin, grace, redemption, the Sacraments, the Sacrifice of the Mass, Purgatory, etc. Similarly, every violation of discipline that had served as a motive for the repudiation of continued catholic unity under the papacy was denounced; reform measures enacted and their observance ordained under pain of severe ecclesiastical censures. Two of the cardinals who presided over the plenary sessions (del Monte and Cervini) became popes: Julius III (1550-55) and Marcellus II (1555), a third, Reginald Pole, became under Queen Mary Tudor, the Catholic, (the last) Cardinal Legate to England, where he labored for Catholic Restoration. Pius IV dealt a blow to unworthy nepotism in the execution of two men appointed by his personally holy, strict and stern, but at times imprudent predecessor, Paul IV (1555-59). Pius IV (1559-65) solemnly closed the Council of Trent with the institution of the "Sacred Congregation of the Council" to enforce and interpret authentically the Council's decrees. He also published a new "Index of Forbidden Books". The statutes of the Council were put into effect by such reforming popes as St. Pius V (1566-72. reform of the Roman Missal and Breviary, introduction of the Tridentine Catechism), Gregory XIII (1572-85 reform of the Julian Calendar; Roman Theological Colleges), and Sixtus V (1585-90: re-organization of the Roman Curia; repression of banditry), by such saintly archbishops and bishops as St. Charles Borromeo of Milan (d. 1584) and St. Francis de Sales of Geneva (d. 1622); by the founders and members of such newly founded Religious Orders and Congregations as the Jesuits, the Capuchins, the Theatines, the Somaschi, the Oratorians, and, among the Communities of Women, the Ursulines, the Daughters of Charity and the Vistandines. Through these popes, bishops and religious men and women reform among the clergy and religious of both sexes was accentuated (celibacy; cloister, preaching, religious instruction, canonical visitations of dioceses; episcopal and pastoral residence, diocesan and provincial synods, etc.); Catholic education fostered (institution of Diocesan and Regional Seminaries, academies for girls; colleges and High Schools for boys), deep-rooted piety nurtured (Marian Sodalities, parochial charitable societies, etc.), foreign missionary activities multiplied (institution of the "Propagation of the Faith" by Gregory XV (1621-23), and frequent reception of the Sacraments, despite the restraints of the Jansenists, fostered. The Inquisition, too, did much in these years to keep Italy and Spain, and her dependencies, within the fold of Rome. Although Leo X (1513-21) had excommunicated Luther, and Pius V, Elizabeth, Clement VIII (1592-1605), despite the Edict of Nantes, was willing, after a protracted delay, to receive back into communion with Rome, Henry IV. Innocent X (1644-55) however, notwithstanding the machinations of Richelieu and Mazarin, could not be induced to accept the terms of the Treaty of Westphalia (1648) regulating the aftermath of the Thirty Years War.

For the best critical Lives of the Popes of the Reformation and Post-Reformation period cf Pastor either in the original German or in any of the authentic translations e.g , English, French, Italian or Spanish and the literature therein quoted.

The best critical edition of the Acts (Decrees, Canons, Letters, Treatises, etc), of the Council of Trent is undoubtedly that of the Górres-Gesellschaft (1901 ff) ; a handy and complete edition of the decrees and canons is that of the S. Cong of the Propagation (Rome, 1882) An English trans of both the Acts of the Council and of the Catechism of the C. of T. was publ. by Rev. J Waterworth.

For the history of the C of T. cf Sforza Pallavicini (Ital. ed., Rome 1656-57, ib. 1883 (edit. Zaccaria) ; Latin trans. by Giattino (Antwerp, 1670) , Paolo Sarpi (London, 1619) , Mendham, Memoirs of the C. of T. (London, 1834; Suppl 1883).

For documents of the C of T. cf Le Plat, Monumentorum ad historiam C. T. spectantium amplissima collectio, 7 vols. (Louvain, 1781-87) , Druffel-Brandi, Monumenta Tridentina I-V (Mainz, 1844-99) , cf also Parsons, Studies in Church History Vol III, 511 ff. (New York, 1907) , Fr Cuthbert, O S. F. C, The Capuchins: A Contribution to the History of the Counter-Reformation 2 vols. (London, 1928) ; Tacchi-Venturi, Storia della Compagnia di Gesu in Italia (Rome and Milan, 1901 ff) , Thos J Campbell, The Jesuits 2 vols (New York, 1921) ; Cath. Encyc. IV 426:XV 30-35; Dict. de la Théol. Cath. under "Council de Trent" and all kings, popes, cardinals and bishops prominent in the Cath. Reformation as indicated in this present article.

R.M.H.

Catholic religious orders. Abbreviations of names of: S.J. for Society of Jesus or member of the Jesuits; O.P. for Order of Preachers or member of the Dominicans; O.S.B. for Order of St. Benedict, or member of the Benedictines, O.S.A. for Order of St. Augustine or member of the Augustinians, O.M. Cap. for member of the Capuchins; O.F.M. for Friars Minor or Franciscans, C.M. for Congregation of the Mission, C.S.C. for Congregation of Holy Cross.

For other abbreviations consult The Catholic Encyclopedia (1907), Vol. I, pp. 27-28; The National Catholic Almanac (1942), pp. 271-273; The Official Catholic Directory, 1942 (1942), p. 917.

L.R.W.

Catholic Societies: Those pious associations, distinct from religious organizations properly speaking, erected by the Church for the promotion of a more perfect Christian life in its members, to encourage works of piety or charity, or to promote public worship. The proper erection of such societies belongs to the pope and to the bishop of the diocese, with the exception of those for the erection of which special powers have been given to others by Apostolic privilege. However, even in the last mentioned case, the written consent of the bishop of the place is required for the valid foundation of a society, unless the contrary is explicitly stated in the concession. Every association must have its own statutes which are to be examined and approved by the Apostolic See* or the bishop of the diocese, and every association is subject to the authority of the ordinary who has the right and duty to watch over them. These associations properly established may possess and administer temporalities under the direction of the Ordinary. For the enjoyment of the rights, privileges, indulgences and other spiritual privileges of the association it is necessary and suffices that the members be validly received in it according to the proper statutes of the organization and not legitimately expelled from it. The Code of Canon Law* recognizes three kinds of pious associations in the Church: 1) secular third orders*, 2) confraternities* and 3) pious unions. Secular tertiaries are those who live in the world under the direction of an Order, and endeavor to attain Christian perfection according to the spirit of that Order in a manner compatible with secular life, and according to rules which have been approved by the Holy See. The best known tertiaries* are Tertiaries of St. Francis, of the Order of St. Dominic and of the Carmelites, and the Oblates of St. Benedict. Associations of the faithful founded to further works of piety or charity are known as pious organizations or pious unions; if they constitute an organic body they are called sodalities*. Sodalities that have for their object the enhancement of public worship are called confraternities. The title or name of a confraternity or pious union must be taken from the attributes of God, or the mysteries of the Christian religion, or the feasts of Our Lord or the Blessed Virgin Mary, or from the saints or from the specific work of piety carried on by the organization. Confraternities may be established only by a formal decree of erection, but for pious unions the approbation of the local bishop suffices and enables them to gain spiritual favors, especially indulgences, although it does not constitute them moral persons. It is the duty of the diocesan bishops to see that the Confraternities of the Blessed Sacrament and of Christian Doctrine be established in every parish, and once erected these confraternities are by law aggregated to the same Archconfraternities erected in Rome by the Cardinal Vicar. Sodalities or confraternities that are empowered by law to affiliate to themselves other associations of the same nature are termed archconfraternities, or archsodalities, or pious unions, congregations or societies of primary rank. No pious association can validly affiliate itself to other pious associations without an Apostolic indult*. In the order of precedence the Code lists these lay organizations as follows 1) Third orders, 2) Archconfraternities, 3) Confraternities, 4) Primary pious unions, 5) Other pious unions. In the United States there are established all forms of these lay associations under their respective rules. See Confraternities, Sodalities.

T.T.M.

Catholicism in China: See Chinese religions.

Catholicism in India: See India, religions of, India, Missions to.

Catholicos: The title of Nestorian and Armenian patriarchs. It originated in Persia during the reign of King Yazdegerd I (399-420), who approved the organization of an autonomous Persian Christian Church, and elevated the metropolitan of the capital, Seleucia-Ctesiphon, to the rank of primate with the title of Catholicos.

Aubrey R. Vine, The Nestorian Churches (London, 1937).   M.S.

Catholics, Old: See Old Catholics.

cause: (Lat. causa) Something whose existence is a precondition of the existence of something else, a sine qua non or "necessary condition" of an existent. "The" cause of anything is sometimes defined as its necessary and sufficient condition. Taken absolutely, this definition implies determinism, for it means that the cause suffices to ensure the effect and thus uniquely determines it. The definition also implies that there is no ultimate distinction between possible and actual existence; for if the necessary and sufficient condition be lacking the effect is impossible, and if it be present the effect is inevitable and its non-occurrence impossible. Thus necessary occurrence and necessary non-occurrence are alone permitted. A definition which admits a distinction between necessary and merely possible existence and does not exclude determinism is as follows. the cause of a thing is the necessary and sufficient condition of the possible existence of the thing. As for its actual existence, perhaps that involves no further condition, but is a sheer contingency or creative addition to possibility, something that may or may not occur, and the knowledge of whose occurrence or non-occurrence is to be had (even by Omniscience*) only by "waiting to see." Thus the effect would require and imply the cause, but the cause would not absolutely require or imply the effect. An intermediate or in one sense deterministic, in one sense indeterministic, conception is that the cause is sufficient condition, not indeed of the existence of any one determinate or individual effect, but of "some one or other" of a class or kind of possible effects. Thus the cause would guarantee that some effect or other of a certain general sort would follow, but not just which one of the possible variations of the sort it would be. Current physics seems to conceive such a limited guarantee to obtain in both directions between cause and effect, so that neither cause nor effect is uniquely and determinately inferrable from the other, but only statistically and probably. The class of the effect is given if the cause is given, and vice versa, and it is assumed that there must be some real member of the class. However, our sense that the past is determinate, in contrast to the future, which is a matter of option between still open alternatives, seems to imply that—whatever it may suit the technical convenience of physics to suppose—the past, the cause, is unique or determinate when the present, the effect, takes place, and thus that the effect requires the cause individually, while the cause requires the effect only generically or approximately, leaving some free or creative option, however slight.

The deterministic version of cause when applied to theology makes the creator require his creation as definitely as the creation requires the creator. Given God, the world must be, just as, given the world, God must be. Each is necessary to the other. Since there are no degrees of necessity, the least creature, being indispensable, would be as important as God.

The purely indeterministic view would mean that, given God, there need be no world at all. From God's existence nothing would follow at all as to the world. God might have perfect self-knowledge, and yet know nothing of the world (except as a mere possibility of existence) since as existent the world would not be involved in his own being. (The failure to see or admit this is common in the tradition, though the usual view of God as totally "independent" in every way is precisely the pure indeterministic view of causality in its theological application.)

The intermediate or qualifiedly indeterministic view of God as cause is that His existence makes it inevitable that there be some world or other, but not just the world which in fact exists. Thus God's independence is of the particular world, not of world-as-such. (Even of the particular world, he is independent only in his essence, not in his total being, which must contain just the actual world, if he is to know this world and love it —See omniscience, panentheism; perfection, transcendence). The intermediate view makes it possible to exempt God from responsibility for the details of the world and its evils, and yet to regard him as "the" cause of the world. His existence makes it inevitable that there be some world but only possible that there be just this world.

Causes are often divided into efficient and final, and Aristotle* spoke also of formal and material causes. All of them are conditions of their effects. A statue would not exist had the plan in the mind of the artist not existed, or had there been no material from which to make it. But a final cause is somewhat indeterministic in a special way, in that the same desired outcome may be reached by more than one route. The final cause is indeterministic also in that success is not guaranteed, since the material may not prove altogether pliable. But further, a final cause does not even intend to fully determine its effect. To know exactly what one desires would be to have it, since knowledge of value is possession in the most literal sense. One would never go to the theater if he knew precisely and vividly what was to occur there, for then he would be enjoying the play already. And the artist sees his form with full precision and detail only when his work is finished. Theologians have striven to avoid applying this principle to God, or have simply overlooked the problem, but it seems doubtful if it means anything to speak of divine purposes in regard to the world if God enjoys its values in advance or in eternity*. Even if it be said that his purposes are purely disinterested or altruistic, this only evades the issue, not only because we have no meaning for altruism other than a taking pleasure in promoting the pleasures of others, or an interest in satisfying their interests, but because it cannot be a good that the interests of the creatures should be satisfied when, should the creatures not exist at all, all possible values would exist anyway in God. It is superfluous to promote the welfare of superfluous beings, whether from a disinterested or from an egoistic standpoint, since even a disinterested survey must perceive the futility of trying to add values to existence as including absolute value eternally. As Bergson, Peirce, Whitehead, and others have been reminding us, the only conceivable purpose of creation is to achieve new values, and if really new they must be new for omniscience*, the measure of reality. God requires that there be a world, if the value of His life is to be enriched. And a God whose life cannot be enriched must either achieve all possible value eternally—which is a contradiction, since there are incompossible values—or he must be eternally limited to some arbitrary quantum or degree of value less than is possible, in which case he is in no significant sense perfect. Thus a God simply independent of the world is unintelligible in terms of final causation. But a God dependent absolutely upon just this world which exists, rather than simply upon world as such, is equally unintelligible, for the idea implies an enrichment every detail of which is involved in the being to be enriched, and this is a contradiction. Thus the intermediate or qualifiedly indeterministic view of the cause-effect relation is no less applicable to the divine as final than as efficient cause.

David of Dinant* identified God and "matter" or potentiality, thus making God the universal material cause. Aquinas* called this view crazy, but it is so only if Thomism is assumed as the norm of sanity. The ultimate potency which is molded into actual form is the uniquely flexible, uniquely modifiable life of deity. For consider, whatever may become real, if and as real it will be known by omniscience and loved by the perfect love. But knowledge and the known, loving and the loved, must in some way correspond to each other, and God must therefore be ready to correspond to whatever can occur, and this potential correspondence is part of the potential being of the things. To make a creature, X, is for God to make Himself to know and care for X as an actuality, for were X not actual, God would not know and love it as actual. (See Gerson, Levi ben.) Thus, in creating, God creates states of himself, and thus treats his being as matter to be given form.

Cause, First or Prime The cause which is first in a logical sense, supreme or universal among causes, the one which is required for any and all effects. To affirm it does not involve denying the infinity of past causes. It is enough that the supreme cause be supposed to have sustained the series of secondary causes through its perhaps infinite past. The supreme cause is thus not necessarily first temporally except that it must be the only cause that has operated at all past times, however remote. It is thus temporally earlier than each and every but not perhaps than all secondary causes (if these be infinite in number). Nor does the argument for a first cause depend for any of its force upon an assumed or demonstrated finitude of the series of second causes. The argument is as follows. Ordinary causes are always logically arbitrary or contingent in their very existence. If there is nothing but the sum of such contingent causes, then that anything at all exists is sheer accident. Yet this cannot be, for "it might be that nothing exists" is an absurdity, since there would "be" at least the fact of the non-being of everything. Though all details of being are contingent (and, as Peirce showed, a non-contingent detail would be a contradiction in terms), it cannot be contingent that there are details of being, some details or other. But what is the being which must receive some details or other, what is the ground of alternatives such that not all of them can be unrealized? The being which will be there no matter what else is there is the universal being, the first cause. The ground of alternatives which makes it impossible that none be realized is not itself a member of an alternative, but rather the being to whose existence there can be no alternative, the necessary or self-existent being which requires that there shall be some non-necessary actualities or other. Thus the first cause is not in every sense independent of other causes, but rather in its essence it depends upon (in the sense of necessitating or omnipotently requiring) the class of contingent beings as such, while in its accidents the necessary being (necessary only in essence and as to having some accidents or other) depends upon just which contingent beings in fact exist.

The traditional procedure of inferring a necessary being from contingent beings held to be in no way involved in the necessary being which was supposed to explain them was self-contradictory and a chief cause of scepticism and atheism. The absurdity of denying a first cause lies precisely in the implication that contingent predicates inhere only in contingent subjects, that accidents happen only to the accidental. The absurdity is avoided only by regarding accidents as contingent phases of the life of a Being as in essential reality not accidental but the necessary recipient of all accidents, the non-alternative medium of all open alternatives. To make the contingent being merely contingent, and the necessary being merely necessary, is to evade the essential question: how are they together one reality? "The contingent-and-the-necessary" must form some sort of whole (all reality, all that is what it is whether human beings know what it is or not) and this whole cannot be exclusively contingent or exclusively necessary. Nor can it be less than God, the supreme cause but, for that very reason, also the supreme effect; the one being who (in his essence) has always been and always will be involved in all causation, and equally the one being who (in his accidents) always has been and always will be enriched by every effect, garnered without loss in his loving omniscience. See concursus, fatalism; fate; Hume, David, omnipotence; pantheism, transcendence.

A. N. Whitehead, Process and Reality (1929), especially the last chapter.   C.H.

Cavasilas, Nickalaos: (d. 1371) Greek Archbishop in the city of Salonica He was educated in Italy and became famous for his mystic and philosophical ideas and thoughts. He is considered one of the greatest representatives of the Greek Church in mysticism. He played also an important role in politics of the Byzantine Empire.

He wrote many books of mystical value, as The Union of Man with Jesus Christ which will be obtained through the Sacraments of Baptism, Extreme Unction, and Holy Communion.

He was an opponent of the Roman Catholic Church, and against the proposed Union of the Greek and Catholic Churches.   G.E.Z.

Cecilia, Saint: Roman virgin and martyr, whose feast is celebrated on November 22. A great deal of legend has grown up about her, but little can be established with certainty. Not even the century in which she was martyred is known. The connection of this saint with music probably arises from a misinterpretation of the first antiphon of Lauds on her feast day.   C.V.

celibacy: See communistic settlements, religious, marriage.

celibacy: (Christian) (Lat. caelebs, unmarried) The obligation imposed since the time of Gregory the Great (d. 604) on clerics in major orders to observe chastity under vow; hence the forbidding of marriage, or, if the person is married, the use of marriage.   L.R.W.

Celsus: Opponent of Christianity, its "first great polemical adversary", whose anti-Christian treatise, True Discourse, written about A.D. 177, was answered by Origen* in his lengthy work Contra-Celsum. It is from Origen alone that we have any knowledge of Celsus, but he tells us nothing of the latter's personal history. In the Contra Celsum, however, we have copious quotations from Celsus, which bring out clearly the line of his argumentation against Christianity.

Origen, Contra Celsum; F. C Baur, Christendom and the Christian Church in the First Three Centuries (1853); Theodor Keim, Celsus's Wahres Wort (1873); E. De Faye, Origene, Sa Vie, Son Oeuvre, Sa Pensée., Vol. II (1927).   C.W.L.

cemetery: (Gr. kosmeterion, "sleeping chamber") A place of burial. Christian care for the dead and faith in a resurrection gave a religious value to cemeteries from a very early date (see catacombs). Burial normally took place in consecrated ground adjoining a church (the "church yard"), from which unbelievers, excommunicate persons and suicides were excluded. See crypt, death and burial practices.   B.S E.

Cenobite: (Gr. koinos, common; bios, life) Monks who live in community as distinguished from hermit* or anchorite* who lived solitary or eremitical lives. The cenobitical type of monasticism was instituted in the East by St. Pachomius* about 318, but was greatly modified by St. Basil. It was introduced into the West by St. Athanasius* in 340. The founder of Western monasticism* is St. Benedict*.   J.B.C.

censer: Another term to describe the thurible, or receptacle used for incense* in the services of the Church. Sometimes the term is also employed for the person using the thurible.   W.N.P.

censorship of books: (Lat. censor, man who takes census) Supervision of the press, by Church or State or army, etc., to prevent misuse of it. The Catholic Church, e.g., takes it as her work to preserve and propagate Christ's teachings, and thus she concludes that no Catholic may publicly contradict those teachings; since 1571 she has a special body of censors called the Congregation of the Index, and a book disallowed by this body is "on the Index." See Gregory XIII, Pope. Also see Office, Sacred Congregation of the Holy.   L.R.W.

censure: (Lat. censura) A term taken from Roman law and meaning an ecclesiastical penalty depriving of particular goods such as the use of the Sacraments; imposed on a baptized person who has committed a serious external fault and is obstinate about it.   L.R.W.

census, religious: See federal census of religious bodies.

Cerberus: In Greek mythology, the three-headed dog guarding the entrance to Hades*. In Hesiod he is described as having fifty heads.   P.G.M.

Cerinthus: The earliest Gnostic* teacher of whom anything definite is known. He was active about the year 100 A.D., in the region of Ephesus, and according to tradition was an adversary of St. John. It is possible that the heresy denounced in the 1st Ep. of John was that of Cerinthus. Nothing of his writing has survived, and the accounts of him in the early Fathers are vague and conflicting.

L. Duchesne, Early History of the Church (1924).   E.F.S.

certainty, religious: The special mode of religious knowledge. Religion has been wont to claim knowledge beyond the scope of rational search or proof. Gnostics* (Christian and non Christian) professed gnosis higher than discursive thought, mystics* an immediacy in apprehending God distinct from the conclusions of ratiocination More widely in the Church faith, again in pri ority to reason, has been the pathway to certitude. credo ut intelligam. The special religious knowledge is conceived as exceeding other knowledge both in substance and in the certainty with which it is held. The N.T. views some claims to higher knowledge as spurious (I Tim. 6 20), yet its own truth too is above human wisdom (1 Cor 1: 17-25). It is revealed not to the wise, but to the trustful and receptive (Math. 11·25; 1 Cor. 2 9-11); the very heart of Christianity is so given (Math. 16 16, 17, 1 Cor. 12 3). Apostolic witness is not to the fruits of inquiry but to what, divinely vouchsafed, is directly perceived (John 1: 14-18, 1 John 1 1-5). By the saving intent of the truth (John 17·3), certainty as to it is akin to assurance* as spiritual realization of divine gifts.

    D. C. Macintosh, The Problem of Religious Knowledge (1940); W. A. Brown, Pathways to Certainty (1930); J. Baillie, Our Knowledge of God (1939); W. W. Bryden, The Christian's Knowledge of God (Toronto, 1940).   J.L.

Cerularius, Michael: (1043-58) Patriarch of Constantinople. Repudiated the claims of Pope Leo IX* to the universal headship of Christendom. He based his contention on the ancient view that each patriarchate was supreme within its own territory. The papal legates sent to Constantinople found him adamant in his refusal and excommunicated him and his adherents on July 16, 1054. This inaugurated the "Great Schism"* between the Western and Eastern churches which persists to this day.

    B. J. Kidd, The Churches of Eastern Christendom (London, 1927).
    J. M. Hussey, Church and Learning in the Byzantine Empire, 867-1185 (Oxford, 1937).   M.S.

chair of St. Peter: The expression has a threefold meaning: 1) the actual episcopal chair or throne used by the Prince of the Apostles, firstly, the one at Antioch, the other at Rome, symbolizing his episcopal office in both cities; 2) the feastdays established by the Church to commemorate Peter's episcopacy in both places; and 3) the symbolical or dogmatical meaning of the expression "ex cathedra".

    1) In exactly what places St. Peter* first lived at Rome (certainly in no one place uninterruptedly from 42-67 A.D.) or where the first Bishop of Rome had his episcopal headquarters (to use an expression of today) cannot be ascertained with certainty. Many pre-Constinian places contend for the honor: Santa Pudenziana, Santa Priscilla, Santa Prisca, etc. That St. Peter as first Bishop of Rome, like other early bishops of other sees, has an episcopal chair is attested by catecumbal representations, by allusions to his cathedra, either real or symbolical, in the early Fathers, e.g., Irenaeus, Cyprian, Jerome, etc.; by such historians as Eusebius* and Orosius, and by an unbroken tradition. Parts of that original episcopal chair or sedes gestatoria (apparently of pagan origin, used perhaps by some pre-Christian teacher or judge and donated by friends to St. Peter) was in later centuries (IX) elaborated with gold, ivory and costly decorations. Throughout the Middle Ages it was venerated by pious pilgrims who came to old St. Peter's to do homage to the Prince of the Apostles buried there beneath the High Altar. By order of Pope Alexander VII (1655-67) it was enclosed in a gigantic casing of bronze, designed by Bernini, and now occupies the principal place of honor above the apsidal altar of the present St. Peter's Basilica, known as the "Altar of the Chair". 2) The Feast of the Chair of St. Peter at Antioch is celebrated in the Roman Liturgy on February 22, that at Rome, on January 18th. Both feast days, however, are of Roman origin. 3) The Greek word for chair kathedra has long become symbolical of doctrine and power divine, royal, juridical, professional, ecclesiastical hence, the word "cathedral", the bishop's church containing his "cathedra", chair or throne, also the expression to speak "ex cathedra", when applied to the Bishop of Rome, i.e., to speak authoritatively and pronounce definitely some article of faith "as pastor and teacher of all Christians". (Constitution. Pastor Aeternus, Vatican Council.)

    Litt. Cath. Encyc. III, 551-4; P. J. Chandlery, Pilgrim Walks in Rome (London, 1927) pp. 102-7; Lexikon f. Theol. u. Kirche, VIII, 478, 559-560, Orazio Marucchi, The Evidence of the Catacombs (London, 1929), pp. 94-109; Anton de Waal, Roma Sacra (Munich, n.d. 1905?), I chap.   R.M.H.

Chalcedon, Council of (451): T h e Fourth Oecumenical Council, summoned to reverse the findings of the Latrocinium (Ephesus, 449*) on the heresy of Eutyches* of Constantinople, supported by Dioscorus of Alexandria that the Person of the Son had only one nature, the divine, hence the name of the heresy—Monophysitism*. The formula was based on the Tome of Leo I*, which was satisfactory only because it stated the problem without facing the issues. The findings of Ephesus (431)* against Nestorius* were confirmed and Constantinople was assigned seniority next to Rome—over Alexandria (contra. Nic. c. vi). Leo refused to accept this canon. See Christology; Dyophysites.   F.W.B.

Chaldean (Persian) Rite: The complexus of liturgical and disciplinary laws and customs used in the Nestorian Churches. Variants of this rite are followed by the Nestorians* in Mesopotamia and Persia with 80,000 members and by the Mellusians in India with 15,000. Catholics of the patriarchate of Babylon of the Chaldees with 70,000 members and of Malabar with 532,000 also follow variants of this rite.   E.A.R.

chalice: (Lat., calix, cup) The vessel used in the Eucharist to contain the wine to be consecrated. Usually of precious metal. See paten.   P.V.N.

Chalmers, Thomas: (1780-1847) Distinguished Scottish preacher, theologian, ecclesiastical statesman, educator, reformer and mathematician. Under his leadership the Free Church of Scotland* was founded in protest to patronage and political meddling. He refuted Hume's objection to miracles and issued a notable Calvinistic work Institutes of Theology.   V.F.

Châlon sur-Saone, councils of: Held in 603, 649, 813, 1062, 1129. That of 649 reaffirmed the formulae of Nicea and Chalcedon. Important is that of 813 which adopted sixty-six canons on the discipline of clergy and laity, teaching, preaching, ordination, confession and penance, prayers for the dead, pilgrimages, etc.   J.T.M

chance: See fortune, tychism.

chancel: (Lat. cancelli, lattices or screens with which it was formerly enclosed) The portion of the church eastward of the nave* set apart for the clergy, choir and altar. The easternmost part which contains the altar* is called the sanctuary*, while the western portion is the choir*.   F.T P.

chancel plays: See religious drama.

Chancellor's Lectureship: Founded in 1893 at Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, with a capital gift of $8,000 by Sir Sandford Fleming, then Chancellor of the University, to provide each year a course of four lectures to members of the Queen's Theological Alumni Association, the lectures to deal in the main with the philosophical basis of religion. The Lectureship was held for ten years from the time of its founding by Prof. John Watson of Queen's. In recent years James Moffatt, E. F. Scott, John Bennett, Reinhold Niebuhr, Nathaniel Micklem and President J. S. Thomson of the University of Saskatchewan have been among the lecturers.   S.M G.

Chancery, Apostolic: (Lat. cancellans, chancellor) The papal office issuing such important documents as those appointing bishops and those erecting new dioceses.   L.R W.

change: See time.

changeless, the: See eternal.

changeling: In Celtic folklore the "little people" or fairies* often stole a human infant and left a changeling in his cradle. The changeling, about the size of the baby, generally had a wizened face, and did not grow normally.   P.G.M.

Changes, The Book of: See I Ching.

Channing, William Ellery: (1780-1842) American preacher and theologian. Launched the Unitarian controversy with his Baltimore sermon (1819) on "Unitarian Christianity," where Christ is described as "one mind, one being, and a being distinct from the one God." See liberal theol.; Unitarianism.   W.M.H.

chant: (Lat., cantus, song) An ancient form of simple ecclesiastical music used in singing the psalms and canticles. The chant normally used in the Latin Church is called Gregorian*, from Pope Gregory the Great*, to whom it is traditionally ascribed. Plainsong*. The so-called Anglican chant is somewhat more elaborate and metrical.   P.V.N.

chapel: (Lat. capella, a cloak. Term first applied to depository of St. Martin's cloak.) A small church, or a subordinate building attached to a church and containing an altar, or a place of dissenting worship, or, the place of worship of a private residence, school or college or other institution.   F.T.P.

chaplain: (Late Lat., capellanus, fr. cappa, cape) A priest serving an institutional chapel, or appointed to the army or navy. The term was apparently first applied to the priest-custodian of the cape (cappella) of St. Martin of Tours.   P.V N.

chaplet: (O. Fr. chapelet, dim fr. chapel, hat, garland) The "rosary"* a form of meditative-oral prayer made up of fifteen decades or tens of Aves with a Pater between each two, also called the beads, esp. when abbreviated to five decades.
L.R W.

chapters and verses of the Bible: In most books of scripture a natural division is traceable Luke, for instance, intends the book of Acts to fall into seven parts, and marks the end of each of them by a formula indicating a further stage in the expansion of the church. Before the time of Christ the Law had been divided into sections for reading in the synagogue, each of them bearing a special name, e.g., "The Bush" (Mk. 12 26). This system was extended to the whole of the O.T., and the "Parashas" are still marked in the Hebrew Bible. It was not till the 13th century that Stephen Langton*, Archbishop of Canterbury (the framer of Magna Charta) introduced the present chapter divisions into the Vulgate. Verses were much later, and were first marked off by the printer Stephanus in his edition of the Greek N.T. in 1551. Shortly afterwards, in the Antwerp Polyglot* of 1569-72 the system of numbered verses was applied to the whole Bible. See verse division of the Bible.   E.F.S.

character education: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

character, indelible: According to traditional Catholic theology, held by Roman, Anglican and Eastern Orthodox, the orders of those ordained to the sacred ministry are "indelibly" (that is, irreplaceably and without possible loss) conferred. Hence, they possess a "character" (a stamp or mark upon them by reason of ordination) which cannot be removed or suffer defection, although the exercise of such orders may be abrogated by ecclesiastical authority.   W.N.P.

charismata: The word means literally "things freely given", and is applied in the N.T. to the new gifts or energies which were bestowed on Christians by the Spirit. In I Cor. 12 4-11 Paul enumerates a large number of these "spiritual gifts", pointing out that they were highly diverse in character. Many of them we would now regard as merely the natural aptitudes which could be employed in Christian service, but for Paul, and the early church generally, they were conferred by a special grace. It was believed that since a man's whole being is transformed by the Spirit he not only receives new endowments, but those which he has already become different. The term "charismata" was used chiefly of the strange phenomena which accompanied Christian worship, and especially of the speaking with tongues*. These gifts were plainly extraordinary, and therefore appealed to the common mind as direct manifestations of a new divine power. Paul makes his protest against this view, and maintains that the Spirit is most truly present in activities which may impress no one as abnormal. Love, he declares, is the very highest "charisma". See holiness churches, pentecostal sects.   E.F.S.

Charity, Brother of: A Roman Catholic religious congregation founded in Belgium by Father P. J. Triest in the 19th century. The purpose of the group is to care for the sick, aged, orphans and other needy people. Many distinct groups of religious women are known as Sisters of Charity*.   V.J.B.

Charity, Sisters of: See Sisters of Charity.

charity and almsgiving (Christian): While the forms and motives of primitive Christian charity had their sources in Egyptian and Semitic cultures, their practice apparently was more extensive than in any other contemporary group. Its structure was the "enclesia," or mutual benefit society, whose services were available at times to other than members. Probably, in these early days Christians established hostels for reception of strangers, which became the typical institutions of the middle ages, ministering primarily to the sick and aged. This spread over all Europe and religious orders sprang up to man them, such as the famous Hospitallers* of Malta. It was not much before the 18th century, with its scientific advances in the treatment of disease, that hospitals were defined for the treatment of the sick, exclusively. However, this is only a general statement, with notable exceptions such as the colony for insane and feebleminded at Gheel, Belgium, which had offered a remarkable service under the egis of the church during the whole medieval period to the present.

With the growth of metropolitan centers of population and accumulation of surplus wealth, medical institutions came into the front rank of private benevolence. St. Bartholemew and St. Thomas in London antedate the reign of Henry VIII, the first hospital in this country was the one founded in Philadelphia by Benjamin Franklin in 1751. Public hospitals grew out of the workhouse, as Bellevue in New York City, that was originally a function of the "Public Workhouse and House of Correction" established in 1736. In contemporary times general hospitals may be private, such as Presbyterian in New York City, municipal, such as Cook County in Chicago, or under denominational auspices, of which almost every considerable community has examples. The Federal government has hospitals for veterans, for acute or chronic patients as well as for mental diseases. Generally, hospitals for the insane are under State auspices, although a few municipalities have them, such as St. Louis and New York City, and there are some private mental hospitals, such as Bloomingdale in New York City (1791).

Provision for dependents was widely furnished by the church which accumulated large sums of money for this purpose. At times, this was distributed indifferently and there were many protests against either the method of distribution or the dishonesty of its almoners. But there was a vast amount of intelligent and courageous service that is less known: such as provision for lepers, rescue stations on dangerous highways, such as over the Alps, services to seamen in port and when shipwrecked, ransom of captives of pirates who infected the Mediterranean, provision for unmarried mothers and their children, as well as development of means of foster care for dependent children.

As the Middle Ages passed into the modern era with its rapidly growing urban centers, monastic and ordinary religious provisions for the care of dependents proved inadequate and various experiments in organization of charitable effort were undertaken in the cities of western Europe and Great Britain. In territories in which the Catholic Church successfully resisted the Protestant movement, they in effect resulted in a merging of ecclesiastical resources with municipal supervision. In Protestant countries they resulted in creating secular organizations in connection with existing ecclesiastical bodies, such as the programs established in Germany by Luther and in Zurich by Zwingli, or in outright municipal and state administration of public assistance as in the English Poor Law of a century later (1601).

On the Continent, administration of assistance rarely came wholly under public service, as the resources of volunteers, such as in the Elberfeld scheme, were widely used. In England, where it was entirely handled as a public function, assistance had a troubled existence, although never entirely suppressed. By 1834, a strong reaction against all such aid had placed severe restrictions upon its practice which did not lift until under the influence of a more liberal theory of economics than laissez faire and of a socialistic philosophy public assistance and its more acceptable substitute, social insurance now cover almost all contingencies of economic need.

The story in the United States follows closely that of England, except that the last, and more generous, stage is not so well established.

In the private field, the two pioneers of the 19th century were Thomas Chalmers of Glasgow and Frederick Ozanam of Paris, who introduced methods of individualization, investigation, record keeping and supervision in the 1830's which finally flowered in the charity organization movement (London, 1869; Buffalo, 1877), which is generally considered the starting point for contemporary methods of treating dependency. It advocated coordination of all charitable effort, the definition of the method used in treatment, called social case work, the criteria and educational preparation of personnel for what has come to be looked upon as a profession. This has involved an evaluation of the sciences contributing to an understanding of human behavior, the establishment of schools in connection with universities, and the production of professional literature.

The story of treatment of the delinquent is less extensive. Following the custom of classical temples, churches were used as sanctuaries, and such function jealously protected However, most delinquents until the rise of contemporary nationalism were political, and the first prisons used largely for debtors, witnesses and persons awaiting execution. Crimes in the modern sense were either very severely dealt with—exile, slavery or death, or left to be avenged or compensated for between the injured and injuring parties.

With the 19th century various schools of thought, the classical, established by Beccasia (1769) and the scientific, initiated by Lombroso (1872), Ferre (1881) and Garofalo (1885) arose and a more careful study of the criminal as a person began to be made. On the continent it is confined in general to extensive psychological studies of the convict, although in Germany of the era of the Republic (1920-1933) some interesting experiments in individualization of treatment were inaugurated. In the United States certain reforms in procedure and treatment were introduced and have taken firm root, such as the Juvenile and to a less extent the Family Court (or Court of Domestic Relations) the indeterminate sentence, probation and parole, changing prisons from places of punishment to schools for the reeducation of the inmate, and the slow—very slow—education of public opinion in a realistic understanding of the problem of delinquency*. See asylum; charity organization, orphanages, social work of the churches.

G. Uhlhorn, Die Christliche Liebesthätikeit (Stuttgard, 1890) ; A. Emminghaus, Der Armenwesen und die Armengesetzgebung in Europäischen Staaten (1870) ; Charles S. Loch, Three Thousand Years of Social Service (London, 1910, new ed, 1938) ; Charles D. Watson, The History of the Charity Organization Movement in the United States (1922) ; Stuart A. Queen, Social Work in the Light of History (1922). F.J.B.

charity and almsgiving (non-Christian):

As long as society remained one of primary contacts, familial aid among kinsmen and mutual aid between members of a community were the only resources for the necessitous. When—or where—this stability and simplicity of society evolved into mobile and complex groups, two distinct attitudes developed toward those in need. Among the Greeks and Romans charity toward the needy was lightly regarded. The culturally approved qualities of mercy, generosity and unselfishness were those exercised toward one's own class or peers. In ancient Greece, citizens of a state voted themselves certain remuneration as payments for services in the public assembly. Later, as citizens became more necessitous, Pericles instituted vast public works, such as the buildings and sculpters that adorned the Acropolis, the constitution of the roadway between Athens and the Pireaus as means of relief, or work relief as we should say. In both Greece and Rome, citizens as early as the fifth and third century B.C., respectively were sold grain at greatly reduced prices, and later it was distributed freely. In Rome, families acquired the right to receive the beneficence of the State, and handed it down to their children In addition, Rome instituted extensive colonization schemes, partly as a device to keep down the number of workless citizens in the urban centers

Charity, in its modern sense, was not highly regarded. Slaves* were sufficiently valuable to be cared for in self interest of their owner. Strangers, if known, were afforded hospitality ordinarily. But the sentiments and practices termed charitable in modern usage were reserved for a sort of glorified mutual aid, reciprocal services between equals in times of need ransom from captivity, attention when ill, financial aid to one temporarily distressed.

While in Rome the State limited its gratuities to its citizens to certain allowances of food (and perhaps amusements) these gratuities were heavily reinforced by the aristocracy who in courting public favor gave lavishly in a wide variety of ways.

In Egypt and the Orient generally, on the other hand, charity was the practice of religious virtue on the part of the wealthy, especially the rulers, toward the economically exploited, and on the theoretical basis of winning divine approval and favor in the future life. It seems as if its distinctive characteristic consisted in its being considered a means of securing rewards in the future life. The needy claimed it on precisely the same ground; but also looked to divine protection that would compensate them in the next life for what they suffered here.

This idea in other Eastern religions merged into the belief of poverty as a virtue in itself, possibly because of its inescapable exploitation. Such an idea reached its fullest development in Persia and especially India, where poverty and sanctity became almost synonymous, but its influence was strong in primitive and medieval Christianity.

Chinese and Japanese philanthropy was until modern period wholly a matter of familial services. Because of the large groups composing these oriental families, they were able to care for their members who were economically imperilled. In modern times both nations adopted modern systems of public welfare, but because of national poverty and war, it has not been actually put in operation in either country.

Second International Conference of Social Work (Baden, 1933) ; Report of the Third International Conference of Social Work (London, 1938) , Yu-Yue Tsu, The Spirit of Chinese Philanthropy (1912) ; Hendrick Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege im vorchristlichen Altertum (Utrecht, 1939). F.J.B.

charity organization:

Charity Organization is a term given to a movement originating in London in 1869, transplanted to the United States in 1877 (Buffalo), and variously named here, such as Associated Charities (Boston, 1882), Society for Organizing Charity (Philadelphia, 1878) and when combined with earlier agencies, as Federated Charities (Baltimore) or United Charitie (Chicago). The movement spread over all o the English speaking world, with similar agencie in some of the larger cities of China and India It made no lodgement on the Continent wher social and cultural conditions had already created different methods of dealing with poverty.

Its founders reacting against the chaotic condition of relief in the older cities proposed plans for the correlation of the activities of agencies giving relief, and the improvement of methods of studying the problems of poverty in the individual and in the community. In its growth, it developed the use of the case committee, by which coordination and improvement of methods, the districting of cities to keep administration and beneficiaries more closely together and, in the United States especially, the promotion of other specialized services in child welfare, medical and psychiatric social services, probation and social work in the public schools. In some communities, especially the younger ones in which there had not been strong relief-giving agencies, they became the leading private agency for the care of the dependent.

Out of the charity organization movement several independent agencies gradually emerged. To mention just a few, the Social Service Exchange, a clearing house for all case working agencies, and the Council of Social Agencies, which took over the "organizing" function of the earlier societies. Many reform movements, such as Anti-Tuberculosis, Tenement House Reform, Control of Small Loan practices, laws governing family relations such as child labor, divorce, desertion and non-support owe their main or sole promotion to such societies. In its later phases of growth, these societies have contributed either initially or in common with others to the definition and development of the two characteristic features of contemporary social work, the definition, method and content of social case work, and the criteria of professional personnel.

Charles S. Loch, Charity Organization (London, 1892) ; Edward T. Devine, The Principles of Relief (1904) ; Richard C. Cabot, Social Service and the Art of Healing (1909) ; Frank D. Watson, History of the Charity Organization Movement in the United States (1922).   F.J.B.

Charles V: (1500-1558) Charles V of the House of Habsburg, was from early young manhood Holy Roman Emperor and King of Spain. The greatest ruler of his House, he was nevertheless unable to solve the problems of those difficult times, but his wise moderation in dealing with the Protestants and his energy against the Turks made this convinced Catholic an important defender of the religious unity of Europe. Cf. Reformation; Spires, Diets of, Worms, Diet of.
    E.A.R.

charms and amulets: In origin a charm was an emotion-charged wish expressed in words. In world-wide usage it is any combination of words filled with a mysterious potency and effective in fulfilling desires. An amulet is a material object efficacious in securing benefits for its possessor. A written charm and an object charmed are amulets. The distinction between charm and amulet is often forgotten and the material object is commonly called a charm. The amulet is worn on the person. Since its essential function is to fulfil wishes, it is expected to give wealth, strength, good-fortune, success in love, victory in war, to protect from dangers, to cure disease, to injure an enemy, to be a shield against demons, ghosts, and the envious, evil eye. See fetishism; magic, phylacteries, relics.   A.E.H.

Charterhouse: The famous pre-Reformation monastery of the Carthusians* in London. The name was an English corruption of Chartreuse. In 1611 one of England's great public schools was founded on the site of the former charterhouse monastery. Today it is located at Godalming, Surrey.   J.B.C.

chartism: A movement named from a Parliamentary petition called the "Peoples' Charter" drawn up in 1836, demanding manhood suffrage, annual parliaments, vote by ballot, abolition of property qualification and payment of members in the House of Commons, and equal electoral districts. The petition was overwhelmingly defeated at the time, but all the suggestions, except annual meetings of the Parliament, have been adopted subsequently.

It was the first proletarian protest of the Industrial Revolution. The Reform Act of 1832 was largely a middle class victory. The Poor Law of 1834 bore heavily upon the artisans, miners and unskilled laborers of England. The Chartist movement, making radical demands and proposing a general strike on two occasions, 1839 and 1842, was not immediately successful, and some of its leaders were deported, yet it furnished the beginnings of the progressive and radical organizations which so strongly influence development of England political action during the last half of the XIX Century; Socialism and the Labor Unions.

E. D. Jones, Chartism—a chapter in English Industrial History. Transactions of the Wisconsin Society of Sciences, Arts and Letters (1900) ; Frank R. Rosenblatt, The Chartist Movement in its Social and Economic Aspects (1916).   F.J.B.

Chartres, the school of: Famous school in France founded at the end of the tenth century by Fulbert*, bishop of Chartres from 1006-1028. Leaders of the School were Bernard of Chartres (died between 1124-1130) and his younger brother Thierry* of Chartres (died around 1150) further Bernard Silvestris, chancellor at Chartres (around 1156), William of Conches*.(1080-1145) Walter of Mortagne*, Bishop of Laon (died 1174) and Gilbert de la Porrée*, Bishop of Poitiers and chancellor at Chartres (1076-1154).

In theology the School followed Boetius, in philosophy Plato and his doctrines in the Timaeus. Although considered second only in importance, the logical treatises of Aristotle, too, were cultivated. The School of Chartres distinguished itself with its love of the natural sciences also. The works of Hippocrates, Galen and even the medical treatises of the Arabs found a home within its walls. A characteristic feature of the School was a genuine love of classical antiquity and a study of the humanistic books of the past.
    s.c.t.

Charvakas: A thoroughly materialistic school of Indian philosophers who regard the soul or self as a mere function of the body which completely ceases to exist when at death the body dissolves. An abundant life of the senses is the highest good. See Lokayata.   C S B.

chasidim: (Heb. Chasid—pious) The party of the pious, the devout champions of the Law* and the up-holders of the traditional faith, who flourished in Palestine during the second and third centuries B C. From their circle came the most determined opposition to the worldly and assimilationist Hellenisers among the people They were the backbone of the Maccabean revolt and the forerunners of the Pharisees.   A.H S.

Chasidism: A significant and extensive mystic movement which rapidly spread among the Jews of Poland in the second half of the 18th century. It came in the wake of earlier mystic messianic movements and the social and economic collapse of the Jewish communities of Eastern Europe following the Cossack uprisings in the middle of the 17th century. The Chasidic movement spread very rapidly, and by the middle of the 19th century, it embraced nearly one-half of the Jews of Eastern Europe. The movement stressed the values of piety, spiritual exaltation and the joy of complete surrender to God as a counter-poise to rigid religious formalism, rabbinic intellectualism, and the spiritual depression of the times. "Pure faith without any sophistries" was the key-note. The essence of Judaism was the love of God and the way to God was open to the poor and ignorant man whose prayer is sincere and whose faith is boundless as to the scholar who is steeped in Talmudic* lore or to the ascetic who denies himself the innocent enjoyments of life. The theologic emphasis was upon the omnipresence of God, man's ready communion with Him, and the power of fervid and ecstatic prayer.

The movement, steeped in religious emotionalism, came into violent conflict with official orthodox Rabbinism centered in Lithuania, seat of great Rabbinic academies, and its followers were frequently persecuted and excommunicated by their opponents who came to be known as "Mitnagdim". The Chasidim came to have their own separate synagogues and special prayer books and their own communal organization within the larger Jewish community. For a time Chasidim and Mitnagdim would not intermarry.

The founder of this movement was a man of humble origin, Israel ben Eliezer (d. 1760) who, because of his reputation as a healer and a miracle-worker, was known as Baal Shem Tov (Besht—the Master of the Good Name). The movement was always centered in the personality of a Tzadik (The righteous one, also called Rebbi) who was the supreme guide of his disciples and their mediator before God. These Tzadikim came to exercise enormous influence over their followers, some of them establishing hereditary dynasties, holding "court" and accumulating great wealth. The movement began to decline sharply towards the middle of the 19th century as a result of its own inner stagnation and the spread of modernism and secularism among the Jewish masses.

Among the more prominent leaders of the movement were Rabbi Baer of Meseritz (d. 1772) the successor to Besht, Rabbi Jacob Joseph of Polonnoye (d. 1782) first literary figure in Chasidism, Rabbi Nahum Tchernobyl (d. 1797), Rabbi Levi Isaac of Berdychev (1740-1809), Rabbi Shneur Zalman of Liady (1746-1819), the philosopher and "rationalist" of the movement and founder of the "Habad" branch of it, and Rabbi Nachman of Bratzlav (1770-1811). See Lurianic Kabbalah.

S. Schechter, Studies in Judaism (First Series), (1896) ; Jacob S. Minkin, The Romance of Hassidism (1935) ; Louis I. Newman and Samuel Spitz, Hasidic Anthology (1934) ; Martin Buber, Jewish Mysticism (1931) ; S. A. Horodezky, Leaders of Hassidism (1928).   A.H.S.

Cheese Sunday: See church year cycle.

Cheltenham (Mo.) community: See communistic settlements, secular.

Chemnitz, Martin: (1522-1586) German Lutheran dogmatician, "prince of the theologians of the Augsburg Confession" (Quenstedt). Learned in mathematics and astrology as well as theology, Chemnitz brought into the doctrinal controversies of his day vast knowledge coupled with clear thought and discriminating judgment. As superintendent of Brunswick he was the leader of the Lutheran Church of Lower Saxony and influential in unifying the Lutherans of Saxony and Swabia on the basis of the Formula of Concord, of which he was one of the principal authors. His Loci Theologici, published posthumously in 1591, is a commentary on the Loci Communes of Melanchthon whose respectful disciple Chemnitz remained in spite of his own firmer orthodoxy. Against the Crypto-Calvinists* he wrote De Vera Praesentia (1560) defending the strict Lutheran view of the Eucharist* including the emphasis on ubiquity*. Against Socinianism* he wrote De Duabus Naturis in Christo (1570). His greatest work is the four-volume Examen Concilii Tridentini (1565-1573), an incisive analysis of the Roman Catholic position adopted at Trent and an able defense of Protestantism. See communicatio idiomatum.   T.A.K.

Chemosh: National deity of the Moabites*, as proved by the O.T. and archaeological monuments (Moabite Stone*). He on occasion was appeased by human sacrifice (2 Ki 3 27). Solomon* is reported to have built a sanctuary to Chemosh in Jerusalem, which was maintained until the reform of Josiah (ibid, 23.13).   H.K.—L.F.

cherub, cherubim: (Heb. Kerub, pl. Kerubim) Winged celestial beings, part human and part animal, who served as the chariot of the Almighty and as guardian angels*. Figures of Cherubim decorated the doors and walls of the Temple of Solomon. Two Cherubim made of olive wood and covered with gold, were set up in the inner Sanctuary of the Temple, their over-arching wings touching each other in the middle of the chamber beneath which rested the Ark*. The Ark itself had two Cherubim of gold set up, facing each other, at the two ends of the Ark-cover (Kaporet), their wings spread out on high, screening it. It was here, between these two Cherubim, that the deity revealed Himself and communicated His commands. (Ex. 25.17-22, Num. 7.89). Yahweh is therefore referred to in the Bible as "He Who is enthroned upon the Cherubim". (I Sam. 4.4, II Sam 6.2, IIK. 19.15, Ps. 80.2, 99.1). There were no Cherubim in the Second Temple.

In the vision of Ezekiel (Chap. 1 and 10) the Divine Throne rested upon the wings of four Cherubim, each of which had the form of a man with four faces—that of a man, a lion, an ox and an eagle, and each one possessed of four wings, under which were the hands of a man. The soles of their feet were calves' soles. Each Cherub had a wheel at its side which moved as the Cherub moved, and both Cherub and wheel were full of eyes. These Cherubim served as the Divine chariot.

Cherubim were the guardian spirits not only of the Sanctuary and the Ark, but also of the Tree of Life after the Fall. (Gen. 3.24).

In the angelic hierarchy which was developed in later times, the Cherubim came to be variously placed in the scale, but their function remained primarily that of guardian angels. Such subsidiary deities of composite forms acting as winged guardians, one finds in Babylonian, Assyrian, Hittite and Egyptian mythology, and representations of them are to be seen on monuments and sculpture.

It has been suggested that the Cherubim were the personifications of clouds, wind or storm.

A.H.S.

Chesterton, Gilbert Keith: (1874-1936) English journalist and author, whose brilliant essays, Heretics (1905), Orthodoxy (1909), and other volumes interpreted Christianity from a mystical Catholic viewpoint strikingly transcending yet intimately related to contemporary thought.

J.W.B.

chiasmus: A sentence in which one set of words is repeated in inverted form, so that the two clauses are crossed as in the letter Chi (X).

E.F.S.

Chicago School of theology: Under the leadership of such men as Shailer Mathews*, John Merlin Powys Smith, and Shirley Jackson Case, the Divinity School of the University of Chicago developed in the early part of the century a theological method which drew heavily upon the insights of the social sciences then coming into academic prominence. At that time the University of Chicago itself was fast on the way to establishing the leading department of sociology in the country, and numbered among its philosophers George Herbert Mead.

The gist of this Chicago theological method is the interpretation of Christian writings, historical events, thought, and service in the light of their social environment. Christian loyalty, it is held, has had perforce to express itself in contemporary culture patterns such as empire, feudalism, national sovereignty, democracy, and law. To understand the Christian religion of the past as well as to express it in the present require an understanding of the social milieu and the changing intellectual climates past and present. Social experience is to be explored as a key to the interpretation of all phases of the Christian movement. Metaphysical and systematic theology thus become subordinate to functional and cultural theology. Theology in fact does not create Christian loyalty. Loyalty rather begets successive theologies to fit the changing times. Consequently no theological formula can ever be considered final or as conveying absolute truth. Cf Foster, G. B.

Shirley Jackson Case, The Social Origins of Christianity (1923), Shailer Mathews, The Atonement and Social Process (1930) ; J. M. P. Smith, The Prophets and Their Times (1925) ; The Journal of Religion issued by the Divinity Faculty and Conference of the University of Chicago.

A.C.M.

child marriage: The marriage* of persons who have not yet reached maturity. Generally, the term is applied to any marriage in which either the wife is under 18 years of age or the husband has not yet reached his twenty-first birthday, these being the most common ages at which persons can marry without parental consent and prevailing in three-fourths of the jurisdictions in the United States. Fifteen jurisdictions, however, prescribe the same minimum age for both males and females; eleven requiring both to be not less than 21, one setting 20 as the minimum, and three permitting marriage at 18. Nevertheless, in more than a half dozen jurisdictions marriage may be consummated by parental consent at 14 for males and 12 for females. While these states are exceptional, the standard generally prevailing is 18 for males and 16 for females.

Among preliterate peoples, marriage is almost invariably permitted after puberty. In this preliterate peoples have not differed from many historical peoples. Talmudic* law fixed the legal age for contracting marriage at puberty. The prevailing marriageable age for girls in Europe during the Renaissance was twelve years. Furthermore, marriages were often celebrated among Europeans until well into the 17th century between persons who had not yet achieved puberty, as was also true in India until very recent times, but under these circumstances the marriage generally remained a fiction until puberty or beyond.

E.R.M.

children: See family; juvenile delinquency; juvenile protection.

Children of the Light: See Society of Friends.

chiliasm: (chiliad- a thousand) Doctrine of Christ's return to reign a thousand years on earth. See millenarianism.

R.E.E.H.

China: See Chinese religions; Chinese Terminology.

China Inland mission: Founded by J. Hudson Taylor who went to China in 1853. It now has over 1000 missionaries there. Vocational and spiritual preparation, careful training in languages are required. No direct appeal is made for funds and no fixed salary is guaranteed. Missionaries are stationed in inland provincial capitals to extend the gospel through the interior.   P.E.J.

Chinese religions: See Chinese Terminology.

CHINESE TERMINOLOGY
(not including Buddhism):

Chang (Tao) Ling: Historical founder of the Taoist religion, who was born between 147 and 167 A.D. By his Taoistic writings and magic healing, he attracted many followers to the Dragon and Tiger Mountain (Lung Hu Shan) where he lived. These followers were required to contribute five bushels of rice each, from which the movement was called "the Way (Tao) of Five Bushels of Rice" and "Rice Bandits." He was called the Heavenly Teacher (T'ien Shih) and the religion he organized was called the "Way of the Heavenly Teacher."

The movement was continued by his son Hêng and grandson Lu. The latter led a revolt in northwestern China for thirty years, supported by charity, magic, and superstitious beliefs. Thus from early days, the movement was both political and religious. After his surrender, the political feature disappeared but the religious aspect continues to this day under the name of Taoism*.

Chinese religions: Confucianism, Buddhism and Taoism are usually considered the religions of China. This description, whether in the qualitative or quantitative sense, is correct only to a limited extent. In the first place, there are more religions in China than these three. Secondly, Confucianism can hardly be called a religion (see Confucianism). Thirdly, Chinese religions are so interfused that it is difficult to draw a line between them. Running through them is the ancient and popular religion of the masses, which may be called the Religion of the People.

Outside of the professional Buddhists and Taoists, the people at large do not distinguish themselves as Confucianists or Buddhists or Taoists. They follow a general religion, which antedates, combines, and overshadows all the so-called "three religions." This general cult is characterized by several prominent features:

1) Animism and polytheism. From time immemorial, the Chinese have worshiped four classes of spirits. The first class, called Shên, includes the spirits of Heaven. Of these, Shangti* is the highest, the sun, the moon, and the stars second, and wind, rain, etc., third. The second class includes the ch'i or spirits of Earth, notably Shê Chi* or Gods of the Ground and the Grain, the five Holy Mountains led by T'ai Shan or the Holy Mountain of the East, other mountains, rivers, and valleys. The third class, called kuei, includes the spirits of human beings, especially ancestors. The fourth class refers to the kuai or spirits of animate and inanimate objects. This ancient classification is no longer followed, nor is the order of seniority still in effect. Because different localities have worshiped different gods at different times according to their need, some gods have disappeared while others have emerged. Those that have survived as the fittest are Shangti, Shê Chi, T'ai Shan, the God of Land, the City God, the Dragon God, the God of Wealth, the God of Medicine, the Kitchen God, Kuei-hsing, Kuan Ti*, Yo Fei*, the Fu Lu Shou, the gods of various clans and professions, etc.

2) Worship of Shang-ti. Although Shang-ti is one of the many heavenly spirits, he is really a category by himself, for he is identical with Heaven (see T'ien) and is comparable to Amita* in Buddhism or God in Christianity. He is purposive, personal, and perfect. Until 1912, it was the supreme duty of the emperor to make sacrifice to him in behalf of the people.

3) Ancestor worship. "As the foundation of things is Heaven, so the foundation of man is the ancestors." With this conviction, the Chinese have worshiped their ancestors with a seriousness equal to their worship of Heaven. As we learn from the inscriptions on oracle bones of the Shang period (1765-1122?), ancestor worship was highly developed at that time. It is an extension of filial piety and should not be compared with the worship of other spirits. The ancient practice of impersonating (shih) the deceased usually by his grandson, the subsequent custom of offering before tablets, the building of ancestral temples, the elaborate system of burial and mourning, the extensive practice of visiting graves, etc., are but expressions of continued respect for parents, without any sense of fear or gain. To the Chinese, "Worship is to fulfill human relations." Ancestors are believed to be still alive as spirits (see hun), with human qualities and human needs. Consequently, the Chinese insist that in sacrifice there must be the feeling that ancestors "are really there." Food is offered them, and, beginning with the T'ang dynasty (618-907), paper money is burned as a gift to them. Other necessary things in the sacrifice are candles and incense. The former grew out of the ancient custom of worship before dawn while the latter was borrowed from Buddhism.

4) Worship of Confucius. As ancestor worship is the extension of filial piety, so the worship of Confucius is the extension of respect for a teacher. The Chinese worship Confucius, Lao Tzŭ, and Sakyamuni (see Buddha, Buddhist Terminology) as the Three Sages in certain temples. But the worship of Confucius alone is national, for every county throughout the empire was required to have, and most of them still have, a K'ung miao (Confucian temple), a wê miao (temple of culture), or a hsüeh kung (temple of learning).

State worship of Confucius began with the offerings by the founder of the Han dynasty before Confucius' tomb in 195 B.C. It developed when Wu-ti established in 136 B.C. the Confucian College of Doctors, consisting of five faculties co-responding to the Five Classics (see Confucianism) and adopted these Classics in 125 B.C. as basis of civil service examination. These gestures were political. Later on, however, when P'ing-ti conferred the posthumous title of "Duke" on Confucius in 1 A.D., when sacrifices in his honor were decreed in all schools in larger cities in 59, when the Five Classics were engraved on stone slabs by Imperial order and placed in the Temple of Confucius at the capital, Ch'angan, in 175 A.D., when a Temple of Confucius was erected in his birthplace in 442, when his lineal male descendant was made hereditary Duke, when images or portraits of him were ordered set in place in schools throughout the empire in 637, when he was honored as "The Foremost Teacher" in 666, as "King" in 739, and as "Perfect Sage" in 1013, and when the same sacrifice was made to him as to Shang-ti in 1906, the honor was conferred out of genuine respect. The Chinese people, from the emperor down, regarded Confucius as the example of man and worshiped him as an ideal instead of a power over the fortunes of human existence. State and school worship of Confucius was terminated in 1912. In 1934, however, the government decided that the birthday of Confucius, August 27th, be observed as a national holiday, decreed that a high government official participate in the worship of Confucius at his native place, Ch'üfu, and appointed his 77th direct descendant as "Sacrificial official for the Grand Perfection, Ultimate Sage, and Foremost Teacher."

5) State Cult. In a sense the worship of Confucius was a state cult, as state worship was accorded Confucius ever since the Han dynasty, except in the T'ang (618-907) and Yüan (1280-1368) dynasties when Taoism and Lamaism, respectively, were more popular with the rulers. The term state cult, in the case of China, however, meant nothing more than official sanction of and participation in the worship of Heaven, ancestors, Confucius, etc. It was different from the state cult of Imperial Rome or Japan. Theoretically the emperor was the Son of Heaven and the head priest of the people. But this did not imply the theory of divine right or governmental control of religions or exclusion of other cults. The emperor's part in the worship of Heaven and Confucius was purely ceremonial. Government regulations of religions were political rather than religious. It is true that each dynasty fixed its own order of worship. The Ch'ing dynasty (1644-1911), for example, paid grand sacrifices to Heaven and Earth, the Gods of the Ground and the Grain, the past Emperors, and Confucius, paid secondary sacrifices to the spirits of Heaven, famous rulers of antiquity, great Confucianists, and outstanding historical persons; and paid ordinary sacrifices to other deities. This classification, however, had little meaning to the people at large. It is also true that in all state capitals, the emperor himself was worshiped in the Wan-shou-Kung (Temple of Long Life). But there was no idea of the divinity of the emperor as in Japan, the worship being merely an expression of hope for the sovereign's longevity. Since the founding of the Republic in 1912, the state is no longer officially connected with any religion.

6) Superstitions Aside from these various phases of worship, there is in the Religion of the People a strong element of superstition called *shu shu, or divination and witchcraft. It is based on the belief that the Great Ultimate (T'ai Chi), yin yang or the negative and positive cosmic forces, the Five Elements (*wu hsing), and the Eight Trigrams (*pa kua) could be so coordinated and controlled as to bring about good fortune. The search for long life and blessings was very extensive in ancient times, first promoted by the priest-magicians (fang shih) and later crystalized in the Huang Lao movement. From then on, astrology, almanacs, dream interpretation, *fêng shui, witchcraft, phrenology, palmistry, ouija to recall the soul, and fortune-telling in all forms have played an important part in the religious life of the illiterate and ignorant. The educated Chinese, however, have stood aloof from these.

7) Ethics. In the Religion of the People, generally speaking, worship is dominated by gratitude and superstition is dominated by fear. In each case, the underlying motive is ethical. Not only is worship an extension of filial piety and respect, most of the historical figures idolized are worshiped as embodiments of moral ideals such as loyalty, courage, justice, righteousness, etc. Religion, to a large extent, means to the Chinese sanction of ethics.

Ethical ideals cherished in this Religion are predominantly Confucian. However, the most important principle that underlies this Religion is the law of retribution to which both Taoism and Buddhism have contributed. This law is expressed in the Chinese proverb "If we plant melons, we reap melons, if we plant beans, we reap beans," in the Confucian saying that "Good deeds bring good fortune and evil deeds bring ill fortune," in the Taoist teaching of response and retribution, and in the Buddhist doctrine of cause and effect and transmigration. To the Chinese mass, the deities are essentially guardians of this law. They believe that their supreme duty is to observe the law by promoting the good and avoiding evil.

8) General characteristics. From the foregoing summary, it will be seen that the Religion of the Chinese People is basically practical, moral, and humanistic. It is the this-worldly interest that has kept it from developing a system of theology or a system of heaven and hell. The belief in the law of retribution has avoided the sense of sin and the idea of chance. It has helped the Chinese to keep their optimism in life and maintain a calm attitude towards misfortune. It has emphasized moral responsibility of the individual, resulting in the absence of any machinery for conversion or missionary work. The performance of rituals is more ethical and social than religious in the strict sense. While there is a great deal of formalism, conventionalism, superstitions, and waste (such as the great amount of cultivable land used for graves), the basic assumptions and the general outlook of the Religion are rational. It is this rationalistic character that has prevented mysticism and fanaticism. The amount of myths is surprisingly small. Immortality is explained on a rationalistic basis (see hun) It is also due to this rationalistic attitude that the Chinese have become remarkably tolerant in religious matters. There have been few religious persecutions in Chinese history. While the persecutions of Buddhism in 446, 574, 845, and 955 were severe, they were for social and political rather than religious reasons.

The most outstanding characteristic of Chinese religion is its eclecticism. The Chinese, even when they attend Buddhist and Taoist temples, worship Buddhist and Taoist deities as members of a general pantheon. For example, they regard the Dipper God, a typical Taoist deity, as a god of the common people. It is extremely important to keep this eclectic character in mind even when Confucianism, Buddhism, or Taoism is considered separately. These systems are described under separate headings (see Confucianism, Buddhism, Taoism; Temples, Far Eastern). What follows is a summary of the religions of the minority.

1. Mohammedanism. Mohammedanism was introduced into China in 628 A.D. according to Mohammedan records, but in 651 according to recent Chinese research. It came both by sea and by land, from the Arabian Sea to the coastal provinces of Kwangtung, Fukien, and Chekiang, and from Persia to Sinkiang, Shênsi, Kansu, and Yunnan. Moslems believe that Mohammed's maternal uncle, whose Chinese name was Wan Ko-ssŭ, first brought the religion to Canton where his tomb still lies outside of the city. Whether this is true, the Huai Shêng Mosque in Canton is definitely the first mosque in China.

The religion is called by Chinese Moslems Ch'ing-chên Chiao, or the Religion of Purity and Truth, and by others T'ien-fang Chiao, or the Religion from the Heavenly Direction (Arabia), and Hui Hui Chiao. The latter is probably a transliteration of Uighur in Eastern Turkestan through which the religion came.

There are two types of Mohammedans in China. Those in Sinkiang and Chinghai retain their own languages and customs, and are called Turban Mohammedans (ch'an hui). Those in other parts of China are largely descendants of Moslem traders and Arabian soldiers who were sent to China to quell a rebellion in 755 at the emperor's request. Aside from adhering strictly to their religion in the Arabian fashion and refusing to eat pork or to worship idols and ancestors, they have been fairly thoroughly assimilated by the Chinese, keeping aloof, however, from opium and alcohol. They have adopted Chinese names such as Ma, Mo, Mu, Ha, Hê, and Ho, which sound like abbreviations of the name Mohammed. They have intermarried with the Chinese. They have attended Confucian schools, held Confucian degrees, accepted Confucian teachings and the Neo-Confucian philosophy of Reason and the Vital Force (ch'i), and approved the worship of Heaven as identical with Allah. They have served in the government, and have contributed to Chinese medicine and the calendar. They speak the Chinese language and follow Chinese customs. Although few Chinese have become Mohammedans and few Mohammedans have followed Chinese religions, the two groups have lived in an atmosphere of amity and tolerance. Mohammedan revolts during the Manchu dynasty (1644-1911) were entirely political. In profession, Moslems are horse traders, caravan merchants, cow slaughterers, and keepers of baths and inns. Unfortunately, few can read the Koran, fewer can understand Arabic. The Koran was not translated into Chinese until some seventy years ago. Today only five of the original twenty parts are existent, and these five were not published until 1927. There are in China 48,104,241 Mohammedan followers and 42,371 mosques, largely in Sinkiang, Chinghai, Manchuria, Kansu, Yunnan, Shênsi, Hopei, and Honan. A number of outstanding generals and government leaders are Mohammedans. Missions and students to Arabia and Egypt have aroused interest in the Mohammedan religion.

2. Christianity: (a) *Nestorianism. The first Christian movement in China was Nestorianism. Some scholars claim that Christians came to China as early as the first century. However, there is no evidence to prove such a contention. The earliest record of Christianity in China is the Nestorian Tablet which was erected in Ch'angan (Sian) in 781 and discovered in 1625. According to this Tablet, the faith was introduced into China by A-lo-pên, whose identity is still disputed, and who arrived in the capital Ch'angan in 635 and received Imperial welcome. According to Saeki, Nestorianism was a form of "Oriental Christianity developed outside the sphere of the Graeco-Roman civilization." The religion known as Ching Chiao, or the Religion of Brilliance, enjoyed popularity until the persecution of 845. The persecution was primarily directed against Buddhism but it almost extinguished Nestorianism. Only slight traces of it could be found ever since.

(b) Catholicism. Catholicism reached China in the Yuan dynasty (1280-1368) with the arrival of such Franciscan fathers as Jean de Plan-Carpin and Guillaume de Ruysbroeck. Twenty churches were established, including the most famous one in Cambulic (Peiping), built in 1299, and other important ones in Yangchow, Hangchow, Ch'uanchow, and Canton.

Not much progress was made, however, until the Jesuits came in the Ming dynasty (1368-1644). The first to arrive was St. Francis Xavier who reached Kwangtung in 1552 and died in the same year. In 1580 Michael Ruggieri (d. 1607) and Matteo Ricci* (1552-1610) arrived in Macao. They were followed by J Adam Scholl (1591-1666), Ferdinand Verbies (1623-1688), etc. These Jesuit fathers enjoyed court favor, converted a number of high official to their faith (including Prime Minister Hs Kuang-ch'i, 1562-1633, with whom Matteo Ricc translated Euclid's Geometry), served the Chines government as astronomers, and contributed a great deal by introducing Western science (mathematics, astronomy, the manufacture of guns and explosives, etc.), and translating Western classics.

By the end of the seventeenth century, they had about 200,000 followers. They promoted Confucianism and approved the worship of Heaven and ancestors. Early in the eighteenth century, the Dominicans and Franciscans objected to this Confucian tendency of the Jesuits. A bitter quarrel followed, resulting in the intervention of both the Chinese Emperor and the French King and finally the suppression of Catholicism which almost ended the movement.

However, various branches of Catholicism continued to be active in different parts of China. Progress was slow but steady. Today there are 3,262,678 Chinese Catholics. They operate 438 orphanages, 315 hospitals, 20,520 schools, including three institutions of higher learning, a number of museums, libraries, and research institutions of high standard. In 1922, the first apostolic delegate to China was appointed by Pope Pius XI, thus putting the religion on a firm basis. Foreign priests number 2,980, while Chinese priests total 2,073, including a number of bishops.

(c) Protestantism. Protestantism started in China with the arrival of Robert Morrison in Canton in 1807. Within 135 years, its membership has grown to about 1,000,000 (Christian community members), or about 500,000 (communicants). In 1934, there were 17 British societies, 64 American and Canadian societies, 23 European societies, 2 Australian, and 1 international. In 1935, there were 6,150 missionaries, representing 93 denominations and subdivisions.

These figures are not as impressive as those of Mohammedanism and Catholicism, but what the religion has done is of tremendous importance. It has contributed substantially to education, medicine, and philanthropy. In 1937 it operated 271 hospitals (18,266 beds) and branches. Most of the best hospitals in China are Christian, and in many interior areas, only Christian medical service is available. The many lower schools with about 150,000 pupils, the 249 secondary schools with 47,940 students, and the fifteen colleges and universities with 7,098 students (all 1937 figures) have won the respect of the Chinese. The Red Cross, the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., etc., are nation-wide movements with extensive support of non-Christians. In social reform, Christianity has taken part in the fight against footbinding, opium-smoking, child marriage, blind marriage, nepotism, and the like. It pioneered the successful fight for the freedom of widows to remarry, for the right of young men and young women to choose their own life-mates and professions, for the independence of women, and for the opportunity for women to receive education. Both education for women and coeducation started in missionary schools. Christianity has helped to introduce and promote Western science, modern knowledge, and physical education. It has assisted Chinese political revolutions and reforms. Most important of all, it has a share in training Chinese leadership, having molded the character of such great men as Sun Yat-sen, Chiang Kai-shek, and other national leaders.

From the point of view of its contribution, then, Protestantism has been successful. It could have been more successful if it had adopted a more sympathetic approach, if it had worked more vigorously among the educated class, if it had spread out all over China instead of largely centering around the coastal cities, if missionaries had mixed with the Chinese more and adopted some of their good customs, if the religion had been entirely free from Western imperialism by refusing the protection of unequal treaties, if both missionaries and Chinese Christians had a more understanding attitude towards Chinese culture, if they had appreciated Chinese virtues just as deeply as they hated Chinese vices, if missionary schools had not ignored Chinese studies as they did, if the Church had achieved more unity, and if it had not over-emphasized theology to which the Chinese are by nature indifferent. In the last twenty years, Christian leaders have been quick to grasp opportunities for advancement. The United Church of Christ in China was founded in 1927. Through emphasis on Chinese culture and keen appreciation of the Chinese philosophy of life, Christianity is rapidly winning the favor of Chinese intellectuals and the Chinese government. Chinese leadership within the Church is growing. Missionaries remaining in the war zones to carry on their service during this war have gained the admiration of the entire people.

3. Other Foreign Religions· (a) Judaism. Judaism has been known to exist in China for many centuries. According to records, a group of Jews came to China in the twelfth century and built a synagogue in K'aifêng in 1163. They might have come as early as the first century to escape the persecution in Babylon in 34 A.D. or for trade. Originally there were seventy families. By 1866, only seven were left, numbering about 300 people. The number has, of course, grown since then. Their traditional center has been K'aifêng in Honan, but many of them live now in Ningpo, Hangchow, and Shanghai. Because they called their synagogue by the same name as a Mohammedan mosque (Ch'ing Chên Temple), they have been regarded as a branch of Islam and called Ch'ing Hui Hui, or Blue Mohammedans. They pick out the sinew of the flesh they eat, and for this reason their religion is called Ts'iao Chin Chiao (Sinew Picking Sect). Only a very small number in K'aifêng still cling to this ancient faith. Their synagogue has been replaced by an Episcopal church. They neither observe sabbath nor practice circumcision. They have been largely assimilated by the Chinese.

(b) *Manicheism. In 694 a religion called Ch'ih-ts'ai Shih-mo Chiao (the Religion of Vegetarianism and Demonism) came to China, settled in Chekiang and adjacent provinces. It was also called Mo-ni Chiao and Ming Chiao (the Religion of Light) and was identified as Manicheism. Persecuted in 823, 825, and 915, it almost entirely disappeared, but managed to survive. It participated in uprisings, mixed with Taoism and Buddhism, prospered in the Southern Sung dynasty (1127-1279), confounded with secret societies, shifted to Fukien province after Yuan (1280-1368). Towards the end of Ming (1368-1644) a Manichean temple still existed there.

(c) *Zoroastrianism. Between 516 and 519 some Zoroastrians brought their religion into China. During the T'ang period, temples were built in the capitals and important cities by imperial command, evidently to attract the peoples of Central Asia. No Chinese was allowed to follow the religion. It declined after the persecution of 845, leaving only a slight trace in the Five dynasties (907-960). There has been no mention of it in Chinese literature since the Southern Sung dynasty (1127-1279).

(d) Others. Modern religious movements like Theosophy, Bahai, Christian Science, Japanese Tenri and Dairei, etc., have found their way to China. But they are represented only by a very small group in one or two localities and have not made any imprint on Chinese religious life.

4. Secret Societies· The religious picture of China is incomplete without a word about secret societies, although these societies have been more political than religious. The best known one was the T'ai P'ing Rebellion led by Hung Hsiu-ch'uan (1806-1865). He became the patriarch of The Society of Shang-ti (God), organized by Chu Chiu-ch'ao, ostensibly for the promulgation of religion but really for revolution against the Manchus. After a vision and after reading a book given him by a Christian missionary, Hung enlarged his organization, called Jehovah his Heavenly Father and Jesus his Heavenly Brother, and extended his religion to Kwangsi. In 1848 he started the revolution from there, established the T'ai P'ing T'ien Kuo (the Heavenly Kingdom of Great Peace) in 1850, and proclaimed himself the Heavenly King. He captured Nanking in 1853, disciplined his army with religion, prohibited alcohol-drinking, foot-binding, and queue-wearing. Because of internal disorder, religious fanaticism, extreme destructiveness, and strong opposition from the Christians as well as the public in general, the Heavenly Kingdom crumbled in 1865 after a brief existence of fifteen years.

The oldest secret society that has some religious character is the White Lotus Society (Pai-lien). It was organized by Han Shantung's grandfather in the beginning of Yüan (1280-1368) with the intention to restore the Sung dynasty. It worships both Buddhist and Taoist deities, although it stresses the repetition of Buddha's name. The Boxers were one of its branches. Today it flourishes in North China.

The Tsai Li Chiao, also called Li Chiao and Li Mên (all meaning Rationalistic Religion), dates back to the seventeenth century. It is similar to the White Lotus Society, so much so that it is often considered a branch of it. Its chief emphasis, however, lies in abstinence from smoking, snuffing, and drinking. It is chiefly found in North China.

The Triad Society (San Tien Hui or San Ho Hui), organized in 1674 for political purposes, follows a number of Buddhist and Taoist practices and worships Emperor T'ai-tsung (939-997). It has participated in several revolutions, including the one started by Sun Yat-sen. Its stronghold is South China.

Besides these, there are the Wu Shan Shê, or the Society for the Intuition of the Good, founded in 1915 in Szechuan by T'ang Huan-chang to synthesize Confucianism, Buddhism, Taoism, Catholicism, Protestantism, and Mohammedanism, and the Tung Shan Shê, or the Society for Common Good, founded in 1922 by Chiang Ch'ao-tsung and others for the purposes of worshiping Śākyamuni, Confucius, and Lao Tzǔ, and cultivating the spirit by means of meditation. Both societies have spread to North and Central China. The former is patronized by the lower classes of society, while the latter includes mostly the educated. Other small, local, or temporary societies are too numerous to mention. See sacred literatures, Temples, Far Eastern.

J. J. M. de Groot, The Religious System of China, Its Ancient Forms, Evolution, History, and Present Aspect (1892-1910), de Groot, The Religion of the Chinese (1910); W. E Soothill, The Three Religions of China (1919), Henri Doré, Researches into Chinese Superstitions (1914), J. K Shryock, The Temples of Anking and Their Cults (1929).

ch'ing ming: (Chin. clear & bright) The festival of the third moon of the old Chinese lunar calendar, which falls on April 5th or 6th. On this day the Chinese visit graves and enjoy the clear and bright atmosphere of Spring.

Chuang Tzǔ: See Taoism.

Chu Hsi: See Confucianism.

Confucius: (K'ung Ch'iu, K'ung Chung-ni, K'ung Fu-tzǔ or Grand Master K'ung, 551-479 B.C.) Confucius was born in a poor family in the state of Lu (in present Shangtung), a descendant of the people of Sung. His father died soon after his birth. When he grew up, he was put in charge of a granary, then cattle and sheep, and then public works in his native state. Later he became Grand Secretary of Justice and then Chief Minister. He regained some territory lost to a neighboring state purely by arguments based on morality. He executed a minister who created disorder, and brought peace to the land to the extent that "things lost on the highway were not stolen." He resigned when the attention of the ruler of his state was completely attracted by a group of dancing girls sent by a jealous neighboring country.

In 496 B.C., he began fourteen years of travel from state to state, offering his service to the rulers. He was politely consulted by them, but no one would put his moral doctrines into practice. He was even sent away from Ch'i, threatened in Sung, driven out of Sung and Wei, and surrounded between Ch'ên and Ts'ai. When difficulty, he exclaimed, "Heaven has endowed with a moral destiny. What can Huan Tuei (who threatened him) do to me?" Eventually he retired to Lu to study, teach, and write.

He lived in a time when the moral and cultural traditions of Chou were in rapid decline. Attempting to uphold the Chou culture, he taught poetry, history, ceremonies, and music to 3,000 pupils. He became the first Chinese educator to offer education to any who cared to come, with or without tuition. He taught culture, human conduct, being one's true self, and honesty in social relationships. Most probably, he wrote the chronicles called Ch'un Ch'iu (Spring and Autumn Annals). His tacit judgments on social and political events were such that "unruly ministers and villainous sons were afraid" to repeat their evil deeds.

He severely disciplined himself and practiced what he taught. He loved poetry, ceremonies, and music. He was serious, honest, polite, filially pious towards his mother, stern towards his son, and friendly towards his pupils. His most reliable teachings are found in the Lun Yü (Analects), aphorisms recorded by his followers. His teachings (see Confucianism) have dominated Chinese life and thought for some two thousand years. Both he and his pupils have become objects of worship (see Chinese religions).

See Bibliography under Confucianism.

Confucianism: Confucianism is called in Chinese Ju Chia (the School of the Learned) and Ju Chiao (the Teaching of the Learned). It is a vital movement that has dominated Chinese culture for two thousand years, and those of Korea and Japan for almost as long. It is based on, and developed out of, the teachings of one man, Confucius*.

Confucius (551-479 B.C.) advocated true manhood (jên) as the highest good, the superior man (chün tzü) as the ideal being, and cultivation of life (hsiu shên) as the supreme duty of man. Consequently he emphasized moral perfection (chih shan) for the individual and moral and social order (li) for society. These are to be attained by the practice of "chung," or being true to the principles of one's nature, and "shu," the application of those principles in relation to others. Chung and shu form the "one thread that runs through" the entire Confucian teaching. The total objective is chung yung, the Golden Mean or Central Harmony, that is, "the central basis of our moral being and harmony with the universe." To this end, knowledge must be directed, names rectified, and social relationships harmonized. The whole program involves the investigation of things, the extension of knowledge, sincerity of the will, rectification of the heart, cultivation of the personal life, regulation of family life, national order, and finally, world peace.

Mencius (371-289 B.C.) carried this moralism and humanism further. He held that we not only should be good, but must be good, since human nature is originally good. True manhood (jên) and righteousness (i) are considered man's "mind" and "path," respectively. A man must "develop his nature to the fullest" and "exercise his mind to the limit." Government must be established on the basis of benevolence as against profit and force. Hsun Tzŭ (c. 335-c. 288 B.C.), believing human nature to be evil, stressed moral discipline and education, especially through the rectification of names, music, and the rules of propriety (li). In the book Chung Yung, the doctrine of central harmony is further developed. Our central self or moral being is conceived to be the central basis of existence, and harmony or moral order is the universal law of the world.

In the second century B.C., Confucianism became merged with the Yin Yang* philosophy. As advocated by Tung Chung-shu (177-104 B.C.), man and nature have direct correspondence. As the cosmic order results from the harmony of yin and yang or the negative and positive universal principles in nature, so the moral order results from the harmony of yang and yin in man, such as husband and wife, human nature and passions, and love and hate. The Five Agents (see wu hsing), through which yin and yang operate, have direct correspondence not only with the five directions, the five metals, etc., in nature, but also with the Five Constant Virtues, the five senses, etc., in man. Thus human affairs and natural events were explained in terms of a neat macrocosm-microcosm relationship, and Tung became the master of the "science of catastrophies and anomalies." At the same time, there was a movement called ch'an wei, or "prophetic writings and apocryphal complements" to the Confucian Classics. These writings treated natural phenomena as causes or effects of human conduct. It was not until Liu Hsin (d. 23 B.C.), who insisted that "the Six Classics were history" and not prophetic literature, that the Confucian and the Yin Yang movements were separated.

The Six Classics referred to were the Shih Ching, Shu Ching, I Ching, Ch'un Ch'iu, Li Chi, and Yo Ching. The Yo Ching or The Classic of Music was lost early in the Han dynasty. The other five were made, in 136 B.C., the literature of the five faculties of the Imperial Confucian College of Doctors, and in 125 B.C., the basis of civil service examination, thus establishing the supremacy of Confucianism.

The Shih Ching or The Book of Poetry (Eng. tr. by Arthur Waley, The Book of Songs, 1937) is a collection of ancient songs which were popular at the time of Confucius. While the Sage evidently was fond of them, especially as records of sentiments and customs, he did not select and edit them as tradition has claimed. The Shu Ching or The Book of History (Eng. tr. by James Legge, The Shoo King, 1882) is a collection of ancient historical documents. There are two texts. The text in the "modern script" is, to a large extent, authentic but that in the "ancient script" is definitely a forgery. Whether Confucius edited this Classic is doubtful. The I Ching or The Book of Changes (Eng. tr. by James Legge, The Yi King, 1882) is a collection of propositions and explanations used in divination written by various authors of different periods up to as late as the third century B.C The traditional theory that King Wên (1184-1135 B.C.?) wrote the propositions and Confucius wrote the appendices is unacceptable, although the book certainly contains a good portion written by Confucianists. It is an important book because it contains ancient philosophy and principles of government. The Ch'un Ch'iu or The Spring and Autumn Annals (Eng. tr. by James Legge, Ch'un Ch'iu, 1879) is a history of Confucius' native state Lu, probably written by Confucius on the basis of previous records. The Li Chi or The Book of Rites is a collection of Confucian treatises of the third century B.C. on ancient ethics, government, and customs. All these Five Classics have suffered corruption and interpolation. From the second century B.C. to 1905, they were the foundation of Chinese education and, therefore, Chinese life and thought.

To these Five Classics, the Neo-Confucianists of the Sung dynasty (960-1279) added the Four Books which had been of even greater importance. These are the Ta Hsüeh, Chung Yung, Lun Yü, and Mêng Tzŭ (Eng. tr. by James Legge, The Four Books, 1871, 1932), basic texts of Chinese schools until 1905. Both the Ta Hsüeh (The Great Learning, Eng. tr. by Lin Yutang in his The Wisdom of Confucius, 1938) and the Chung Yung (Golden Mean or Central Harmony, Eng. tr. by Ku Hung-ming, The Conduct of Life, 1906, revised by Lin Yutang in The Wisdom of Confucius, 1938) are sections of the Li Chi, singled out by Neo-Confucianists. The Ta Hsüeh is attributed to Tzŭ Ssu, grandson of Confucius, and the Chung Yung to a Confucian pupil. Most of these two books represents original teachings of Confucius. The Lun Yu or the Analects (see Confucius) was probably compiled by followers of Confucius between the fifth and fourth century B.C. and contains authentic sayings of Confucius and his immediate pupils. All these books have been corrupted to some extent Mêng Tzŭ or The Works of Mencius is the most original of all.

The Sung Confucianists not only elevated these Confucian writings to great eminence, but they also carried Confucian philosophy to new heights, producing the system of Li Hsüeh, or Rational Philosophy, usually called Neo-Confucianism in the West. This Rational Philosophy developed in three phases, namely, the Reason School in the Sung period (960-1279), the Mind School in the Ming period (1388-1644), and the Empirical School in the Ch'ing period (1644-1911). The central idea of the movement is focused on the Great Ultimate (T'ai Chi) and Reason (li). The Great Ultimate moves and generates the active principle, yang, when its activity reaches its limit, and engenders the passive principle, yin, when it becomes tranquil. The eternal oscillation of yin and yang gives rise to the material universe through their Five Agents of Water, Fire, Wood, Metal, and Earth. Thus reality is a progressively evolved and a well-coordinated system.

This dynamic and orderly character of the universe is due to Reason and the Vital Force (ch'i).

As the Ch'êng brothers (Ming-tao, 1032-1086, & I-ch'uan, 1033-1077) said, "All things have the same Reason in them." Thus, Reason combines the Many into One, while the Vital Force differentiates the One into the Many, each with its own "determinate nature." The two principles, however, are not to be sharply contrasted, for neither is independent of the other. Reason operates through, and is embodied in, the Vital Force. It is this cooperative functioning of theirs that makes the universe a cosmos, a harmonious system of order and sequence. "Centrality is the order of the universe and harmony is its unalterable law." As such the cosmos is a moral order. This is the main reason why the greatest of the Neo-Confucianists, Chu Hsi (1130-1200), said that "the Great Ultimate is nothing but the Reason of ultimate goodness."

Furthermore, the universe is a social order, and nothing can stand by itself. At the same time, everything has its opposite. "No two of the productions of creation are alike," and the Taoist doctrine of equality of things must be rejected. In the eternal sequence of appearance and disappearance every creation is new, and the Buddhist doctrine of transmigration must be rejected.

In order to appreciate fully the meaning of the universe, man must comprehend Reason. This can be done by "investigating things to the utmost," that is, by "investigating the Reason of things to the utmost." When sufficient effort is made, and understanding naturally comes, one's nature will be realized and his destiny will be fulfilled, since "the exhaustive investigation of Reason, the full realization of one's nature, and the fulfillment of destiny are simultaneous." When one understands Reason, he will find that "All people are brothers and sisters, and all things are my companions," because all men have the same Reason in them. Consequently one should not entertain any distinction between things and the ego. This is the foundation of the Neo-Confucian ethics of jên, true manhood, benevolence or love. Both the understanding of Reason and the practice of jên require sincerity (ch'êng) and seriousness (ching) which, to the Neo-Confucianists, almost assumed religious significance. As a matter of fact, these have a certain correspondence with the Buddhist dhyāna and prajña, or meditation and insight. Gradually the Neo-Confucian movement became an inward movement, the mind assuming more and more importance.

When it came to the Ming period, especially in Wang Yang-ming (1473-1529), Reason became identified with Mind. Mencius' doctrine of native knowledge was revived and made the basis of his theory of the identity of knowledge and conduct and the sacred duty of man to "fully exercise his mind" and to "manifest his illustrious virtues."

Wang Yang-ming considered desire as an obstacle to the mind. The Neo-Confucianists of the Ch'ing period, especially Tai Tung-yüan (1723-1777), however, argued that since desire is part of our nature, it has its rightful place, just as the Vital Force has its rightful place beside Reason.

As a matter of fact, Reason can only be discovered in daily events and experience, or in short, in the Vital Force itself.

Throughout the development of Confucianism, the basic concept jên has remained the center of Confucian ethics. It is the general virtue, the principle "by which a man is to be a man," which may be rendered as the Good or True Manhood. Fundamentally it means the development of one's nature to the fullest extent and the application of that principle in relation to others, that is, to treat others as oneself or to put oneself in the position of others. Specifically, it means the Three Universal Virtues of wisdom, benevolence, and courage, the Five Constant Virtues of benevolence, righteousness, propriety, wisdom, and good faith, and the eight ideals of filial piety, respect, loyalty, good faith, propriety, righteousness, integrity, and the sense of shame.

In a rationalistic and humanistic system such as Confucianism, its religious position is difficult to define. On the one hand, the Confucian outlook of the universe is obviously naturalistic. On the other hand, the universe is conceived as a moral order to which man's destiny is closely tied. This ambiguity has led many to consider Confucianism as a religion and others to regard it as a non-religious ethical system. Many have viewed Confucius as a promoter, or even a founder, of a religion, while others have described him as an agnostic. Confucius was neither. In ancient China, Lao Tzŭ*, the atheist, represented the left wing in the matter of religion, and Mo Tzŭ*, the vigorous promoter of the ancient faith, represented the right wing. Confucius followed the middle course, with tendency towards the right. The fact was that Confucius was primarily interested in life. Consequently he "did not talk about spirits," but said that "if we cannot serve man, how can we serve spirits?" and would not discuss death. However, life to him contained religious elements. Consequently he prayed, worshipped Heaven (see T'ien) as his predecessors did, promoted the ancient practice of ancestor worship, and knew and obeyed the decrees of Heaven. To him and to his followers, the religious life and the moral life could not be sharply distinguished. Confucian humanism does not and has not precluded religion. As a matter of fact, all Confucianists agree that the "ancient sages founded teaching (chiao) on the way of gods." Confucianism, as Ju Chiao, or Teaching of the Learned, is both ethical and religious.

Of course, if religion is interpreted as an organized system, then Confucianism is definitely not a religion. It has no priesthood, no church, no Bible, no creed, no conversion, and no fixed system of gods. It has no interest in either theology or mythology. Even Confucian ceremonies are more social than religious. It is true that Confucius has been made an object of worship (see Chinese religions), but he was not deified as Lao Tzŭ and Sākyamuni (see Buddha, Buddhist Terminology) were. The Confucianists, and the Chinese in general, worship Confucius as the ideal man, the "Grand Perfection, Ultimate Sage," rather than as a ruler of any Heaven, such as Lao Chun or the Buddha. The last of the great Confucianists, K'ang Yu-wei (1858-1927), believing that Western powers became strong because they had organized religions, made repeated attempts to establish Confucianism as a formal and official cult. But he met with no success.

On the surface, it would seem that Confucianists have not been interested in religion. It is true that they have remained aloof from superstitions and idol worship, leaving these to ignorant people. It is also true that they have not shown any high degree of piety. Nevertheless, the worship of Heaven and ancestors has been so strongly promoted by Confucianists that it has been considered characteristically Confucian. Although Confucianists vary a great deal in their philosophy of human nature, their general conclusion is that human nature is good. To them this good nature comes from Heaven, whose outstanding quality is jên or love, as evidenced by the unceasing production of things. The Confucianists not only believe in Destiny, but believe to such extent as to be fatalistic.

By virtue of this attitude towards Heaven, ancestors, human nature, the universe, and Destiny, Confucianism, while not a religion in the strict sense, is religious. This religious character is not found in any fanaticism, external observance, formal organization, or irrational beliefs. It is found in the whole Confucian philosophy of life. See cosmogonies; death and burial practices; Japanese Religions; Temples, Far Eastern.

Fung Yu-lan, A History of Chinese Philosophy, Pt. I, tr. by D. Bodde (1937); Lin Yutang, tr The Wisdom of Confucius (1938); H. A. Giles, Confucianism and Its Rivals (1915); J. P. Bruce, Chu Hsi and His Masters (1923); F. G Henke, tr. The Philosophy of Wang Yang-ming (1916).

fang shih: (Chin.) "Man with formulae," or priests and magicians who flourished in the Ch'in and Han dynasties (249 B.C.-220 A.D.) and who offered divination, magic, herbs, charms, alchemy, breath technique, and other crafts (fang shu) and superstitions in terms of Yin Yang and Taoist philosophies as means to immortality, inward power, restored youth, and superhuman ability.

fêng shui: (Chin. wind & water) This was originally a system of geomancy to determine the position and direction of graves, based on the belief that through the control of wind and water, the vital force (ch'i) of the deceased would not be dissipated by them. The system, which involves the doctrines of yin yang* and the Five Elements (see wu hsing), has been generally applied to determine the location of all types of buildings.

fu lu shou: (Chin.) These are the "Three Plenties" of 1) blessing or happiness, 2) official emolument and the honor it brings, and 3) longevity. They are also called the Three Stars, as each of them is believed to be dependent on a star-god. They are represented by either the three Chinese characters, or by the bat (fu) symbolizing happiness, the deer (lu) symbolizing honor, and the peach symbolizing longevity, or by a smiling

figure with or without children around him, representing happiness, an official representing honor, and an old man representing long life. These representations are used as charms, as objects of worship, or simply as felicitation.

fung shui: (Chin.) See fêng shui.

hsien: (Chin. immortal) The belief in immortals was very strong in the Ch'in and Han periods (249 B.C.-220 A.D.) and was later strengthened by Taoism. The Yun-chi Ch'i-ch'ien of Taoism enumerates nine classes of immortals. Of the many immortals who inhabit the Realm of Great Purity (see San-ch'ing) and who move in this world in various forms to promote good and suppress evil, the pa hsien, or the eight immortals, are the most famous. They are Li T'ieh-kuai who is always depicted as a beggar with his crutch and gourd full of magic medicine, Chung-li Ch'uan who has a bearded face and carries a fan or a peach, Lan Ts'ai-ho who is represented as a young man or young woman carrying a basket of fruit or playing a flute, Chang Kuo (Lao) who is depicted as riding on a white mule or carrying a phoenix feather or a peach of immortality or a bamboo tube, Ho Hsien-ku who is a beautiful maiden holding a magical lotus-blossom or playing a musical instrument, Lu Tung-pin who carries a magic sword or a fly-whisk, Han Hsiang Tsŭ with a basket of peaches or holding a bouquet of flowers, and Ts'ao Kuo-chiu carrying a pair of castanets.

The grouping of immortals in sets of a certain number was not common until the first century A.D., after the introduction of Buddhism*. The term "pa hsien" was first mentioned in the Li Hui Lun by Mou Young of the first century A.D. Later works referred to groups of other numbers, of these the groups of eight and nine were the most popular. After the T'ang dynasty (618-907 A.D.), however, the group of eight became the most favored one, for reasons as yet unknown. By the end of the Sung dynasty (960-1279), the "eight immortals" had already appeared on the Chinese stage. To this day, the "eight immortals," either singly or in groups have been popular subjects of representation in art, on the stage, and in a thousand other ways.

Though the number eight became established, the members of the "eight immortals" changed from time to time. The earliest set known to us was the "Eight Lords of Prince Liu An," who, according to the general belief of the Six Dynasties (222-589 A.D.), were old men who visited the Taoistically inclined Prince, regained their youth and became immortals. The present group cannot be much earlier than the Yuan dynasty (1280-1368), since no mention of them can be found in literature earlier than this period. From the thirteenth century on, however, this group came to be accepted. Were they copied from the "Eight Lords of Prince Liu An"? Were they parallels of the "Eight Officials" of the Wu-t'ai Mountain of the Chin dynasty (265-290 A.D.) as some historians maintained? Or were they the legendary version of the "Eight Lords" of scholarship of the Sung dynasty (960-1279), as suggested by Chu Hsi? Writing in the sixteenth century, an outstanding authority on the "eight immortals," Wang Shih-chêng, confessed that it was impossible to know the origin of the present group.

The existing group is evidently the survival of the fittest. The general opinion is that the Chinese are satisfied with them because they represent all kinds of people—old, young, male, female, civil, military, rich, poor, afflicted, cultured, historical persons and fictitious figures, and people of early, middle, and later historical periods. It may, however, have been due to the fact that they offered the greatest variety of individuality, and individuality was highly important in literature, art, and drama in which they were often depicted. It may also have been due to the growth of landscape painting in the tenth century which suspended for several hundred years the tradition of Buddhist and Taoist figure painting and discouraged new grouping of immortals for art, thus allowing the present group to set a strong hold in the thirteenth century. It may even have been due to the Taoist universal imitation of Buddhism, resulting in a set group of Taoist immortals to parallel or to compete with set groups of Buddhist arhats. By the fourteenth century, the artistic and religious significance of the "eight immortals" was overshadowed by the utilitarian, for in the art and drama of this period, they were usually associated with birthday felicitations. This is the reason why today they are symbolic of happiness in general and of longevity in particular.

Hsüan-wu: (Chin. dark & strong) Name of the Taoist Dipper god, also called Hsuan-t'ien Shang-ti (the Lord on High in the Dark Heaven) and T'ai I (the Great Unit). It is often symbolized by the tortoise and the snake, by virtue of their position in the north which is dark, and their strength. A shrine for this deity is usually found in the back of a Chinese village. As the Lord on High in the Dark Heaven, the deity enjoyed immense popularity during the Han dynasty (206 B.C.-220 A.D.) and is today equally prominent as Wên-ch'ang*.

Huang Lao: The religious movement flourishing from the first century B.C. to the fourth century A.D. under the names of Huang-ti, or the mythological Yellow Emperor (-2599? B.C.) and Lao Tzŭ (570 b.C. or the fourth century B.C.). It involved divination, alchemy, and the belief in immortals. It provided Taoism* with some of its basic features. Ethically, the Huang Lao movement emphasized simplicity, transcendental bliss, *wu wei (non-artificiality), inner peace, and the nourishing of one's original nature.

hun: (Chin.) The active, positive, or heavenly (yang) part of the soul, as contrasted with the passive, negative, or earthly (yin) part of the soul called p'o. (See Yin yang). Hun is the soul of man's vital force (ch'i) which is expressed in man's intelligence and power of breathing whereas p'o is the spirit of man's physical nature which is expressed in bodily movements. In heavenly spirits, hun predominates, whereas in earthly spirits, p'o predominates. When hun is separated from p'o in man or things, change ensues.

I Ching: (Chin. The Book of Changes) See Confucianism.

immortals, Taoist: See hsien.

Ko Hung: A Taoist philosopher. See Taoism.

Kuan Ti, Kuan Kung: (Chin.) Kuan Yü (d. 219 A.D) was minister and sworn brother of Liu Pei, king of Shu, who fought desperately to restore the Han dynasty. Kuan Yu's absolute loyalty to Han and to his master and his unparallel righteousness and chivalry towards his opponents have been a great inspiration to the Chinese. He has been honored as Kuan Shêng Ti Chun, or the Sage, Lord, and Master Kuan. He is worshipped by all Chinese as the God of Loyalty and Righteousness (but not as God of War), and as the Military Sage, somewhat corresponding to the civil sage Confucius. Until 1912, he was object of state worship in the wu miao or Temple of Strength, which is limited to him and Yo Fei*, while the Temple of Culture or wên miao is limited to Confucius. Also called Kuan Kung, or Duke Kuan, Kuan Ti is the most popular masculine deity in China.

Kuei, Kwei: (Chin.) See Shên.

K'un: (Chin.) Earth, symbolized by ☷ in the Eight Trigrams (pa kua*), the trigram of the negative or female cosmic principle, yin, opposite of ch'ien.

Lao-tse: Idem Lao Tzŭ*.

Lao Tzŭ: Whether Lao Tzŭ was the founder of Taoism*; whether he was the same as Li Erh and Li An; whether he lived before or after Confucius; and whether the Tao Tê Ching (Eng. trans.: The Canon of Reason and Virtue, 1913, 1927, by P. Carus; The Way and Its Power, 1935, by A. Waley, etc.), contains his teachings are controversial matters. According to the Shih Chi (Historical Records), he was a native of Ch'u (in present Honan) and a custodian of documents whom Confucius* went to consult on rituals. Thus he might have been a priest-teacher who, by advocating the doctrine of "inaction," attempted to preserve the declining culture of his people, the suppressed people of Yin, while Confucius worked hard to promote the culture of the ruling people of Chou. Although many modern scholars accept the eighteenth century theory that Lao Tzŭ lived in the fourth century B.C., the matter cannot be considered settled.

As the ancient fang shih or priest-magicians movement became popular in the Ch'in and Han dynasties (249 B.C.-200 A.D.), Lao Tzŭ became a popular object of worship (see Huang Lao). When this movement was incorporated into Chang Ling's "Way of Five Bushels of Rice" in the first century A.D , Lao Tzŭ was considered the founder of the religion which assumed the name Taoism. Later Taoist tradition made him the historical member of the Taoist Triad (see Sanch'ing), under the name of Lao Chun, or Lord Lao The Buddha was regarded as his incarnation. In 666 A.D, he was honored by Imperial order as the Most High Emperor of Mystic Origin (T'ai-shang Hsuan-yuan Huang-ti). Again in 1013, he was honored as the Most High Lord Lao (T'ai-shang Lao-chun). Today he is worshiped either as a member of the Triad or separately.

Lieh Tzŭ: See Taoism.

Mencius: See Confucianism.

Mohism: See Mo Tzŭ.

Mo Tzŭ: (Mo Ti, between 500 & 396 B.C.) Founder of Mohism and author of Mo Tzŭ (Eng. tr. by Y. P. Mei, The Ethical and Political Works of Motse, 1929), he advocated· 1) "benefit" (li), or the promotion of general welfare and removal of evil, through the increase of population and wealth, the elevation of conduct, the regulation of benevolence and righteousness towards this practical objective, the elimination of war, and the suppression of wasteful musical events and elaborate funerals, 2) "universal love" based on the will of Heaven; 3) "agreement with the superiors," 4) a method of reasoning which involves a "foundation," a "survey," and "application," and 5) the belief in Heaven and the spirits both as a religious sanction of governmental measures and as an effective way of promoting peace and welfare. Compared with Confucius and Lao Tzŭ he was the strongest defender and promoter of the ancient faith. His followers, Mo Chê, or Neo-Mohists, probably developed into a religious order involving asceticism and a system of "elders."

pa kua: (Chin.) a) The Eight Trigrams or Elements (☰ Heaven, ☷ Earth, ☳ Thunder, ☶ Mountain, ☲ Fire, ☵ Water, ☵ Water in motion, ☴ Wind and Wood), by which all existence and transformations are explained, analyzed, and predicted. A kua is a combination of trigrams and represents a hsiang, a phenomenon, an image, or an idea. For example, the trigram of water over the trigram of fire means triumph, good fortune, etc. The system is used both in Chinese cosmology and system of change (i) as well as in divination. b) A figure consisting of the eight trigrams is used by the Chinese as charm, as object of worship, and as art motif. See T'ai Chi.

Pao-p'o Tzŭ: Idem Ko Hung*.

San-ch'ing: (Chin. three purities) a) The Three Purities in Taoism, namely, Essence (ching), Vital Force (ch'i), and the Spirit (shên). b) The Three Pure Ones of Taoism. The first is Wu-hsing T'ien-chün or the Heavenly Honored

One Without Form, also called T'ien-pao Chün or the Lord of the Jewel of Heaven. He lives in the Realm of Jade Purity which is populated by holy men (shêng jên). The second is Wu-shih T'ien-chun or the Heavenly Honored One Without Origin, also called Ling-pao Chun or the Lord of the Jewel of Intelligence. He lives in the Realm of Superior Purity which is populated by pure men (chên jên). The third is Fan-hsing T'ien-chun or the Heavenly Honored One of Brahma Form, also called Shên-pao Chün or the Lord of the Jewel of Spirit. He lives in the Realm of Great Purity which is populated by immortals (hsien*).

This Taoist Triad is definitely a feeble imitation of the Buddhist Trikāya (see Buddhist Terminology). The first One is Yuan-shih T'ien-chün*, the second, Tao Chün or the Lord of Tao, and the third, the historical Lao Tzŭ, also called Lao Chün. Sometimes the Jade Emperor (see Yu-huang) is mentioned as the first member. However, neither the relationship between Yuan-shih T'ien-chun and Yu-huang nor the relationship between the first and second members of the Triad is clearly defined.

Shang-ti: (Chin. the Lord on High) a) Identical with Ti or the Lord. b) The Lord of Heaven (see T'ien). c) Title of the highest Taoist deity (see Yuan-shih T'ien-chün). d) Chinese name for the Christian God. e) "The Superior Lord," referring to sovereigns of antiquity. See Chinese religions.

Shê Chi: (Chin.) The Chinese Gods of the Ground and the Grain. In ancient times the emperor, the feudal lords, and the people all had their own Shê Chi, but it was the duty of the feudal lords to make offerings to Shê Chi as thanksgiving for the blessings of territory and food. Today Shê Chi is usually worshiped in an open altar beside a tree at the head of a village.

Shên: (Chin.) Shên and kuei are usually mentioned together. Etymologically shên consists of the radical shih, which means indication from above (sun, moon, and star), and the stem which gives it the pronunciation shên, and which means extension, that is, bringing about the myriad things. Kuei, on the other hand, means to return. The following are the common interpretations of shên and kuei: a) Shên, heavenly spirits; kuei, spirits of deceased human beings. (Ancient Chinese religion) b) "Shên is spiritual power which is unfathomable," or "what is unfathomable in the movement of yin and yang or passive and active universal principles." "Shên refers to the mystery of the myriad things," that is, "the unity of things." (I Ching, third century B.C.) c) Kuei and shên are respectively yin and yang*. "The concentration of the vital force (ch'i) of yang to produce things is an extension of shên, whereas the dissipation of the drifting *hun and the diminishing p'o or positive and negative aspects of the soul, resulting in a change, is the kuei that is returning (to the elements). (Ancient & medieval Chinese philosophy & religion) d) "Shên to man is like water to ice." (Wang Ch'ung, 27-c. 100 A.D.) e) "Kuei and shên are the native and good ability of the two vital principles of yin and yang," in the sense that "coldness is an example of kuei while hotness is an example of shên." "To come into being from non-being is the nature of shên, to change from being to non-being is the nature of kuei. (Chang Hêng-ch'ü, 1021-1077) f) "Kuei and shên are the traces of creation," or "the operation of the universe." (Ch'êng I-ch'uan, 1033-1107) g) "Kuei and shên are the increase and decrease of the two universal forces of yin and yang." "From the standpoint of the two forces or principles, then shên is the efficacy of yang and kuei is the efficacy of yin. From the standpoint of the one universal force (ch'i), then what has become and extended is shên and what has departed and returned (to its origin) is kuei." "The vital force of Heaven is unceasingly producing things; that is shên. . . . The vital force of human beings returns to the elements (at death); that is kuei." (Chu Hsi, 1130-1200).

The above interpretations are summed up by Chang Shih "Generally speaking, what has become but is unfathomable is shên, and what has gone is kuei. Specifically, the vital force of Heaven, Earth, mountain, river, wind, snow, etc., is shên, whereas what is worshiped in an ancestral hall or temple is kuei. With reference to man and things, what has concentrated and come into being is shên, whereas what has dissipated and passed away is kuei. With reference to a person, the vital force of hun (the positive aspect of the soul) is shên, whereas the vital force of p'o (the negative aspect of the soul) is kuei."

The word shên is also used in philosophy and religion to mean god-like power, spiritual power, creative power, mystery, a divine man, god-like man, holiness beyond our knowledge, vital force, the mind, energy, and in aesthetics, rhythmic vitality, expression, wonderful quality, style full of spirit or vivacity.

Shih Ching: (Chin. the Book of Poetry) See Confucianism.

Shu Ching: (Chin. the Book of History See Confucianism.

shu shu: (Chin.) Divination and magic i ancient China, including astrology, almanacs, th art of coordinating human affairs by the activ and passive principles of the universe (yin yang* and the Five Elements (*wu hsing), fortune tel ing by the use of the stalks of the divinatio plant and the tortoise shell, and miscellaneo methods such as dream interpretation, the regul. tion of forms and shapes of buildings, etc.

T'ai I: (Chin. the Great Unit) a) The Gre Unit before Heaven and Earth, identical wi T'ai Chi*. b) The Lord of Heaven. c) A st god in the East, a minister of the Lord of Heav in charge of sixteen other star gods. d) The Gre Unit, a Taoist deity variously identified wi Hsüan-wu*, the highest of the heavenly spiri the first of the nine constellations, etc. e) A branch of Taoism*, founded by Hsiao Pao-chên between 1138 and 1140 to promote the practice of charms and magic in an attempt to realize the Great Unit and the Three Origins (Heaven, Earth, and Man) of existence.

T'ai Chi (Chin.) a) The Great Ultimate or Terminus, which, in the beginning of time, "engenders the Two Primary Modes (i), which in turn engender the Four Secondary Modes or Forms (hsiang), which in their turn give rise to the Eight Elements (*pa kua) and the Eight Elements determine all good and evil and the great complexity of life." (Ancient Chinese philosophy). b) The Great Ultimate which comes from, but is originally one with, the Non-Ultimate. Its movement and tranquillity engender the active principle, yang, and the passive principle, yin, respectively (the Two Primary Modes), the transformation and the union of which give rise to the Five Agents (wu hsing) of Water, Fire, Wood, Metal, and Earth, and thereby the determinate things. (Chou Lien-hsi, 1017-1073). c) The Great Ultimate which is One and unmoved, and which, when moved, becomes the Omnipotent Creative Principle (*shên) which engenders Number, then Form, and finally corporeality. Being such, the Great Ultimate is identical with the Mind; it is identical with the Moral Law (tao). (Shao K'ang-chieh, 1011-1077). d) The Great Ultimate which is identical with the One (I), or the Grand Harmony (T'ai Ho). (Chang Hêng-ch'ü, 1020-1077). e) The Great Ultimate which is identical with the Reason (li) of the universe, of the two (yin yang*) vital forces (ch'i), and of the Five Elements (wu hsing). It is the Reason of ultimate goodness. "Collectively there is only one Great Ultimate, but there is a Great Ultimate in each thing." (Chu Hsi, 1130-1200).

Taoism: The term "Tao Chia" (the Taoist School) did not appear until the Shih Chi (Historical Records) of 97 B.C. But the movement which later assumed that name had been going on for centuries. Whether Lao Tzŭ* was the founder of the movement is disputed. At any rate, the School opposed nature to man, glorifying Tao or the Way, spontaneity (tzŭ jan), "inaction" (wu wei) in the sense of non-artificiality or following nature, simplicity, "emptiness," tranquillity and enlightenment. These were all dedicated to the search for "long life and lasting vision" (in the case of Lao Tzŭ), for "preserving life and keeping the essence of our being intact" (in the case of Yang Chu, c. 440-360 B.C.), and for "companionship with nature," "transcendental bliss," "peace of mind," naturalness "like a new born calf," "equality of things and opinions," and "spontaneous and unceasing transformation" (in the case of Chuang Tzŭ, between 399 & 295 B.C.). As the Shih Chi recorded it, the Taoist School "urged men to unity of spirit, teaching that all activities should be in harmony with the unseen (Tao), with abundant liberality towards all things in nature. As to method, they accepted the orderly sequence of nature from the Yin Yang* School, selected the good points of Confucianists and Mohists and combined with these the important points of the Logicians and Legalists. In accordance with the changes of the seasons, they responded to the development of natural objects."

While this philosophy of life was developing, another movement was under way, namely, the search for immortality, inward power, and superhuman ability through divination and magic (see shu shu). This movement, in progress from time immemorial, was vigorously promoted by priest-magicians (fang shih). By the first century B.C., it had already become a concerted movement called Huang Lao, or the Yellow Emperor and Lao Tzŭ, and enjoyed Imperial patronage as well as tremendous popular following.

As the fang shih movement grew in popularity, religious and political reformers competed to incorporate it into their own schemes. In this, Chang Ling* of the second century A.D., the historical founder of the Taoist religion, was most successful. He made use of Lao Tzŭ not only because the Huang Lao cult was powerful, but also because Lao Tzŭ's Tao Tê Ching (see Lao Tzŭ) contained enough vague phrases such as "the Spirit of the Valley," "the divine man," "the mysterious female," the harmonious "infant," the "One," "long life," etc., which could be so interpreted as to give his movement a mysterious and magic character. His movement, styled the Way (Tao) of Five Bushels of Rice, grew in strength. He became the Heavenly Teacher with headquarters in the Dragon and Tiger Mountain in Kiangsi. His direct descendants continued to spread the religion and held the hereditary title of the Heavenly Teacher (the Pope of Taoism) until 1927 when the Chinese Government abolished the papacy.

In the third century A.D., a Taoist philosopher, Wei Po-yang, carried the Taoist religion to new heights. In his Ts'an T'ung Ch'i (inter-penetration unified and harmonized), he attempted to combine the Taoist philosophy and that of the fang shih with those of the I Ching (The Book of Changes) and the Yin Yang School*, and to unify and harmonize them. The ultimate goal of the book was to prolong life through the practice of alchemy whereby, it was believed, the yin and yang or negative and positive cosmic forces could be harmonized and the vital force (ch'i) of the universe could be concentrated on the individual's body. The book became the basis of the Lung Hu Ching (the Dragon and Tiger Classic) of unknown date, Huang T'ing Ching (the Yellow or Internal and Realm or External Classic) of the late third century A.D., and the Yin Fu Ching (the Secret Accord Classic) by Li Ch'üan of the eighth century, all of which have become Bibles of Taoism. The latter Classic, often attributed to the legendary Yellow Emperor, teaches the way to attain unity and immortality for the individual and wealth and power for the state.

Soon after Wei Po-yang, another Taoist philosopher arose, namely, Ko Hung (c. 268-c. 334), also called Pao-p'o Tzŭ, or the "philosopher who embraces Simplicity." His book Pao-p'o Tzŭ is a mixture of Taoist philosophy and Confucian ethics. Its emphasis on alchemy, especially internal alchemy (Nei tan), raised the practice of breath control, thought control, taking medicine, eating charms, etc., to a position of prominence in the Taoist religion.

These two philosophers provided Taoism with a firm theoretical ground and an elaborate system of practice. The time was ripe for a finishing touch of the cult. This was accomplished in the fifth century by K'ou Ch'ien-chih (414 A.D.). He regulated the ceremonies and codes of the cult, fixed the names of its deities, and formulated its theology. Through his influence Taoism was made the state religion in 440 A.D. while Buddhism was persecuted.

State patronage of Taoism was repeated in 574 and 891. Imperial favor reached its height during the T'ang dynasty. Because both the founder of the dynasty and Lao Tzŭ were of the same surname Li, Lao Tzŭ was honored by Imperial order as T'ai-shang Hsuan-yuan Huang-ti (the Most High Emperor of Mystic Origin) in 666, ranking above Confucius and the Buddha. Princes and dukes and those below them were required to study the Tao Tê Chîng, and Taoist temples were ordered established throughout the empire. In 742, Lao Tzŭ's four great pupils were conferred posthumous titles by Imperial order. Chuang-Tzŭ (between 399 & 295 B.C.) was honored as the Pure Man of Mount Nanhua (Nanhua Chên Jên) and his book (Chuang Tzŭ, Eng. tr. by H. A. Giles, 2nd ed. 1926, & Fung Yu-lan, 1931) was canonized as the Pure Classic of Nanhua (Nanhua Chên Chîng). Lieh Tzŭ, contemporary of Chuang Tzŭ, and the book Lieh Tzŭ of third century A. D. (Eng. tr. by L. Giles, Taoist Teachings from the Book of Lieh Tzŭ, 1912) were honored as the Pure Man and Pure Classic of Simplicity and Emptiness, (Ch'ung Hsü). Wên Tzŭ (fifth century B.C.?) and the book Wên Tzŭ attributed to him were honored as the Pure Man and Pure Classic of Penetration of Mystery (T'ung Hsuan). Kêng-sang Tzŭ, contemporary of Chuang Tzŭ, and the book bearing his name were honored as the Pure Man and Pure Classic of the Spirit of the Grotto (Tung Ling). In the following dynasties, however, although Taoism always enjoyed Imperial respect, it never again existed as a state cult, but as a religion of the mass, especially the illiterate and the superstitious.

As a religion of the mass, Taoism, also called Hsüan Chiao, or Religion of Mystery, is distinguished by several prominent features:

1) First of all, it has one of the most thickly populated pantheons in the world. Aside from creating many deities of its own, such as the Jade Emperor (see Yü-huang), the Three Pure Ones (see San-ch'ing), the Three Rulers (San-kuan), the Dipper God (see Hsüan-wu), the Great Unit (see T'ai I), the Liu-chia, the Liu-ting, God of Literature (see Wên-ch'ang), Progenitor Lu (Lu Tsu), the many immortals, the 28 stars, etc., it has adopted most of the traditional deities and even some Buddhist gods, especially Kwan-yin. Traditional deities like the City God (Ch'êng-huang), the God of Land Hou-t'u), Kuan Ti*, the Gods of Wealth, Medicine, Kitchen, Doors, etc., became so prominent in Taoism as to appear almost exclusively Taoist. It has a god for almost everything, including the whole and parts of the body. It worships the spirits of animate and inanimate objects as well as ancestors and famous historical persons. It worships a great number of stars. To these it has added ten great "Heavenly Grottoes," 36 subsidiary "Heavenly Grottoes," and 72 "Blessed Places" where Taoist True Men and immortals rule and await people to seek the Way (Tao). Imitating the Buddhists, the Taoists have their own 33 heavens which they have increased to 81.

2) The objective of Taoist worship is twofold, to seek blessings and long life To this end, Taoism has developed the most elaborate system of alchemy (see wai tan) (nei tan) in the world. Many Taoists take alchemy more seriously than anything else. By means of alchemy, they hope to realize the Three Original Principles of Taoism, namely, Essence, Vital Force, and Spirit (San Yuan).

3) Taoism is a rich reservoir of superstitions. It has capitalized the traditional *fêng shui and the Buddhist patterned heavens and hells. In addition, it has incorporated and elaborated divination, na chia, fortune telling, witchcraft, astrology, communication with the dead, and many others.

4) In organization and literature, the Taoist religion is a wholesale imitation of Buddhism. Its system of clergy is similar to that of the Buddhists in election, classification, ordination, and transmission. The priests, called Tao shih, are of two types. There are the "home Tao shihs" who stay with their family, either wearing the Taoist robe or not, and there are the regular Tao shihs who renounce their homes, adopt vegetarianism, and live in monasteries. Both are required to fast on occasions, to recite the holy writings, and to perform in ceremonies. They differ from Buddhist monks in retaining their lay surnames and keeping their hair. Today there are far fewer Tao shihs than Buddhist monks, and there are no Taoist nuns. Taoist temples, called kuan (literally see, that is, to see deities and immortals), and kung or palaces as the large ones are called, are also modeled after Buddhist temples Equally Buddhistic are Taoist ceremonies and music. The Taoist Canon, too, is also an imitation of the Buddhist Tripiṭaka. However, the Taoist Canon (*Tao Tsang) is more eclectic in that it contains Confucian and other non-Taoist work

5) Although Taoism concerns itself a great deal with spirits and immortals of the other world, it is its ethical teaching that has kept alive. To most followers, the religion is essentially a sanction of ethics. In addition to the Five Precepts (not to kill, not to drink alcohol not to lie, not to steal, and not to commit adultery) borrowed from Buddhism, Taoism advocates the Ten Virtues, namely, filial piety, loyalty to the emperor and teacher, kindness towards all creatures, patience, remonstration of evil deeds, self-sacrifice to help the poor, setting living creatures free and planting trees, digging wells and building roads, teaching the unenlightened and promoting welfare, and studying the holy writings and offering to the gods. These and other precepts, together with a well worked out merit system, present a moral code that contains the best elements of Confucianism and Buddhism as well as Taoism. The two most popular Taoist books, the T'ai-shang Kan-ying P'ien by Li Ch'ang-ling, d. 1008 (Eng. tr. by D. T. Suzuki & Paul Carus, Treatise by the Exalted One on Response and Retribution, 1906) and the Yin-chih Wên (Eng. tr. by Suzuki & Carus, The Tract of the Quiet Way, 1906) by an unknown author and attributed to the deity Wên-ch'ang*, both teach the Confucian virtues of filial piety, loyalty, benevolence, and righteousness, the Buddhist doctrines of karma and transmigration, and the Taoist ethics of patience, simplicity, contentment, and harmony. These two books, with retribution as their keynote, have been most influential among the lower strata of Chinese society.

6) Taoism has been thickly mixed with eclectic sects and secret societies (see Chinese religions). However, it has traditional sects of its own. The division into sects took place in the Sung dynasty (960-1279). In the Yüan period (1280-1368), there were four sects, the Chên Ta Tao Chiao, the T'ai I Chiao, the Cheng I Chiao, and the Ch'üan Chên Chiao. At present only the latter two are existent. The Chêng I Chiao, or the True Unity Sect, is the southern school prevalent south of the Yangtze River. It is traced to Chang Ling and is, therefore, orthodox, but it was actually founded by Liu Hai-ch'an of the tenth century. It emphasizes man's nature, that is, man's spirit or true self, and relies on charms and magic formulae to preserve man's original nature. As such it is the "self-power" sect of Taoism (see Pure Land School). It is idealistic and informal. Its followers are all "home Tao shihs." On the other hand, the Ch'üan Chên Chiao, or the Preserve-Purity Sect, is the northern school with Peiping as its center. It is traced to Lü Tung-pin (Lü Tsu) but was actually founded by Wang-chê of the tenth century. It emphasizes man's life, that is, man's vital force (ch'i), and depends on medicine and diet to prolong life. As such it is the "other-power" sect of Taoism. It is materialistic and formal. Its followers are regular Tao shihs. See sacred literatures, Temples, Far Eastern. See Bibliography at the end of article "Chinese religions."

Tao Tsang: (Chin. the Taoist Canon) The origin of the Taoist Canon, which was certainly an imitation of the Buddhist Tripitaka (see Canon, Buddhist Terminology), is unknown. According to the Yün-chi Ch'i-ch'ien, it had increased from 3,744 parts (chuan) in the eighth century to 4,565 parts in the 1019 collection. Many of these volumes were lost after the destruction in 1281. The existing edition was made in 1446 and supplemented in 1607. It contains 5,200 parts, including a number of non-Taoist works. This edition was reproduced in 1120 volumes by the Commercial Press in 1925.

Ti: (Chin.) a) The Supreme Lord (see T'ien) b) The world-honored deities (such as those of the four directions and the Five Elements). c) Mythological sovereigns whose virtues approximate those of Heaven and Earth.

T'ien: (Chin. heaven) a) Physical heaven. b) The Supreme Lord who is purposive and personal, identical with Ti (Lord), Shang-ti*, Huang-t'ien (Almighty Heaven), and Huang-t'ien Shang-ti. (Ancient Chinese philosophy and religion, especially Confucius and Mo Tzŭ. After Confucius, T'ien and Ti* were distinguished, the former referring to the Lord in the sense of omnipresence and all-inclusiveness and the latter referring to the Lord as the directing and governing power. c) The course and operation of Destiny beyond human control. d) The creative process, which involves yin and yang*, or the negative and positive universal principles. (I Ching, third century B.C., and Neo-Confucianism. e) The principle of excellence or perfection. f) Nature. "Heaven follows the standard of Tao; Tao follows the standard of Nature." (Lao Tzŭ*) "Heaven and Earth follow the course of constancy," to be contrasted with man. (Chuang Tzŭ, between 399 & 295 B.C.) "The course of Heaven is constant." (Hsün Tzŭ, c. 335-286 B.C.) "From the Great Vacuity we have the name Heaven." "The concentration and the dissipation of the vital force of Heaven and Earth are many and various, but its principle or Reason is never wrong." "Heaven is that according to which the Great Ultimate (see T'ai Chi) and the Two Primary Modes (yin & yang) attain their nature and unity." (Chang Hêng-ch'ü, 1021-1077) "There is no Heaven outside of Nature." "Heaven and Earth are merely the greatest of existence; since they exist, they have a limit." "Heaven involves yin and yang." (Shao K'ang-chih, 1011-1077) "Heaven and Earth are merely products of the vital force (ch'i) of yin and yang." "Heaven is nothing but the vital force," that is, "the pure aspect of the material principle." (Chu Hsi, 1130-1200) g) Reason (li). "Heaven is the universal Reason." (Ch'êng I-ch'üan, 1033-1107, & Ch'êng Ming-tao, 1032-1086) "Heaven and Earth unconsciously produce and transform things." (Ch'êng I-ch'üan) "Heaven and Earth are what is metaphysical." "As there is Reason, there are Heaven and Earth." (Chu Hsi) To Chu Hsi, as to most Neo-Confucianists, Heaven is moral, for "Jên or love is the character of Heaven," because "Heaven is constantly producing things." h) Heaven as against hell. Orthodox Chinese religion has none, Buddhism has 33, and Taoism 33 and even 81 such heavens.

wai tan: (Chin.) External alchemy, as a means of nourishing life, attaining Tao, and immortality. It includes transmutation of mercury into gold (also called chin tan), medicine, charms, magic, attempts at disappearance and change of bodily form. Both internal alchemy (nei tan) and external alchemy have been practiced in Taoism*.

Wang Yang-ming: See Confucianism.

Wên-ch'ang: (Chin. literary glory) a) A star worshiped from ancient times. b) The Taoist God of Literature. He was originally a historical person by the name of Chang Ya-tzŭ whose heroism and death in fighting for the Chin dynasty (265-420 A.D.) inspired people to erect temples and worship him. In 1314 he was conferred the title Tzŭ-t'ung Ti-chun, meaning the Lord Master of his native district Tzŭ T'ung. As Taoists believed that he assisted the Lord of Heaven in administering affairs of literature and officialdom, they regarded him as the God of Literature and Arts and worshiped him in schools until recently. He is often erroneously confused with the Wên-chang star. K'uei-hsing is the associate god of literature.

wu hsing: (Chin.) a) The Five Agents, Elements, or Powers of Water, Fire, Wood, Metal and Earth, the interaction of which gives rise to the multiplicity of things, and which have their correspondence in the five senses, tastes, colors, tones, the five virtues, the five atmospheric conditions, the five ancient emperors, etc Also called wu tê. (The Yin Yang School in the third & fourth centuries B C. & the Han dynasty, especially Pan Ku, 32-92 A.D , & Tung Chung-shu, 177-104 B.C.). b) The Five Agents which are the five vital forces (ch's), engendered by the transformation of yang, the active cosmic principle, and its union with yin, the passive cosmic principle, each with its specific nature. When the being of the Great Ultimate (T'ai Chi) and the essence of yin and yang* come into mysterious union, determinate being ensues, with the heavenly principle, yang, constituting the male element and the earthly principle, yin, constituting the female element, giving rise to the myriad things. (Chou Lien-hsi, 1017-1072). c) In the Taoist religion, especially in its geomancy, the Five Elements are the agents of the spirits.

wu wei: (Chin.) Literally "not to make" and also "not to act," the term fundamentally means non-artificiality, non-assertion, following nature, and secondarily means inaction, inactivity and passivity. According to Taoism*, artificiality must not replace spontaneity, and the state of nature must not be interfered with by human efforts or superficial morality and wisdom. "Tao undertakes no activity," or "Tao acts without assertion," and "yet there is nothing left undone," said Lao Tzŭ*.

Yi Ching: (Chin. the Book of Changes) See Confucianism.

Yin yang: (Chin.) a) Passive and active principles, respectively, of the universe, or the female, negative force and the male, positive force, always contrasting but complementary. Yang and yin are expressed in heaven and earth, man and woman, father and son, shine and rain, hardness and softness, good and evil, white and black, upper and lower, great and small, odd number and even number, joy and sorrow, reward and punishment, agreement and opposition, life and death, advance and retreat, love and hate, and all conceivable objects, qualities, situations, and relationships. b) The Two Modes (i—— and—— in trigram, or kua, symbols) of the Great Ultimate (T'ai Chi*), from the interplay of which all things are engendered. c) A system constituted by the Five Agents or Elements (wu hsing*), of Water, Fire, Wood, Metal, and Earth, which in turn constitute the Great Ultimate. (Chou Lien-hsi, 1017-1073) d) The two forces of ch'i, or the vital force which is the material principle of the universe. (Neo-Confucianism) e) Name of a school (400-200 B.C.) headed by Tsou Yen, which advocated that all events are manifestations of the passive or female force and the active or male force of the universe, and which was closely associated with popular geomancy, astrology, etc. See cosmogonies.

Yo Fei: (Chin.) Embodiment of patriotism and loyalty, Yo Fei (1103-1141) is worshiped by the Chinese as a military sage, sharing the honor of state worship in the Temple of Strength (wu miao) with Kuan Ti*. As a general of the Sung dynasty, he devoted himself to the suppression of insurrections and resistance against Tartar invasion. He would have saved the empire if the prime minister Ch'in Kuei had not surrendered to the Tartars and taken Yo Fei's life by treachery. On his back were found written the words "Loyalty to do utmost." Today- outside Yo Fei temples is often found a kneeling image of Ch'in Kuei as a monument of shame.

Yü-huang: (Chin.) The Jade Emperor or Pearly Emperor of Taoism. First mentioned by Han Yu (768-824), the deity, symbolic of "jade" or Absolute Purity, was probably a creation of the Southern and Northern Dynasties (420-589) when the name Yuan-shih T'ien chun* appeared. They have been identified by some people. However, their relationship is not at all clear. As a result of the efforts of Emperor Chên-tsung (998-1022), Yü-huang emerged as the leading god in the Taoist Pantheon. Popular legends trace him to various historical persons. At any rate, he corresponds to, but is more humanized than, the traditional and Confucian Shang-ti* and the Buddhist Amita*.

Yüan-shih T'ien-chün: (Chin. the Heavenly Honored One of Origin and Beginning) The highest deity of Taoism*. Also called Yüan-shih T'ien-wang (the Heavenly King of Origin and Beginning), he is the first member of the Taoist Triad (see San-ch'ing). According to Taoism, he was the essence of existence, the operation of the Force of the One Origin, existing before Heaven and Earth became cosmos and yin and yang* (negative and positive universal principles) became a system. Later, when Heaven and Earth were formed, the Ta-yuan Yu-nu (the Jade Lady of Great Origin) came into existence. By uniting with her, the Heavenly Honored One gave rise, in successive order, to the Emperor of Heaven, the Emperor of Earth, and the Emperor of Man. From these came the ancestors of the Chinese. In Taoist temples, sometimes the Yuan-shih T'ien-chun and sometimes Yu-huang* is worshiped as the highest deity. Some people regard them as identical. However, their relationship is not at all clear.

See Buddhist Terminology.   W.T.C.

chivalry: (Fr., chevalerie, horsemanship, knighthood) The aggregate of all which guided the Medieval gentleman's conduct both in peace and war. Historically chivalry may be traced to the general conditions existing after the death of Charlemagne. When a military aristocracy took over the task of saving the Christian West from utter ruin, it was necessary for the Church to moderate the actions of the soldier-knights. The Church taught ideals of conduct which gave to medieval manhood its reputation for valor and honor, and especially its reverence for women. Later when knighthood withdrew from the influence of the Church, chivalry degenerated into gallantry. See crusades.   J.B.C.

choir: (Lat., chorus) 1) The body of trained singers who render the liturgical choral music of the Eucharist or the Divine Office. 2) That part of the church building, generally west of the high altar, where the singers have their stalls. See chancel.   P.V.N.

chorale: A hymn-tune the style of which was introduced by the Lutheran reformers. The text was always in German rather than in Latin, the whole congregation sang. The tunes were selected from the best of the Gregorian* tunes, from secular tunes, or from the original works of Lutheran composers, notably Johann Walther. The original purpose was to give the congregation a greater share in the service than had been the Roman Catholic tradition. The tunes were very metrical, much more harmonic than contemporary compositions, yet more contrapuntal than modern hymns. The chief melody ·was long kept in the tenor part. The chorale has been used as a basis for later works by such outstanding composers as Bach, who made many organ settings called chorale-preludes, and Felix Mendelssohn, who used familiar chorales in his organ sonatas, cantatas*, and oratorios*. Modern organ compositions employing chorales or hymn-tunes form a valuable part of organ literature which is most suitable to use in the Protestant church services.

W. Douglas, Church Music in History and Practice (1937); J. Julian, Dictionary of Hymnology (1915).   E.H.B.

chrism: (Gr. chrisma, anointing*) An oil*, compounded of olive oil and balsam, blest by the bishop and used in certain ceremonies, such as baptism and confirmation   T R W chrismon: A monogram made up of the first two Greek letters in CHRISTOS, "Christ." Also called "Chi Rho," the names of these letters.   B S.E.

Christ: See Jesus Christ.

Christ, the living: Christ now living and working in the world is not Jesus, and not even Jesus Christ* when Christ is a title applied to Jesus solely in his bodily existence. Neither is the living Christ merely the influence of Jesus' life on subsequent generations, nor the ideals that men have followed in the name of Jesus Christ. Rather the living Christ is a reality which works in the world today, having come into history after the crucifixion. This reality was brought into the world by the Cross and its effective context. The effective context of the Cross was the heritage of the Hebrew prophets, plus other historical and psychological conditions prevailing at the time of the crucifixion, plus the life and teachings of Jesus which preceded the Cross and made it significant, plus the disciples whose lives were deeply shaped by all this. From the Cross in this context comes forth the living Christ that works continuously in the world unto this day, through whom sin is forgiven, who is the mediator and means of grace and the savior of the world.

The grace of God through the living Christ stands in contrast to the work of God under the law. The law is any established order with its regulations and ideals, its sentiments and habits. When God's creativity works under the law it makes us appreciatively aware of one another's interests in so far as we learn to love and cherish the goods and obey the standards of the accepted way of life. However, when we live under the sovereignty of the law God's creativity cannot make us actively and appreciatively aware of the interests of people who live by different standards from our own. These others may belong to some different race, class or culture, or they may be persons so unique in individuality or in depth that our standards cannot reach them. So, when we live under the sovereignty of the law, a barrier intervenes between us and all "outsiders."

The Cross, in the context which we have noted, shattered the sovereignty of the law. Jesus cried at last, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me. It became manifest to him in the last expiring agonies of the Cross that God would not intervene and save the world by way of the Jews. To the disciples also it became apparent that the hope and promise of the law were not to be fulfilled by way of a Messiah who would rule the world under the law of Israel.

This realization did not come to the disciples full-bodied and suddenly. It grew upon them after the crucifixion. Furthermore, it did not grow upon them primarily as theory or idea. It grew upon them as a way of living. They found themselves living with more freedom and fullness of growing community with many sorts of people and with many unique personalities which the standards of the law would not have permitted when it was sovereign over their lives. They found themselves living in his way first of all because of what they had gotten from Jesus during his life, and, secondly, because the Cross had shattered the hope which made the law supreme. This hope continued with them for a time as a theory and an idea, but its power to shape and control their living became less and less. That fulness and freedom of the creativity of God that Jesus had initiated among them could not be bound by the law although it was so bound during the life of Jesus. It could not be bound by their own ideas and hopes and fears. It could not even be bound by the purposes and aspirations of Jesus himself. The creativity of God working through Christ crucified broke the confines of the law by way of the Cross and released the grace of God to work beyond the law. This released and magnified power of the creativity of God in history, community and personality is the living Christ.

The living Christ can work in the world in this manner only through those who accept his sovereignty over their lives beyond the sovereignty of the law. The law, meaning some accepted order of life, must always stand. But in Christ it is servant, not master. When the living Christ rules our lives, the standards which we obey and the goods which we seek and cherish are held subject to the unbounded creativity of God. This unbounded creativity broke free of the law by way of the Cross. It lives among us through those who accept the sovereignty of Christ over their lives. The living Christ is this sovereignty of unbounded creativity whereby community may deepen and widen without limit.

This creativity beyond the law is the grace of God through Christ whereby our sins are forgiven. To sin is to have any interest which makes us resistant to the creativity of God, which means resistant to any extension of our appreciative awareness of the interests of others. We are never free of sin, but when our ultimate commitment is to the creativity of God beyond the law, then the set of standards by which we live cannot longer estrange us incurably from others who live by different standards. We are always estranged but in Christ the fear, hate, suspicion, prejudice, indifference which we feel toward people with standards opposed to ours can be overcome by the work of God. When the law is supreme, God cannot overcome this estrangement, because our devotion to the law intervenes. This is corrected when the creativity of God in Christ is the ultimate source of control.

Sin continues even when we give ourselves to Christ, but when the living Christ controls us our sin in the form of pride, hate, fate, prejudice, indifference to others is forgiven in the sense that it no longer blocks the work of God in our lives. It is no longer deadly. The death involved in unforgiven sin is any final limit put upon the work of God in our lives. Forgiveness of sin is removal of any such finality and this is accomplished by the living Christ.

The living Christ in the world today carrying the grace of God beyond the law is that creativity whereby we may become appreciatively aware of one another's interests, no matter how unique the individual personality may be, nor how diverse the race and culture of the people with whom we deal, nor how otherwise inadequate our standards may be to compass the diversity of interests which we encounter. Our standards make us sinners, not because standards necessarily are evil, but because we follow them in such a way as to put limits upon that creativity of God which works to make us vitally participant in one another's interests. The living Christ is the creativity of God released into history under such conditions that the grace of God can overcome these limits when we accept Christ as sovereign over the law.   H.N.W.

Christ myth: A theory popular in Germany from about 1910. It represents Jesus as either an astral deity who has come to earth, suffered, died, and risen again, or as the projection of the repressed social, economic and political aspirations of the lower classes in the Roman Empire.

See S. J. Case, The Historicity of Jesus (1912); F. C Conybeare, The Historical Christ (1914), M. Goguel, Jesus the Nazarene—Myth or History? (1926).   F.C.G.

Christ's Sanctified Holy Church Colored: A Negro holiness (second blessing) sect organized in 1904 at West Lake, La. There are 31 churches (16 in Louisiana and 9 in Texas) and 665 members. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

Christadelphians (Brothers of Christ): A religious sect founded by John Thomas (1805-1871), an English physician who settled in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1832. He first joined the Disciples of Christ, but repudiating that faith because of its stand on baptism and its type of organization, he founded his own church in 1848.

This group, premillenial in belief, called for a restoration of primitive Christianity, and held that the Holy Spirit was not a person, but an outreaching of God's power in man. It looked toward a world-wide theocracy centering at Jerusalem. Last published statistics give the group 134 societies and 3,352 members in 24 states; the church has no ministers. A periodical, the Christadelphian Advocate, is published.

R. Roberts, Dr. Thomas, his Life and Work (London, 1884); F. J. Powicke, art. Hasting's Encyclopedia of Rel. & Eth.; The Christadelphian Advocate (Des Moines, Iowa).   M.G.R.—W.W.S.

christening: (Anglo-Saxon fr. Gr.) The act of receiving into the church of Christ by baptism*; making a Christian; baptizing. Or, in churches where baptism is at the time of conversion, a service of dedication of infants.   T.J.B

Christian art: See art, ecclesiastical, Christian.

Christian Biography, Lectureship in: Established in 1928 by Dr. and Mrs. E. S. Tipple at Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, New Jersey. The capital sum is $25,000. The purpose of the lectureship is to provide an annual series of lectures on the life and thought of Christian leaders. The following have served on this lectureship. F. L. Wiseman, W. W. Sweet, Bishop H. Welch; E. H. Griggs, D. Malone, Bishop F. J. McConnell.

(Data furnished by the Office of the President of the University.)   v.f.

Christian Brothers: The name by which the Brothers of Christian Schools are commonly known. This order, founded by St. John Baptist de La Salle* in 1684, arose as a congregation of laymen bound by the three simple vows, and dedicated to the education of the poor. Its training college for teachers at Rheims (1685) was the first such institute for primary teachers. It is found in many dioceses of the United States. The Irish Christian Brothers is a separate but similar institute founded in Dublin by Edward Ignatius Rice in 1802. This latter order also has schools in the United States.   t.t.m.

Christian Church: As the name of a denomination, designates the union of three groups which repudiated sectarian names· a movement led by James O'Kelley, Methodist, in North Carolina, 1794, one by Abner Jones and Elias Smith, Baptists, in New England, 1801, one by Barton W. Stone and others, Presbyterians, in Kentucky, 1803. Mutual acquaintance led to union in 1820. Many of the churches and their leaders, including Stone, united with the Disciples of Christ* in 1832. The successors of the remainder merged with the Congregationalists in 1930 to form the "Congregational and Christian Churches." Local congregations of Disciples of Christ are often known as Christian churches, but that body as a whole is not properly called "the Christian Church." See Christian Union.

C. C. Ware, Barton Warren Stone (1932).

                                                    w.e.g.

Christian Congregation: A holiness sect, exclusive in nature, organized at Kokomo, Ind., in 1899. It has dwindled to one church with 57 members. See Evangelistic Associations; holiness churches.   e.t.c.

Christian, early, use of Apocrypha: See Apocrypha, early Christian use of.

Christian, early, use of Old Testament: See Old Testament, early Christian use of.

Christian Endeavor Society: See Young People's Societies, Christian.

Christian ethics: See ethics, Christian.

Christian Knowledge, Society for Promoting (S.P.C.K.): Founded for the promotion of education and religion in 1698, now mainly active as an Anglican publishing house.   e.r.h.

Christian and Missionary Alliance: A conservative evangelistic and missionary group founded by A. B. Simpson in 1881. It has missions in many countries and carries on widespread evangelistic work in the United States. There are 444 churches with 32,000 members. See holiness churches.   e.t.c

Christian missions: See Chinese religions; India, missions to, Japan, Christianity in, missionary movements.

Christian Nation Church: A conservative religious sect in Ohio, having five churches and slightly more than one hundred members. The movement originated in 1892 and took the form of an organized sect in 1895. The purpose was to carry on an intensive evangelistic work and to teach a stricter manner of living than that prevalent among other Christians.

The practices and teachings of the sect are largely negative in nature, stressing opposition to prevalent doctrines and practices. It opposes the wearing of ornaments, membership in organizations other than the church, divorce and remarriage, marriage with an unconverted person, desecration of the Sabbath, entertainments in churches, artificial steps for limiting the size of families, charging admission to places of worship, idleness, the use of tobacco, jesting, singing of secular songs, and similar practices. On the positive side the group teaches entire sanctification, divine healing, and the second coming of Christ. See holiness churches.   e.t.c.

Christian Nurture: The idea expounded by Horace Bushnell* in his book with that title (1847), that the child in the Christian home "ought to grow up as a Christian, and not to be trained up for future conversion." This book represented Bushnell's reaction against the extreme position of the revivalistic Calvinists who developed the New Haven theology*, who, losing sight of the historic doctrine of children in the covenant, seemed to imply that the child must be permitted to become "ripe enough in sin to have a conscious battle with it" before he could become a Christian. Bushnell's view met considerable opposition at first, but gradually prevailed. He called the attention of the churches to the necessity for training the young, he expounded a clear doctrine of Christian growth, and he suggested methods for religious training. He is rightly known as the father of the religious education movement.

Besides Bushnell's own works, see the article on Bushnell by C. A. Dinsmore in the Dictionary of American Biography; Lewis B. Schenck, The Presbyterian Doctrine of Children in the Covenant (1940).

                                                    s.e.m.

Christian Reformed Church: (Gereformeerd Kerk) See Kuyper, A.

Christian Science: Christian Science in its current use designates a denomination which has since 1875 come to share the religious field with the historic Christian denominations. It is centrally organized and directed but it functions denominationally in local churches with their own buildings, leaders and "readers", stated times and forms of worship. It is, therefore, descriptively accurate to entitle the entire movement as The Christian Science Church and its local groups as Christian Science churches, although the "Mother Church" in Boston occupies a unique position. Specifically it was in its origin a variant of American Protestantism though it has since extended internationally.

Christian Science, thus inadequately summarized, was definitely initiated by a leader finally known as Mary Baker Eddy and was the issue of a long and complicated series of events, experiences, relationships and even philosophies which it is extremely difficult to follow, disentangle and appraise. It began as a faith healing cult for which Phineas Quimby of Maine supplied a theory. He finally identified his system with the teachings of Jesus and seems beyond any question to have called it "Christian Science". Authoritative Christian Science literature does not acknowledge this but it is documented by the Quimby Manuscripts.

Mrs. Eddy after her second marriage went to Quimby for treatment. It was a turning point in her life and she became in her turn a teacher and healer. She secured a following and in Lynn, Massachusetts (in 1875) organized a society known as the Christian Scientists. The first edition of Science and Health, the authoritative work for the movement, was published in 1875. Mrs. Eddy says in the preface to the 1909 edition of Science and Health that she began "Christian Science mind healing" about the year 1867 and copy-righted her first pamphlet in Christian Science in 1870, but it did not appear in print until 1876 though copies had been in "friendly circulation." The work itself seems to have been a final redaction of "copious notes of Scriptural exposition." It has since gone through many editions and suffered editorial changes.

Basically, the supporting philosophy of Christian Science is simple. It is a pure idealism. "Nothing is real and eternal, nothing is spirit—but God and His ideal, evil has no reality." All this is developed in Science and Health at length with scriptural support ingeniously argued. Since God is good, He cannot have created nor be responsible for all the shadowed side of life. Man is "God's spiritual idea" and belongs by right to an order in which there is neither sickness, sin, sorrow or death. Such things are errors of his mortal mind. They have no reality for him save as he admits them. Deny them and they cease to exist. There are, therefore, two fundamentally opposed systems of belief, the true and the false. Man is entangled in a false system of belief whose sources Mrs. Eddy does not convincingly trace. He may escape that entanglement with all its consequences by affirming the other system and demonstrating his affirmation by faith, self-discipline and practice.

Centrally, in practice, Christian Science has been and is the application of its philosophy and theology to bodily healing, but there are marginal demonstrations in comfort, prosperity and general well-being. It has made a religion of healing and a healing of religion. It has had, therefore, a peculiar power of appeal and an ample field in which to operate. In its first rapid period of extension it drew markedly from the older Christian communities and disturbed their leaders. The result amongst other things was a highly controversial literature which begins to be dated. The movement has always been most adroitly led and its department of public relations—so to speak—extremely effective. Its idealistic philosophy has naturally led to an idealization of the movement in general and Mrs. Eddy, in particular but its official historians. The complexity of the elements involved makes an analysis of it unusually difficult. Its theology substantially modifies the inherited theologies while continuing much of their terminology.

As a religion it is strongest in teaching that God should have meaning for the whole of life and resolving—in its own way—the inherited difficulty of adjusting Divine power and goodness with what theologians have called the problem of evil. The result has been a definite type of religious devotion, effective with neurotic and self-centered personalities. As a system of mental or faith healing it is a strongly drawn system of psycho-therapy. Its cures operate in regions responsive to suggestion, and it is usually held that only functional disorders are thus responsive. But under any opinion of the medical faculties, this leaves a large field open to Christian Science practitioners.

One may say, therefore, that Christian Science is a philosophy, a semi-theology, a system of Biblicism and a psycho-therapy effectively organized, amply financed and aptly propagated. Its followers have an unusually strong group consciousness. Statistics are not available and the movement has been somewhat regional, but all large cities have, however, strong Christian Science churches and it is representatively disseminated through the United States. See New Thought Movement.

Borden P Bowne, Philosophy of Christian Science (1908) ; Mary Baker Eddy, Science and Health with a Key to the Scriptures (1934. Trustees under the will of M. B. Eddy) ; E. Mary Ramsay, Christian Science and its Discoverer (Christian Science Pub Soc. 1935) ; James M Campbell, What Christian Science Means and What We can Learn from It (1920) ; M. B. G. Eddy, Miscellaneous Writings, 1883-1896 (1924, Trustees) , Sibyl Wilbur The Life of Mary Baker Eddy (1907) ; Edwin Franden Dakin, Mrs. Eddy; the Biography of a Virginal Mind (1929) ; G. G. Atkins, Modern Religious Cults and Movements (1922).   G.G.A.

Christian Social Union: A league founded in 1889 by Bishop Wescott, Scott Holland, and Charles Gore (that year editor of Lux Mundi) to arouse the social conscience of members of the Church of England*, especially those at once devout and well-to-do. From 1900 on it had some 6000 members, mostly Anglo-Catholics*, until 1914 by which time it had largely spent its force. Its greatest influence was among the ordinands at Oxford and Cambridge and in urban parishes. It inspired similar interests among some Nonconformists and Roman Catholics, and collaborated with them in the movement of the Conference on Politics, Economics and Citizenship (Copec) after the first World War (1920, 1924) and provided the background for the English interest in the Life and Work movement and the Malvern Conference. Cf. social gospel.   T.J.B.

Christian socialism: See social gospel.

Christian Union: A sect (or the general designation covering two sects) which grew out of a merger of several independent religious movements in 1864. Followers of James O'Kellev, Barton W. Stone, J. V. B. Flack, and other independents were involved and the movement drew heavily on the Methodists. (See Christian Church) There are no distinctive doctrines apart from the general evangelical position This sect has 93 churches and 6,000 members.

An offshoot of Christian Union is the Church (or Churches) of Christ in Christian Union of Ohio. The breach occurred in 1909 over holiness. The Churches of Christ in Christian Union are fundamentalist, stressing entire sanctification as a "second work of grace," divine healing, and the second coming of Christ. There are 86 churches with 3,500 members.   E T.C.

Christian Unity Baptist Association: A group of 7 small Baptist churches (180 members) in North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia, which formed a distinct organization as a result of a resolution in a Regular Baptist* association to drop all churches practicing "open communion." They practice feet washing but otherwise do not depart widely from ordinary Baptist positions. E.T.C

Christianity*: Christianity may be tentatively defined[1] as a spirit-filled[2] life of faith and love embodied in a/the religion 1) of revelation and 2) of redemption 3) experiential in nature 4) eternal in value-content 5) historical in structure, person and event 6) intuitional in its access to reality 7) interpreted by a theology Christo-centric in method, Theo-centric in incentive and objective and anthropo-centric in direction 8) incorporated in a community of fellowship (the Church) with its Lord[3] 9) implemented by a free personal-social ethic, grounded in the Divine Will and 10) having as its goal a universal moral-spiritual Social Order—The Realm (or Kingdom) of God.[4]

The component parts of the definition may be more fully outlined as follows:

1. Christianity is distinctly revelatory—convinced that God reveals Himself and His purposes progressively (Divine impartation prompting human discovery) in Nature, in the Reason and Conscience of Man, in History, and culminatingly in Jesus Christ (as summarized in the prologue of the Fourth Gospel and in the Epistle to the Romans)—the vehicle of revelation being the Word (Logos) incarnate in Christ and articulate in the inspired writings of the Bible.

2. Organically, Christianity is a religion of regeneration and redemption, coming to man as sinful with the forgiving and renewing grace of God[5] to save and empower him both individually and socially with the spirit of a new life in Christ.

3. Psychologically, Christianity is experiential, having its roots in racial religious experience—which may be defined as the sense of the sacred (numinous)[6]—purified and transformed by the Divine Spirit and made potent and creative in life and thought through the exercise of faith, i.e., the free energizing of the individual self and the group in appropriating spiritual life and truth.[7] In Christian experience emotion blends with cognition and volition to produce an inner harmony and well-being described as "the abundant life,[8] and "life and peace."

4. Ontologically, Christianity consists of eternal values of intrinsic, self-evidencing validity and worth, embracing the true and the beautiful and consummated in the Good These values being essentially personal subsist and are unified for the Christian mind in the Self-existent Eternal Being, who is the One Good,[9] whose existence is known by his Presence,[10] confirmed by knowledge of "His works and ways".[11]

5. Having as its purpose to realize eternal realities and values in time, Christianity is structurally, concretely and developmentally historical. Springing from a Hebraic-Judaic root which itself sprang from Semitic religion, as that in turn from primitive religion, Christianity is indigenously related to all religions, and may be regarded as indebted to all[12] and as fulfilling whatever of truth and virtue (while rejecting what is false) is in all. Entering into the cultural environment of the Graeco-Roman world, Christianity creatively appropriated Hellenistic as well as Hebrew-Judaic thought forms, the synthesis of which proved singularly adaptable and fruitful for the purpose.

As concretely historic, Christianity centers in a supremely endowed, self-disciplined,[13] self-realized, redemptive person, who appeared at a pregnant moment in the historic process (called by Paul "the fullness of time"), fulfilled a unique mission and founded the Kingdom of God.*[14] His spiritual portrait, life, death and resurrection, as drawn in the N.T., are accepted by the Christian Faith as authentic, trustworthily portrayed by the hand of love. Him Christianity has taken as its Lord and Master, one who has not only given to it its distinctive precepts and ideals but who was, and is, himself the Faith personalized and, as the risen and living Christ, is still ever more widely exercising his redemptive mission.

The historic character of Christianity does not preclude symbol, drama and myth but rather justifies and enhances these —symbol being essential to the expression of religion, both in interpretation (language) and in art, drama offering an incalculable aid in heightening the impression and effect of history (Christianity is the most dramatic of all religions) and myth, including legend and tradition (provided neither is a substitute for history but only an acolyte), lending to historic deeds and persons color, vividness, and significance such as history could not otherwise convey.

6. While Christianity is primarily an experience, a life, it is also a knowing and as such relies upon a form of knowledge implicitly yet intelligently intuitional—not less so in that its nomenclature is concrete, empirical and personal rather than abstract and speculative. While depending cognitively upon intuition the philosophy of Christianity is catholic, comprehensive and hospitable and may be said to embrace the affirmative truths and values, not only of intuitionism, valuism and personalism, but of mysticism, idealism, realism, empiricism and pragmatism. In other words, Christianity is philosophically at once convinced and reasonable, distinctive and inclusive, intuitive and interpretive.

Logically, Christianity is markedly dialectical, setting dipolar truths over against each other and resolving the dichotomy by a dialectic which is decissional (either-or) in respect to contraries and moral alternatives and synthetic (both-and) in uniting mutually fulfilling opposites. This gives birth to paradox[15]—an expressional product of dialectic which, uniting wholeness of view with discrimination, is peculiarly germane to the Christian mind.

7. As revelatory, experiential and intuitional, engaged in incorporating eternal values in human life, projected as it is in time and in history, Christianity requires and creates a creedal, didactic, doctrinal instrument of interpretation, or ideology, consisting of a mystical-rational, intuitional-systematic theology, the leading conceptions of which may be defined somewhat as follows; with the understanding that all Christian doctrines—as contrasted with dogmas which are valid semper ubique et ab omnibus (and which Christianity has also)—are in need of continual renewal and reinterpretation.

The Christian conception of God is that of Love,[16] borne to man in the benignant arms of the reassuring (analogical) symbol of Spiritual (Heavenly) Father,[17] as it is witnessed (seen) in living reality in the sonship of Jesus[18] and felt in the moving impulsions of the Holy Spirit.

Although sufficient for faith, Divine Fatherhood has been given metaphysical formulation by Theology under the further symbol of Trinity in the doctrine of the *Trinity which, appearing first in worship and afterward taking conceptual form stands for the completeness of God and the union in Him of transcendence and immanence, power and love, revelation and redemption.

Interpreting all things in relation to God, Christian theology is thus Christo-centric in approach, Theo-centric as its object and its teleology.

Divine Fatherhood, enlarged in depth and range, involves and interprets the doctrine of Creation (creativity) long regarded as mechanical but coming to be understood, in the light of advancing knowledge, as developmental, progressive and cooperative, God as "Creator of creators"[19] giving to creation itself, and chiefly to man, a vital part, through inceptive and increasing freedom, in the universal creative, harmonizing and perfecting process which moves toward universal reconciliation and the fulfillment of the highest possible good for all.[20]

Jesus Christ for Christian theology is the beloved Son of God, the incarnate Logos, the archetypal and ideal man (Paul), Savior and Lord, uniting the Jesus of History and the Christ of Faith, who by dying upon the cross in vicarious suffering on behalf of man implemented timeless reconciliation in time and by his resurrection from the dead brought life and immortality to light. In this historic-symbolic moving drama Christianity unites experience and event, factuality and personality, deed and idea, symbolism and history. begetting an assurance of spiritual verity as not otherwise available for faith.

Man, as viewed by Christian theology, is "made in the image of God" and as such is rational, moral and free. Having by abuse of freedom become sinful, he is, by virtue of the same freedom, and by the grace of God, redeemable and immortable.[21] Through the freedom of Faith, Christianity conceives humanity's immortable nature as "an inner man" perpetually renewed, and thus transmuted into a "spiritual (resurrection) body" which serves the surviving spirit as an instrument to express personality and commune with others in a Larger Life beyond death.[22]

Evil, in the light of Christianity, is a multiform demoralizing, corrupting force, arising, wilfully, "from within out of the heart of man"[23] and becoming a sinister organized destructive power which assumes the guise of a personality (Satan) but will be overcome by the greater power of good.[24]

8. As a religion of love Christianity unites its members to their Lord and to one another in a beloved community[25] in which is cherished the highest possible human fellowship and which by its self-sacrifice and radiant spirit (by no means wholly lost)—especially manifest on the mission field—unfailingly wins adherents to the Christian "Way." This unity being spiritual and affectional is potentially strong enough, as a sacrament and a covenant, to bring together Christians of varied types of belief and worship and unite people of all races and nations and social stations in one world-embracing body, a consummation long delayed by needless misunderstandings and divisions but now moving forward with accelerated speed, fostered by the alienations and enmities of a wartorn world.

9. Being an active, redemptive, constructive Faith, Christianity implements its mission by a vital, free, individual-social ethic which moulds personality and society toward the fulfillment of the highest attainable ideal. As such the Christian ethos expands in adjustment to changing social, economic and political patterns, although less by external influences than by the propulsion of its own autonomous character and power of adaptation and application.

10. The goal of the Christian ethic, as of Christianity itself, is the Kingdom of God, anticipated by Hebrew prophecy and announced by Jesus as already present and exercising its healing and life-giving benefits through himself but also to come far more fully in the future in two contrasted but mutually fulfilling ways, one biological (the parable of the mustard seed) and the other apocalyptic, overcoming, through conflict and upheaval, the Kingdom of Evil.[26]

Christianity commits to the Church the chief agency in bringing in the Kingdom, itself also, as "the body of Christ," an integral part of the Kingdom entrusted with the conduct of worship, the task of religious instruction, the regeneration of individuals, of society and the world-wide extension of the Evangel.

The Kingdom, or Reign, of God which thus animates the vision and enlists the devotion of Christians is a universal, all-inclusive reign of[1] "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit,"[27] a brotherhood of men of all nations and races that is to conserve all the highest values garnered from the age-long growth of good and adventure of man,[28] a Kingdom advancing through growth and struggle toward realization in the present world, yet is already established and can be consummated only in the eternal world, the prayer for which is "Thy Kingdom come, on earth, as it is in heaven!"

Confronting as it does today, with a fresh sense of responsibility, the indispensable and urgent need of religion in the task of world reconstruction, Christianity is coming to realize, with new enlargement of vision and consciousness of dedication, its own undeveloped resources as the Faith above all others of inherent developmental potency, uniting in an unexampled degree doctrine and deed, eidos and ethos, (e.g., the unrealized ethical implications of the Fatherhood of God), with power to meet, on the one hand, the pressing intellectual problems aroused by the new knowledge of man and the cosmos and on the other the overwhelming demands of racial, economic and political world reorganization. Possessing as has been proven by nearly twenty centuries of trial, invincible motive, insight and faith in God and man, it may be predicted without hesitation that Christianity is on the eve of a new era of inner renewal and resolution and outer achievement in its God-given task.

* It need hardly be pointed out that this definition makes no pretension to be other than the endeavor of a single limited individual mind to summarize the conception of Christianity garnered after extended study and reflection. Had there been ampler space for the purpose the definition might well have been made much more elastic and have included variant interpretations of subjects upon which there is room for wide differences of viewpoint.
1 The attempt to form a definition of Christianity reveals as nothing else could its indefinable wealth, resourcefulness and comprehensiveness as a religion, making it incomparably universal in character and value.
2 Rom. 8. The scripture references throughout are used as indices or illustrations of meaning, not as proof-texts.
3 John 15
4 "On earth as it is in heaven."
5 Eph. 2.8.
6 Rudolf Otto.
7 Matt. 17:20; Heb. 11:1.
8 John 10 10, Rom 8 6.
9 Matt. 19:17.
10 Acts 17:23-28
11 Rom. 1:20
12 Rom. 1:14.
13 "Though he was Son, yet learned he discipline through what he suffered and being made perfect he became the author of Eternal perfecting (Salvation) to all who give him their heart's heed" Heb. 5:9.
14 Ritschl.
15 E.g., "He that saveth his life shall lose it."
16 I John 4:8.
17 The Lord's Prayer.
18 "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."
19 Bergson, The Two Sources of Morals and Religion, p. 243.
20 Col. 1:20. "By him to reconcile all things unto Himself." Acts 3.21. The period of the great Restoration (Moffatt). Eph. 1:10 "That in the coming of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ" 21 Having the capacity for immortality.

22 I Cor 15 35—49, 2 Cor 4.16.
23 Mark 7 20—23.
24 Luke 10 18, Rom 16.20
25 John 13 34-35
26 This dual character of "the Second Coming", though essential to its nature, has been seriously missed by theology as well as in popular misunderstanding.
27 Rom 14 17
28 Parable of the Harvest (Wheat and Tares) Matt 13·24-30.
Bibliography. The bibliography of Christianity is too extensive and varied for specific citation Embracing as it does the N T, the chief writings of Patristic literature, the great works of Medieval and of Protestant theology, the classics of Christian Mysticism and the books representing such resuscitations of life and thought as Wesleyanism, Puritanism, the Oxford Movement, Ritschlianism, Christian Romanticism, Pietism, Liberalism, Unitarianism and "the New Theology" and such contemporary movements as Social Christianity, the New Scholasticism, Barthianism, Reconstructed Liberalism, Personalism and Christian Realism, also the histories of the Church, of Christian Doctrine and Missions, and the productions of Christian Art and Literature, Poetry and Science (in so far as these have been animated by Christianity) it is unnecessary to do more than direct attention to this affluent output of virile literature to indicate the wealth of cultural and spiritual fruitage that Christianity has evoked.   J.W.B.

Christianity in China: See Chinese religions.

Christianity and the mystery religions: See mystery religions.

Christmas (origin and customs):

The celebration of the anniversary of the birth of Christ now observed on December 25. There is uncertainty as to when or why this date was chosen. There is no data in the N.T. by which it may be definitely determined.

There seems to have been no interest in the birthday until the time of Hippolytus, Bishop of Rome, in the first half of the 3rd century. He first chose January 2, others proposed May 20, April 18 or 19, March 25 or 28. For some time January 6 had been observed as Christ's spiritual birthday or date of his baptism and there is evidence that it was also celebrated by some as the day of his natural birth.

Two main reasons are generally accepted in explanation of the decision favoring December 25.

1. The "Plan of the Ages." By complicated and fantastic calculations the creation of the world was estimated as beginning March 25, so Christ, the Paschal Lamb, the new Creation, had his conception on March 25 and his birth therefore December 25.

2. The New Testament. By other unsubstantiated reasoning from the Gospel stories the conception of John the Baptist is placed in September and so Christ's in March and thus his nativity in December.

Obviously, the choice of these dates was influenced by pagan observances, though to what extent may not be determined. The date of the conception, March 25, is related to the sun as is also that of the nativity. There had long been the Spring festivals joyously celebrating the rebirth of nature as there had been the Saturnalia (December 17-24) and Brumalia (December 25) rejoicing in the end of the winter solstice and the "birth-day of the unconquered Sun." As the Day of the Sun became the Lord's Day (Sunday) so, other pagan days and festive occasions were conquered by Christ and became Christian holy days.

According to authentic records no church fes-tival was held in celebration of Christ's birth un-til the first half of the 4th Century. Only slowly was December 25 adopted in the East where Janu-ary 6 was observed in honor of both the physical and spiritual births. This date was celebrated by Jerusalem until 549 and has been by the Armenian Christians to the present.

Few of the customs connected with the celebra-tion of Christmas are actually church festivals—that is, have been consecrated by the church or come within the church year. Perhaps the only one is The Cradle of Christ an observance of Christmas Eve which has its origin in the story of the Magi bringing their gifts to the infant Christ. Doubtless this is a reflection of the more ancient Adonis cult, the "adoration in the Cave."

The fact that these customs are popular again help to explain the choice of December 25. They were not imposed by the church but were born of elemental human qualities. Ancient practices and festivals growing out of man's reaction to the sea-sons, the strange and striking moods and changes of nature, were continued by the Christians with a new significance attached. Man remains a creature of nature though a Christian.

Rejoicing at the end of the winter solstice, the darkness of the shortest day of the year turning again to the lengthening light—the Romans cele-brated this "Birthday of the Unconquered Sun" in the madness of the Saturnalia by the lifting of almost all restraints, the closing of schools, re-striction of punishment, freedom of slaves, merry-making, gaming and feasting, the exchange of gifts especially tapers and dolls for children.

The same natural phenomena were observed by more northern people in the Yule* feast, song fes-tivals and ceremonies symbolizing protection from demons and evil Spirits and assurances of abundant harvests in the new year. The fir tree is in all probability a later German adoption, its history going back no further than the 17th Century. The mistletoe is of Celtic origin and is of modern adaptation to the Christmas customs. Each of these symbolizes light in the darkness, life in the midst of death.

The Christmas Tree, so universally celebrated now in connection with the Sunday School, is the happy home and family festival transferred to the Church and thus given more hallowed and re-ligious connotation. Cf. Sol Invictus. See church year, church year cycle.

Lilly Frazer, Leaves from the Golden Bough (1924); Randolph E. Haugan, editor, Christmas; Jocelyn Rhys, Shaken Creeds, Appendix I, p 227 (1922).   R.E.E.H.

Christology: Schleiermacher* defined Christianity as "a monotheistic religion of a teleological kind in which everything is related to Christ, the Re-deemer". The meaning of this definition in the context of his theology can here be ignored, but what is to be emphasized is that he believed it impossible to conceive the Christian religion apart from the centrality of Christ. Indeed, the Chris-tian religion cannot be theologically understood except by a rigorous Christocentrism. Christology is the name for the theological interpretation of the meaning of the belief in Christ, it is the doc-trine of the person and work of Christ.

While it cannot be said that Christology as a developed doctrine can be found in the N.T., it must be acknowledged that the books of the N T. are full of Christological notions. The names of dignity with which Jesus* is endowed (Son of Man, Son of God; Christ, Lord; Saviour, Lamb of God; etc.), reflect interpretations of His life and work in terms of theological ideas. To what extent Jesus Himself made them possible by His own sense of messianic* mission, we can no longer definitely establish. But it is clear that soon after His crucifixion, which His dis-ciples in the resurrection experiences came to un-derstand not as a defeat but as a marvellous con-firmation of His messianic mission, His person and life were explained in terms of certain pas-sages of the O.T., particularly the so-called mes-sianic prophecies and the Isaianic passage of the suffering servant.

The apostle Paul* who by the vision accom-panying his conversion was persuaded that the crucified Jesus was indeed the Christ, developed a first Christology. He viewed Christ as a pre-ex-istent divine being who as the servant of divine grace and love had humbled himself by becoming a man, in order to save men from the dominion of the "powers" of law, sin, and death, and who having broken them by his obedience unto the death of the cross, was raised up to sit at the right hand of God, the Father, from whence he would come again to judge the world. Thus Christ was seen as the center of a divine drama of salvation. In it his incarnation and his resur-rection were the most important factors.

This Pauline view which was incorporated in modified and extended forms in the teachings of the late N.T. books, especially in the gospel ac-cording to John, was less representative of the doctrine that prevailed among the early Christians than of their worship and common life. The "Lord" Christ Jesus was the center of their cul-tus and the fountain of their new life. They worshipped in his "name" and as "new creatures" they believed to be "in Christ".

The Christological notions of the N.T. reflect the concern to understand the meaning and char-acter of Jesus in terms of Jewish and Hellenistic ideas. (In this connection it is important to see how these ideas, e.g., the title "Lord", gained a new significance when they were connected with Christ and the Christian faith.) They served as the basis of all later Christological work through-out the history of the church, proving to be an al-most inexhaustible source of a great variety of doctrines.

The most significant post-Biblical Christological development was begun when the so-called Apol-ogists, of whom Justin Martyr* was most representative, introduced the so-called Logos Christology. Adopting the mode of thought which the Jewish philosopher Philo*, a contemporary of Paul, had employed, when he used the Platonic-Stoic idea of the Logos (the divine principle of creation and rational world order), they declared Jesus to be the incarnation of the Logos. Thereby they endeavored to maintain the monotheistic character of the Christian religion, on which the Christians had insisted from the beginning, at the same time explaining the worship of Christ as a divine agent of revelation and salvation. Their accomplishment was historically most important insofar as by their identification of Jesus Christ with the Logos* they could claim that in the Christian religion the Jewish hope for the Messiah and the Greek-Hellenistic yearning for the disclosure of divine, ultimate truth had been fulfilled. Understanding the divine revelation in Christ as the climax of Jewish religion and Greek philosophy, they could explain the uniqueness of the Christian religion in distinction from Judaism and Hellenism by pointing to the Incarnate "Word" (Logos). But the price they and their theological successors had to pay for this achievement was high. For the Logos-Christology explained the meaning of Jesus' person and work primarily in metaphysical and cosmological terms (which, by the way, have proved unacceptable to us moderns). Thus the historical figure which is in the center of the N.T. message was lost sight of. Christological speculation turned almost immediately to the problem of how the relation of the Logos with God must be understood. Another question, namely that of the character of Jesus' person and life waited to be raised.

The first problem was solved in the course of the Arian* controversy (318-381), the setting of which had been prepared by the work of the great theologians of the third century, particularly Origen*. The trinitarian dogma declared by the Council of Nicaea (325) and confirmed by the Council of Constantinople (381) taught the *homoousia (consubstantiality, sameness of being) of the Father and the Logos (See Constantinople, Councils of).

When the Nicaean theologians defined the nature of Christ as "God from God", "begotten not made", they were concerned to safeguard a certain interpretation of the salvation through Christ as it had been first introduced by Irenaeus. When he taught that in Christ "God became man that man might become God", he regarded the Incarnation as the ground of the hope of immortality (for in it eternity had entered time) and the Resurrection as the ground of the ultimate victory of good over evil (for by it death and sin, the "wages of death") had been defeated. By the Arian metaphysical teaching that the Son had a beginning, (that "there was a time when he was not") the truly divine character of this salvation was denied. Hence the Nicaeans under the leadership of Athanasius fought for the dogma of the divinity of the Son (Logos) with the conviction that in it the very essence of the Christian faith was expressed. It must be noted, however, that in attributing divinity to Jesus Christ, they proceeded on the basis of the question what he must have been in view of their doctrine of salvation and not what the gospels described him as having been.

The same abstract and artificial approach which, by the way, has been characteristic of most Christological thinking, was also that of the controversy which followed almost immediately upon that initiated by Arius and was essentially concluded by the work of the Council of Chalcedon* (451). The problem which demanded solution was the following If the Logos has to be regarded as "consubstantial" with the Father, what kind of a person was Jesus in whom the divine Logos became incarnate? Since Tertullian it had been customary to describe the character of Jesus Christ as "one person in two natures" (human and divine) In the light of the Nicaean teaching there arose the possibility of three Christological heresies Nestorianism*, which stressed the difference between Christ's human and divine natures in such a way that it became impossible to conceive him as one person, Monophysitism*, which so emphasized the divine nature of Christ as the essential aspect of his being that his human nature was virtually denied, and Apollinarianism*, which defined the person of Christ in such a way that he could be regarded as neither human nor divine. The Christological dogma of Chalcedon excluded all these heresies by defining the person of Christ as one person with two natures, so unified that they must be regarded as neither mixed with one another nor as separated from one another. The artificiality of this definition is obvious, yet it saved the Christian faith from serious Christological aberrations. It preserved the fundamental Christian conviction that God had acted in the man Jesus.

For centuries, it remained henceforth a basic Christological tenet that Christ was both man and God (Origen had coined the phrase theanthropos, God-man). Thus the Greek dogma came to dominate all Christological thought. To be sure, the medieval scholastics (in this respect following Augustine) were not much interested in metaphysical Christological speculations. Hence they took the ancient teaching on the person of Christ for granted and paid particular attention to the work of Christ. It became their special concern to understand his passion and death The Crucifix thus became the symbol of medieval western Christianity. Anselm* of Canterbury saw the death of Christ as the only sufficient reparation (satisfaction) paid to God for human sin. Abailard* interpreted it as that disclosure of divine love which will decisively turn man to the love of God. Bernard of Clairvaux* made it the object of a mystical contemplation by which man might become one with God. Thomas Aquinas blended all these notions into one.

This preoccupation with the question what Christ had done for man, particularly by his death, led to a concern for the Christ of the N.T., which the ancient theologians had avoided. Thus medieval Christianity developed the ideal of the "imitation of Christ" (Damiani, Norbert of Xanten, Francis of Assisi, Thomas a Kempis) The gospel picture of Christ once more asserted itself. One began to write books entitled "The Life of Christ" (Ludolf of Saxony). Nevertheless, the dogma of the two natures remained in the foreground.

This fact was left unchanged also in the times of the Renaissance and the Reformation. To be sure, Erasmus placed the teachings of Christ (philosophia Christi) in the center of his moralistic and enlightened interpretation of Christianity. And Luther professed to be not primarily concerned for the metaphysical aspects of the Christological dogma, emphasizing instead the soteriological character of Christ as "the mirror of the fatherly heart of God." Actually, the main implications of the old dogma remained in force. In Luther's fully developed Christology they became apparent in his teaching on the atonement* of Christ's death as a penalty for human sin (a teaching which the Reformers adopted) and in his doctrine on the ubiquity* of Christ, which he put forth in connection with his doctrine of the Lord's Supper (a doctrine the Christological implications of which particularly the Calvinists vigorously denied).

Orthodox Protestantism retained the old dogma intact, extending it merely in furtherance of partisan interests. The rational criticism to which it was subjected by the Humanists, Spiritualists, Anti-Trinitarians (particularly Socinians*) and Arminians never led to a construction of new Christological doctrines.

In the teachings of the philosophers and theologians of the Enlightenment* the doctrine of the two natures of Christ finally lost its validity. Their vigorous anti-supernaturalism and Rationalism permitted them to see in Jesus only the supreme moral teacher. They were unable to comprehend the centrality of Christ in the Christian faith.

A reconstruction of a fully Christian doctrine of Christ was begun by Schleiermacher* who in separating himself both from Orthodoxy and Rationalism taught to regard Christ as the Redeemer, insofar as he communicates to believers the perfectness of his own God-consciousness, and as the Founder of the Christian Church, insofar as he determines its common life by the impulses that proceed from his perfection. Ritschl*, depending on Schleiermacher, believed it possible to combine with these teachings the Christocentrism of the Lutheran Reformation. Rigorously excluding the old dogma from consideration, he insisted that the historical Jesus, the founder of the Christian movement, must be seen as the revealer of God, particularly insofar as in his life he perfectly fulfilled his vocation of disclosing the divine plan of the Kingdom of God.

When Ritschl became the head of the theological "school" that bears his name, the modern investigation in the life of Jesus had already begun. His own teachings greatly encouraged the interest in the historical Jesus. Neglected, almost forgotten for centuries, the historical figure of the man of Nazareth came to dominate the life of liberal Protestantism. Theologically, the old Christology was relegated to the past in which it had developed, religiously, it continued to lend power to the meaning which one claimed to derive from the "Jesus of history." Today, the church is in need of a new Christology. See communicatio idiomatum, creeds of Christendom, Cyril of Alexandria, Dyophysites, Eutyches, Jesus, our knowledge of, kenosis, monotheletism, Nihilianism; perichoresis, Virgin Mary.

H R Mackintosh, The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ (1912).   W.P.

Christotokos: See Nestorianism, Virgin Mary.

Chronicles, I and II: Historical books of the O.T., contained in the third and latest division of the Hebrew canon, the "Writings" or Hagiographa*. They were originally one volume, and cover Hebrew history from Adam to Cyrus (538 B.C.) with special attention devoted to David* and the subsequent kings of Judah. The work is obviously a revision of earlier, canonical books of the O.T., especially I, II Samuel and I, II Kings, in accordance with the interests and ideas of the author. He shows particular interest in the Temple*, its cult and clergy (especially the Levites), in racial purity (see the elaborate genealogies), and in the dogma of divine retribution. Jewish tradition attributes the work to Ezra*, but modern scholarship usually assigns it to a writer of a later period, in the first half of the third century B.C., who also wrote Ezra-Nehemiah*. If Ezra lived in the first half of the fourth century, it is not impossible that he was actually the author. The principal source used was the earlier historical books, Genesis-Kings, but it is possible that other authentic sources were utilized. It is seldom, however, that the Chronicler gives accurate additional information concerning history, and his work is chiefly of value for study of the ideas and institutions of the author's period. The Books of Chronicles are supplemental to, and in the spirit of, the Priestly writings (see P), but represent a somewhat later stage in ecclesiastical development.

See E. L. Curtis and A. A. Madsen, The Books of Chronicles (International Critical Commentary) (1910); W. F Albright, "The Date and Personality of the Chronicler", Journal of Biblical Literature XL (1921), pp. 104-124.   J.P.H.

chronological order of Biblical Books: See Books of the Old Testament, the, in chronological order, Books of the New Testament, dates of the.

Chrysoloras, Manuel: (c. 1355-1415) Of noble Byzantine family, was sent to Italy by Greek Emperor to beg aid against Turks, settled in Florence on invitation of the city, and became first important teacher of Greek in Italy. Died en route to Council of Constance.   W.E.G.

Chrysostom, John: (347-407) John of Antioch, the "Chrysostom" being a title, meaning "Goldenmouthed", bestowed because of his matchless pulpit eloquence. Born in Antioch in 347, given an excellent education by his saintly mother Anthusa. Became an advocate in Antioch, but later, after three years of instruction by Bishop Meletius in Antioch, was baptized. He avoided election as bishop in 370, and, after the death of his mother who had opposed his desire, he went into monastic retirement. Returning to Antioch in 380, he was appointed Deacon in 380 and Presbyter in 386. Then in 387 he was made Patriarch of Constantinople. There a friendly act involved him in the Origenistic controversies*, which provided an occasion for his banishment owing to the hostility of the Empress whose loose life he had rebuked. He died in exile in 407. He wrote commentaries, expository homilies, apologetic treatises, and a work on the Priesthood in which he commended virginity and asceticism. He is the only member of the Antiochan school* whose orthodoxy has never been challenged.   A K.R.

Chuang Tzŭ: See Chinese Terminology.

Chubb, Thomas: Dee Deism.

Chu Hsi: See Chinese Terminology.

church: See ecclesia, sect, temples.

Church and State: See caesaropapism, Concordat; Papal States, legates and nuncios, papal, Westphalian treaties.

church architecture: See art, ecclesiastical, Christian; church building

Church Army: A Church of England organization, founded in 1882 by Prebendary J. C. Carlile, which carries on work similar to that of the Salvation Army. An American branch was established after the first world war, with a training school for men and women in New York City.   W.N.P.

church building: In the earliest days of Christianity, Christian worship was conducted in private homes. While it may be true that the basilicae* of the Mediterranean countries influenced to some extent the plan and the structural system of the earliest Christian churches, yet modern investigation would seem to prove that too much has been taken for granted in this respect.

Perhaps the oldest Christian place of worship known today is the ancient church at Glastonbury, in Somersetshire. Local tradition asserts that it was built by Joseph of Arimathea, who is believed by some to have introduced Christianity into Britain in 63 A.D. Extensive excavations were carried out by Frederick Bligh Bond, Esq., and others, and brought to light evidences that a Christian place of worship stood on the site in earliest times. The present building, a roofless structure of sturdy stone construction, is certainly not the original building, but it is probably a heavy veneer of stone that may have been built to protect one or more earlier structures. The original church, according to tradition, was of wattle and daub construction, rectangular on plan, and of simplest construction.

America was colonized by northern Europeans, and it is but natural that they brought to this country the traditions of northern lands, rather than the planning and methods of construction of the southern and eastern countries. The American colonists were not wealthy, and there was no attempt to introduce the large, imposing type of church buildings that are characteristic of France, Spain and Italy, nor the massive Romanesque that prevails so largely in Germany.

Partly because so many of the early settlers in America were Englishmen, and partly because the majority of English churches were of the small simple parish-church type, English types of architecture prevailed in America from the start There were a few attempts at a very simple type of Gothic*, but the style more typical of Colonial days was the Georgian. London had burned in 1666, and many of its city churches had been rebuilt by Sir Christopher Wren, in a style somewhat new to England. Their plan was often a simple rectangle, rather wide and short, with a comparatively shallow chancel. These buildings were simple, but Sir Christopher saved them from mediocrity by constructing towers and spires of considerable richness and of great originality.

The simplicity and ease of construction of these churches appealed to the austere American Puritan mind. Wren's Georgian style was further simplified, and our own Colonial churches were the result. Many of these still exist. Among them are North Church, Old South Church, Park Street Church, the Roxbury Meeting House, the Dorchester Church, all in Boston, and the First Church in West Roxbury, the last no longer standing. Close by are the two churches in Dedham, and churches in Wayland, Lancaster and many other communities. Providence has an especially fine example, and at East Lyme is a restoration of another good Colonial example. Almost every New England village has one or more examples, and good Colonial is found here and there along the coast, as far as Charlestown, S. C.

Colonial did not influence the Middle West to any extent until recent years. The prevailing style there was a type of building incorrectly called Victorian Gothic. These churches were rectangular on plan, with a thin tower and spire on the main axis. The chancel degenerated into a shallow recess, and in the worst examples, was occupied by the organ and the singers. About the year 1867, the so-called Akron theatre-plan was introduced, and gained much popularity throughout the Central States. A decade or so later, H. H Richardson and his followers introduced a modified form of Romanesque, but its vogue was of short duration.

In 1892, a firm of young architects known at first as Cram, Wentworth and Goodhue, and later as Cram, Goodhue and Ferguson, built All Saint's Episcopal Church, Peabody Square, Boston. This was the beginning of the remarkable Gothic revival that was destined to hold sway in America for half a century. This famous firm of architects built churches in almost every important city in America, and these range all the way from small chapels seating but a hundred people to the vast fabric of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York.

An attempt had been made in England to revive the Gothic style, which had been a dead style for four centuries. Eminent architects, such as the Pugins, the Scotts, Bentley, Bodley & Garner, Paley & Austin, Stokes, Butterfield, Sedding, Comper, Tapper and others had done much brilliant work, but it was in America, and at the hands of Ralph Adams Cram, Bertram G. Goodhue and a number of men either trained or influenced by them, that the most remarkable age of church building since the Middle Ages, came into being. It lasted from about 1892 to 1930, when the financial depression and other causes caused a swift decline.

Not only in church building, but in all the associated arts, was there a most remarkable awakening. Connick, Burnham, d'Ascenzo, Lakeman, Reynolds, Francis & Rohnstock and a number of others produced stained glass of a quality fully equal to anything done abroad. Skinner, Austin, Casavant and others built organs of finest quality, exceeding even their eminent predecessors, the two Roosevelts, Hutchings, Johnson and Hook & Hastings. John Kirchmayer's wood carving became known throughout the world, while Irving & Casson, William F. Ross and others did work of exceptional merit. In ecclesiastical metal work were such men as Krasser, Koralewski and Yellen, whose work was the rival of that of Mediaeval Hildesheim. Sculptors, workers in mosaics, in church embroidery, in encaustic tiles for church floors, and to a lesser extent in mural decoration, transformed many of our American churches into places of great richness. It was only in bell founding and. in the construction of carillons* that the English and continental product was superior to that of America.

Partly due to the industrial depression of 1930-1940, and partly because so many of these famous and gifted architects and craftsmen died within a short period of time, enthusiasm waned, and by the time of the Second World War, comparatively few churches of merit were being built. There was no longer the demand for careful planning, sturdy honesty of construction and perfection of craftsmanship.

Efforts have been made from time to time to adapt the so-called Modern style to church building, but without conspicuous success. A few good Modern churches have appeared in the Scandinavian countries and in Finland. Those of Germany and France are unquestionably ugly. A few rather good examples are to be found in England, such as St. Saviour's Eltham, Hanwell St. Thomas's, the new parish church at Hook and the proposed Guildford Cathedral. The vast cathedral at Liverpool, not yet completed, is Gothic but with decided Modern influence. In America and Canada a very few Modern churches have appeared, but thus far they have not attracted wide attention. See art, ecclesiastical, Christian, bells; cathedral, norman; temples.   F.R.W.

Church Congress: Annual meetings of members of the Anglican Communion in England and in America, at which problems facing the Church are discussed and differing points of view presented.

In England, a semi-official committee supervises the plans for the meetings, in America, an organization entitled The Church Congress sponsors the conferences The American group has a working committee with headquarters in New York, the committee publishes booklets and syllabi for study.   W.N.P.

church government. See clergy, polity. Also see under various churches.

Church Missionary Society, the: See Evangelicals.

church, the institutional: See institutional church, the.

church, the, in historic Christianity, conceptions of: The term church is used to designate a group of more or less closely related phenomena and values, all related to the continuation in human history of the work and influence of Jesus Christ. Questions about the "true" meaning of the word, about the essence of the church and about the "true" church are fundamentally moral questions relating to the comparative worth of various human actions. The meaning of the term varies between two poles but in every case some reference to both is involved, the first of these is the idea of a special community of men constituted by Jesus Christ or by God through Christ, the second is the idea of an institution which carries on or witnesses to the work of Christ among the "natural" communities of mankind. Each idea is subject to a variety of interpretations, hence three main sets of problems have been discussed in theology with reference to the church the nature and function of the community, the nature and functions of the institution, the relations of institution to community.

In the sub-apostolic period the church was thought of primarily as a chosen people of God, a new race elected to take the place of the previously chosen, now rejected, Israel, it was on the one hand the special recipient of divine favors, on the other hand the special instrument of the divine will. Membership in the community was the result of regeneration rather than of natural birth, the law of the people was the new law revealed by Jesus Christ; it was not a geographically localized society but scattered throughout the world. While this idea of the church as a new and universal people remains a constant theme in the thought of later periods it is made the leading theme by medieval sects, in part by the monastic orders and, in the Reformation period, by the Anabaptist* groups and their successors. It is of great importance also as one motif in the major reform movements from Wyclif* onward. The problems and conflicts which marked the development of the Jewish doctrine of the chosen people reappear, though with significant differences, in the history of the idea in Christendom. The most important of these center around the following points. the degree of separateness of the new community from other societies with which it is intermingled spatially, culturally and economically; the relation of the new law to common human mores, and the rigorousness with which the former is to be interpreted and applied, the relative importance of the letter of traditional law and of individual inspiration, the extent to which suffering or rulership represents the function of the people in the divine economy, the mode of government of the community, the question of membership, to what extent it is dependent on personal decision, on divine action, on social or spiritual inheritance, the relation of definite and definable local or provincial societies to the vaguely definable general community of all Christians.

The idea of the church as institution, while represented in the early recognition of the apostolate and never wholly absent from Christian thought, tends to take some precedence over the idea of the church as community with the increasing Christianization of the Roman empire, the development of an official clergy and the episcopate, of the rites and the sacramental system. It is in part the consequence of the growing maturity of the Christian movement, in part the result of the accommodation of Christianity to prevailing social and religious practices. Cyprian* (d. 258) brought such ideas of the church into systematic form. For him the church was primarily an institution of salvation, centering in the bishops, the successors of the apostles and dispensatores dei. For medieval Roman Catholicism* "church" means fundamentally the hierarchical institution, which mediates grace through the sacraments*, brings offerings for the people and also governs as representative of God. In general, the major Protestant movement, as represented by Luther and Calvin, did not so much break with the institutional conception of the church as it challenged the priestly conception of its function. The proper work of the church, in the conviction of the Reformers, was the preaching of the gospel to which the administration of the sacraments was subordinate. Calvin and Calvinism* united with this a large interest in the governing function, as indicated in the fact that discipline was regarded in this branch of the Reformation as one of the marks of the church alongside of the preaching of the gospel and the proper administration of the sacraments. In the period of Protestant scholasticism the prevailing conception of the church was that of a school which taught right doctrine, a notion which was confused with the idea of the preaching of the gospel, but with the evangelical revival in the 18th and 19th centuries the original Reformation emphasis was reestablished, so far as the conception of the institutional function was concerned.

Despite variations of emphasis on community or institution both elements have needed to be considered in all thought about historic Christianity and a major question at all times has been the question of the relation of the two aspects. For Roman Catholicism the institution of the priesthood, culminating in the papacy*, is the representative and the visible embodiment of the new community; no one is a true member of the community who is not loyal to the institution. Lutheran and Calvinist Protestantism regard the community as an object of faith rather than of experience while the "visible church", or the institution of preaching and discipline is an instrument which God uses, though not necessarily so, for the creation of the invisible community, on the other hand, the presence of the institution may be regarded by faith as an indication of the presence of the community. Sectarian Christianity, which became profoundly influential throughout Protestantism in the evangelical revival, subordinated the institutional to the communal conception and sought the establishment of visible societies of Christians to which it applied the term church, without showing much interest in the problems of the relation of such societies to historic and universal movements or communities.

A. Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, 2 vols. (1908), 2nd ed.; F. Loofs, Symbolik; C. Gore, editor, The Church and the Ministry (1919); Hort, The Christian Ecclesia.   H.R.N.

church, the primitive Christian: Jesus was not, in the literal sense, Founder of the church, for what he looked for was the Kingdom, when men would spontaneously obey the will of God, and no formal organization would be necessary. The references to the church in Matthew's Gospel can be proved, on critical grounds, to be doubtful. At the same time the church was the inevitable outcome of the work of Jesus. He gathered around him a body of disciples which could not but expand and take on it the form of a regular community. Above all, he proclaimed the Kingdom of God, and his followers were those who broke with the present world and threw in their lot with the new order which was at hand. This, in its origin and all through its history, has been the formative idea of the church. It is the society of those who are seeking in this world to order their lives by the principles of a higher world, in which the will of God is the sole law.

The church had therefore no definite beginning. After Jesus' death his disciples continued to live as they had done in his company, and as their numbers grew they were obliged to introduce some kind of order, which became ever more elaborate. Before they knew, the church as an institution had become an accomplished fact. It regarded itself as the new Israel, and its very name "Ecclesia" is one of the names applied in the O.T. to the assembly of Israel. The view has commonly been held that the church in its origin was nothing but an imitation or counterpart of the Jewish theocracy, but it was something radically new. Its members were Jews and naturally fell back on the models offered them in Judaism, which was the only religion known to them. This, however, only affected the outward structure of the new community, which arose directly out of the message of Jesus.

The primitive church was the same in its essential character as the later one, which aimed at reproducing it on a larger scale; but it had several peculiarities which give it a place apart. 1) Its mood was one of intense ardour and confidence. Inspired by the Resurrection visions the disciples were now certain that Jesus was the Messiah, that he had ascended to heaven, that he had sent down the Spirit to help them. They believed that at any hour he would return in glory to bring in the Kingdom of God. This mood of exaltation gave a special character to the church worship. While modelled on that of the synagogue it allowed room for ecstatic manifestations, above all for the "speaking with tongues", in which prayer was made by means of an inarticulate language, supposed to be that of the Spirit. 2) The church embraced the whole life of its members, and took the form of a communistic society. This was no doubt due in some measure to the belief that the world was near its end and that private possessions had now lost their value. But it must also be explained from the effort to follow out literally the teaching of Jesus, who had declared that his disciples must surrender everything before they could enter the Kingdom. 3) There was nothing in the nature of an official ministry. A precedence was allowed to the immediate disciples of Jesus, and especially to Peter; and their counsels were generally followed. But in theory all believers were on the same footing. They all took an active part in the church worship, and no important step was taken except through the common meeting. It was assumed that the church was controlled solely by the Spirit, which was present in all its members and might express its will through any of them.

A society of this kind could only maintain itself for a short time, when it was small in numbers, and confined in one place, and animated by a tense enthusiasm which was bound, in natural course, to die down. In its primitive form the church may be said to have continued for about twelve years,—up to the time of the persecution by Herod Agrippa (A.D. 42). The disciples were then expelled from Jerusalem, and when they returned shortly afterwards they appear as an organized society, governed by a board of elders under the presidency of James. Before this time a new turn had been given to the whole Christian movement by the rise of the Gentile mission. The Gentile churches took the mother community for their example but inevitably made many changes in its theory and practice. Yet in substance the ideas of the primitive church were those which determined the whole future of Christianity. It has always been recognized that we must go back to them in order to understand the nature and purpose of the church.
E. F. Scott, The Nature of the Early Church (1941); O. Linton, Das Problem der Urkirche (1932).   E.F.S.

churchwarden (Anglican): A layman appointed to assist the rector or vicar in administering the temporal affairs of the parish. Normally two in number, of whom one may be named by the rector, the other chosen by the parishioners.
                                    P.V.N.

church year: The early Christians carried over from Judaism the idea of a weekly holy day—the observance of Sunday* as a day of worship soon replacing the legal observance of the Sabbath*. They also continued the Passover*, now become the feast of the Resurrection. In the 2nd century the Quartodeciman* controversy revolved around the observance of Easter* on the 14th Nisan or the Sunday following. A short strict fast before Easter grew into the varied observance of Lent, while the 50 days between Easter and Pentecost* were treated as festal. From at least about 150, martyrs were remembered on the anniversaries of their deaths. Thus in ante-Nicene times the framework of the church year with the two cycles de tempore and de sanctis was already established. In the 4th century two feasts of the Manifestation of Christ, December 25 and January 6, were introduced, except in the Armenian Church, which observes only January 6, they are combined by devoting December 25 (Christmas) to the Birth and January 6 (Epiphany*) to other Manifestations. Further development is a fixing of details—the ordering of the cycle of Sundays and the increase of saints' days. In the Greek Church all Sundays depend on Easter or Pentecost, but in Western calendars some weeks before Christmas and after Epiphany are attached to those feasts. In the Greek calendar every day, in the Roman almost every day now has a saint or saints (others besides martyrs having been added since the 4th century, St. Mary and virgins since the 5th), but in observance Sundays take precedence over minor saints' days. At the Reformation Lutherans and Anglicans retained the temporal and part of the sanctoral cycle. The Reformed Churches sometimes rejected all except Sunday (to which, by a revival of a mediaeval tendency, English-speaking Puritans applied the sabbatarian laws), but observance of at least the major festivals is now almost universal. See festivals and holy days, Christian.

J. Dowden, The Church Year and Kalendar (1910); K. A. Kellner, Heortology (1908).
                                    E.R.H.

church year cycle: The main points of the usual Western Church Year are the feasts of Christmas* and Easter*, each preceded by a penitential and followed by a festal season. Advent* (Latin adventus, coming, i.e., of Christ) begins on the fourth Sunday before Christmas, the festal season continues through the Epiphany and its octave. Lent* covers six Sundays and 40 weekdays before Easter; since the early Middle Ages the three preceding Sundays have been called Quinquagesima and, by extension, Sexagesima and Septuagesima (by, inclusive reckoning, Quinquagesima is 50 days before Easter, Sexagesima 57, Septuagesima 64, hence the first name is correct, the second approximately so, the last not even that—but the influence of the series was strengthened by a symbolic parallel between the penitential season and the 70 years of the Babylonian Captivity). The last two weeks of Lent are Passiontide, further distinguished as Passion Week and Holy Week*. Ascension Day is the 40th day after Easter (Acts 1.3), Pentecost or Whitsunday the seventh Sunday (Lev. 23 15, Acts 2:1). Its octave completes the paschal season. The variations in the date of Easter are adjusted by longer or shorter series of common Sundays, numbered after Epiphany (1-6) and after Pentecost (23-28)—in some mediaeval and in modern Lutheran and Anglican uses these last are numbered after Trinity (22-27), from the Feast of Trinity*, observed since the 13th century on the Sunday after Whitsunday. The Greek calendar is similar, except that Christmas does not affect the cycle and Sundays are numbered after Pentecost until pre-Lent, the pre-Lenten Sundays are named from the Gospel read (as Prodigal Son Sunday) or the gradual beginning of the fast (as Cheese Sunday, in the last week in which cheese may be eaten). Saints' Days and Holy Days are fixed by the civil calendar; in case of conflict minor Holy Days yield to common Sundays and all to the major festivals*. See bibliography under church year.   E.R.H.

Church, the Brethren ("progressive") : See Dunkers.

Church of the Brethren ("conservative") : See Dunkers.

Church of Christ (Holiness) U. S. A.: A sect of colored holiness believers organized in 1894 by C. P. Jones, a Baptist preacher at Selma, Alabama. It claims 106 churches and 7,400 members. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

Church of Daniel's Band: A holiness sect organized in imitation of the early Methodist class meeting at Marine City, Mich., in 1893. It has 5 churches and 120 members. See Evangelistic Associations; holiness churches.   E.T.C.

Church of England: 1) History. Romano-British Christianity, probably dating to the 2nd century, was weak even in the 4th, though it survived in Wales and planted the Celtic Churches of Ireland, Scotland, and Brittany, later of great importance. The conversion of the English began with Augustine's mission to Canterbury, 597. The English Churches, of Roman, Celtic, and other foundations, were united and organized under Archbishop Theodore of Tarsus, 668-690*. Foreign contacts were less after period of organization until the Norman conquest, 1066. Thereafter the two provinces of Canterbury and York functioned as a normal part of the Western Church—in practical matters Pope, King, and local bodies struggled for control. "The Church of England shall be free" in Magna Charta, 1215, referred mainly to capitular election of Bishops, gradually lost, however, to royal influence and papal "provisions;" the latter were forbidden by Statutes of Provisors and Praemunire (1351-1394), but common by royal permission, the Pope usually providing the King's candidates.

Henry VIII's policies forced repudiation of papal authority by clergy and Parliament, 1531-1534—Bishop Fisher, Thomas More, and some others died for refusing Oath of Supremacy. Under Edward VI (1547-1553) there was a rapid movement towards Protestantism, under Mary (1553-8) a short-lived Counter-Reformation. After Elizabeth's accession the "Elizabethan Settlement"* refused both extremes, Henry's claims were moderated, but Roman Catholics were subject to much persecution, and against Puritans* (at this time mainly Presbyterian) the Church remained Episcopal in government, liturgical in worship, non-Calvinist in theology. After the Puritan triumph under the Commonwealth the Church was restored with the King, but ceased to be inclusively national with expulsion of the Nonconformists, 1662 (recognized by Toleration Act, 1689). Eighteenth century inertia was broken by the Methodist revival, but the Methodist Societies separated after John Wesley's death, 1791. Evangelicals* since about 1760 and Anglo-Catholics* since 1833 have brought new life to the Church, which retains contact with the intellectual and civic life of the nation. In spite of occasional tension, disestablishment in England (widely discussed after Reform Bill of 1832) seems remote, though effected in Ireland (Church of Ireland nominally united with English, 1800, disestablished, 1869) and Wales (1920).

2) Organization and Status. The Anglican Communion includes, besides the above, the Episcopal Church of Scotland (separate from Church of Scotland since 1689), Anglican Churches in U. S. A., Canada, West Indies, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, India, China, and Japan, and various missionary dioceses. Its organ is the informal Lambeth Conference of Bishops, meeting normally every ten years (since 1867). Except in England it is self-governing on the basis of a constitutional episcopate, with Synods of clergy and laity. The constitutional position in England is obscure; the "establishment" consists of legal and personal restrictions on the one hand (the most conspicuous being the obligation of chapters by a law of 1534 to elect the royal nominee), and rights to ancient endowments and a vague but probably useful national position on the other. The Convocations of Bishops and clergy of the two provinces have since 1532 required royal assent to canons; a legal decision of 1736 denied them the right to bind the laity. Since 1919 they have formed with a House of Laity the National Assembly, which may propose ecclesiastical measures for parliamentary confirmation; few have been rejected, but among them an important one, the Prayer Book Revision, 1927-8 (See Book of Common Prayer), after much controversy and discussion (and in fact by Nonconformist and Northern Irish votes). At present there are 43 dioceses in England, and c. 20,000 clergy; active membership is reflected by Easter communicants, usually about 2,800,000—adherents are probably several times as numerous, and in the rest of the Communion at least as many again.

3) Theology. From about 675-775 England was a center of ecclesiastical learning, its chief lights being Aldhelm of Sherborne, the Venerable Bede, historian and commentator, and Alcuin, through whom England contributed to Carolingian scholarship. King Alfred (870-901) did much to revive learning, especially by translations, after Danish invasions; vernacular homilies and other works were produced to the end of the Anglo-Saxon period   Lanfranc and Anselm of Canterbury were among the theologians brought to England by the Normans, the Universities of Oxford (c. 1167) and Cambridge (1209) were among the first north of the Alps.   Fourteenth century Nominalism at Oxford produced the anti-ecclesiastical views of William of Ockham and John Wycliffe (condemned 1382)   Wycliffe influenced John Hus to an extent yet undetermined, in England his ideas, repressed by Church and State, lived on in the Lollards and appear in the Erastian strain in Anglicanism and in the Congregational tendency of English Protestantism.   In the early 16th century learning revived with a group of Catholic humanists and reformers, of whom Dean Colet and Thomas More were the most conspicuous.

After the Reformation, Anglican theology, when it clarifies itself as neither Roman Catholic nor Calvinist, strives to continue the long tradition of English Catholic scholarship.   Archbishop Parker (1559-1575) published Anglo-Saxon homilies, while the "judicious Hooker" (died 1600) in his Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity defended the Elizabethan settlement.   His love of the Fathers and devotion to the Incarnation as the central dogma have remained typical of Anglican theological writing.   Even more than by theologians, however, the Anglican temper was formed by the Book of Common Prayer—Cranmer's great work of 1549, considerably revised in 1552, and gradually restored and amplified in later revisions   Its services combine Reformation loyalty to the Bible with Catholic love for the Church and its ancient ways of worship.   In the 17th century Hooker's work was continued by the Caroline Divines, while the Cambridge Platonists were the beginning of the Broad Church* school.   The Deist controversy of the 18th century produced a solid school of apologists; Bishop Butler's Analogy of Religion . . . to the Constitution and Course of Nature has been widely influential.   The Oxford Movement (1833-1845) led to a revival and extension of the Catholic tradition in Anglican thought, the Broad Church group became more articulate (Essays and Reviews, 1862), and Christian Socialism found an early champion in F. D. Maurice (1805-1872).   In 1889 Lux Mundi, edited by Charles Gore, later Bishop, was an Anglo-Catholic effort to come to terms with the principle of development; some ten years later Liberal influence found expression in the Modern Churchmen's Union. Among the tendencies of our day may be mentioned an increased interest in social theory and practice, in which the school of Maurice has broadened out to influence almost the whole Church, a renewed study of Moral Theology (Bishop Kirk), a Christian approach to the organic philosophy of science (A. E. Taylor, Archbishop Temple), and such diverse trends as neo-Thomist philosophy, pacifist ethics, and the liturgical movement*. The specific corruption of Anglicanism is a disposition to excessive contentment and calm.   But today its practical activities are numerous and its intellectual life vigorous.   There is much interest in the pressing problems of church unity and world organization   And in the person of William Temple it has for the first time since Anselm a primate who is the ablest philosopher of the Church of England as well as an energetic promoter of its practical mission.

G K A Bell, A Brief Sketch of the Church of England (1929) ; Y. Brilioth, The Anglican Revival, Studies in the Oxford Movement (1925) , S. C Carpenter, Church and People, 1789-1889 (1933) , F J Foakes-Jackson, Anglican Church Principles (1924) . The Lambeth Conference (1930) , More and Cross, Anglicanism (1935) , Stephens and Hunt, ed , A History of the English Church, 10 vols (1899-1910).

E.R.H.

Church of the Full Gospel, the, Inc.: A religious sect of four churches and 300 members, organized by R. H. Askew at Goldsboro, North Carolina, in 1935.   It is a conservative group teaching sanctification, the second coming of Christ, eternal punishment, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit.   Foot washing is practiced.   See holiness churches.

E.T.C

Church of Georgia: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

Church of God: A pentecostal sect with headquarters at Cleveland, Tenn.   It was first organized as "Christian Union" in 1886, reorganized as the "Holiness Church" in 1902, and took its present name in 1907.   It claims to be in accord with Methodist theology, but stresses "second blessing" holiness, speaking in unknown tongues, immersion, and feet washing.   It has 1,081 churches and 45,000 members.   See pentecostal sects.

E.T.C.

Church of God, Adventist: See Adventists.

Church of God (Anderson, Ind.): A holiness sect (distinguished from others having the same name by including the address of its headquarters) originating as a branch of the Winebrenner evangelistic movement.   It stresses sanctification but repudiates speaking in unknown tongues.   It has 1,032 churches and 57,000 members.   See holiness churches.

E.T.C.

Church of God (Apostolic): A holiness sect organized at Danville, Ky., in 1897 by Thos. J. Cox under the name of "Christian Faith Band Church."   The present name was assumed in 1919. Feet washing and immersion are practiced.   See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.

E.T.C.

Church of God (Oregon, Ill): See Adventist sects.

Church of God (Salem, West Virginia): A sabbatarian and adventist* sect which branched off from the main trunk of Millerite adventism (see Adventist Sects) in 1861 when the main body adopted the name "Seventh Day Adventist Denomination," and also because of disbelief in the inspiration of the adventist prophetess, Mrs E. G. White.   It is fundamentalist and stresses literal interpretation of the Bible.   Its officers are twelve apostles, seventy elders, and seven stewards.   It now claims that its real headquarters is Jerusalem. There are 39 churches and 1,150 members.

E.T.C.

Church of God and Saints of Christ: A Negro sect founded in 1896 by William S. Crowdy, a railway cook, in response to a vision. Its doctrines include a belief that the Negroes are descendants of the "lost tribes of Israel," hence circumcision, the Passover rites, and other Jewish customs must be observed along with Christian ceremonials. The sect has a communistic* colony at Belleville, Va.

E.T.C

Church of God as Organized By Christ: A small sect originating in a schism among the Mennonite* Brethren in Christ led by P J Kaufman in 1886. The cause of the schism was a general dissatisfaction with all other churches. It is an "anti-sect," marked by its oppositions rather than affirmations. It opposes "second work holyites" or sanctification, other sects, union meetings, tobacco, lodges, war, suits at law, Sunday schools, revivals, talking in unknown tongues, shouting, theatres, jewelry, fine clothing, creeds, and "a hireling ministry." It claims to be the "true church." It has 13 congregations (but only 3 buildings) and 360 members. See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.

E.T.C.

Church of God in Christ: A Negro sect founded by C. H. Mason, a Baptist preacher, in 1897. It is pentecostal in nature, emphasizing the "gift of tongues" and divine healing. It has 772 churches and 31,000 members in 36 states. See pentecostal sects.

E.T C.

Church of Ireland: See Ireland, Church of.

Church of Jesus Christ, the: See Latter Day Saints

Church of the Nazarene: The largest of the holiness denominations, the outgrowth of the National Holiness Movement following the War Between the States. It has 2,197 churches and 136,000 members. It is represented in all the States.

The Church of the Nazarene represents the merger of a large number of holiness sects and associations. Over the years it has had several names. In 1890 several New England churches organized the Central Evangelical Holiness Association, in 1895 other churches organized the Association of Pentecostal Churches of America in New York; in 1896 these united under the latter name. The First Church of the Nazarene was formed at Los Angeles in 1895, and in 1907 the Nazarenes united with the Pentecostal Association, taking the name of Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. Other holiness bodies joined from time to time: New Testament Church of Christ, Independent Holiness Church (united in 1904 and called the Holiness Church of Christ) and the Pentecostal Alliance (or Mission). In 1919 the word "Pentecostal" was dropped and the sect became The Church of the Nazarene. See holiness churches.

Chapman, A History of the Church of the Nazarene; Jernigan, Pioneer Days of the Holiness Movement in the Southwest, E. T. Clark, Small Sects in America (1937).

E.T.C.

Church of Revelation, the: A religious sect founded by Janet Stine Lewis at Long Beach, California, in 1930. The only distinctive principle is the practice of metaphysical and magnetic healing. Ministers are unsalaried There are three churches and about 350 members.

E.T.C.

Church of Scotland: See Scotland, Church of.

church school: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

Church Student movements: See student religious organizations.

Churches of Christ: a) Many of the older New England churches, antedating serious competition of other denominations with the Congregational standing order, are called Churches of Christ, e.g., "The United Church of Christ in New Haven." b) Local congregations of Disciples of Christ are often called Churches of Christ. c) The only group which has no other name, and the one to which it refers in government statistics, is the body of churches which separated from the Disciples of Christ*. They are strict constructionists in "restoring primitive Christianity," to the extent that they repudiate missionary societies and the use of the organ in public worship, both of which are deemed unscriptural. Some also disallow Sunday schools and the use of individual communion cups. Their extreme congregational independency does not admit any general organization, and their statistics are therefore uncertain, but they probably number about 500,000, with their greatest strength in the South, especially in Texas. Their separate existence was first recognized in the religious census of 1906.

W.E.G.

Churches of Christ in Christian Union. See Christian Union.

Churches of God, Holiness: A Negro holiness sect organized by K. H. Burrus at Atlanta, Ga., in 1916. It teaches divine healing and entire sanctification. There are 35 churches and 5,800 members. See pentecostal sects.

E.T.C.

Churches of God in Jesus Christ: See Adventists.

Churches of God in North America: A conservative sect which originated in the revivals of John Winebrenner, a preacher of the German Reformed Church*. He left that denomination (under charges growing out of his preaching of experience) about 1825 and organized a "Church of God," later called the "General Eldership of the Church of God." In 1896 the name became General Eldership of the Churches of God in North America. These churches oppose "sectarianism" and insist that "Bible things should be known by Bible names, and a Bible name should not be given to anything not mentioned in the Bible."

Immersion and feet washing are practiced. The sect operates Findlay College at Findlay, Ohio, and has a publishing house at Harrisburg, Pa. There are 352 churches and 30,000 members.

E.T.C.

Churches of the Living God: Two Negro sects growing out of a group organized by William Christian at Wrightsville, Ark., in 1889 under the name of "Church of the Living God, Christian Workers for Friendship." In 1925 E. J. Cain led off a group which took the name "Church of the Living God, the Pillar and Ground of Truth." Mrs. Ethel L. Christian is now "Chiefess" of the body operating under the original name. She lives at Memphis, Tenn., and claims doctrines given to her by direct revelation which are not communicated to "gentiles." Among these is the revelation that Jesus Christ and King David were Negroes. The "Christian Workers for Fellowship" branch has 96 churches and 4,500 members. "The Pillar and Ground of Truth" has 119 churches and 4,800 members. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

Churches of the New Jerusalem: See New Jerusalem, Church of the.

churches, social work of: See social gospel, social work of the churches ciborium: (From Gr. kiborion, cup) 1) A chalice-like covered vessel from which the consecrated eucharistic bread is communicated and in which it is reserved upon the altar. 2) A canopy supported on pillars and covering the altar.   P.V.N.

circumambulation: Ceremonial walking around an object or person. It is usually done three times, keeping the right side toward the object encircled. The practice is almost universal Whatever may have been the origin of the custom, the many peoples have used it for many purposes—to show respect, to give protection, to consecrate a building site, to secure good fortune, to identify oneself with or acquire the sanctity of a sacred object or holy person. Walking in the reverse direction shows disrespect and has evil effects. See death and burial practices; magic circle.   A.E H.

circumcision: Circumcision, or amputation of the male prepuce, is one of the oldest as well as one of the most wide-spread customs. It is or was practised (although with many variations as to the method of circumcision, age at the time of circumcision, who may perform the rite, etc.), among the Jews, Mohammedans, Egyptians, Polynesians, the Indian tribes of the New World and many of the primitive tribes of Africa and Australia. In fact it is estimated that 1/7 of the male population of the world is circumcised.

Many theories are advanced to explain the origin and purpose of this custom; such as a) for hygienic reasons, b) as a mark of tribal affiliation, c) as a preparation for sexual life, d) as an initiatory test of courage before acceptance into the tribe, e) as a means of sanctifying the generative faculties, f) as a sacrifice redeeming the male from the god who gave him life.

For the Jews circumcision is one of the most important of the 613 commandments. It was interpreted as a sign of the covenant between God and Israel and, therefore, indispensable as a mark of affiliation with the latter. (cf. Gen. 17 10-14, Ex. 12.44-49).

In the Talmud*, many prescriptions are laid down regulating the act of circumcision. It may be performed even on the Sabbath, if that is the eighth day after birth. It consists of a) milah, the amputation of the prepuce, b) periah, the baring of the glans, and c) metsitzah, staunching the flow of blood. Appropriate benedictions are recited before and after the circumcision and the child is given a name at this time. The circumcision ceremony is usually followed by a festive meal, at which a special Grace is recited in which reference is made to this event. See feasting; Jewish Christianity, Mohammedanism.

E.B.—L.F.

Circumcision, Feast of the: January 1. Circumcision was a sign of the covenant between God and the Jewish nation. The feast commemorates Christ's reverence for the Law in undergoing this rite eight days after His birth. The feast was also observed as an occasion of reparation for the immoral pagan excesses connected with the worship of Janus on this day. See New Year's celebrations.

Cf. Addis and Arnold, A Catholic Dictionary, p. 185.   s.c.

Cistercian Order, the: A rigid revival of the Benedictine* rule, substituting manual labour for learning. It was founded by Robert de Thierry, Abbot of Citeaux (Lat. Cistercium) whence the order derived its name. Its main point lay in the insistence on simplicity in its churches, houses and dress. Their habit was a white gown and hood over a black cassock. A black cloak was worn outside the precincts of the monastery. Their best known members were Stephen Harding, the third Abbot and St. Bernard*. The order spread rapidly as far as Russia in the East, Jerusalem, to England where the shrines of Fountaines and Rivaulx Abbeys testify to the wealth the Order acquired. In Henry VIII's* reign, 75 houses and 26 nunneries of the Order were suppressed in England alone. Cf. Caesarius of Heisterbach.

F.W.B.

city missions: The agencies and work by which the church ministers to the spiritual and material needs of the poor and under-privileged in the cities of Christian lands. It includes housing, clothing, feeding, reforming, teaching, providing occupation and recreation, preaching, counseling and social case work.   P.E.J.

Civa: See Shiva.

civil law: See law.

clairvoyance: See occultism; parapsychology; psychical research, societies for.

Clark Foundation, the: The Clark Foundation, in the amount of $10,000, established by the late Mr. Arthur O. Clark at Pomona College, Claremont, California, makes it possible for the college to offer each year a lecture or course of lectures in the general field of religion.   A.C.M.

Clarke, James Freeman: (1810-1888) Unitarian minister Born, Hanover, N. H., d. Boston, Mass.; Harvard College, 1829, Divinity School, 1833. Minister, Louisville, Ky, 1833-40, Church of the Disciples, Boston, 1841-88, Professor at Harvard Divinity School, 1867-71. Established his Boston church as perfectly free in faith and customs, less bound by traditions than the older ones, and made it a vital force in all religious, moral, social and political reforms. Apart from his work as pastor, he was long a leading spirit in the organized work of his denomination, active in public education, social betterment, anti-slavery, civil-service reform, equal suffrage, temperance. Irenic and of wide religious sympathies he published Orthodoxy its Truths and Errors (1866), Ten Great Religions (1871), Common-sense in Religion (1874), Vexed Questions in Theology (1885), etc.

See Autobiography (1891), ed. E. E. Hale.
                                                                 E.M.W.

Clarke, William Newton: (1841-1912) Baptist minister and theologian, graduated, Madison (now Colgate) University, 1861, Colgate Theological Seminary, 1863, held important pastorates in Newton, Mass., Montreal, and in Hamilton, N. Y., taught N.T. Interpretation in Toronto Baptist College, became professor of Christian Theology, Ethics and Apologetics, Colgate University in 1890. Here he taught with marked ability until his death.

Author: An Outline of Christian Theology (1898); The Christian Doctrine of God (1909); Can I Believe in God the Father (1899), Sixty Years with the Bible (1909), The Ethics of Jesus (1911). A biography was published in 1916 Dr Clarke's An Outline of Christian Theology, notable for its clarity, experiential quality and irenic spirit, at once met with approval and became one of the most acceptable and constructive texts in Systematic Theology
                                                                 J.W.B.

Class, Gustav: (1836-1908) He taught philosophy at Erlangen. Not unlike R. Eucken*, he was influenced by Fichte and Steffensen. He had the courage of continuing a metaphysic of the spirit, in which he assigned to religion a universal significance.

Untersuchungen zur Phänomenologie und Ontologie des menschlichen Geistes (Leipzig, 1896); Die Realität der Gottesidee (Munchen, 1904).   H.H.

class struggle: See socialism.

classics of Confucianism: See Confucianism.

classification of religions: The divisions, classes, and subclasses, etc., into which the religions of history differentiate, a grouping of the historical religions into kinds, requisite to the scientific study of religion.

Classifications have heretofore uniformly failed in that they have impaired the wholeness or integrity of religious cults and systems of the past Such classifications used criteria which emphasized the qualitative, at the expense of the quantitative, aspect of a religion. They failed to show with clearness what it was in religious history that definitely marked off a "religion" as a historical whole, and what it was that determined the historical unity and the individuality of a single religion within the entire field. They failed to make a thorough use of the basic religious concepts found imbedded in, and giving character to, the actual historical religions

Examples of types of classifiers will illustrate. A) Hegel* tried to classify historical phenomena in religion with a concept not found in the historical religions themselves. Quite significantly, he did pay his respects to genuine basic concepts of the religious factor in historical religions of Hebrews and Greeks[1], concepts actually possessing control over religious patterns, however he failed to use them in their historical character, and restricted their use to the service of his speculative concept of the Absolute. This so altered the historical meaning they actually carried in their service as concepts, that all attempts of Hegelians to perfect Hegel's classification, without having to alter his criterion, were bound to fail. B) Maurice Vernes, typical of another large group of classifiers, failed in that he made use of culture, a non-religious concept, for a criterion[2] Concepts such as race, culture, language, geography, etc., are ineffectual as criteria for grouping religions of history for scientific study of religion. C) Goblet D'Alviella[3] is an example of a large group of classifiers which used entity concepts. He sought to arrange religions in a series according to groups of religious entities, from nature worship and worship of the dead to monotheism.

The problem of classification approached a solution satisfactory for scientific study when, for a criterion, consistent use was made of the concept of the religious factor, which is found imbedded in each and every religion of history. Once the evolution of the meaning in the concepts of the religious factor in the historical materials, was uncovered, there was found a skeletal frame or pattern of the religions in the entire field of history. Materials of a new classification were revealed, they were the characteristics of the religions themselves, were genetic in nature, and had their limitations both in place and time. Historical religions were observable as wholes, and required definitions that depended upon the range of the basic concept involved. And that basic concept was the concept of the religious factor.

Briefly, the classification indicated the following: The entire field of religions is seen to break into two great divisions: two-factor religion, and *one-factor religion. The one-factor religion is differentiated into five subdivisions which for convenience and identification are: ruah religion, nous religion, mainyu religion, brahman religion, and ch'i religion; each of these five are further differentiated into religious systems which serve about 90% of the peoples of the world today: conceptually, from the standpoint of structure and function, they all have class relationships. In the two-factor religion, there are differentiations which break as wholes, and are conveniently identified by the manner of life of the human societies represented whether hunter religion, herder religion, religion of hoe-culture peoples, or religion of field-culture or urban culture peoples. Each such class has its member representatives, which are religions of single societies . . . If, therefore differentiation of historical religion is followed beyond the divisions, representing the religious factor on a man-nature basis, it reaches next to the classes representing the religious factor on a region-culture basis; beyond that it reaches to the subclasses, representing the religious factor on an integrating functioning religious society basis . . . If followed to its end the differentiation reaches the individual religious member of human society.[4]

[1] G. W. F. Hegel, Philosophy of History, tr. by J. Sibree (1901), pp. 53-60.
[2] Maurice Vernes, L'Histoire des Religions (Paris, 1887), pp. 67-94.
[3] Goblet D'Alviella, The Origin and Growth of the Conception of God (London, 1897), sec. ed., pp. xii-xv.
[4] For fuller consideration of the whole question of classification, see Fred L. Parrish, The Classification of Religions (1941).   F.L.P.

classis: In some Reformed polities, e.g., that of the Reformed Church in America*, a judicatory corresponding to the presbytery*, i.e., a body of the ministers of a region and elders representing the churches, having authority over churches and ministers under the superior judicatories.   R.H.N.

Claudius of Turin: (d. ca. 827) Bishop. A Spaniard (tainted by the Adoptionism of Felix of Urgel?*), he was favored by the Carolingian court because of Biblical scholarship, having compiled several commentaries (Genesis through Kings, Matthew, Pauline epistles). Opposing cult of pictures, crosses, saints, he engaged in controversy with Jonas of Orléans and the Irish Dungal.
                                                            A.C.

Claver, St. Peter: (1580-1654) Spanish Jesuit, for thirty-five years the volunteer servant and spiritual father of the African negroes who were brought to Cartagena, Colombia, to be sold as slaves.   E.A.R.

Cleanthes: (ca. 304-233 B.C.) A leader of the Athenian school of Stoics* following Zeno of Citium*. Author of a "Hymn to Zeus" (tr. in Bakewell, Source Book of Ancient Philosophy).
                                                            J.E.N.

clearstory: See nave.

Clement of Alexandria: (A.D. c. 150 - c. 213) Christian Platonist, Logos theologian par excellence, teacher of Origen*, by general consent one of the most attractive figures in Christian history. Clement like his great pupil sets out from the Creed and appeals steadfastly to Scripture. He is important as a witness to the virtual completion of the N.T. Canon. The center, however, of Clement's Christianity is neither the Father in Heaven nor the Son made man to be the Redeemer of the world. It is the ever-active Logos, the guide, guardian, champion, and educator of humanity. This Logos is related to the One or highest God as mind to its unknown foundation, through it the Absolute enters into relations, the many are derived from the one. Bigg credits Clement with being the real founder of Neo-Platonism* (Christian Platonists, p. 64). See Pantaenus.

The principal works of Clement are the Protrepticus or "Exhortation", which has been called an evangelistic tract, the Paedagogus, which is concerned with the training of the Christian convert, and the Stromateis or "Carpet-bags", which is the most theological of the trilogy and expounds a Christian gnosis. Notable also is the one homily of Clement extant, Quis Dives Salvetur.

J. P. Migne, ed Patrologia Graeca (cf. the critical ed. of Stahlin in the Griechischen Christlichen Schriftsteller series); Ante-Nicene Fathers, II; C. Bigg, Chr. Platonists of Alex (1886); E. de Faye, Clément d'Alexandrie (1898); R. B. Tollinton, Clement of Alexandria (2 vols. 1914), standard histories of doctrine.   C.W.L.

Clement, St., Pope of Rome (ca. 92-101) and Clementine Epistles: Pope St. Clement was after Linus and Cletus (Anacletus) the third successor of St. Peter as Bishop of Rome. Since Origen's* time he has been identified with the Clement mentioned by St. Paul in Phil. 4, 3. Whether he was a Jewish- (Lightfoot, Nestle) or heathen-(Funk) convert to Christianity is disputed. According to Tertullian (De Praesc. 32) he was consecrated a bishop by St. Peter himself. Despite the silence of Ireneus, Eusebius and Jerome, he was honored as a martyr and a crypt was erected to his memory during the reign of Constantine*. Whether he is to be identified with or is distinct from the martyred Consul (A.D. 95) T. Flavius Clemens, is still a subject of controversy. The Martyrium Clementis (IV century cf. Migne, PG II 617) is certainly legendary and based on unhistorical documents. According to a well-founded tradition, the Apostle of the Slavs, St. Cyril, found the relics of the saint in the Crimea during the IX century and brought them to Rome, depositing them in the present Basilica of St. Clement (now in charge of the Irish Dominicans) where they are still honored. Feast Day in the Roman Liturgy· Nov. 23; in the Greek and Syrian: Nov. 24; in the Russian Church, Nov. 24. St. Clement is looked upon as the first of the "Apostolic Fathers"* and is usually depicted with an anchor, because allegedly drowned for the Faith.

Clementine Writings.

Of the many writings ascribed to St. Clement only his first Epistle to the Corinthians is considered authentic. According to Ireneus*, who styles it "most important" and Eusebius* who calls it "magnificent", this letter of Clement was read publicly in the assemblies of the early Christians and given the same prominence as the Sacred Scriptures themselves. The purpose of the Epistle was to quell disturbances and misunderstandings between the clerics and laics at Corinth. (cf. I Cor. 1, 10-16). The first part of the Epistle

(Ch. 1-36) has preserved to posterity precious descriptions of Ancient Christian life, practices and doctrines, the second part (Ch. 27-61) enters specifically into the causes of the controversies at Corinth and exhorts the faithful to penance and submission to the presbyters. Important for the historian is the reference to the martyrdom of St. Peter at Rome, his primacy (cf. "Pope" and "Peter, St., First Bishop of Rome") also over the Church at Corinth; and the journey of St. Paul to Spain.

The "Second Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians", a homily of general content, although delivered at Rome or Corinth as early as ca. 150, is not authentic but rather the composition of another. Hilgenfeld and Harnack would adscribe it to Pope Soter. Other unauthentic writings are: Two Epistles "Ad Virgines" (i.e., to the unmarried), perhaps of the III century; the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies; the Apostolic Constitutions and the so-called Clementine Liturgy, contained therein is a Jacobite (Syrian Monophysite) Liturgy; the Clementine Canons and five letters placed at the beginning of the Pseudo-Isidoran Decretals*. See canons of various churches.

For the Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians cf. Migne, PG (Paris, 1857-66), Vol. II; P. Young (Junius, Giunio) (Oxford, 1633); 2nd ed, ib. (1637), "editio princeps"; J. B. Cotelier, Patres Aevi Apostolici (Paris, 1672); Engl tr. in Roberts-Donaldson, Ante-Nicene Fathers (1911-19); cf Otto Bardenhewer, Geschichte der Altchristlichen Literature I, 116-31 (Freiburg, 1913-24)²; Id. Patrologie (Freiburg, 1894); Adolf von Harnack, Geschichte der Altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, Vol I (Leipzig, 1893-1904); Gustav Kruger, History of Early Christian Literature in the First Three Centuries (1897); J. B. Lightfoot, Clement of Rome 2 vols. (London, 1890)—highly praised; Id. The Apostolic Fathers (London, 1890), Vol. II, Part 1, 271-316; Joseph Tixeront, Handbook of Patrology 2 (1923); Gebhard Harnack, Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur (Leipzig, (1883-1913); Cath. Encyc. IV, 12-17.   R.M.H.

Clement, XI, Pope: See Camisards; Unigenitus.

Clement XIV, Pope: (1769-74) Giovanni

Lorenzo (his name as a Franciscan-Conventual) Ganganelli was born October 31, 1705 at Sant' Arcangelo, near Rimini, the son of a physician. In 1723 he entered the Order Friars Minor* Conventual; became in 1746 Consultor of the Holy Office, and in 1759 cardinal. A learned theologian, he was mild and lovable, holy and free from Nepotism. It is untrue that he promised the Bourbon princes—unduly active through their ambassadors at the Holy See in the stormy conclave that preceded his election—that if elected pope he would suppress the Jesuits*; at most he recognized the possibility of such a papal action. Following the example of Benedict XIV* he was lenient and perhaps too conciliatory towards the secular courts of the "ultra-enlightened" age of the late XVIII century, with which, as expressed in his first Encyclical, he wished to be at peace so as the more easily to combat irreligion. He dispensed with the annual reading of the "Holy Thursday Bull" (In Coena Domini) regarding papal censures for certain violations by secular princes. His relations with England were friendly. He officially received with royal honors the King's brother at the Vatican in 1772, while refusing the same honors to the pretender. His friendly gesture prepared the way eventually for Catholic Emancipation in England. His nuncio (cf. "Papal Legates") was favorably received at the English Court. In the East, the Nestorian Patriarch Mar Simeon and six of his Suffragens, were received into union with Rome. His conciliatory spirit enabled him to renew diplomatic relations with Portugal, broken off since 1760, and to bridge over difficulties with Parma. But no concessions would satisfy the Bourbons in their demands for the suppression of the Jesuits. If Clement finally did yield it must be remembered. 1) that the trouble did not begin under his pontificate, it was inherited as an unwelcome child from his predecessors, especially Benedict XIV and Clement XIII. (cf. Cath. Encyc. IV, 32-34 and II, 434-5); 2) that the Jesuits had already been civilly expelled from Spain, France, Sicily, Parma and Portugal before Clement XIV became pope, 3) that Clement resisted to the bitter end and only gradually put his decision into effect by suppressing their colleges in the Papal States and prohibiting the reception of novices; 4) that the Brief "Dominus et Redemptor" of July 21, 1773 was merely a disciplinary measure, as used repeatedly by other popes in similar circumstances; and 5) that the Brief waives entirely the truthfulness or untruthfulness of the accusations of the Bourbons against the Jesuits and merely intends to meet a temporary emergency—to "save the body as it were through the amputation of an otherwise important limb". Clement XIV personally had the highest regard for the Jesuits, by whom as a youth at Rimini he had been educated. He suppressed the Jesuits not because they were Jesuits, but in spite of it. The return of Avignon and Benevento by France and the Kingdom of Naples was hardly a consolation for the sorely tried pope. The good work done by the Jesuits suffered as a result of the suppression primarily in the American colonies that had been under Bourbon crowns. During his short pontificate Clement sought to better the deplorable financial conditions of the Papal States*, to encourage commerce and industry; and to subsidize arts and sciences. He began the valuable Pio-Clementine Museum of the Vatican. It is untrue that he was poisoned by a Jesuit or that his mind was affected before death.

The Bulls and Discourses of Clement XIV were published in Italian at Florence in 1845; his (Latin) letters and briefs by A Theiner. 2 vols at Paris, 1852. His best sympathetic and apologetical life is by the same A. Theiner, Geschichte des Pontifikates Clem. XIV, 2 vols. (Paris, 1853). Other biographies and studies by: F. X Ravignan (Paris, 1854); J. Crétineu-Joly, Clem. XIV et les jésuits 3 (Paris, 1848). Pastor's story of Clement XIV was left unfinished, due to death, and was published posthumously, with additional chapters by others. It forms volume XVI, parts 2 and 3 of the original German edition. It is rather "un-Pastorian" in its harsh criticism of a pope and provoked unfavorable comment. The Italian translation by P. Cenci appeared at Rome (Desclée, 1933), Vol. XVI, part 2. The English trans. has not as yet appeared. Cath. Encyc. IV, 34-38.   R.M.H.

clergy: (Gr., kleros, a lot—Acts 1 17—, hence late Lat. -clericus) The origin of the ministry of the Church is shrouded in historical confusion out of which has emerged the opportunity to create systems of traditions of artificial clarity in order to justify some or other form of authority. In the NT there is little or nothing to distinguish definitely any cadre of offices from a series of functions necessary for the maintenance and expansion of the Church, the Apostles alone excepted. There is nothing to indicate that the seventy had any permanent basis or that the "seven deacons*" were anything more than lay officers appointed to administer to the relief of the poor and to relieve the apostles of secular duties. The presbyteros are the senior members of the church, whether in age or standing is not clear even from I Ep. Clem.; the oversight of the Church is also initially rather a function than an "office", and is (as late as the Canons of Hippolytus) apparently confined to an individual church, as the equivalent of pastor (poimēn). After the Gnostic and Montanist crisis, however, another factor comes into prominence· the concept of orthodoxy resting in the tradition handed down from bishop to bishop and ultimately derived in direct succession from the Apostles. The appeal to episcopal or apostolic succession* is used in this sense by Irenaeus* in reply to the Gnostic successions. The transformation of the episcopate* to its later form of the monarchical episcopate with its seat (see) in a city is difficult to account for historically. As early as Ignatius*, the bishop* is the symbol of the presence of Christ at the eucharist, but this is not incompatible with either the presbyteros or poimēn in his duty of supervision over the individual church. It is suggested that the cause lies elsewhere. In pre-Christian times the word episcopos is applied to a variety of duties: the inspector (episcopos) of cavalry, and the supervisor (episcopos) of a deme or racial unit within a city or its territorium. Where there were several presbyteroi, one was the president of their collegium, and he appears to have performed the function of episcopate. The combination of these two functions, together with membership of the city council which advised or was responsible to the governor, would account for the elements of permanent tenure and civil power which becomes one of the characteristic features of the episcopate, even before 313. The ecclesiastical factor is found in the Cyprianic* conception of the ecclesia as limited to the clergy, the laity being in a subject status, and the crystallization of the doctrine of Apostolic Succession as a principle of continuing authority and Divine Right. (In Persia, there is a parallel development after 499, and there the Catholikos has the status of an ecclesiastical wazir or minister of state.)See Nestorianism. The process is completed by the increase of civil privilege and duties under Constantine I and Theodosius I and, in the West by the Valentinian Decree of 445, by which "the primacy of the Apostolic See is assured by the merit of St. Peter, prince of the episcopate, by the rank of the City of Rome and also by the authority of the Sacred Synod." In Pseudo-Isidore's Decretals (c. 850 A.D.), the Cyprianic concept is defined in terms of the Holy Roman Empire that "the humblest priest is superior to the mightiest emperor" and the Pope is the supreme judge of Christendom.

The system that emerged conformed to the Roman Imperial system. The usual term for a bishop was Papa (pope*); this was more commonly used of a Patriarch (bishop of an Apostolic See), before its use was confined to the Bishop of Rome. In Rome, the chief clergy of the City came to be called Cardinales—of three ranks. bishops, priests, and deacons. A Papal Domestic chaplain now receives the title monsignor. Outside Rome, an Archbishop receives the jurisdiction of a province; the bishop, of a diocese, the presbyter or priest (sacerdos) of a parish or other charge. The bishop's secular officer is the Archdeacon, originally the chief of the deacons. In addition there were the ranks of lector (reader), sub-deacon and other lay offices. In the Greek Orthodox Church and its kindred, the names are generally the same in Greek form, though the Archimandrite (Abbot or chief of abbots) plays a more markedly ecclesiastical rôle than his Western counterpart. In Persia, the title Pope is supplanted by Catholicos or Mar Catholicos.

Since the Reformation, the Western systems have generally assumed a simpler form. The Churches of England and Sweden have retained the ranks of Archbishop, Bishop, Priest and Deacon (the threefold ministry). The Scottish (Presbyterian) and Reformed (Calvinist) have retained the word Presbyter for the full minister or pastor, the Lutheran Churches, Congregational, Baptist and their derivatives, pastor; the English Methodists: superintendents, minister; in the U.S.A., bishops are added over the superintendents. The main effect of the Reformation was to revive lay selection and the authority of the congregation and so to avoid the creation of hierarchies. See benefit of clergy; priest; regular clergy; secular clergy.

The most complete survey of the question is in A. C. Headlam and others, (ed. R Duckerley), The Ministry and the Sacraments (1937); T. M Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry (n.d.); B. H. Streeter, The Primitive Church (London, 1927); for legal status and liabilities, J. M. Dale, Clergyman's Legal Handbook (London, 1898), ed. by J. S. Risley.   F.W.B.

Clericis Laicos: The Bull of Pope Boniface VIII* (1296) occasioned by the protests of French and English clergy against the taxes levied upon them by their respective monarchs then planning military campaigns. Boniface countered such extraordinary taxation with the threat of excommunication.   R.C.P. clerks, regular: Religious institutes of men, e.g., the Jesuits, if combining the works of secular priests and the solemn vows of monks.   L.R.W.

clinical psychology: That branch of psychology which is concerned with the diagnosis and treatment of persons who require assistance with their social and psychological problems. From abnormal psychology* it is differentiated chiefly by its practical orientation.

This field is relatively undeveloped. At present the clinical psychologist's function is chiefly that of diagnosis and he places his reliance upon various standardized tests. On the basis of averages obtained from the study of a large number of persons he seeks to rate the individual. Actual therapy is left to the physician, the social worker and the teacher.

The intelligence tests, which figure so prominently in the repertoire of the clinical psychologist, found their first important use in the identification and grading of feeble-minded children. Their use has been extended to identify superior children and to distinguish special aptitudes and personality traits. They are thus used in child guidance, in vocational guidance, in industrial psychology and in personnel work in colleges and elsewhere. Among the names most closely associated with their development that of A. Binet (1857-1911) deserves special mention. See psychologists, English school of.

L. M. Terman, The Measurement of Intelligence (1916); F. L. Wells, Mental Tests in Clinical Practice (1927); C M. Louttit, Clinical Psychology (1936).   A.T.B.

cloister: (Lat., claustra, bar, bolt, bounds) a) An open court surrounded by an arcaded walk found in connection with monastic establishments and sometimes with cathedrals*. Intended mainly for a retired walk for monks and clergy. b) A monastery.   F.T.P.

closed communion: A term employed by religious bodies to describe the practice of admitting to the Holy Communion only those who are regularly enrolled members, and in good standing, in their respective denominations. The Roman Church, on the one hand, and the Baptists traditionally, on the other, represent the two extremes which hold to this practice. See altar fellowship.   W.N.P.

Clotho, Lachesis, Atropas: See fate.

Clovis: (c. 466-511) Real founder of Frankish kingdom. Adopted Christianity in orthodox form for himself and his people. Extended kingdom at expense of heretical (Arian) neighbours. Laid foundation of strong new state important in making of Europe. In it the Teutonic and Roman civilizations became blended.   X.H.C.

Cluniacs: Members of the Order of Congregation of Cluny. Founded in 910, the Congregation, in the person of the Abbot Berno and his immediate successors, sought a reformation of monastic life through a more disciplined reapplication of the Benedictine* rule. The early emphasis upon personal poverty, labor, and rigid discipline declined apace as the mother foundation arrogated to itself the feudal control of numerous subject houses. Mother and daughter establishments at their peak of worldliness evinced striking examples of architectural brilliance, literary studies, and cultic magnificence, Drawn increasingly into the stream of papal politics, the wealthy order rapidly lost its pristine, reforming character and gave rise to the sad spectacle of privilege and decay.

See L. M. Smith, The Early History of the Monastery of Cluny (Oxford, 1920).   R.C.P.

Cluny: A Benedictine monastery founded at Cluny in France early in the tenth century, and famous as the home or school of many distinguished mediaeval men, e.g, Gregory VII*, also called Hildebrand.   L.R.W.

Cocceius, Johannes: (1603-1669) Eminent theologian. Professor in Franeker and Leyden (Holland). A Bible-centered theology. Most complete exposition of the Federal Theology* with its stress on Covenant of Grace. Was a modification of rigid Calvinism. Conflict of his followers with Voetian party.   X.H.C.

codex: A leaf book, as distinguished from a roll or scroll. The codex was a Roman invention, suggested by the cluster of two or three hinged tablets surfaced with wax on which Romans jotted down their memoranda. Early in the second century Christian publishers began to employ papyrus codices in their work, perhaps as being more convenient to use and more capacious than rolls, as in the codex both sides of the material was written on. See manuscripts of the Bible.   E.J.G.

Codex Alexandrinus: Fifth century manuscript of the Greek Bible, almost complete, the N.T. in what Hort called a fundamentally "Syrian" text in the gospels, though not elsewhere. It was given to the King of England in 1628 by Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople, who had probably brought it from Alexandria. It is now in the British Museum. See canons of various churches, manuscripts of the Bible.   E.J.G.

Codex Amiatinus: See Amiatinus, Codex.

Codex Bezae: A sixth (or even fifth) century manuscript* of the four gospels (Matthew-John-Luke-Mark) and the Acts, in Greek and Latin, the Greek on the left hand page, the Latin (in the Old Latin version) on the right. It was given to Théodore de Beze (or Beza) the great Greek scholar of the French Reformation, after the sack of Lyons in 1562, and in 1581 was given by him to the University of Cambridge, which still has it. It has many interpolations and curious readings, and is the leading document of what is called the "Western" text.   E.J.G.

Codex Curetonian Syriac: See versions of the Bible, ancient.

Codex Ephraemi: A fifth century manuscript* of the Greek Bible, from which the writing was effaced in the twelfth, to make room for some works of Ephrem the Syrian, in a Greek version. While only 64 leaves of the O.T. remain, from the poetical and Wisdom books, more than half of the N.T. (145 leaves out of 238) survives. It was brought to France by Catherine de Medici in the sixteenth century and is in the Bibliothéque Nationale, in Paris. Its text though very uneven is often excellent. The decipherment of this palimpsest was the first notable work of Tischendorf who published its text in 1843-45 It ought now to be studied with the aid of ultra-violet or infrared light, so effective in work on palimpsests.

E.J.G.

Codex Juris Canonici: See Canon Law, decretals.

Codex Sinaiticus: A fourth century manuscript* of the Greek Bible, found by Tischendorf in the convent of St. Catherine on Mt. Sinai, in part, in 1849, but the bulk of it in 1859, when he secured it for the Czar of Russia. It preserves about one-third of the O.T. but the N.T. is complete, and is accompanied by the Epistle of Barnabas and about one-fourth of the Shepherd of Hermas. It was purchased in 1933 for the British Museum, where it now is. In text it is second only to the Codex Vaticanus*, with which it often agrees. See canons of various churches.

E.J.G.

Codex Vaticanus: A fourth century Greek manuscript* of the Old and New Testaments, which has been in the Vatican Library at least since 1481. It has lost some portions it now begins at Gen. 46 28, lacks part of the Psalms, and breaks off at Hebrews 9.14. But its text is in general so good that it is recognized as our most valuable manuscript of the N.T. and indeed of the Greek Bible. See canons of various churches. E.J.G.

Coetus: See Reformed Church in the U. S.

Cohen, Hermann: (1842-1918) The idea of God occupies the central position in his philosophy of critical idealism. The idea contains the connotation of a basic harmony between the structure of the universe and the aspiration of mankind. Cohen's introduction of the idea of God into his philosophy is an attempt to satisfy the longing of men to believe that the ethical ideal is real in a more solid sense than that of an aesthetic ideal.

God as an idea is neither alive nor a person. He can be discovered by the processes of reason itself. Religion, properly so-called, arises with the emergence of the ethical consciousness. The "function" of God is not to provide prosperity, or even happiness, but to aid the efforts of men to discriminate between right and wrong. The idea of God assures the continued existence of nature for the ethical work of man.

Religion is wholly the result of the fiat of man. It is a stratagem of the spirit, a psychological instrument employed by man for the sake of improving his character. Man does the work of redemption. God is the sign, or the name signifying the attainment of a victory over sin. Religion alone is capable of producing the ideal of individuality. The conception of sin is in principle applicable to an individual only, not to a social group. The cultivation of intellectual faculties is a religious duty. The religious philosophy of Cohen has idealistic, positivistic and humanistic elements derived from his intuition concerning the objective validity of ethical experience. See Neo-Kantianism.

Religion und Sittlichkeit (Berlin, 1907), Der Begriff der Religion im System der Philosophie (Giessen, 1915), Die Religion der Vernunft (Leipzig, 1919), J. Hessen, Die Religionsphilosophie des Neukantianismus (Freiburg, 1924). H.H.

Cole Lectureship: A lectureship at Vanderbilt University founded by Colonel E. W. Cole of Nashville, Tennessee. His object was "to establish a foundation for a perpetual lectureship in connection with the School of Religion of the University to be restricted in scope to a defence and advocacy of the Christian religion." The lectures are delivered annually in the spring. The original donation was $5,000, but this has been increased to $12,000 by a subsequent donation by Mrs. Cole, by the sale of published volumes, and in other ways. Among the lecturers have been. F. J. McConnell, Robert E. Speer, Charles E. Jefferson, L. H. Hough, H. E. Fosdick, S. P. Cadman, H. S. Coffin, Shailer Mathews, Rufus M. Jones, G. A. Buttrick, E. S. Brightman, and F. C. Grant. J.P.H.

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor: (1772-1834) English poet, critic, and philosopher Following a studious career at Christ's Hospital and Cambridge, an association with Wordsworth* resulting in the Lyrical Ballads (1798), and a visit to Germany whence he drew much of his subsequent inspiration, Coleridge drifted into a period of narcotic ineffectiveness from which he emerged during his last years to do some brilliant but fragmentary writing and to exert a strong contemporary influence through his lectures and conversations. Of his critical and philosophical works the most important are Biographia Literaria (1817) and Aids to Reflection (1825); Table Talk (1835); Confessions of an Enquiring Spirit (1840), and other collections appeared posthumously. Perhaps the greatest of his contributions to English thought was the currency which he gave to German idealism. See Marsh, James; New theology.

There is no complete edition of Coleridge's prose. The Complete Poetical Works have been critically edited by E. H. Coleridge (1912) and the Biographia Literaria by J. Shawcross (1907). An excellent selection from the whole range of his writings is to be found in Stephen Potter's Coleridge: Select Poetry and Prose (1933). Of recent biographies the best is by E K. Chambers (1938), although that by J. D. Campbell (1894) has long been regarded as standard. See also J. H. Muirhead's Coleridge as Philosopher (1930). L.W.C.

Colet, John: (1467-1519) English Reformer, studied in Italy. Emancipated by the Renaissance he returned to England, appointed Dean of St. Paul's he rejected the allegorical method, winning appreciation by his fresh historical interpretation of scripture. R.E.E.H.

collation: See advowson.

collect: A short, terse prayer of the Western rites, so called as either a) "collecting" or summing up the devotions of the people, or b) the prayer ad collectam, when the people were assembled to go in procession to the church appointed for the public (stational) Mass of the day. In the Roman Missal* the collect preceding the Epistle is called Oratio.   P V.N.

college apostolic: (Lat., collegium, a group or body) The apostles as one body with St. Peter* at their head   L.R.W.

College of Cardinals: The body of ecclesiastics nearest to the Roman Pontiff in dignity. Since the time of Sixtus V* (1586) the College of Cardinals numbers seventy members, of whom six are to be Cardinal Bishops, fifty Cardinal Priests, and fourteen Cardinal Deacons. However, the places are practically never all occupied. The cardinals*, while in no sense members of a parliament, constitute a sort of advisory council, with the duty of assisting the Holy Father in the government of the Church. They have the sole right of administering ecclesiastical affairs during a vacancy of the Holy See, and of electing the new Pope.*   C.V.

college, pontifical: See pontifical college.

colloquy: In the original constitution of the French Reformed Church the colloquy corresponded to the presbytery* and the classis*. In a reorganization in 1852 "consistories"* replaced the colloques.   R.H.N.

Colored Cumberland Presbyterian Church: See Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, the: See negro church, the.

Colossians, Epistle to: An epistle written by Paul to a church a hundred miles inland from Ephesus, which he had never himself visited. Through his disciple Epaphroditus, who had founded it, he had learned of a heresy which was now threatening its existence, and wrote from Rome (or according to a recent theory, from Ephesus) to refute the false teaching. The nature of the Colossian heresy is doubtful. It was evidently some primitive form of Gnosticism, but was peculiar in its inclusion of Jewish customs and beliefs. Its central motive appears to have been that while Christ reconciled us to God we have still to reckon with the material forces, presided over by angelic beings. Worship has therefore to be rendered to the angels, and since they rule in the material sphere this worship must be material, concerned with objects and rites and places and cabalistic signs. Paul answers the heretical teachers by insisting on the all-sufficiency of Christ, who gathers up in himself the power which controls all others. The epistle contains some of Paul's profoundest thinking, but is often difficult, owing largely to his ironical use of the heretical jargon, which is now unintelligible. The date of Colossians is 60 or 61 A.D.

J. B. Lightfoot, Commentary on Colossians (1876); E. F. Scott, The Literature of the New Testament (1932).   E.F.S.

Colportage: See religious tract movement.

Columbanus, Saint: (543-615) Abbot of Luxeuil and Bobbio, was born in West Leinster, Ireland, and in about 583 with twelve companions set out for Burgundy. Invited by king Gontram he erected a monastery at Annegray, and established others at Luxeuil and Fontaines. For these monasteries he wrote a rule, embodying the customs of the Celtic monasteries After twenty years in Burgundy he was attacked by the jealous Frankish bishops and the dissolute king Thierry II who banished him from Burgundy. After much wandering, he settled at Bobbio, between Milan and Genoa, where he founded his famous monastery and where his relics rest He wrote a rule which was approved but which was superseded by the rule of St Benedict. His feast is celebrated on November 21 See monasticism.

        J.B.C.

Colver Lectures, the Nathaniel: Established in 1915 by Mr. and Mrs. Jesse L. Rosenberger in honor of Nathaniel Colver, first theological professor in the old University of Chicago. Endowment $3,500. (Data from the office of the secretary of the University of Chicago.)   V.F.

Comenius, John Amos: (1592-1670) Born in southern Moravia, at Nivnice, he was educated in the school of the Unity of Brethren and later at Herborn in Nassau and the University of Heidelberg. Driven out of his parish early during the Thirty Years' War, he found refuge, along with many of his people, at Leszno, in Poland. It was here that in 1631 he published his Janua linguarum reserata which established his fame as an educational reformer. Later he was given the task of reforming the school system of Sweden, and subsequently of Hungary. In the course of this activity he worked out an educational system which entitles him to the title of "the father of modern educational theory and practice." The pedagogical works are published in his Opera didactica omnia (1657).

But his influence was much wider. In the ecclesiastical field, he became an important member of that small group of men who worked for the union of Christendom. His ecumenical proposals and practical schemes entitle him to be regarded as a prophet of modern ecumenicity*.

And finally, he advocated an integrated, unified "pansophic" view of culture, a philosophico-scientific point of view. It was for the purpose of founding a "pansophic" college that he spent a winter in London, and only the outbreak of the Civil War in England prevented the carrying out of the project. However, he continued to elaborate the scheme for the rest of his life. His pansophic proposal is best presented in his Via lucis written during the stay in London.

He died at Amsterdam in 1670.

See Bohemian (or Czech) Brethren; Moravian Church, the.

Matthew Spinka, translator, Comenius' The Labyrinth of the World (1942); Matthew Spinka, John Amos Comenius (1943); E. T. Campagnac, translator. Comenius' The Way of Light (Liverpool, 1938).   M.S.

commandments: See decalogue.

Commandments of the Church: In general, any laws issued by the Church and binding all the faithful, in the U. S., six particular regulations of the R. C. prescribed by the third plenary council of Baltimore* (1886), regarding attendance at Mass, frequenting confession and Holy Communion, keeping fasts and abstinence, supporting pastors, and the degree of kinship allowed for marriage.   L.R.W.

commercial theory: See redemption.

Commission, the Biblical: The Commissio Pontificia de re biblica, established October 30, 1902 by Leo XIII*, and consisting of a committee of cardinals (5) and a number of consultors, whose work is to secure the observance of proper interpretation and defence of the Sacred Scriptures according to the prescriptions of the Encyclical "Providentissimus Deus." This committee is constituted on the lines of other pontifical commissions and its duties are. to protect and defend the integrity of the Catholic faith in Biblical matters; to further the progress in the exposition of Sacred Scripture by taking notice of all recent discoveries and discussions; to decide controversies on grave questions that may arise among scholars, to see that the Vatican library is properly stocked with codices and other necessary books for Biblical study and research, and to publish studies on Scripture. Pius X*, on February 24, 1904, granted the committee the right to confer upon those who have passed the necessary examinations the degrees of Licentiate or Doctor of Sacred Scripture.   T.T.M.

commissions, ecclesiastical: See ecclesiastical commissions.

common grace: (gratia communis) A term used in Reformed* theology. It is sharply distinguished from special grace which pertains only to eternal salvation. Common grace, which pertains only to terrestrial things, affirms- 1) That God as Creator loves all things as creatures, even sinful men who may be predestined* to damnation. 2) That irrespective of their eternal destiny man as man can have a sense of right (not eternal righteousness), beauty, and truth, but that he does not have such sense by virtue of being a creature merely, but by virtue of divine favor. It tends to mitigate God's hate of the unsaved, which they merit by sin, but it does not remove the hate. 3) That believers may share in the terrestrial concerns of unbelievers, because as creatures they also are recipients of common grace. The theory of common grace is Calvin's* adaptation of an idea which had already been elaborated by Melanchthon*. This idea was that while human culture has nothing to do with salvation (cf. Luther's "justification by faith alone and not by works"), the believer must concern himself with it because God wills it. It is related to the two-fold truth theory* in philosophy. The theory of common grace has been of great importance in promoting liberal culture in Reformed circles.

Reformed thinkers have sometimes reacted variously to the theory: Some have doubted that God would love men without intending to save them, and therefore two extremes have been adopted: the one denies the existence of a common grace; the other tends to make common grace coincide with saving grace, leading. to universalism*. Again, some consider that this theory really reduces human culture to a plane of relative unimportance, which in turn has resulted in diverging views. some hold that this is as it should be, others tend towards cultural secularization. It has been difficult to hold common and saving grace in balance. There is on this subject an enormous literature, particularly in The Netherlands and among American Calvinists. See also Abraham Kuyper, Herman Bavinck, Benjamin B. Warfield. See grace.

common law: See law.

common law marriage: See marriage.

communicatio idiomatum: (Lat. communication of properties or attributes) A Christological* doctrine seeking to explain the relation of the divine and human natures in Christ, developed by Luther* and his followers on the basis of the Formula of Chalcedon*. This doctrine, designed to safeguard the unity of Christ's person while distinguishing between His two natures, is germinally present in the concept of perichoresis (interpenetration) of the ancient Church. The controversy over the real presence* of Christ in the Lord's Supper was the occasion for its further development in the sixteenth century. Over against Zwingli*, Luther insisted "the divine nature gives the human its property, and the humanity also the divine nature". Since the divine nature may thus endow the human nature with omnipresence, the bodily presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper becomes possible. The doctrine was systematically formulated by Chemnitz* in De duabus naturis in Christo (1571) and confessionally stated in Art. VIII of the Formula of Concord*.   T.A.K.

The transposition of names, a term in Christology which paradoxically affirms the conjunction of the two natures in the one Person of Christ by designating the Person according to a name appropriate only to one nature and predicating an attribute of the other nature. E.g., God was asleep in the back of the boat, the Creator was crucified, the Master stilled the waves, the Carpenter of Nazareth created the universe.   T.J.B.

communion: An antiphonal chant* sung during the partaking of the elements of the eucharist. See plainsong, psalmody.   E.H.B.

communion, holy: See Lord's supper.

communion of saints: The term is variously explained. It originally was a mystic communion with the perfect and the just in heaven. The existing church owes its endurance to the saints. For Augustine* the communion of saints is the communion of the good and pious. They love God and one another. They pray for the church. Everyone in this communion has inwardly a part in the spiritual estate of the others. The saints alone are the inheritors of the future kingdom of God. The communion of saints does not originate and exist through the visible church, though it is in the visible church. The communion of saints is passed on in the church. For some medieval theologians the term is applied to the participants in the grace-offering sacraments. Others apply it to the members of the triumphant church. For still others it is sharing the spiritual properties acquired by the saints. Lastly, for others, it is the communion of the pious of all times and places. See intercession.

J. P. Kirsch Die Lehre von der Gemeinschaft der Heiligen (Mainz, 1900).   H.H.

communism: See labor movements; Marx; socialism.

communistic settlements, religious: A large number of religious sectarian groups within the Hebrew-Christian tradition have from time to time attempted to organize their life on a collectivistic basis. Most frequently they have stressed community of property in consumption of goods, but occasionally production also has been organized along communistic lines. Sexual relations, however, have usually been regulated in harmony with traditional moral and religious concepts. Some of them have been celibate, either confining their membership to one sex, or segregating the sexes within the community; some have merely regarded celibacy as the preferred estate, while among others individualistic family life has been accepted as divinely established. Only one, the Oneida Community* in New York, founded by the New England Perfectionists* under the leadership of John Humphrey Noyes, is known to have extended communism to all personal relations, including marriage and family life. Most of these communities have been short lived, and have left few traces or none. Others have exerted considerable influence upon religious history, only a few of which can be noted here.

Early Hebrew-Christian Communities. Complete communism in consumption goods first appeared among the Hebrews in the largely celibate communities of the Essenes* in the second century, B.C. It was also characteristic of the early church in Jerusalem, but soon disappeared as a central tendency in the development of Christian belief and practice, only to reappear sporadically in reformist groups as Christianity ceased to be mainly a Jewish sect and became a competing faith in the lands of classical paganism.

Such revivals of Christian communism have had a common basis in the ascetic* traditions within Judaism, in Old and New Testament views as to the "deceitfulness of riches," in the Manichaean doctrine of the corruption of private possessions, and in the attempt to apply literally the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount. The Benedictines* of the sixth century were the first monastic order to reintroduce communism into orthodox Catholic circles, while the most extensive development of collectivistic and cooperative practices under Catholic auspices was undertaken by the Jesuits in Paraguay, who between 1602 and their expulsion by Spain in 1767 gathered over 100,000 Indian converts into about 30 agricultural communities, with trade on a barter basis among families holding individual allotments, and with common "fields of God" tilled and operated collectively for the benefit of the needy.

Early Modern Sectarian Communities. Communistic modes of life appeared with increasing frequency with the rise of the numerous heretical sects during and following the thirteenth century, and especially during the period of the Reformation. Among the more important of these were the Waldenses, the Albigenses, the Cathari, the Apostolican Sect of Alanzo in Italy and France, the Beghards of France and Germany, the English Lollards of Norfolk, the Bruges Weaving Friars, the Dutch Fraternity of the Common Life, the Bohemian Taborites, the Moravian Brethren, and others. But the establishment of collectivistic communities in the midst of hostile institutions in a well settled society proved difficult at best, until the settlement of America offered a new hope of success and a new opportunity for expansion in a new land favorable to new ideas. During the eighteenth, and more especially during the nineteenth century, the English colonies, and later the United States, became the haven of communistic sects suffering from persecution and threatened with annihilation in Europe.

The Labadists in Maryland.* The first to come were the Dutch disciples of Jean de Labadie (1610-1674), a former French Jesuit who later preached the perfectibility of man, and found in arrogance and cupidity the chief deterrents to man's living as Christ had lived. Fleeing from the persecution of Cardinal Mazarin in France, Labadie finally settled at Weiward in Holland, from whence the Labadists set forth to the spiritual conquest of the world. After an abortive attempt to establish a colony in Surinam, two leading members of the Weiward community, Jaspar Danckaerts and Peter Sluyter, were sent to New York in 1679 on a similar mission. Driven out by the persecutions of the Catholic governor, Andros, and the Dutch clergy, they finally settled near the present site of Elkton, Md., on a 3,750 acre tract donated to them by Augustine Hermann from his vast estate of Bohemia Manor in 1683. Their colony was communistic in both production and consumption, but their attitude toward sex was pathologic, culminating in extreme self-torture to destroy carnal appetite. The sexes lived and ate in separate quarters, and performed different functions, but they shared the same rights and duties. The colony was successful economically, but only at the sacrifice of its religious principles on the part of their leader, Peter Sluyter. At first passionately opposed to both tobacco culture and slavery, Sluyter persuaded them that in order to survive, they must accept both. Sluyter increasingly subordinated the common good to the profit motive and finally in 1698 he persuaded the colonists to return to private ownership. In the division which followed he retained the best lands for himself, and died a rich man in 1722. The community had completely disappeared by 1727.

This first communistic experiment in America contained about a hundred members, men, women, and children, at the height of its development.

German Separatist Communities. German Lutheranism was especially prolific in the production of communistic sects Earliest among these were the followers of the ex-Lutheran pastor, Johann Jacob Zimmermann, who sought for his followers retreat from "the Babylon of Europe" in the wilderness of the New World. But Zimmermann died at Rotterdam the day before embarkation and Johann Kelpius (1673-1708), a young Rosicrucian intellectual and eccentric who came successively under the influence of Jacob Boehme*, the mystic, Jacob Spener*, founder of the Pietists, and Jane Leade, of the English Philadelphists, assumed the leadership of the enterprise. They established their colony on the Wissahickon, near the present site of Fairmount Park, Philadelphia in 1694. Hermit Spring and Hermit Lane, in Fairmount Park, still commemorate their occupancy of this tract. They referred to themselves as the "colony of the Contented of the God-loving Soul," but were known by others as the "Society of the Woman in the Wilderness," owing to their aspiration to become the Beloved of the woman described in Rev. 12 1ff as advancing from the wilderness, leaning on the arm of her Beloved, to deliver the true Church. They were millenialists and celibates who believed that the return of Christ would occur in the immediate future. They accordingly regarded the world as ephemeral and adopted a cenobitic pattern of life. Under the inspiration of Kelpius none were more ready to endure hardship and danger to aid the ill and needy, but after his death from tuberculosis at thirty-five, they withdrew more and more into their solitary cells. A few recanted, married, and joined various churches, but the leading spirits continued in their way of life until death put an end to their enterprise.

The fame of Kelpius spread throughout Europe, and in 1720 a group of German believers under Johann Conrad Beissel (1690-1768) arrived only to find the colony in decay. After a sojourn among the Dunkards at Conestoga, they established a colony at Ephrata (see Ephrata Society), between Reading and Lancaster, Pa., in 1732. Like the Labadist and Kelpian groups, they were millenialists and celibates. The colony was divided into three groups, the Solitary Brethren (unmarried men), the Order of Spiritual Virgins (devoted to virginity) and married couples who, on joining the community, were pledged to continence. Beissel himself cared little for material prosperity, although for a time, under the leadership of the three Eckerlin brothers, Ephrata became a flourishing and diversified industrial establishment, and even marriage became an issue. But the Eckerlins were expelled in 1745, and the community again assumed its former austerity. Ephrata has often been referred to as the most long-lived communistic settlement in history, but it never comprised more than 300 members, and its distinctive characteristics passed with the generation of the founders. It still exists for students and tourists, but little of the original spirit remains. During its first decades, however, it sent forth many disciples who attempted to found branches elsewhere, of which the best known were those established in South Carolina by an English convert, Israel Seymour, and at Snow Hill, Franklin Co., Pa. by an American, Peter Lehman.

Ephrata was followed by two other German Separatist groups of importance, the Rappites or Harmonists and the Separatist Society of Zoar. George Rapp (1757-1847) was the son of a Wurtemberg farmer and grape owner, an ardent student of the Bible and of the works of Arndt, Boehme, Spener, and Swedenborg*. He began preaching in his house and soon gathered about him a group of Separatists numbering about 200 families. His preaching was a variety of Lutheran pietism heavily laden with mysticism and millenialism. After years of persecution, Rapp, his son John, and a few friends emigrated to America in 1803. They purchased 3000 acres of improved land in Butler County, Pa, and sent for their followers who arrived during 1804 and 1805. One ship load settled in Lycoming Co. under the leadership of Haller. The majority organized the Harmony Society with a written constitution on Feb. 15, 1805, which provided for a communistic theocracy with Rapp as actual dictator. Rapp then developed the strange doctrine that Adam had contained within himself both sexes, that as a result of sin the sexes had been made separate, uncreative within themselves as individuals, and that through consecration men and women could recapture their lost powers and be able, each within himself, to bear children. Celibacy, which was adopted in 1807, was thus a temporary expediency necessary to regain man's lost creativity.

Owing largely to Rapp's extraordinary energy, intelligence, and moral power, the colony was successful economically in spite of two expensive relocations, two serious defections, and various lawsuits by apostates who sought to acquire their individual shares of the community property. The rival communities of dissidents failed, and though they depleted the treasury and reduced the membership, especially that led by the bogus Count de Leon who settled at Phillipsburg in 1832, they removed the discordant elements and prepared the way for greater peace within the society. The lawsuits, beginning as early as 1821 and carried through the higher courts, were decided in favor of the society and rendered great services to communistic settlements in general by establishing the legality of their compacts and the inviolability of the communal property against claims of members for wages and for reimbursement for their original contributions Even the relocations marked stages of material advancement. Because their property was becoming too small for their members, because it was not situated on a navigable waterway, but more especially because it was not suitable for their favorite European employment, viticulture, they sold their holdings in 1814 for $100,000 and purchased nearly 25,000 acres on the lower Wabash River in Indiana. Here they built a new Harmony and prospered as never before. Within ten years they had added more than 14,000 acres to their holdings, expanded their industries, extended their commerce, and increased their membership to over 1000 souls. But the site proved malarial and their neighbors hostile. In 1824 they sold their properties to Robert Owen for $182,000 and purchased a 3000 acre tract on the Ohio River 18 miles below Pittsburgh. Here they built Economy, their third settlement, in 1825. The society grew wealthy through manufacturing and its progressive use of labor saving machinery. It became famous for its wines, whiskeys, woolens, and other products. But after the death of Rapp, his successors, through unwise charities, unsound investments, and lax bookkeeping, accounting, and inventory methods, brought it into serious financial straits. In 1892 a new Senior Trustee, John Samuel Duss, employed a firm of accountants who disclosed an indebtedness of nearly $1,500,000. For years Duss struggled to liquidate the debts and to provide for its aging membership with some success, but the rule of celibacy and the lack of fresh converts resulted in dwindling numbers, and the society disbanded in 1906.

Rapp confined his attention to religious affairs and accepted communism as a way to realize spiritual values, without contradicting or conflicting with the civil authorities. Others of the Separatists of Wurtemberg, Baden, and Bavaria were of a different mind. They condemned civil as well as religious authorities, opposed taxation and military service, and insisted upon the supremacy of the individual. In 1817 a group of about 300 under the leadership of the woman mystic, Barbara Grubermann, decided to emigrate to America. Their leader died before they left Germany, but on the voyage one of their number, Joseph Michael Bimeler (or Baumeler) (1778-1853), doctored the sick, encouraged the depressed, imparted secular and religious instruction, and by sheer force of intelligence and character became the indispensable leader of the group. On a 5500 acre tract in Tuscarawas Co., Ohio, they established their settlement which they called Zoar, after Lot's city of refuge on the shore of the Dead Sea. Their intense individualism was at first not compatible with communistic principles, but after two years they decided, against Bimeler's judgment, that to succeed they must have community of goods. Drastic measures were necessary at first. In order to pay for their land they agreed that no one was to marry and that husbands were to live apart from their wives. But they never believed in celibacy as more than an expedient, and when their debt was cleared, they reintroduced marriage, Bimeler himself being among the first to take a wife. Their society was incorporated in 1832. Unlike the Rappites, their government was thoroughly democratic. It consisted of a board of three directors, each elected for a term of three years, assisted by a council of five, elected for one year. The highest administrative officer was an agent-general. Bimeler himself served in this capacity. He was a practical as well as a spiritual genius. He established a brewery, two flour mills, woolen and linen factories, and an iron foundry. At one time the membership reached five hundred, and the communal property was worth over a million dollars. Bimeler was greatly reverenced and after his death no general agent was appointed, nor did a religious leader emerge. The functions of the former devolved upon the cashier or one of the directors, while in place of the latter, one of Bimeler's "Discourses" was read each week. These "Discourses" which the members regarded as inspired, had been delivered extempore, and covered topics ranging from abstract theology through practical morality to sanitation and hygiene, for Bimeler was also physician to the colony. One of the younger members had taken notes for the benefit of his deaf father. After Bimeler's death these notes were collected and published in three volumes. But deprived of the statesmanship and driving force of their leader, the group stagnated, and finally disbanded on March 10, 1898.

Like the Zoarites, the Amarites were not interested in communism before their arrival in America. The wealthier members had assisted the less fortunate, and established woolen mills and knitting works for their employment. They were a group of German pietists* who traced their origin to the seventeenth century, to the teachings of Rosamunde Juliana, a lady of noble rank, and Dr. Johann Wilhelm Peterson, a learned professor at Luneberg, whose followers regarded them as "Inspired Instruments," but the real foundations of the movement were laid by the ex-Lutherans, the Rev. Eberhard Ludwig Gruber and Johann Friederich Rock, in Hesse in 1714. The group became known as the "Society of the True Inspiration." After 1817 the mantle of inspiration fell upon Christian Metz (1794-1867) and Barbara Heinnemann. In 1842 Metz and two companions were sent to America to select a location. They purchased 5000 acres of the Seneca Indian Reservation near Buffalo, N. Y. for $50,000 which they subsequently increased to 9000 acres. Their original plan was to hold only their lands and houses in common, and each member's contribution to the purchase price was to be secured by a proportionate share of the real estate and to bear a reasonable rate of interest. But the plan proved to be impracticable, and absolute communism became the rule of the society. Their group was organized as the Ebenezer Society, and within four years about 800 persons had arrived from Germany. Some Canadians also joined the movement, and established a branch society at Kenneberg, 45 miles northwest of Buffalo, and another 12 miles north of Buffalo, known as Canada Ebenezer. By 1854 the society had outgrown its property. Adjacent land was held at too high a price, and the rapidly growing city of Buffalo interferred with the secluded life desired by the colonists. They finally secured 26,000 acres of land in central Iowa where they established their village of Amana* in 1855, followed by six other villages before 1862. In 1859 the community was incorporated as the Amana Society. Their life was plain and austere. No adornment was permitted in dress, in architecture, or in household furnishings. Hymnology was encouraged, but musical instruments were prohibited. Though marriage was permitted, it was not extolled, and the sexes were segregated at meals, at church, and at work. Diversified industries were introduced, especially those concerned with the manufacture of woolens. At one time, the society had nearly 2000 members, and has perhaps seventy-five percent as many at present. In recent decades it has been losing its communistic features, and has been assuming a semi-capitalistic character. In 1932 it was reorganized as a joint stock company in which the stockholders are both owners and employees. The old austerity had passed, the women are assuming positions of leadership; the people now own their own homes, but what goods they wish, and pay their own bills. The economic and social life is no longer dictated by the religious authorities. They have adopted many progressive social measures, such as free medical services and methods of dealing with poverty and other social ills.

The communities at Bethel, Mo., and Aurora, Ore., although composed largely of German immigrants, were of distinctively American origin. Their founder, Dr. Wilhelm Keil, was a milliner and merchant tailor of Nordhausen, Prussia, who became successively amateur actor, mystic, hypnotist, and medical charlatan. He came to America in 1835, and after spending some time in New York, opened a drug store at Pittsburgh. Influenced by Paracelsus and Cagliostro, he plunged into the study of medicine, botany, and physics in search of the "Universal-medizin" which was to be the elixir of the ages. He practiced hypnotism and mental healing, sold his elixir in infinitesimal quantities at high prices, and soon became popular among the simple-minded German masses as "Der Hexendocktor." In 1838 he was converted to Methodism, and burned his "medical" prescriptions with appropriate awe-conspiring ceremonies. But he soon revolted against Methodism, declared he would bear no other name than Christian and accept no other creed but the Bible. He began to preach, and gathered about him a number of German emigrants to whom he claimed to be one of the two witnesses mentioned in Rev. 11 3. He was later joined by the disillusioned Rappites who had followed de Leon, and began to plan a communistic society somewhat like Rapp's, but without the rule of celibacy. In 1844 they settled at Bethel, Shelby Co., 48 miles from Hannibal, Mo. Here they prospered, and within a decade had established a distillery, a grist-mill, a saw-mill, a cording and woolen mill, and all the mechanical trades needed by the farmers in their neighborhood With their increasing wealth, Dr. Keil longed for a broader field, and imagined that he might establish a larger community on the Pacific Coast. In 1855 he set out with a group of followers, and, after a futile attempt to settle at Willapa, Ore., moved to a happier location 29 miles south of Portland, which they named Aurora, after Keil's favorite daughter. Here again a self-sustaining economy was established on a barter basis. No money was used within the community. Their beliefs were simple and elastic in all matters except-ing their devotion to the communistic ideal. There were no restrictions of diet or dress, few regulations of conduct, and no creed save "love to one another." Government, they believed, should be parental, as is the government of God, and Keil's rule was regal, though mild and just. His indicated wish had the force of law in both communities, and when in his later years he inclined increasingly toward celibacy, few members had the courage to marry. Bethel attained a population of 400, and Aurora over 1000. But they were held together by the will of a forceful leader, and when he died, they disintegrated, and the colonies disbanded in 1880-81.

Bishop Hill Colony. Scandinavian Lutheranism also produced its communistic sects. These arose out of the activities of the Devotionalists, or Readers (Lasare), who sought to lead the State Church back to the zeal, simplicity, and faith of the early Christians. Among the leaders of this movement in Helsingland, Sweden, was Eric Janson, who settled with a party of Swedes at Bishop Hill, Ill., so called after his birthplace in Sweden. Few communistic groups suffered such hardships in their earlier years. One ship was lost at sea, two were shipwrecked with but few survivors, and only one reached New York. After they arrived they lived in dug-outs and sod houses, subsisted on pork and corn, and suffered from malaria and cholera, 114 dying within two weeks. In 1848 two hundred left the colony because they could not accept Janson's extravagant religious claim that he was the actual reincarnation of Christ. Their agriculture and industries flourished, and at the time of Janson's assassination at a court trial brought by a disaffected follower, John Root, in 1850, they numbered 1000 persons. Janson's death was a severe blow to the believers, who fully expected their leader to rise, like Christ, on the third day. When this hope failed, they chose Jonas Olson as their leader. He was less of a mystic and more of a business man than Janson, and the colony became comparatively wealthy, realizing in 1854 over $35,000 on their crop of broom corn alone. But Janson made two mistakes. He attempted to introduce celibacy, and he permitted a speculator, Olaf Janson, not a relative of the founder, to secure financial control and invest the funds of the community in unsound business enterprises. The former alienated the young people, and the latter reduced the colony to penury in the panic of 1857. From this it never recovered, and was finally liquidated in 1862.

Shaker Communities. These sectarians are officially known as the "United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Coming." They believed that their founder, Mother Ann Lee (1736-1784) was this second appearance of Christ. The sect originated among the English Quakers who had been influenced by the exiled French Camisards*. In obedience to a vision of Mother Ann, the first group arrived in New York in 1774, and two years later established their first settlement at Niskayuna, now Watervleit, N. Y. From here they conducted evangelistic tours through the adjacent New·England states until the death of Mother Ann. They established their first completed community at Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., in 1787. Within the next seven years eleven communities had been established in New York and New England, and before 1825 seven more had been founded in Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana. Finally, an outpost was established as far away as Florida. They were strictly celibate, but there was no discriminating of race or sex, the communities freely admitting Negroes and Jews, and the women bearing an equal share in the ministry with the men. Each community was governed by two Elders and two Elderesses who had charge of spiritual affairs, and two Deacons and two Deaconesses subordinate to them who supervised temporal matters. There were also several ministries, each consisting of two brothers and two sisters who had charge of two or more societies, the Ministry of Mt. Lebanon being known as the Head of Influence, and recognized as the central executive of all the societies. As successful communists, excellent farmers, and skilled mechanics, they exercised considerable influence in nineteenth century America. They numbered about 6000 in 1840, but now have less than 100 members in five surviving communities.

The Bruederhof or Huterite Communities were founded by the followers of Jacob Huter, an early sixteenth century Mennonite* reformer who added communism, abstinence from profit, usury, and from all forms of political life to the pacificism and quietism of their co-religionists. They are the oldest communistic society in the world. The group consists largely of Germans who sought refuge from military service in Southern Russia, from whence they migrated to South Dakota. Thirty-five or forty families settled at Wolf Creek and Bon Homme in 1874. A third community of some seventeen families settled at Elm Spring in 1877. The last contingent arrived from Russia in 1879. Fourteen other colonies were offshoots of these three. Since they were farmers, they settled in compact groups in the open country, sometimes as many as a dozen families under one roof. Some of the Huterites settled on private farms, but within the Bruederhof everything is run on a strictly communistic basis. The government is theocratic and patriarchal, and is administered by a teacher, a preacher, and a Wirt, or business manager, who appoints assistants and apportions the work to individual members. These three, together with the elders, form a ruling hierarchy who are elected for life by the male members over twenty-one years of age. Their entire number, including those on private farms, was about 2000 in 1917, but as a result of persecution during the war, all but five of the colonies moved to Canada. The present Huterite population is composed of the descendants of the original families who endured persecution in South Germany, Moravia, and the Tyrol in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Few new converts have been added since that time.

Another large Russian communistic religious sect, the Doukhobors, settled in Canada in 1897. (See Russian sectarianism.)

Mormon Communism. America has also produced its own native varieties of religious communism. The most important of these was the United Order of Enoch, established by the Mormon prophet, Joseph Smith, who received a revelation to the faithful to "consecrate all thy properties, that which thou hast, unto me, with a covenant and deed which can not be broken." In return each man was to receive a "stewardship" for which he must render an annual accounting. The Order was first set up in Thompson Co., Ohio, and in Jackson Co., Mo., but the Mormons were driven out before they had a chance to work out its details. Several communities in Utah were later organized on the principles of the United Order, especially at Orderville in southern Utah, where there was no private property except clothes. But the experiment was abandoned after ten years' trial in 1884, and the property distributed to the members.

Lesser American Religious Communities. Among the native American communities built up about the idea of Christ's second Advent (see adventist sects) were those founded by Jemimah Wilkinson at Jerusalem, N Y. (ca. 1789-1820), by Peter Armstrong at Celesta, Pa., (ca. 1861-1866) and by Frederich T. Howland at Adonai-Shomo, Petersham, Mass. (ca. 1864-1896). The total number of lesser communities of American origin is unknown, but there were probably about 100 of them in all. Among them were the Spiritualist Brotherhood of the New Life, at Portland, N. Y. (ca. 1867-1880), the Woman's Commonwealth of Belton, Texas, and Washington, D C. and the Lord's Farm near Westwood, N. J. Various cultist groups have also attempted to establish communities. Among these were Shalam, or the Children's Land near Dona, N. Mex. (1884-1901), the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical* Society at Point Loma, Calif. (ca. 1900), the Koreshans in Chicago and at Estero, Fla. (ca. 1902), the Dowieites at Zion City, Ill. (1893-) the House of David at Benton Harbor, Mich., (1903-) and Father Divine's* Heavens in New York and his Promised Land up the Hudson, opposite Hyde Park. See Church of God and Saints of Christ.

V. F. Calverton, Where Angels Dared to Tread (1941); W. A. Hinds, American Communities (2nd rev. ed., 1908); J. H. Noyes, History of American Socialisms (1870); Chas. Nordhoff, The Communistic Societies of the United States (1875).   H.E.J.

communistic settlements, secular: With the development of utopian socialism* under the leadership of Claude-Henri, Comte de Saint Simon* (1760-1825), Charles Fourier (1772-1837), and Etienne Cabet (1788-1856) in France, and Robert Owen (1771-1858) in England, a number of attempts were made in America to establish communistic settlements on a purely secular basis. The earliest of these was made by Owen, who purchased the former Rappite (See communistic settlements, religious) site on the lower Wabash River in Indiana, which he rechristened New Harmony, and began colonization in the spring of 1825. Its purpose was to free man from what Owen declared to be "a trinity of the most monstrous evils, . . . private or individual property, absurd and irrational systems of religion, and marriage founded upon individual property, combined with some of these irrational systems of re ligion." Owen himself joined the colony on Jan. 18, 1826, accompanied by a brilliant galaxy of scientists and scholars. But the greater part of the settlers were, as Owen's son later described them, "a heterogeneous collection of radicals, enthusiastic devotees of principle, honest latitudinarians and lazy theorists, with a sprinkling of unprincipled sharpers thrown in," and in spite of adequate financial resources the community had but a brief history. Seven constitutions were adopted in less than 18 months, and after each new revision, groups would secede and form a new community, of which there was at one time ten in existence. The enterprise was finally abandoned in June, 1827.

Owen was the inspiration of at least nine other communistic colonies. Of these the more important were at Yellow Springs, Ohio, by Daniel Roe (1824) and at Nashoba, Tenn., by Frances Wright (1825-28). They were all ephemeral, lasting from a few months to a maximum of three years.

A group of quasi-secular communities were founded in Massachusetts during the decade of 1840-49. They were an outgrowth of the "theological thaw" which resulted in the breakup of New England orthodoxy and the rise of Unitarianism, Universalism, and the transcendental philosophy, which, as O. B. Frothingham says "was satisfied with nothing so long as it did not correspond to the ideal in the enlightened soul, and in the soul recognized the power to make all things new." The earliest and most enduring of these was Adin Ballou's Hopedale (1840-56) in the town of Milford, the most bizarre was the vegetarian community of Fruitlands (1843-44) founded by Bronson Alcott in the town of Harvard, and the most famous was Brook Farm (1841-47) at West Roxbury. Although led by clergymen and religiously motivated, they resembled the secular communities in social organization rather than the other religious communities, and they were less concerned with restoring the literal pattern of the N.T. Church. They are chiefly significant as preparing the intellectual climate for the reception of the Fourieristic phase of communistic settlement. They were more congenial to the American mind than the stark agnosticism of the Owenites. They attracted the attention of the best known intellectuals of the time, including Emerson, Channing, Hawthorne, Lowell, Whittier, Charles A. Dana, Theodore Parker, Orestes Brownson, and others. Many of them visited or resided in the settlements, especially at Brook Farm, and aroused widespread interest in their activities by sermons, lectures, and publications. As Emerson* wrote to Carlyle, "We are all a little wild here with numberless projects of social reform, not a reading man but has a draft of a new community in his waistcoat pocket."

Public interest was thus prepared for the reception of the teachings of Charles Fourier, introduced into America by his disciple, Arthur Brisbane (1809-90). Brisbane's writings were enthusiastically received by the transcendentalists, and he had the good fortune to convert the dean of American editors, Horace Greeley, who engaged him to conduct a daily column in the New York Tribune on the theories and practice of Fourierism. The central idea of this system was a scheme of social organization which would necessarily result in social harmony through the spontaneous formation of social groups of sympathetic individuals. People were to be assembled into "phalanxes" of about 1800 persons, composed of "groups" of from 24 to 32, and "series" of from seven to nine, composed of individuals attracted to each other by one of the four affective "passions," friendship, love, ambition, and familism. They were to occupy a "phalanstery," a beautiful and spacious building like a modern apartment hotel, located in the midst of a self-sustaining agricultural tract. The surplus remaining after providing for the common support of all were to be divided into 12 shares, 5 of which were to go to labor, 4 to capital, and 3 to talent. Fourier shared Owen's anti-religious bias, the chief difference of his scheme from that of his British contemporary being his retention, at least temporarily, of private property and inheritance. Although only two Fourieristic phalanxes were attempted in France, over 40 were undertaken in the United States, chiefly in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Wisconsin. The first of these was the short-lived Sylvania Phalanx (1843-44) in Pike Co., Pa., and the most important, the North American Phalanx near Red Bank, N. J. (1843-55). Noyes calls this "the test-experiment on which Fourierism practically staked its all in this country." It was the longest lived and most successful of them all, but internal dissensions and a disastrous fire brought it to an end, and Fourierism in America passed into history.

Brook Farm was reorganized as a Fourieristic phalanx in 1844 under the influence of Brisbane and Greeley. It undertook the construction of a phalanstery which was destroyed by fire in 1846 as the members were preparing to celebrate its completion. The financial resources of the community were exhausted in this enterprise, and it was dissolved the following year.

Of all the secular communistic colonies in America, the Icarian settlements had the longest history. They were based on the teachings of Etienne Cabet (1788-1856) as developed in his social romance, Voyage en Icarie (1840), a work inspired by reading Sir Thomas More's Utopia while Cabet was a political refugee in England. In contrast to Fourierism, which was based on agriculture and the handicrafts, Icaria was to be a highly mechanized society. Cabet differed from both Owen and Fourier in the role assigned to religion in social life and in his emphasis on strict monogamy. Monogamous marriage was obligatory and binding, and in his La vrai christianisme he interpreted Christ's mission as the establishment of social equality.

Cabet's views were for a time immensely popular, and he numbered his adherents by the thousand. He sincerely believed that a state similar to Icaria was an immediate possibility, and that it could be realized within fifty years. Failing to secure the support of the government of France for a colony in his native land, he sent a detachment of his followers to establish a community in northeastern Texas in 1848. But their numbers were quickly reduced by hardship, disease, and desertion, and the remnants made their way back to New Orleans where they were joined by fresh recruits, including Cabet himself, early in the following year. The site recently abandoned by the Mormons at Nauvoo, Ill, was then secured, and about 280 Icarians followed their leader thither in 1849. Here for a time they prospered, but dissensions centering chiefly in the somewhat arbitrary government of Cabet culminated in the expulsion of the leader in 1856. With about 180 of the faithful minority, Cabet retired to St. Louis, where he died on Nov. 8, 1856, a broken and disappointed man His personal adherents established a new colony at Cheltenham, Mo., in 1858, which continued for six years.

Factional strife between the older and younger generations persisted at Nauvoo after Cabet's withdrawal. Weakened and impoverished by repeated secessions, they placed their property in the hands of receivers to satisfy their creditors and by 1860 the entire group had removed to Corning, Iowa. Further conflict resulted in two other settlements in the same vicinity, the last of which came to an end in 1895. A third group migrated to Cloverdale, California, in 1881, where they founded a new colony, Icaria Speranza, which was dissolved in 1887.

The anarchistic villages founded by Josiah Warren, Equity, Ohio (1830-32), Utopia, Ohio, (1847-51) and Modern Times on Long Island (1851-60) present an interesting reaction to Owenism. Disillusioned with communism as a result of his experiences at New Harmony, he resolved to found groups based on "the sovereignty of the individual," in which money and outside capital were to be dispensed with, and goods exchanged on the basis of the labor-time expended in their production. The colony founded at Skaneateles, N. Y. by John A. Collins, a former associate of Garrison in the abolition cause who later fell under the influence of Fourierism, was anarchistic in its system of social control. It was, however, also Owenite in its anti-religion and communistic in its property arrangements. See communistic settlements, religious; social gospel.

M. Hillquit, History of Socialism in the United States (1906).   H.E.J.

commutation of penance: The alteration of a prescribed penance,* usually by shortening the period and intensifying the discipline, but often with liberal relaxation. See composition.   J.T.M.

compacts or compactata: These were the agreements concluded between the Council of Basle* (chiefly through its representative, legate Palomar) and the Hussite* parties of Bohemia. The negotiations, lasting four years, were concluded on July 5, 1436, at Jihlava. Since the Hussite armies had been defeated in the disastrous battle of Lipany in 1434, the Council was able to dictate largely its own terms. Accordingly, although the Czech Hus-sites were allowed to administer the eucharistic elements of bread and wine, their other demands were not granted. In return, the Council revoked the former condemnations of the Hussites—or Calixtines as they were called—and restored them as faithful sons into the bosom of the Church Thus the Hussite struggle with the church was terminated.   M.S.

comparative religion: Whenever religions have met historically comparison has inevitably resulted The basic motive has generaly been an apologetic one, to exhibit the superiority of one over the other. But in the nineteenth century there began to emerge what its exponents called the Science of Comparative Religion, or recognized as one phase of a more inclusive Science of Religion which began with the history of religion, moved through the classification and comparison of religions to the philosophy of religion. Its claim in itself to being a science rests upon the fact that the method used is the scientific method in so far as that is applicable in the field of human thought and human relations. Theoretically it approaches the field with no presuppositions, it seeks all the facts that are discoverable through the researches of the philologist, anthropologists, archaeologists, psychologists, sociologists, historians, and others who seek to understand the development of man and his culture. It assembles the facts, relates them, classifies them, and finally attempts some generalizations as to the origin, the nature and development of religion. That workers in this field succeed perfectly in eliminating personal bias can scarcely be maintained, any more than it can in any of the social sciences, but great gains have been made, and in true scientific spirit conclusions and generalizations are held subject to revision as new data may require.

The hopes held out for the field by such writers as L. K. Jordan early in the century have scarcely been realized. It may not be without significance that the Encyclopedia Brittanica, while it carries articles on Comparative Anatomy, Psychology, Philology etc. has no article on Comparative Religion. Terminology in the field is notoriously lacking in uniformity and much of the work in the comparative field is now carried on in departments of religion, history of religion, and even philosophy of religion in the universities of the world. See gods.

H. Pinard de la Boullaye, L'Etude Comparee des Religions. 2 vols. 3rd Edition (Paris, 1929). Vol I; J. Reville, Les phases successives de L'histoire des religions (Paris, 1900) ; L. H. Jordan, Comparative Religion; Its Genesis and Growth (Edinburgh, 1905) ; Comparative Religion, Its Adjuncts and Allies (London, 1915).   C.S.B.

comparative symbolics: See Konfessions Kunde.

compline: (Lat. completorium) The late evening hour of the Divine Office*, so called because it completes the day's round of prayer.   E.R.H.

Complutensian polyglot: See polyglot Bibles.

composition: In medieval customary law, payment made to the injured or to the relatives of the murdered by the offender in crimes of violence. In penance*, payments in lieu of penitential austerities.

J. T. McNeill and H M Gamer, Medieval Handbooks of Penance (1938)   J T.M.

compurgation: In primitive and medieval law, acceptance of the oaths of a prescribed number of witnesses (e g., twenty-four) chosen by the accused, as proof of the latter's innocence. The system encouraged perjury.   J.T M

Comte, Auguste: (1798-1857) French philosopher, founder of positivism and of the science of sociology.* His system, which was influenced by Saint-Simon (with whom he for a while collaborated, then quarreled), was not unlike Kantian phenomenalism.* It excludes metaphysics and is based on scientifically verifiable (positive) knowledge. Social and individual culture exemplifies the "law of the three stages" (discovered by Comte in 1822, but, as Boas notes, anticipated by Turgot in 1750). These stages are the theological (personal gods), the metaphysical (impersonal forces), and the positive (laws derived from observation and experiment). In the positive stage, the six pure sciences are developed mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology (which includes psychology), and sociology. After 1845, his mystical friendship with Clotilde de Vaux led him to an interest in religion, and he founded "the religion of humanity," with humanity itself as the Supreme Being and object of worship, great figures of culture as its saints, every day in the year a saint's day, woman the object of worship in the home, and himself as chief priest. He attempted to found a church with but meager success. Modern religious humanism* owes much to Comte. Comte coined the terms positivism and altruism. See positivism.

His chief works are.. Cours de philosophie positive (1830-1842), 6 vols.; Catéchisme positiviste (1852), and Système de politique positive (1851-1854), 4 vols.

See John Stuart Mill, Auguste Comte and Positivism (1865); H. Spencer, Reasons for Dissenting from the Philosophy of M. Comte (1884).   E.S.B.

conceptualism: (Lat. concipere, cept, concept from capere, take) The theory in logic and epistemology which attempts to solve the medieval problem of universals* by holding that concepts, universals or abstract ideas, exist as such only in the mind devoid of any basis in reality or objective counterpart. However these concepts are more than mere words of empty sounds (cf. nominalism). This view has been attributed to Abailard* and (?) to Ockham*. Like nominalism, this view is opposed to and by the ultra-realism of Eriugena, William of Champeaux et al. Cf. Scotism, terminism; etc.   D.C.O'G.

conciliarism: The doctrine of the authority of representative church councils as over against that of the monarchical papacy. The doctrine became explicit in works by John of Paris (1302) and Marsiglio of Padua (1324) and was revived by Henry of Langenstein, John Gerson, Pierre d'Ailly and numerous others after the beginning of the papal schism (1378). The councils of Pisa, Constance, Basel and Ferrara-Florence gave expression to the conciliar theory. This is summed up in the decree Sacrosancta of Constance*, 1415, which states that the council represents the catholic church militant and that all, including the pope, are bound to obey it in matters of faith and of the unity and reformation of the church. Conciliarism aimed at a representative system of church government. Protestant church polities in general may be called conciliar. The Gallican church in a nationalistic spirit reaffirmed the decrees of Constance in 1682.

G. J Jordan, The Inner History of the Great Schism (London, 1930).   J.T.M.

conclave: (Lat. cum, with, and clavis, key) The enclosure of the cardinals while electing a pope, an enclosure ordered in 1274 by Pope Gregory X and in some measure ever since practiced. See scrutiny.   L.R W.

Concord, Book of: See Book of Concord.

concordances: Alphabetical tables of words used in works of literature, with references for finding them. There were mediaeval concordances of the Latin Vulgate,* and a concordance of the Hebrew Bible was produced in the second quarter of the fifteenth century. A much improved edition of it was published by Buxtorf in 1632. The standard modern one is that of Mandelkern (Leipzig, 1896, Berlin, 1925). Of the Septuagint* the best concordance is that of Hatch and Redpath (Oxford, 1897-1900), of the Greek N. T., that of Moulton and Geden (1897). Cruden's useful concordance of the King James Version appeared in 1737, but for the student the best modern ones are Young's Analytical Concordance (Edinburgh, 1879), and James Strong's Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible, including the Revised Version (1894, 1923).   E.J.G.

concordat: A concordat (concordia, capitula concordata, pax, conventio, pactum, pactio) is an agreement made between the highest officials of Church and State concerning the mutual relations they propose to observe permanently in any given country concerning either all matters, or only in certain eventualities, that might otherwise cause friction, and as agreed upon. Concordats generally refer to matters of a mixed nature, e.g. diocesan or religious organizations, appointments to important ecclesiastical positions (pastors, canons, bishops, etc.), matrimonial contracts and celebrations, schools and educational matters, financial assistance on the part of the State, etc. Cs. vary according to the origin of their legal obligatory force. At times this may be a law previously agreed upon and enacted by both Church and State as separate bodies, e g. the Concordat of Worms;* or it might be a Papal Bull, accepted by the head of a government and then ratified by its regular legal channels (XIX cent. concordats); or finally, it might be a convention mutually agreed upon, properly phrased (usually both in Latin and in the language of the country concerned), then ratified by the corresponding heads—pope and king— or if with a Republic frequently also by Parliament or Chamber of Deputies, etc. Cs. are usually signed, for the pope, by the Cardinal Secretary of State, for the government, by an ambassador to the Holy See. A Modus Vivendi is differentiated from a C in as much as it is not as yet a permanent, but only a tentative agreement, subject later either to ratification, alteration or annulment. (Pius XI agreed on such a Modus Vivendi with Czecho-Slovakia). Concordats, being bilateral, are considered sacred pledges and may not be rescinded, altered or abolished without the consent of the other party. It is evident that the Church does not consider herself in conscience or honor bound to respect agreements wrung from her by force.

There are predominantly three theories to explain the legal nature or binding force of Cs. a) the Legalists Theory, which considering the State the supreme society, holds that it can only obligate, not agree with, any inferior body, such (as they hold) the Church, b) the Compact Theory, that makes the contract a bilateral contract, and c) the Privilege Theory, which holds that Cs. are obligatory only on the part of the State because of the privileges conceded by the Church. The last-named is often considered the more plausible theory. In reality, however, the papacy has traditionally always remained faithful to her part of an agreement and for that reason has not failed to protest, at times most emphatically, against infractions or violations on the part of the State, e.g., Pius X* (Encyclical Vehementer, Feb. 11, 1906) regarding the persecution of the Church and Religious Orders in France; and Pius XI* (Encyc. Mit brennender Sorge, May 14, 1937) regarding Nazi Germany. Famous historical Cs. are the: Concordat of Worms, 1122 between Calixtus II and Henry V of Germany ending the Investiture* Troubles, the C. of Constance*, Martin V and Spain, France, Germany and England; the French C. of 1516 between Leo X and Francis I of France, and of 1801, between Pius VII* and Napoleon I; and finally, the Lateran Treaty and Concordat of 1929 between Pius XI* and Italy, ending the so-called Roman Question. Papal Cs. are made only between the popes and such countries as have diplomatic (ambassadorial or ministerial) relations with the Holy See. In recent years (since 1926) in Germany, as in many other predominantly Protestant, Evangelical and non-Catholic countries, Cs. have frequently been signed between the corresponding governments and the responsible heads or controlling bodies of such (Evangelical, etc.) Churches.

Lexikon f. Theologie u. Kirche, VI, 134-8; Cath. Encyc. IV, 196-203; A. Mercati, Raccolta di Concordati (1098-1914) (Rome, 1919); Dict. de la Théol. Cath. III, 727-44.   R.M.H.

Concordat of Worms: See Worms, Concordat of.

concupiscence: (con—intensitive, and cupio, desire) In Augustinian theology* the technical term, from Tertullian through the Vulgate's translation of epithumia, for the excessive desire both general and sexual that characterizes fallen man. St. Thomas held original sin* to be formally privation of original righteousness, and materially to be concupiscence. See sin.   T.J.B.

concursus: (Lat. con, and currere, to run along with) That aspect of Divine Providence whereby God co-operates with the operations of created, or secondary, causes.* It is frequently divided into (i) moral concursus, which is the divine co-operation with the natural and supernatural actions of rational beings, and (ii) physical concursus, which is God's co-operation in all the actions of secondary causes in created nature. There has been much discussion as to the manner in which divine concursus works, especially in regard to the question of the pre-determination of the moral and religious acts of man. The problem is related on the one hand to the freedom of moral creatures and the relative autonomy of contingent physical agents, and on the other hand to the omnipotence and foreknowledge of God, in particular to the extent and efficacy of the creative decree. An additional difficulty is presented by the fact of morally evil actions, in which God concurs without giving approval to their evil aspects.   V.J.B.

condignity: (Lat. con, and dignus, worthy) A moral relationship in which the subject of a right is regarded as being of comparative equality with the term of the right. In its perfect form, condignity applies to the situation of commutative justice. Condign merit is that moral exigency devolving upon another person to reward or punish a subject in accordance with the exercise of his right. Contrasted with congruity*.   V.J.B.

conditional immortality: See immortality, conditional.

conductus: A polyphonic*, unaccompanied, choral composition based upon an original Latin text, not employing a Gregorian chant* as its foundation. The rhythm was similar in all parts and words were often sung in only one part. Its popularity in the 12th and 13th centuries centered in Paris where Pérotin was a prominent composer. Due to greater interest in the polytextual motet* the conductus fell into disuse by the 14th century.

H. E Wooldridge, Oxford History of Music, Vol. I (1901); L. Ellinwood, "The Conductus," Musical Quarterly (April, 1941).   E.H.B.

confession: The acknowledgment of sins to a priest as the representative of God and the Church, for the purpose of obtaining absolution* and counsel. In Catholic theology and devotion Confession has develped from a means of removing excommunication, as Penance* was in the patristic period, to a means of progress in devotion in the medieval and modern period. The changes are 1) private instead of public penances (public confession itself had changed to private confession with public penance by the beginning of the patristic period), 2) lenient and precatory instead of severe and penal penances; 3) frequent and regular use for all sins instead of use only for great sins; and 4) administration by a priest instead of by a bishop.

Confession has become in modern Catholicism the chief means and center of moral and pastoral work. The Roman Catholic Church* makes confession before communion at least once a year

(the Easter duty) obligatory. The Orthodox Church (See Orthodox Churches) expects confession annually, the Anglican Church (See Church of England) as often as the penitent needs it Of the penitent is required a) contrition, b) confession, c) satisfaction, which mean a) self-examination, sorrow, purpose of amendment, b) honest and full confession, and c) fulfillment of the assigned penance. The priest decides upon the fulfillment of these requirements and gives or refuses absolution. He is described as fulfilling the spiritual offices of judge, father, physician, and teacher. Among Protestants recent revivals of confession involve the last three of these offices, here in accord with Zwingli* who regarded as valid only the office of teacher, the direction of souls, but with more attention to the work of physician in accordance with modern psychological counseling.

P. Batiffol, Etudes d'histoire et de theologie positive (Paris, 1902–06); C E. Schieler and H J. Heuser, Theory and Practice of the Confessional (1905); K. E. Kirk, Vision of God (London, 1932); Some Principles of Moral Theology (London, 1934).

T. J. B.

confession, seal of: See seal of confession.

confessional: A stall, or prayer desk and chair where confessions are heard, usually in this country an enclosed structure where the priest sits into which the penitent speaks through an aperture. Sometimes, by metonymy, the whole discipline of penance. See confession; penance, penitential (manual). T. J. B.

confessionalism, Lutheran: See neo-Lutheranism; Missouri Lutherans.

confessions of faith: See symbolics.

Confessions, Formal, of the Christian Church: For Eastern* Catholicism the deposit of faith is not only in the Nicene Creed but also in the findings of the Councils of Ephesus (431), Chalcedon (451), Constantinople (553), Constantinople (680) and Nicaea (787).

Of the twenty articles in the Confession of Gennadius (1453) the last seven were added later, the dialogue with the Turk is entirely unauthentic, and what remains is not standard because the definition of the trinity has been weakened.

The four answers of Jeremiah II,* Patriarch of Constantinople, to the Tuebingen Lutheran theologians (1574-81) criticizing the Augsburg Confession* are considered a symbol.

The Confession of Metrophanes Critopulus (1625) composed for the Helmstaedt theologians, published 1661, recognizes only baptism, penance, and the eucharist as necessary mysteries and contained a polemic against Roman Catholicism but not against Protestantism and excludes the apocrypha from the canon. Formal ecclesiastical sanction is lacking.

Of the eighteen paragraphs in the Confession of Cyril Lucar (1629, 1631, 1633) ten are tinged with Calvinism,* gained from reading and correspondence and not sojourn in Calvinistic countries. Chapter II accepts the Bible as superior in authority to the church. Cyril reduces the seven sacraments to two and substitutes the real but spiritual presence for transubstantiation.* The doctrine of purgatory* has also disappeared and justification by faith is approved. This Patriarch of Constantinople was five times deposed, five times reinstated and at last strangled to death (1638) Against this confession, Peter Mogilas, Metropolitan of Kiev and father of Russian theology in 1638 composed a confession (1642, approved; 1667, published) which was made a canonical confession and doctrinal standard of the Russian Church in 1839.

The orthodox ecclesiastical rejection of Cyril Lucar's confession came in 1672 at the synod of Jerusalem and in consequence of charges of secret sympathy of the Eastern church with Calvinism. This synod was the most important in modern times for the Eastern church Dositheus, Patriarch of Jerusalem, was fanatically orthodox and the eighteen articles of his confession plus the closing four questions and answers place his church unequivocally on the side of Rome and in opposition to Calvinism.

Roman Catholicism in addition to approving the "ecumenical creeds" accepts the findings of its own councils and the declarations of its popes. The Council of Trent* (1543-63) sought the authorization of Pope Pius IV. The oath of obedience to the pope had held for archbishops since the thirteenth century, for bishops since the fifteenth and was now extended to canons The pope reserved the exclusive right of interpreting the proceedings of Trent even as he confirmed the decrees of the 255 fathers on the Nicene Creed, the Scriptures, original sin, justification, the various sacraments and purgatory. The Profession of the Tridentine* Faith (Creed of Pius IV, 1564) is binding upon all priests and public teachers. It consists of the western form of the Nicene Creed of 381, a summary of the conclusions of Trent, additional articles and solemn pledges of allegiance to the faith and to the pope. The Roman Catechism, 1566, deals with Apostles' Creed, the seven sacraments, the decalogue and the Lord's Prayer

The papal definition of the immaculate conception* of the Virgin Mary*, 1854, and of papal infallibility*, 1870, round out the formulation of the Roman creed. The former reads "the Blessed Virgin Mary in the first instant of her conception was by a singular grace and privilege of Almighty God, in view of the merits of Christ Jesus the Savior of mankind, preserved free from all stain of original sin . . .", the latter, "the Roman pontiff when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, when in discharge of the office of pastor and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme Apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals to be held by the universal Church . . . is possessed of that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed that his Church should be endowed for defining doctrine regarding faith or morals, and that therefore such definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irreformable of themselves and not from the consent of the Church"

The Book of Concord* (1580) of the Evangelical Lutheran Church contained nine symbols

The Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed (with filioque*), the Athanasian Creed, the Augsburg Confession, the Apology of the Confession, the Articles of Schmalkald*, the two catechisms of Luther and the Formula of Concord. In Editions printed in Saxony since 1700 the Visitation Articles of 1592 appear.

By 1530, Lutheranism was defined. The doctrinal conflicts after the death of Luther were synthesized in the Formula of Concord* which signified a return to the theology of Luther from the mediating tendencies of Melanchthon*. The late sixteenth century formulation held generally until Pietism and the Enlightenment won out at the German universities in the early eighteenth century. This victory was a defeat for old Lutheranism. Toward the end of the Napoleonic epoch a new Lutheranism emerges, demanded by and corresponding to the new German nationalism. The doctrinal parallelogram consists of a christocentric emphasis after the Pauline pattern, a feeling of solidarity with the confessional inheritance, a reawakening of the sacramental motives, and the significance of the church-concept. Literalism and biblicism yield to spiritual connections between the Bible and the Reformation. Since 1919 and particularly since 1933, the Lutheranism of Germany has been faced by a political and syncretistic religious challenge whose outcome cannot be predicted.

The central core of Lutheranism is justification* sola fide which immediately called in question the penitential* system of medieval Catholicism, eliminated the sacrifice of Christ in the mass*, demanded the priesthood of every believer and secularized piety and asceticism. Where this fundamental was not in question, Lutheranism remained conservative in worship, organization, and practice. The secularization of ethics prevented theocratic adventures. Provincial churches retarded the rapid development of a sense of solidarity changing with the appearance of a national state and consciousness.

The refusal of Luther at Marburg, 1529, to recognize the Swiss and South Germans as of the same faith was the birthday of the Reformed* faith. Inability to agree upon the interpretation of the eucharist was the parting of the way between Lutherans and the Reformed faith. For Calvinism* the authority of the Bible is the norm of faith and practice. Here a confession of faith is an attempt to summarize the Bible. The "ecumenical creeds" were accepted because felt to be in agreement with the Bible. Christology was not the point of departure. The foci of the Reformed ellipse were predestination and the Bible. Everything and everyone are predetermined yet man falls voluntarily and God is not the originator of sin. Through sin man is incapable of any good act and salvation is wholly of God. Faith itself is the gift of God. Good works can only be the fruitage of faith and never merit. Only the predestined belong to the church. Finitum non capax infiniti!

There are over thirty Reformed confessions of faith ranging from the Sixty-seven articles of Zwingli*, 1523, to the Westminster Confession* of Faith, 1647, and thereafter. The Heidelberg Catechism* became very popular. The Westminster Confession, a development of the Irish Articles*, 1615, is the basis both of the Savoy Declaration*, 1658, and the Philadelphia Confession, 1688 and its English Baptist ancestor, the Assembly or Second London Confession, 1677. It was immediately adopted by the Scottish Kirk and parliament. Thus it is the standard for Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists and many bodies deriving from them. It is the culmination and end of creative reformed Protestant thought.

The Thirty-nine Articles*, whose theology is that of the Augsburg Confession, with many subsequent changes, derive from the forty-two Edwardine articles and the thirteen articles of 1538. Anti-Roman Catholic sentiments appear in some ten articles, for example, "as the church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch, have erred, so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith." The twenty-one homilies, Article XXXV, could not be approved by any Catholic censor of books as good selections for perusal by the faithful. "The Prayer Book and the Thirty-nine Articles are not vital parts of the Episcopal church but the two creeds are." "The theology of the Thirty-nine Articles is the theology of the Confession of Augsburg."

The confessions of faith of the democratically organized European Protestants begin when the Anabaptists* whose modern descendants are the Mennonites* drew up their first confession in 1527. It dealt with baptism, excommunication, breaking of bread, avoidance of abominable pastors in the church, sword and swearing. The Mennonite confession of about 1580 consists of forty articles and was necessitated by the disagreement and dissension that involved discipline and the understanding of Jesus. It has many biblical prooftexts for every clause in each article. It rejects infant baptism, the oath, the sword, war but acknowledges "just and moderate power."

In the democratic Protestant bodies creeds are little more than local as far as their binding nature is concerned since the covenant supersedes them. For Congregationalists and Baptists the general theology of the Westminster Confession holds. Even platforms and declarations vanish among the Friends* although the Apology of Robert Barclay is valued by the more orthodox Friends. At present fundamentalist groups among the Baptists are insisting upon binding ministers and teachers by subscription to creeds.

After the adoption of the United States Constitution and the Bill of Rights, it was necessary for some denominations to revise their confessions of faith. Chapters XX, XXIII, and XXXI of the Westminster Confession and Question 109 of the Larger Catechism required attention as did the Royal Declaration and especially Article XXXVII of the Thirty-nine Articles. The Formula of Concord was revised in the anathema section. The Methodist Articles of Religion, 1784, made changes in their Article XXIII. In 1784 the Roman Catholic Church in the United States took action to meet the requirement of the United States forbidding "its Catholic subjects to have foreign vicars-apostolic as their superiors". The American environment has deeply modified interpretations of the inherited faith. Unitarianism* declares its faith to be the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the leadership of Jesus, salvation by character, progress of man onward and upward forever, while Universalism* asserts the universal fatherhood of God, the spiritual authority and leadership of his Son, the trustworthiness of the Bible as containing a revelation of God, the certainty of just retribution for sin, and the final harmony of all souls with God.

For the confessions of faith of the hundreds of American cults and sects, the last United States Census of Religious Bodies (1936) should be consulted which is easily the best source book on contemporary religion in the United States. See creeds of Christendom. See also Belgic Confession, Cambridge Platform, Dordrecht Confession, Forty-two Articles, Gallican Confessions, Helvetic Confessions, Scots Confession, Syllabus of Errors, Papal, Tetrapolitan Confession, Thirteen Articles, Torgau Articles.

Census Religious Bodies, U. S (1936); W. A. Curtis, "Confessions" in Hastings E. R. E., 3, 831-901; C. Hardwick, History of the Articles (1884); W. J. McGlothlin, Baptist Confessions of Faith (1911); J. T. Mueller, Die sym. Bücher der evang. luth. Kirche (1869); P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, 3 vol. (1876).   C.H.M. confessor: (Lat. cum, with, and fiteor, to witness) a) A priest juridically hearing confessions and giving absolution*; b) a person who "has given heroic testimony" to the Christian faith.   L.R.W.

confirmation: The completion of Baptism* by the laying on of hands* or unction* (or both), thus bestowing full initiation* into Christian discipleship with its gift of the Holy Spirit—so understood in the early and mediaeval Church on the basis of Acts 8:14-17, 19 1-7, and references to imposition of hands or anointing*. From at least the second century the normal minister was the Bishop*. From about the fourth, unction was considered the essential sign; in the Eastern Church the close connection with Baptism was retained, leading to administration by presbyters (using chrism* consecrated by the Bishop—in modern times usually by Patriarchs)—in the West episcopal administration was adhered to, leading to delay in most cases for some years. The Council of Trent* recommended the age of seven, allowing for some instruction before confirmation. The Bishop is the proper minister, though delegation to priests is possible. Anglicanism retained the rite, with laying on of hands as the sign (though chrism has been revived in some quarters, beginning with 18th century Non-Jurors*), postponement to adolescence became common and the candidate's "confirming" of baptismal vows often received more attention than the Bishop's confirming of the candidate. In recent years there has been some return to a younger age. In Lutheranism confirmation was continued as the conclusion of catechetical instruction and admission to communion, with the pastor's blessing—as such it has spread in some other Protestant circles (in combination with or as an alternative to the Evangelical practice of "joining the church" after conscious conversion*). Confirmation, however understood, completes Christian initiation and so normally precedes First Communion—although in current Roman Catholic practice the order is often reversed. Strength for Christian discipleship is the gift prayed for. Where the outward sign is held to convey the gift confirmation is commonly called a Sacrament, as in Roman Catholic and Orthodox teaching, and often in Anglican except where the name is strictly limited to the two Sacraments "generally necessary for salvation". See catechumenate, laying on of hands, initiation rites, sacraments.

W K. L. Clarke and others, Confirmation or the Laying on of Hands (1926), 2 vols Matthias Laros, tr. G. Sayer, Confirmation in the Modern World (1938).   E.R.H.

confiteor: (Lat., I confess) The form of general confession preparatory to the Roman Mass. A similar form is used also in prime and compline.   P.V.N.

Confraternities: Pious unions requiring a formal decree of erection, founded for the increase and spread of some act of public worship. The best known confraternities in this country are those of the Blessed Sacrament and of Christian Doctrine, a branch of which are required in each parish. Archconfraternities are those confraternities having the right to affiliate other confraternities or sodalities, and to communicate to them their privileges. See Catholic Societies.   T.T.M.

Confucius: See Chinese Terminology.

Confucianism: See Chinese Terminology.

congregation: Etymologically, an assembly of persons. The word is used mostly in religious connections. It signifies 1) a gathering at a particular time for worship, 2) an organized local group meeting regularly for worship and other religious purposes; in this sense the congregation is the basis of congregational polity; 3) in Roman Catholic usage, a branch of a monastic order or an association or an administrative body, e.g., the Congregation of the Propaganda*.   R.H.N.

Congregation of the Index: See censorship of books.

Congregational Holiness Church: A pentecostal sect having 56 churches and 2,100 members in the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida. It was organized in 1921 in a secession from the Pentecostal Holiness Church. Its main principles are sanctification, divine healing, speaking in unknown tongues, feet washing, and the second coming of Christ. See pentecostal sects.   E.T.C.

congregational independency: See independency.

Congregational Methodist Church: See holiness churches.

Congregationalism: In its current uses designates an American protestant denomination, or a fellowship of "free-churches" in Great Britain. One may, therefore, accurately speak or write of the Congregational denomination. Baptists, Unitarians, Disciples and other smaller American denominations are congregational in their church polity, but are not so designated denominationally. American Congregationalism cannot be understood apart from its history. It is English in its origin and can be loosely dated as a movement from about 1550.

Its history can be generalized under four phases. The first was entirely an aspect of the English Reformation. Certain Anglican clergymen of a radical temper refused to accept the Elizabethan settlement of the confused religious situation, withdrew from the Church thus established and refused to conform to the authority and procedures of the Anglican Church. They gathered and led fluid groups of humble people and sought to constitute independent churches after what they believed to be New Testament models. Such inchoate churches later chose their own ministers and administered their own affairs. They were in substance Congregational though not so named. These non-conforming* groups were bitterly persecuted and the most steadfast were driven into exile in Holland.

This connecting group between the English and American phase of Congregationalism maintained themselves in Leyden, Holland for about twelve years under the capable leadership of John Robinson, pastor, and William Brewster. They then migrated to New England and founded the Plymouth Bay Colony. They were purely independent in polity. Massachusetts Bay was settled by Puritan* migrants whose leaders formed a Presbyterian polity, though with qualifications. Their lonely situation, and possibly the influence of Samuel Fuller of Plymouth, led them to organize their first church at Salem, Massachusetts on a congregational basis—though that use of the word is anticipatory.

The second phase of American Congregational history was marked by a struggle between the Presbyterian bias of many Massachusetts Bay leaders and a more democratic form of church government The result was a compromise called, in contrast with the then dominant English Presbyterian* puritanism "The New England Way," or else the "Congregational Way" which seems the first use of the word in its present connotation. The local church maintained its independence and administered its internal affairs by congregational decision but was subject in the ordination and installation of its pastors and teachers to the advice and approval of its neighboring churches. Also and naturally, theirs was a growing community of action.

In the third phase of its history Congregationalism, as thus established, maintained a priority in the New England colonies—and later in the New England states—and may be accurately defined as the religious aspect of their social, political, economic and cultural life. During this period which lasted until the beginning of the Nineteenth Century, Congregationalism may be called the most geographically and culturally unified religious fellowship in America.

In its fourth phase Congregationalism for many reasons, among which must certainly be noted an attempt at a most intimate cooperation with New York and New Jersey Presbyterianism, failed to maintain this priority in the rapid and always widening growth of the Interior and Western States. Its polity made any central control and direction difficult. Toward the middle of the 19th century this weakness was so strongly felt that movements toward a national organization were initiated which, being consistently pursued, have resulted in an increasingly unified control of all shared enterprises, though individual churches still maintain their congregational status.

Theologically, American Congregationalism inherited and continued Calvinism*. The Westminister confession* was accepted as a doctrinal basis and later the Savoy declaration* which was extremely Calvinistic. The system was debated, defended, expounded and improved by a distinguished succession of theologians beginning with Jonathan Edwards* and ending with Professor E. A. Park*. Their systems were known as a New England rather than a Congregational theology, though they were all Congregationalists. They debated the questions with which all Calvinistic theology has concerned itself, freedom, moral responsibility, the sovereignty of God, the scheme of salvation, etc. They mitigated somewhat the severities of the system as their succession lengthened.

There were, however, both restraining and liberating forces in Congregational polity, which saved the churches from rigid subscription to a denominational creed and defended enquiring minds from heresy trials. Behind these defences a liberalizing movement was begun, principally by Horace Bushnell*, and continued by Congregational preachers, scholars and teachers. For perhaps forty years preceding the first world war the Congregational mind strongly influenced the religious transition which eventuated in America in 19th century religious liberalism.

Congregationalism took an acknowledged leadership in the promotion of Foreign missions and in the founding of early American universities and colleges. Its historic dominance in New England has been affected by economic changes and a great infiltration of non-Protestant population elements. Its churches are now generally distributed across the continent but, save through its concern for Negro education, it has found no field in the Southern states. Some years ago it achieved a really organic union with the Christian denomination*.

There were in 1940 6,006 Congregational Christian churches in the United States with 1,058,807 members. These churches gave $2,023,350.00 to benevolent and missionary causes. Their expenditures for their own maintenance were $14, 966,108.00. See American theology, early; Cambridge Platform, New England theology, Saybrook Platform.

Henry M. Dexter, The Congregationalism of the last 300 years, as seen by its literature (1880) : Williston Walker, A History of the Congregational Churches in the U. S (1899), Albert E. Dunning, Congregationalists in America (1894), Leonard Woolsey Bacon, The Congregationalists (1904), G G. Atkins and F. L. Fagley, History of American Congregationalism (1942)   G.G.A.

congresses: Assemblies promoting the spiritual, social and intellectual welfare of Catholics. Congresses are religious, educational, political, social, sociological; regional, diocesan, national and international. The first noted Congress convened at Mainz, Germany in 1848.   B.R.

congruism: (Lat. congruitas, fitness) The theological reference is to fitness to receive grace*. Not merit versus grace in salvation itself, but man can so live to deserve grace. Scotists* held this, Thomists* man can do this only by God's aid. Anglican Thirty-nine Articles*, XIII, denies Scotist position.   J.L.

congruity: (Lat. congruus, suitable) A moral relationship in which the subject of a right is not regarded as the equal, but as the inferior or superior, of the one who is the term of the right. Such a situation is found in distributive justice, where the receiver of a benefit is not duty-bound to make an equal return as he would be under commutative justice. Thus, congruous merit is rewarded on the basis of a ratio of subject to term which is other than that of equality. See condignity.   V.J.B.

Conrad of Gelnhausen: (1320-1390) Theologian, professor at the University of Paris, later Chancellor of the University of Heidelberg. His Epistola Concordiae advocating the conciliar method for ending the great western schism influenced the thinking of later conciliar* theologians, notably Henry of Langenstein and Jean Gerson.
                     F.W.N.

Consalvi, Ercole: (1757-1824) Cardinal, Secretary of State under Pope Pius VII*. He patronized the fine arts, science and literature. The Concordat* between the Papacy and Napoleon was largely due to his statesmanship.   C.V.

consanguinity, marital impediment of: Consanguinity, or relationship by blood within prohibited degress, is a marital impediment* that prevents the conclusion of a valid marriage or enforces dissolution of a de facto union the parties to which are so related.

The canon law is based upon the Roman law (Cod. Just, V, iv, 18-19, Cod Theo., III, xii, 1-3), scriptural passages especially Lev. XVIII, 7-14, and the interpretations of these passages by St. Ambrose and St. Augustine. From the 6th to 13th centuries many conciliar canons and papal decretals forbade marriages of persons related within the seventh degree, but the rigor of this prohibition was relaxed by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) which stipulated the fourth degree as the limit.

After much controversy among the canonists, the decision of Alexander II (1061-1073) was accepted He held that the degree was the number of generations between the parties and a common ancestor, excluding that ancestor. (Migne, Patrologiae, CXLVI, 1379-81). Gregory IX (1227-41) decreed that when the parties to a marriage were related to a common ancestor in different degrees the longer line was to be the determining factor in calculation of the degree for canonical purposes. (Decretals, IV, xiv, 9).

P. E. Corbett, The Roman Law of Marriage (Oxford, 1930), H Feije, De impedimentis et dispensationibus matrimonialibus (Louvain, 1885) ; C E. Smith, Papal Enforcement of Some Medieval Marriage Laws (1940).   C.E.S.

conscience: The term originally denoted simple consciousness without ethical bearing. As a kind of consciousness it exists at all levels perceptual, classificatory and creative. In Neo-Platonism self-consciousness obtained an ethico-religious color. With the rise of Christianity conscience is described as an independent source of moral insight. In the Middle Ages synderesis came to be connected with conscience. The former is the permanent inborn disposition of the mind to think general rules of moral conduct from which the individual can reason in directing his moral activities. Very common in the thirteenth century, the term was interpreted either as a disposition of the will or of the intellect. The scholastics clearly distinguished between synderesis and conscience, the latter being practical reason endowed with special principles, enabling the individual to act morally. It was in the beginning of the modern period that conscience, in contrast to consciousness, came to stand for a specialization of mental function distinguishing between right and wrong. With the rise of modern speculation conscience became an inner, primeval faculty. Theological tradition explained conscience as the voice of God in our souls, a divinely implanted conviction of right and wrong. The corruption of the will by sin causes uncertainty in its voice. This doctrine in its many forms characterizes especially the religious thought of Western civilization, attesting to the growing importance of morality in religious experience. Where the theologian, unable to derive conscience from any human source, calls it a divine endowment, the intuitionist says it is underived, an innate endowment. Some intuitionists have regarded it as a direct perceptual capacity, others have stressed its emotional quality, a feeling of approval or disapproval, still others have explained it as the direct and authoritative guidance of our moral life. All these doctrines affirm the direct certainty of conscience and assume an evident finality in the moral direction of our lives. Empirically, conscience is simply the inference from our past experience as guidance for the future. Its sanctions are relative to specific experiences and situations. Its authority is ever subject to revision and recall. It is the voice of man's fuller self, the man that he may yet be. Intense devotion to duty when allied to bigotry, obscurantism, if sanctified by the halo of religion may lead to unspeakable evil (Torquemada's consignment of the heretics to the flames). Conscience is not infallible. Hence it needs to be trained, kept enlightened, learning to be conscientious about itself, and self-critical of its judgment. Being unyielding and imperative in principle, despotic and ruthless in execution, it can result in tragedy. A too self-confident conscience is a moral peril. It becomes stunted unless it transcends itself. It must face the reality of its own possible shortcomings.

Sociological naturalists maintain that conscience is the result of the pressure of society upon the individual, an echo, the reality of which are the folkways. Their theories do not do justice to the type of behavior in which men defy their group. The individual character of conscience does preclude determination of most moral judgments by the opinions of the group. Neither the social character of most moral judgments nor the pressure of society upon the individual explain the nature of conscience. Historically related to both the rational and impulsive elements in human nature, it is as unique as the capacity for conceptual knowledge. Like the latter it may be strengthened, enlarged by discipline, or it may deteriorate from lack of use. It is more potent when it supports one impulse against another than when it sets itself against the total force of the individual's desires. It operates more effectively when it consolidates and stabilizes socially valuable impulses. Although the development of reason increases the opportunities for exercising conscience, it is very dubious if the growth of reason strengthens the force of conscience as much as is claimed. Religion is much more potent in this task. Although we need books that nourish conscience, it is even more essential that we have books that facilitate an understanding of the nature of conscience and of its role in society, books that reduce the claims of conscience to proportions that bear sustained scrutiny, that reward sincere devotion and that can withstand criticism.

L. F. Anderson, Die Seele und das Gewissen (Leipzig, 1929); J. H. Breasted, The Dawn of Conscience (1933); M. St. Gillet, L'education de la conscience (Paris, 1913); C. T. Gorham, Why we do right: a rational view of conscience (London, 1924); V. Jankelevitch, La mauvaise conscience (Paris, 1933); H. Jeffs, Concerning conscience, studies in practical ethics (London, 1912); K. E. Kirk, Conscience and its problems; an introduction to casuistry (London, 1927); T. V. Smith, Beyond Conscience (1934); P. Sollier, Morale et moralite; essay sur l'intuition morale (Paris, 1912); H. G. Stoker, Das Gewissen, Erscheinungsformen und Theorien (Bonn, 1925). H.H.

consensus gentium: See epistemology; immortality, arguments for and against.

consensus patrum: (Lat. consent of the Fathers) In matters of faith or morals, when the Fathers of the Church teach with moral unanimity a doctrine to be of faith, that doctrine is of faith. In the same way, what they unanimously condemn as heretical, is heretical Further, the logical conclusions which they unanimously draw from articles of faith provide us with theological arguments that are certain. In philosophical or scientific matters, the authority of the Fathers is only as strong as their arguments. c.v.

conservation of value: The phrase was coined by Harald Höffding* (Philosophy of Religion, tr., 1906) to express the "characteristic axiom of religion" parallel to the scientific axiom of the conservation of energy. Contemporary as well as ancient religious thought confirms Höffding's claim that the innermost tendency of all religious experience is the minimum faith and demand, not simply that there will always be value*, but that there will be the "continuous conservation of value throughout all transformations" (Ibid., p. 11). Implicit in this faith, as Höffding, W. R. Sorley*, and E. S. Brightman, among others, have noted, is the realization that values cannot be conserved without being increased continuously.

Thus to be completely accurate the phrase should read: faith in the continuous realization of the highest values beyond the limitations of human experience and history. As Höffding says, "the faith does not presuppose that there must always be a certain amount of actual value in existence, but only that there must always be the same possibility for the coming into being of value." (Ibid., p. 222).

The particular theoretical foundation of this faith varies with the metaphysical account of value. W. R. Sorley, for example, maintains that the faith presupposes rather than indicates the objective validity of a realm of values, since there is not enough empirical evidence for such preservation. For some thinkers God is the impersonal, objective system of values, while for others the highest values are ideals in God's consciousness.

W. R. Sorley, Moral Values and the Idea of God (1930); E. S. Brightman, Philosophy of Religion (1940). P.A.B.

conservative Judaism: See Judaism, conservative.

consilia evangelica (evangelical counsels): They comprise poverty, celibacy and obedience, the following of which leads to a higher perfection. Individuals intent upon striving toward perfection take them as norm for their conduct. They are accepted by voluntary solemn promise. Their positive aim is the furtherance of love. They are instruments of perfection. H.H.

consistent Calvinists: See Calvinists, consistent.

consistory: Generically, an assembly of ecclesiastical office-bearers for transacting business. In Roman Catholic usage a consistory is a meeting of cardinals, the Pope presiding; such now are merely formal. In some Reformed polities, e.g., the Reformed Church in America, the consistory, composed of the pastor of a church and the elders and deacons, has authority over the congregation, corresponding to the session*. The system of government originally established in the Lutheran churches of the German states was called consistorial, the consistories, district and general, being administrative bodies of clerical and lay membership appointed by the civil authority. These succeeded to the medieval consistorial courts through which the bishops administered their dioceses. In later Lutheranism the consistorial system has been much modified. In the Church of England consistory courts in dioceses remain.   R.H.N.

consolamentum: The Catharist rite of spiritual baptism whereby the spirit of consolation was administered to an individual for the forgiveness of his sins and the liberation of his soul from the kingdom of fleshly evil to that of spiritual good. Imparted by the laying on of hands* by one who already possessed it, and further signified by placing John's gospel on the recipient's head, the consolation conferred true apostolical succession* upon the candidate, thus rendering him a member of the "perfect". Necessary to salvation, it was rarely administered to "believers" until the moment of death.   R.C.P.

consolation: 1) Alleviation of sorrow, the soothing of disappointment or sadness. The word occurs frequently in ascetical and devotional literature, to denote the happiness that succeeds periods of spiritual depression or aridity in prayer.

2) Evening meal of monks. An evening repast given to monks by way of addition to their ordinary supper or collatio, as a sort of compensation on occasions of extraordinarily prolonged prayer or work; also, more generous and tasty portions of food or wine served on great feasts.   C.V.

Constance, Council of: (Nov. 5, 1414-April 22, 1418) The high-water mark of the Conciliar Era, this council, which ended the Great Schism*, was called by John XXIII under the aegis of Sigismund. There were three objectives unity in the headship of the church, for there were three popes John XXIII (Council of Pisa), Gregory XII (Rome), Benedict XIII (Avignon), reform in respect to clerical abuses (there was a general demand for reform of the church in head and members, and some even urged abolition of the cardinalate); and heresy (Wycliffism, Hussism). The order in which these three issues were to be taken up was long and hotly debated.

By July of 1417 the three popes had been disposed of, by deposition with papal ratification (John XXIII), by resignation (Gregory XII), and deposition without papal ratification (Benedict XIII). Nov. 11, 1417 Cardinal Otto Colonna was elected, who took the name of Martin V.

With respect to heresy the council brought to trial John Hus* who was executed in 1415, despite imperial safe-conduct. In 1417 Jerome of Prague* was executed Wycliffite errors were anathematized.

As to reform there was sharp difference of opinion, mainly on the question of whether the pope (or pope-in-council) or whether the council (with the pope as executive officer) is the true agent of reform. This was expressed learnedly but with moderation by Gerson* in his sermon,

March 23, 1415. In its decree Haec sancta of April 6, 1415 (Fifth Session) the Council laid down the principle that its authority is from Christ and that even the pope had to submit to its decrees. In its decree Frequens of October 9, 1417 (Thirty-ninth Session) the principle of conciliar* periodicity was adopted, the next councils would meet after five years, then after seven years, and thereafter decennially. Councils might, in case of schism, meet without formal convocation. A commission appointed by the nations was to work with the pope to bring about desired reforms in the whole ecclesiastical system. To the college of cardinals were to be joined six from each four nations so that in papal elections the whole church might be represented.

Martin V accepted the decrees generally but with the important reservations based on the inviolability of papal supremacy.

See Nicholas de Clémanges, Pierre D'Ailly, ecumenical councils (bibliography).

M. Creighton: A History of the Papacy from the Great Schism to the Sack of Rome (London, 1905-07), Bk. II "The Council of Constance" in vol i, 299-vol. ii, 128. L. Pastor, The History of the Popes, from the Close of the Middle Ages (London, 1923), vol. i, 193-207.

C Mirbst, Quellen (Tubingen, 1934), pp. 227-231, 242 f

M. Spinka, John Hus and the Czech Reform, (1941), Ch. III 'The Trial".   Q.B.

Constantine the Great, Emperor: (272 or 274-337 A.D.) Son of Constantius Chlorus who was successively Caesar and Augustus over the prefecture of Gaul, a competent soldier and constructive ruler. His mother was Helena, whose relationship to Constantius is debated. From 292 to 305 Constantine was at the court of Diocletian, ostensibly for education but really as a hostage. After Diocletian's abdication in 305 he fled the imperial (Galerius') court to join his father who had become Augustus. Upon the latter's death in 306 Constantine was designated Augustus (by the paternal testament and army). He gained popularity in Gaul, especially with the Christians for his mild treatment of them. In 311 he "delivered" Rome from Maxentius in the Battle of the Milvian Bridge. On the way to Rome he had seen his vision of the cross and the words "In hoc signo vinces." In 313, together with Licinius, he issued the celebrated Edict of Toleration. Constantine now controlled the prefectures of Gaul and Italy, a defeat of Licinius, partly because of the latter's persecution of Christians, ended in Constantine's final defeat of him in 324 and in his issuance of a decree of universal toleration. In 325 he convened and took part in the Council of Nicea*. In 326, on charges by Fausta his wife he put to death his son Crispus, and soon after, perhaps, ordered her to be executed. In 330 he dedicated the city of Constantinople (whose building had perhaps been planned already in 324) on the site of Byzantium. His last years were spent in wars and ecclesiastical affairs. He was baptized on his death-bed. Constantine was the subject of several legends, e.g., Donation of Constantine* . See Arles, Synod of; Donatism, Lactantius.

A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (New York, 1925), vol. 1 contains translations of important sources Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, (translated and edited by A C McGiffert), Eusebius' Life of Constantine and Oration in Praise of Constantine, together with Oration of Constantine (translated and edited by E C. Richardson)

C B. Coleman, Constantine the Great and Christianity, and M. A. Huthmann, The Establishment of Christianity and the Proscription of Paganism (vol. lx of Studies in Hist., Econ, and Public Law, edited by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University, 1914)   Q B.

Constantinople, Councils of: There were three general councils which met at Constantinople, namely, the Second (381), the Fifth (553), and the Sixth (680-81).

The Council of 381 was called by Theodosius the Great (379-95), and its chief claim to fame is that it terminated the struggle over the Nicene Creed* by the approval of a version of it which is in substantial agreement with that adopted at Nicaea (325). The chief difference between the two versions is that the clause of the Nicene Creed regarding the Holy Spirit was expanded to read "who proceedeth from the Father." This later gave rise to the age-long controversy between the East and the West when the latter church added to this clause the famous "Filioque"* phrase. The Council also prescribed "that the bishop of Constantinople should have the next prerogative of honor after the bishop of Rome, because that city was New Rome." (Socrates, E. H., vii, 8).

The Council of 553 was called by Emperor Justinian (527-565), and was predominantly Eastern in attendance. The Emperor dominated the proceedings, and succeeded in securing legislation concerning the so-called Three Chapters Controversy*, condemning Theodore of Mopsuestia*, Theodoret of Cyrus, and Bishop Ibas* of Edessa. Since this was interpreted as an action implying a criticism of the Council of Chalcedon*, Pope Vigilius (who had been kept practically a prisoner in Constantinople since 547) at first refused his consent to the decree, but fearing to be exiled, yielded at last in 554.

The Council of 680 convened by Emperor Constantine IV Pogonatus (668-685), dealt with the mooted question of Monotheletism* (one-will theory) which, by asserting that the two natures in Jesus Christ possessed only one common will or energy, practically conceded the substance of the Monophysite* doctrine that He possessed only one nature—the divine. Even Pope Honorius of Rome had adopted this heresy. The Council of 680 condemned the one-will theory, and specifically anathematized Pope Honorius. Thus it completed the doctrinal formula regarding the two natures in Jesus Christ which had been centuries in evolving: it asserted that there were two natures, two wills, in one person in Jesus Christ.

Since neither the Fifth nor the Sixth General Council had passed any canons, a supplementary Council was held at Constantinople (in Trullo) in 691, which rectified the omission. It is usually known as the Quinisext Council. See ecumenical councils.

Adolf von Harnack, History of Dogma, 7 vols (1895-1900), A. C McGiffert, A History of Christian Thought, 2 vols (1933).   M S.

Constantinopolitan Creed, The: Often called the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed The Council of Chalcedon*, 451, ascribed it (but perhaps mistakenly) to the Council of Constantinople, 381. It differs from the Nicene Creed*, 325, in its elaboration of the statement about the Holy Ghost, to the Nicene "and in the Holy Ghost" it added "the Lord and Giver of Life, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, who spake by the prophets." It also adds statements about the church, baptism, and the resurrection. There is a striking similarity between this creed and the formula of Epiphanius*, 374. See creeds of Christendom.

P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom (1919 ed.), Vol. II, pp. 31-61.   Q.B.

constitutional law: See law.

Constitutions of Clarendon: (1164) Provisions framed by Henry II's advisers at Clarendon and agreed to by Thomas Becket but later repudiated by him. They assert the king's jurisdiction over ecclesiastics in questions of advowsons*, crimes of clerics, their absence from the realm, trials of laymen in church courts, excommunication of tenants-in-chief, appeals, and elections of bishops and abbots.

E. P. Cheney, Readings in English History (2 ed., 1922).   J.T.M.

constitutions, papal: Important papal laws or grants used for dogmatic or disciplinary pronouncements. Since 1911 Constitutions have been used for erecting or dividing dioceses. Constitutions now have the old Bull* form.   B.R.

consubstantiation: A term often used to designate the Lutheran view of the Lord's Supper* but rejected by most modern Lutheran theologians because of its ambiguity. If it is used, as by Luther, to mean the real presence* of Christ together with the earthly elements, it is correct. But historically "consubstantial", the Latin translation of the Greek "homo-ousios", was used in the ancient Christological* controversies to mean "of the same substance". When applied to the bread and the body of Christ in the Lord's Supper, it connotes "the kneading up of both substances as it were into one lump" (Hooker's Eccl. Polity). Such a tertium quid the Lutherans deny, as well as the implication that the body and blood of Christ are present and received in the same way as the bread and wine. See Lutheran Doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Cf. impanation.   T.A.K.

content psychology: See psychology, schools of.

continence: The state of restraining oneself from using his sex faculty; the virtue of chastity; one of the fruits of the Holy Ghost.   S.C.

contingent: (Lat. con-tingere, to touch together or on all sides, to happen)
The contingent is that which can be or not be, that of which the essence does not include existence. Opposed to necessary being*. See cause.

L.R W.

contrition: The state of sorrow for sin, coupled with the intention to abstain from such sin in the future. Such contrition is held by Catholic theologians to be necessary if forgiveness of sin is to be attained. Contrition is to be distinguished from attrition*, which means a state of sorrow approximating emotional disturbance, because of sin, the latter is not necessary in order to obtain forgiveness. Cf. retention of sins. W.N.P.

contumacy: Contempt of a court order. In ecclesiastical law the word is especially applied to failure of an accused person, after citation, to answer a charge in court. Contumacy usually results in summary judgment. R.H.N.

conventicle: Etymologically, a meeting or assembly. In church history the word signifies a religious assembly not sanctioned by civil law, e.g., meetings of Protestant dissenters in England when such were illegal and the gatherings of the Cove-nanters*. The word also meant a meeting-house where illegal worship took place. R.H.N.

Conventicle Act: This was an act passed in 1664 making it an offense for more than four persons of sixteen years of age and up to attend services "in other manner than is allowed by the liturgy." The act was followed by severe persecutions until in 1672 the king granted nonconformists licensed places of meeting for services and for preaching if not derogatory to the Established Church. The act was repealed in 1812.

V.F.

conventions: See culture.

convents: (Lat. conventus, an assembly) There are two distinct technical meanings of this term in the history of monasticism*. First, a religious community of either sex considered in its corporate capacity. The word was first used in this sense about the fourth century, when the hermit monks of the East began to group themselves about a common superior. In Western monasticism, where the eremetical form was practically non-existent, the term conventus was used from the beginning to describe communities of monks or nuns under a superior. Secondly, the word signifies the building in which a religious community of either sex resides. Today the popular signification of the term connotes a residence of religious women.

Convent life varies according to the specific object for which a particular convent was established.
In general, the contemplative life, wherein women dedicate themselves to prayer, seclusion, and mortification, was the idea of the older religious orders. The more modern congregations concern themselves to a greater degree with the active work of conducting schools, hospitals, orphanages, homes for the aged or defectives, and other charitable institutions. Labor of some useful kind is a characteristic of all convent life. As in early times convents played an important part in the spread of Christian civilization, so today they are key organizations in the work of the Catholic Church.

A. Ross, Religious Orders of Women (1916).

C.V.

Conventuals: One autonomous branch of the Roman Catholic mendicant Order of Friars Minor*.
The name, Conventual, has been used since 1431 to designate the Friars following a less rigorous rule, but this group was not recognized until 1517.
Three Popes have been elected from the Order of Conventuals. The term, Conventual, has also been used to designate groups following a rule less strict than the original (particularly in regard to the corporate possession of property) in several other religious Orders. V.J B. conversion: The term conversion, as applied to religions, means fundamentally a rather definite and somewhat sudden change in the dominant beliefs, or attitudes, or sympathies, or allegiances or aspirations of an individual. The word probably cannot be rightly defined, for each case of conversion seems, in most respects, to be unique,—just as are poems or plots of plays, or scientific discoveries, or peculiarities of "personality," or sunsets. If one should collect and study hundreds of confessions of conversion as has the writer of these lines, he would be inclined to say "each is an original."

One can at least designate certain types, or shall we say species within the genus, of these picturesque,—often altogether dramatic,—experiences.
The classification that follows, used for descriptive purposes, cannot be exhaustive,—only suggestive and provocative.

1. The drama of conversion is apt to center in the birth of a new and higher selfhood. The organism, from the day of its inception, is basically and fundamentally integrative Like magic it heals wounds, assimilates difficulties, and accepts challenges. (W. B. Cannon, Wisdom of the Body, also Bodily Changes) The storm and stress of youth is the testing ground for the birth of the new selfhood. "The thing we long for that we are for one transcendent moment." "Seek and ye shall find." These pregnant sayings are good biology and good psychology. New energies are set free. Fresh coordination of "higher" impulses do occur.

Despite a considerable number of "backslid-ings"* (five or six per cent) and recurrences of struggles with old attitudes and habits (about one-third of the entire number), it appears, from an intimate study of many hundreds of confessions, that something of permanent value is carried over into later years. (Starbuck, Psychology of Religion (1899), Ch. 28).

2. Conversion is, rather fundamentally, a blossoming, or fruition, of the basic biological and psychological urges and drives. A reach, a quest for novelty, characterizes most living creatures, including children and youth. The finer impulses seek an outlet. They ripen into dreams, then into longings. The bud does burst. The vision clears, —sometimes slowly and almost imperceptibly, sometimes "like flashes struck from midnight."

Several statistical inquiries indicate definitely the age-coincidence of conversions and accessions to puberty. For the most adequate, also most challenging critique of this notion, consult Elmer T. Clark's The Psychology of Religious Awakening (1929). (G. A. Coe, The Spiritual Life, Starbuck, The Psychology of Religion).

Hence a victory for the Freudians*, and also for G. Stanley Hall (Adolescence) who are convinced that religion is a "sublimation" of sex, or in its refined forms, the "libido."

Is not this event, however, a sublimation also of self regard, (the seeking of personal salvation); of fear, (of final destruction), of gregariousness, (fellowship of the saints), of self-expression, (missionary zeal), of appreciation, (the beauty of holiness); and perhaps a dozen or score of other fundamental "instincts" or propensities, which in their blending or fusion constitute the kingdom of righteousness in the heart. The sweet singer of Israel, realizing the majesty and glory of the heavens and of the universe, exclaims "The Law of the Lord is perfect converting (or restoring) the soul."

Due, doubtless, to faulty education and training, the child is caught quite too completely in a bristling world of things and chores, of specificities of activities and informations, and of superimposed attempts at logical thinking. In adolescence* with new contacts and ripening biological functions which throw new energizing fluids into the life stream the real self may be born or reborn sometimes with dramatic intensity. Viewed in this perspective, conversion may well mean a regeneration*, a rebirth, a transformation from childhood to maturity, from indifference to vitalized social contacts, from fact-mindedness to appreciation of meanings and values, from thoughts about life and the universe to participation soulfully in the drama of living.

3. Conversion often signifies the resolution of a conflict. It may center in the battle between sensuous enjoyments and cultivated tastes, between sin and righteousness, or in the struggle between a God and a satanic force. With St. Augustine* and many of the great souls this battle assumes the majesty of a seemingly life-and-death struggle. David himself knew the terror of the conflict. "Wash me from mine iniquity." "In sin did my mother conceive me." "Create in me a clean heart. Then will I teach transgressors the way and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

4. Conversion often involves a Copernican revolution of values from egocentricism to a response to a universe of spiritual and cosmic Reals. That which lies behind and within this transforming experience has been called by many names: "The Father" (Jesus), "Dear City of God" (Marcus Aurelius), "The Over-Soul" (Emerson), "Jehovah" (Moses), "The All-pervading Beauty" (Plato). Those persons who have made this revolution from earthiness to spirituality have sometimes been designated, in a phrasing borrowed from the Hindu traditions, "twice born souls." (William

James, Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), pp. 166, 363, 488).

5. The term conversion often signifies the definite acceptance "unto salvation" of a creed or doctrine or fellowship. This revolution of values is usually done under the stress of personal appeals, or waves and tides of social pressures. Ideas or vital experiences are impelling. If shared they become irresistible. Propagandism and proselytism among humans run deep racially and rise high in their intensity. Greek philosophy early became evangelical. So it was in India. In about the fifth century B.C. likewise, Buddhism struck deep roots in the cultural soil of that country and spread dramatically across eastern Asia and westward as well. Christianity from its inception was dynamically evangelical. The familiar Bible story of Paul and Barnabas converting individuals and entire communities during their successful journey, is illustrative of the way the mind behaves religiously. Perhaps a lively percentage of wars on the planet have been fundamentally religious conflicts.

6. There are negative or "counter-conversions" that take one away from an already accepted fellowship or doctrine and into a riper or more adequate one. These are usually accompanied by similar strains and agonizings and then final satisfactions as were originally experienced by the devotee. (James, The Varieties of Religious Experience, pp. 175 ff.) (Starbuck, Psychology of Religion, p. 137 ff.) Of this number, some move out into bleaker mental weather and build for themselves islands of rest and satisfaction not poorly symbolized by the remark "He believes in no-God and worships It." See James' Varieties of Religious Experience for a description of Ratisbonne and other striking instances of a serene and satisfying counter-conversion.

7. There are ethical conversions. It would be unfair to omit those who profess and advocate an "ethical conversion." As Felix Adler, founder of the Ethical Culture Society*, indicates,—a person may be a Christian for many years and yet not be recognized as one until he has become regenerated. We find in the Stoic sage, the Christian and the Hindu the same notion of a second birth which will make it seem as if he had really become a new man and leading an entirely new life . . . We too must become regenerate, be born into the new spirit so that morality will never again seem cold and bare to us but that the divine element which is in it will become uppermost in consciousness. (The Standard, February, 1943, pp. 134 and 135).

8. Conversion as the state of being thrice-born. Just as the youth in his teens and twenties may outgrow the mere sensory delights of childhood and ripen into an appreciation of life's purposes, programs and meanings, so the mature man or woman too much entangled with and enslaved by domestic duties, civic responsibilities, economic problems and social distractions,—even religious observances whose spirit has begun to ossify,—may inwardly rebel and seek afresh the things of "the spirit." In the late middle years the physical and mental powers pass their peak of efficiency. The dynamic of living is deep seated in every organism. Defeat and death come hard. The deeper-higher selfhood cries out for deliverance. The Universe's answer to men and women of spiritual fortitude is a second rebirth of power and insight. This phenomenon is so truly indigenous to human experience that it has repeated itself in cults and personal lives in most of the cultures of the world. The Buddha* (5th century B.C.) after much wrestling of the spirit during his maturer years won the victory and could say "Hell is destroyed in me. . . . I am converted. I am no longer liable to be reborn in a state of suffering and I am assured of final salvation." Seneca*, although involved in the furies of the world statesmanship of the first century A.D. affirmed "I regard myself not so much as a reformed but as a transfigured man."

9. Conversion in terms of "Other-Worldliness." In many ways the most radical revolution of religious values is that in which one renounces altogether this ordinary world of drabness, worry, and distraction and in his maturer years, if not earlier, flees from it, in fact as well as in fancy, and escapes into his own sphere of meditation, or into a cave, or a convent, or a monastery. To solitude and self-denial as marks of "godliness" are often added the soul-discipline of bodily torture. A quite adequate account of the asceticisms and monasticisms of the world as they spread through nearly all the civilizations is found in Hastings Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, Vol. I, pp. 63 to 110. They flourished and spread until the Renaissance. From that time onward they have tended to decrease.

10. Conversion and whole-mindedness. Conversions are likely to occur under emotional stresses and strains and are in danger of emphasizing a partial view of life and religion. William MacDougall has pointed out the pathological character of the "sin complex." (Social Psychology, p. 68). Dr. H. I. Schou "views with some skepticism all sudden conversions occurring after long periods of depression." (Religion and Morbid Mental States). George A. Coe has established through hypnotic suggestion a definite correlation between radical conversion and hallucinations and motor automatisms. (The Spiritual Life, p. 120). Consult for further data E. T. Clark The Psychology of Religious Awakening, Ch. VII).

In the thoughtful, even "scientific," interpretations of the facts of conversion that have flourished for just about a half century, scholars representing the recognized religious orders have participated as warmly and helpfully as have those of more distinctly academic interests. There would seem to be a high degree of agreement that conversion marks certain types of release in the minds and hearts of men and women, of the progressive truth, beauty and righteousness that will bless and "regenerate" and "redeem" humanity. Conversion, then, would seem to be the act of taking a positive, not a negative or indifferent, attitude towards the vital things of human life and destiny. See psychology of religion; salvation.

E. T. Clark, The Psychology of Religious Awakening (1929); George A. Coe, Psychology of Religion (1916), (University of Chicago publications in religious education. Handbooks of ethics and religion) and The Spiritual Life (1900); Edmund S. Conklin, The Psychology of Religious Adjustment (1929); George B Cutten, Psychological Phenomena of Christianity (1909), G Stanley Hall, Adolescence (1904); William James, Varieties of Religious Experience (1911); Charles C. Josey, Psychology of Religion (1927); J. H. Leuba, The Psychology of Religious Mysticism (1925), J B Pratt, The Religious Consciousness (1920) and The Psychology of Religious Belief (1907), Edwin D Starbuck, The Psychology of Religion (1899), K. R. Stolz, Psychology of Religious Living (1937); G. M Stratton, Psychology of the Religious Life (1911); W. B. Thomas, Psychology of Conversion (1935); Robert H Thouless, An Introduction to the Psychology of Religion (1923); A. C. Underwood, Conversion, Christian and Non-Christian.
Encyclopedia Articles: Encyclopedia Britannica—13th Edition, Vol. VII pp. 46 ff; Catholic Encyclopedia—Vol. IV pp. 347-348; Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics—Vol. IV pp. 104-110; Jewish Encyclopedia—Vol. IV pp. 249 ff, New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge Vol. III pp. 261 ff.   E D.S.

conviction of sin: Conviction of sin* is not the ordinary natural feeling that we are not perfect, that we err or make mistakes. It is a definite evangelical experience connected with sin as that in our life which is contrary to God. It is the realization by the individual of the chasm that divides him from God, that lies between his inner state and the holy demands of God. Thus it comes through the vision of God (Isa. 6:1-5), or by the presence and action of the Holy Spirit* (John 16: 7 ff). It includes remorse and despair of oneself, and is preparatory to repentance toward God and to salvation as the gift and work of God. Much is heard today of social conviction of sin, the sin of the community against its members. This touches a phase of the moral life; but it is at the depth of evangelical conviction only as individuals feel responsibility even for this sin and are moved to repent. See repentance.
H. R. Mackintosh, The Christian Apprehension of God (1929), (Student Christian Movement); R. S. Moxon, The Doctrine of Sin (1922).   J.L.

cooperation: The literal and general meaning is a working together. In a more special sense, cooperation began in a successful way among the now famous Rochdale Pioneers in England in 1844, though remarkable abortive attempts at cooperation were made in the late eighteenth century in southern England. In its narrowest meaning, it is a getting together or a pooling of economic interests. in matters of lending and borrowing, or of buying, or of processing and shipping. A whole community or that part of it with interests in common joins hands, to see to the quality of its own production and also to control markets and to get fair prices for products; thus middlemen tend to disappear, besides, people own their own stores and service stations, and set up their own clinics and employ nurses and doctors. In these ways, cooperation seems to many persons to be essentially economic. But it is not exclusively economic, since it engages other human needs and capacities, such as the moral, political, educational and religious, and some authorities think it to belong primarily to adult education. See labor movements.

G. Richardson ABC of Cooperatives (1940); F. Hall and W P. Watkins, Co-operation. A survey of the history, principles and organization of the movement in Great Britain and Ireland (Manchester, Eng., 1937); J. P. Warbasse, Cooperative Democracy, 3rd ed. (1936).   L.R.W.

cope: An ecclesiastical vestment, worn by bishops, etc., and also by priests for certain ceremonial purposes, as, e.g., processions, etc. An adaptation of the ancient cappa, but usually ornamented richly.
                                                                    W.N.P.

Copernican astronomy: Copernicus (Polish astronomer, 1473-1543) pointed out the superior mathematical coherence of the view that the earth moves around the sun, and is thus not the motionless center of things it was held to be in Ptolemaic astronomy*. The sun, however, in the new astronomy assumed the role from which the earth was displaced. (Newton later denied centrality even to the solar system) That the earth moves had been suggested long before, as early as 250 B C., and that mathematical elegance and unity are to be looked for in nature was taught by Italian neo-Platonists who influenced Copernicus, and by the ancient Pythagoreans*. Copernicus, Kepler, Galileo, and Newton effected the shift from a teleological to a mathematical way of interrogating nature. Or at least, the telos or end that is made primary by these men is no longer human welfare, but the abstract and universal end of mathematical rationality—the glory of God as cosmic mathematician, rather than as cosmic ally and judge of humanity.

N. Copernicus, De revolutionibus orbium coelestium (Ed. of 1873), Ger. trans. by Menzzer (1879). L Prowe, Nicolaus Coppernicus (1883-84).   C.H.

Coptic Church: The native Egyptian church derives from the ecclesiastical-political rivalry between Alexandria and Constantinople* rather than from the christological* controversy over monophysitism*. It was Egyptian nationalism represented by natives and monks against Byzantine* imperialism. When the Council of Chalcedon (451) decided against Eutyches, the nationalist Copts lined up against the Byzantine Melchites making the provincial Coptic Church a reality. Since 1882, western missionaries have had access to Egypt and the Coptic Church at present constitutes about one-twelfth of the population and has a patriarch, metropolitans and bishops with interests also in Jerusalem and Jaffa as well as at Khartoum. See canons of various churches.
                                                                    C.H.M.

Coptic versions: See versions of the Bible, ancient.

Cord, confraternities of the: Four societies authorized by the R. C. Church to honor: 1) Our Lady of Consolation, founded by Saint Monica; 2) St. Francis of Assisi; 3) St. Joseph, commemorating a miraculous cure; 4) St. Thomas Aquinas, to secure chastity.   C.V.

Corinthian style: See temples, Greek and Roman.

Corinthians, First and Second Letters to the: While Paul was at Ephesus, on the third missionary journey, he was in occasional communication with Corinth, across the Aegean His first recorded letter to them, mentioned in I Cor. 5 9, may be preserved in part in II Cor. 6 14-7 1. Visitors from Corinth brought him disturbing news of factions and immoralities in the Corinthian church, and soon after a letter of questions on practical matters was brought him from Corinth (I Cor. 7 1). He dealt with the report he had received and with these questions in our I Corinthians Of especial importance are his discussion of how rights should sometimes be waived, ch. 9, and his account of the place of love in Christian living, ch. 13, and of the Christian hope of immortality, ch. 15. The Corinthians were more incensed than pleased with this great letter, however, and he wrote a third, anguished letter, written with many tears and regretted after it was sent, probably preserved in II Cor., 10-13, which enables us to look into the very heart of Paul. This was carried to Corinth by Titus, and Paul waited anxiously for his return. He concluded his work at Ephesus, and went to Troas, where he hoped to find Titus. But he was not there, so Paul went on to Macedonia. There he found Titus, with good news from the Corinthians, they had seen their mistake and were once more loyal and devoted to Paul. Paul writes a fourth letter, our II Cor. 1-9, setting forth the motives and methods of his ministry, 2 12-6.10, in a milder, more conciliatory strain. Chs. 8, 9 deal with the collection he was making for the poor Jewish Christians of Jerusalem. The whole Corinthian correspondence falls in the years 54-56.

Literature· H. Lietzmann,· Handbuch zum Neuen Testament. An die Korinther, I-II (2d ed , 1923), A Robertson and A. Plummer, First Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians (2d ed., 1916); A Plummer, Second Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians (1915).
                                                                    E.J.G.

Corning (Iowa) community: See communistic settlements, secular.

corporal: The cloth, usually linen, on which the eucharistic vessels rest (and in the Roman ceremonial the Host* itself until just before Communion), originally covering the whole altar, but now not much over 1 ft. square, the name is from corpus, body, because the Body of Christ rests on it.   E.R.H.

corporate personality: Expression designating the unity of the social group (family, clan, tribe or nation) which binds its members together by fictitious or actual blood-tie. Implies also a realistic solidarity with the past and future generations, the social group being an organic body in space as well as in time. Notion of considerable importance for the correct understanding of the O.T. doctrines of Covenant, Sin, Atonement, Vicarious Suffering, Sheol, Individualism, and even of the N.T. conceptions of Church, Communion of Saints, etc.

See J Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture (1926), pp. 263 ff., 474 ff., etc ; H. Wheeler Robinson, "The Hebrew Conception of Corporate Personality," in Werden und Wesen des Alten Testaments (1936), edited by P Volz, F. Stummer and J. Hempel, pp 49-62. S.L T.

Corporation Act of 1661: This act excluded Dissenters* from membership in municipal and similar corporations in England, it gradually fell into desuetude after 1718, but was not formally repealed until 1828. E.R.H.

Corpus Christi: (Lat., Body of Christ) The Thursday after Trinity Sunday, a feast instituted in 1264 through the efforts of St. Juliana of Cornillon (Belgium), to honor the Real Presence* of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist. C.V.

Corpus Doctrinae: (Lat. body of doctrine) A term applied to collections of confessional writings in force in various Lutheran state churches in Germany before the Book of Concord* in 1580 brought about a uniform confessional basis. Among the most authoritative was the Corpus Doctrinae Prutenicum (1567) drawn up by Chemnitz* and Mörlin for the Church of Prussia. T.A.K.

Corpus Juris Canonici: See Canon Law, decretals.

cosmic egg: See cosmogonies.

cosmogonies: The earliest theories regarding the origin of the world were suggested by man's own creative activity. It is not surprising, therefore, that a single culture may have several creation* stories. In these speculations a god is usually the actor. He weaves the world on a loom (Egypt, India, the Babylonian Ea wove reeds together over the primeval waters, covered them with earth as the dwelling place for the gods), he molds the earth as a potter (Egypt), or if the earth is already in existence molds man from clay (American Indian, Hebrew); he creates the universe by sacrifice (India); he builds the world as a master artificer (Egypt, India); he speaks the earth into existence by the magic word (Egypt, Israel, India, Babylonia). The sexual union of the parent gods, Heaven and Earth, was a common motif. It occurs in Japan, Egypt, Greece, India, China and America. The emergence of life from an egg suggested the idea of a cosmic egg floating on the waste of waters from which comes the creator (India, Egypt, Greece, Polynesia).

All of these early creators worked with preexistent materials. There was no thought of creation out of nothing. The belief was almost universal that before the beginning of creation there was nothing but a vast expanse of waters shrouded in darkness. Greek thought placed before the origin of man's world a variety of existences material and abstract—ocean, chaos, aether, night, time, earth and heaven from whose union the gods were born. The Egyptian schools made several geneological arrangements of ocean, earth, heaven, sun and air. The creation of the ordered world and man came later. In the Hebrew creation stories Yahweh* found the pre-existing barren earth and ordered it, or subdued chaos and the dark deep, putting the waters above the firmament and spreading the earth over the lower waters. Then he created the sun, moon and stars, the creatures of the sea, the earth and man. Christianity inherited the Hebrew cosmogony. In the Middle Ages the creation of the world out of nothing became a dogma for Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Philosophic thought in Greece and India played with the idea of a single basic principle underlying the evolution of the universe—water, air, fire, the four elements, nous, breath, desire. In most cultures one of the gods was credited with the work of creation. At least ten gods claimed the honor in India and the choice was not finally made among them before philosophy and the idea of a cyclic universe made creator gods meaningless. Zoroastrianism divided the creative work, Ormazd producing all good things and Ahriman the evil.

When philosophy makes the choice of a beginningless universe rather than a beginningless god the forms of the existing world are the result of a cyclic movement of eternal change. (See cycles of time.) In the Sankhya* system of India the attraction of Purusha, the infinite number of eternal souls upon Prakriti, eternal matter, produces the world. Classical Confucianism* posits at the beginning the Great Unity. This unfolds into the Yang and Yin*, then the five dynamic elements and through their infinite combinations produces material things, plants, animals and man. In Hinduism and Buddhism vast cycles of beginning and destruction of the universe covering incalculable time spans take place within the eternal absolute. Buddhist cosmography provides heavens, worlds and hells for all types of existences from beings of bodiless, pure thought to the demons and the damned. A total system may include a thousand million universes. See evolution. A.E.H.

cosmological argument: See cause; God. Cf. teleological argument.

Coulanges de, Fustel: (1830-1889) Being one of the most prominent French historians of the ancient world and of medieval history, he attempted to show that ideas—in particular religious ideas—generally are the causes of social changes and the primary factor of social phenomena. He showed that wherever new religions arise, introducing new ideas, they radically modified society. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City (1900). H.H.

council: See synod.

Councils, Buddhist: See Buddhist Terminology.

councils, ecumenical: See ecumenical councils.

Councils, Lateran: See Lateran Councils.

counseling, personal: See clinical psychology, psycho therapy, cure of souls.

counter conversion: See conversion.

Counter-Reformation: See Catholic Reformation, the.

covenant: (O.T. berith; N.T. diatheke) One of the fundamental words in biblical religion, a formula, originating as the legal basis of society, used to describe the special relationship between God and people.

A. O.T. Conception

A discussion may be divided into two parts: the covenant 1) as the basis of community and 2) as theological terminology.

1. In early Israelite society as in all nomadic or semi-nomadic society covenants between men and between groups were the legal arrangements which made peaceful community relations possible. In the O.T. the expression most frequently used is: X cut a covenant with Y. Other verbs are occasionally employed, but "cut" is the most common, and probably refers to sacrificial rites which originally initiated the agreement. Two familiar illustrations of O.T. covenants are those made between David and Jonathan (I Sam. 18.3, 20.8, and 23 18) and between Jacob and Laban (Gen. 31. 44-55). In the latter the rite consisted of the setting up of a pillar (E source), or heap of stones (J source), vows, sacrificial offering, and community meal. It is important to notice that the deity (or deities? Cf. vs. 53) of the respective groups was made a party to the agreement and would see that it was kept (n.b. the Mizpah Benediction). Thus the covenant was absolutely binding and could never be safely broken. Righteousness in the O.T.,* therefore, is primarily the maintenance of the covenant, while sin was its transgression, a breach of an agreement.

2. With this background the theological significance of the word is clear. The sources agree that in the period of the Wandering, Conquest, and Settlement that which held the various groups of the people of Israel together was a religious bond or covenant (cf. Exod. 24 and Josh. 24), made of their own free will with Yahweh. God chose Israel to be His people, and Israel chose Him to be her God. Israel was thus conscious of a special contractual relationship existing between her and God, a relationship carrying with it certain obligations, the keeping of which meant life or death, blessing or curse (Dt. 30.15 ff.; see further· lovingkindness).

Later writers, especially Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the authors of Deuteronomy and the Priestly Writings, made frequent use of this conception. Israel, it was claimed, had broken the covenant (Hos. 6:7, 8:1; Jer. 11: 1 ff., 34:18). An explanation was accordingly provided for the problem of suffering, though to some it was not entirely adequate, since it raised the problem of theodicy (cf. Hab. and Job). A fundamental difference of opinion between religious leaders in the O.T. was in regard to the precise obligations which the covenant with God entailed. While the priestly group emphasized the external prescriptions of the law, in particular the ritualistic law, the greatest of the prophets were more concerned with deeper ethical and religious issues, a point of view which found one of its highest expressions in the prediction of a new covenant, not like that made on Sinai which had been broken by Israel, but one which was to be written on the hearts of men (Jer. 31 31 ff.). See blood, circumcision; corporate personality.

B. N.T. Conception

The Greek word diatheke was most commonly employed in Hellenistic Greek for "will," "testament," but in the LXX and N.T. it is also used to designate the O.T. idea of covenant. The most frequent use of the latter in the N.T. is in the Pauline writings and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where the contrast is made between the Old Covenant of law and the New Covenant in Christ. The O.T. conception, expressing the comprehension of the divine election and the binding relationship of the elect to God, is not developed in the N.T. The idea of covenant there is used rather to clarify the difference between Christianity and Judaism (cf. Luke 22.20, I Cor. 11:25, Gal. 3 15 ff.; Heb. 8 ff.).

G. Kittel, ed., Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, Zweiter Band (Stuttgart, 1935), pp. 105-137. This is a careful study of the word in both the O.T. and N.T. with full bibliographical reference. See also J. Pedersen, Israel (1926), pp. 279 ff., 363 ff., 414 ff.; and L. Kohler, Theologie des Alten Testaments (Tubingen, 1936), pp. 43-58.

G.E.W.

covenant (or federal) theology: This arose late in the 16th century, apparently independently, among the Reformed of western Germany, English Puritans and Scottish theologians. These . Calvinists, hesitating over the representation of God involved in the foreordination of individuals before time, devised a historical conception of His dealings with man, in the form of two covenants, of works and of grace, all on a Scriptural basis. Under the former God offered to man eternal life on condition of obedience; this covenant being broken in Adam, God altered His plan by establishing the covenant of grace, under which He gave salvation through faith. This doctrine strengthened its hold in the early 17th century among English Puritans and in Scotland, and therefore has large place in the Westminster Confession*. Various formulations of the covenant of grace appeared; in the West. Conf. it is said to be "administered" in three periods: before the Mosaic law, under the law through the sacrifices and the prophets, finally fully in the gospel. In the 17th century this theology was elaborated by Dutch Calvinists, chiefly Cocceius* and Witsius and by the Swiss Turretin. The covenant formed the thought of New England Puritanism, not only in theology but also in matters ecclesiastical, social and political. As a definite scheme the covenant theology has lost most of its once wide vogue and strong influence, but it has left permanent deposits in conceptions of God's gracious purpose and human obligation to Him, and records in hymns and prayers still used. See feudalism.

J. Ball, A Treatise of the Covenant of Grace (London, 1645); T. Boston, The Marrow of Modern Divinity, in Whole Works, VII (Aberdeen, 1850); J. Cotton, A Treatise of the Covenant of Grace 1645); W. Hastie, Theology of the Reformed Church (Edinburgh, 1904); P. Miller, The New England Mind (1939), pp. 365-462 and bibliographical appendix.

R.H.N.

OK

Provincial Church, confessional Protestant, democratic declarations, and American Protestant, sect and cult. The three creeds which formerly were regarded as ecumenical are the Apostles' Creed*, the Nicene Creed and the Athanasian Creed* (the particular confessional statements of the various Catholic and Protestant bodies are discussed under Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church).

The Apostles' Creed has been very popular in both the Catholic and Protestant churches The apostles were not concerned with its composition and its romantic history has only recently been recovered. It did not result from the conflict with Gnosticism and Marcionism but was in process of formation from the early days of Christianity. Simple confessions to Jesus, two member confessions to God and Christ and three member confessions to God, Christ and the Holy Spirit are embedded in the N.T. The early Roman form of the Apostles' Creed (see Old Roman Symbol) consisted of "I believe in God the Father Almighty and in Christ Jesus his Son, our Lord, and in holy Spirit, holy Church and resurrection of the flesh." The final form of the Apostles' Creed was reached in Gaul whence it returned to Rome in the eighth century. The traditional text can hardly be traced beyond the sixth century and the word "body" of the eleventh affirmation dates from A.D. 1543.

The complete history of the Nicene Creed is very much in question. The Lambeth conference of A.D. 1888 raised the question of the desirability of the revision of the English version The debate over its text was very violent between A.D. 325 and 381 resulting in a considerable expansion, in changes in meanings of words, and finally in the formation of the various provincial churches (Persian, Nestorian, Jacobite, Coptic, Ethiopian, Armenian). In 325, homoousios denoted communion and equality and identity of being between Father and Son, in 381, only the two former. During the bitter controversy, A.D. 325-381, Athanasius* the chief defender of the orthodox view was sent into exile four times and accused of the use of black magic and of murder as well. When the Roman church in the eleventh century finally added the notorious filioque to the third article, making the procession of the Holy Spirit* from the Father and the Son, the permanent schism* between the Roman church and the Greek church came on.

That the Athanasian Creed, or Symbolum Quicunque should still be considered ecumenical is strange indeed. In the Latin it consists of 44 short theses. Its origin is unknown although contemporary criticism assigns it to the sixth century Athanasius of course did not compose it. Only in the late seventh century is it assigned to Athanasius. It may have been a consensus of sermonic materials or the work of a single theologian in Gaul or Spain. It was first used in worship in the time of Charlemagne and only in the thirteenth century regarded as equal to the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed.

Anglicanism has given it liturgical value but the American Protestant Episcopal Church omits it in Article VIII and in worship. It was never adopted in the Eastern Church* and hence no authorized Greek text exists. By substitution of a trinity of the one Divine person for a trinity of persons this creed would have been acceptable to Swedenborg.

The essence of the Athanasian Creed is. "And the Catholic Faith is this That we worship one God in Trinity and Trinity in Unity, neither confounding the persons nor dividing the Substance . . . that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is God and Man . . . at whose coming all men shall rise again with their bodies, and shall give account for their own works."

In Catholicism, the Bible and tradition are fundamental for truth and faith. Hence its creeds are absolute and infallible in authority. Eastern Catholicism claims infallibility for seven "ecumenical" councils* from I Nicene Council (325) to the II Nicene Council (787). Western Catholicism extends the claim to the Council of Trent and the Vatican Council and pronouncements of the popes when intended as official decisions on matters of faith and morals.

For orthodox Protestantism*, the Bible* is the only infallible rule of Christian faith and practice and hence the authority of confessions of faith is relative, subordinate, limited. The confession is not a rule of faith but of doctrine and its sanction ecclesiastical. For other types of Protestantism, the confession is only credo (a personal profession) and never credendum (a necessary and imposed creed). The idea of the covenant prevails among various democratic Protestant bodies.

Historically considered, creeds are convenient summaries arising out of definite religious situations, designed to meet urgent contemporary needs, and serving as tests of orthodoxy. Therefore they are inadequate in new crises and unable to secure uniformity of belief. No confession of faith has ever been composed that has done justice to the faith and experience of its subscribers. They overemphasize some values and overlook others and cannot anticipate future issues. None of the creeds answers our questions regarding disarmament, race prejudice, pacifism. They do not detect error and make Christianity an intellectual affair, sometimes producing religious astigmatism and dishonesty. Ecumenicity applies at the very best merely to approval and never to content of any creed. See Christology, Constantinopolitan Creed; Trinity.

W. A Curtis, "Confessions" in Hastings' Encyclopedia R. E. 3, 831-901, A. von Harnack, History of Dogma, 7 vol. (1894-1899), K Holl, Gesammelte Aufsaetze, II, 115-128; H Lietzmann, Geschichte der Alten Kirche (1936), vol. 2; C. H. Moehlman, Protestantism's Challenge (1939); P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 3 vol. (1876).

C.H.M.

cremation: See death and burial practices.

Cremer, Hermann: (1834-1903) He was professor in Greifswald. A personally influential Lutheran pioneer of biblical theology. Interpreting forensically and very energetically the Pauline doctrines of sin, justification and judgment on the basis of conscience, he fought the speculative doctrine of God in favor of a biblical doctrine.

Lehre von den Eigenschaften Gottes (Gotha, 1897), Das Wesen des Christentums (Gutersloh, 1902).
H.H.

crescent: (from Lat., crescens, present participle of crescere, to grow) An emblem representing a half-moon with horns turned up. The crescent and star were ancient Byzantine symbols of Constantinople assumed as the standard of the Ottoman Turks upon their capture of the city. The Order of the Crescent was founded by Selim II in 1799 to confer knighthood upon Christians for service to the Turkish state. It is now extinct. Metaphorically, it may refer to Islam*. P.E.J.

crime and criminal law: See guilt, juvenile delinquency, law, penology, prison reform.

crisis theology: See Barth, Karl, Gogarten, F., Thurneysen, E.

Critical Realism: See epistemology.

criticism: See Biblical criticism.

cromlech: A circle of huge stones, standing upright, as at Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain. Sometimes the cromlech surrounded a tomb, sometimes a stone altar. P.G.M.

Cromwell, Oliver: (1599-1658) Born in Huntingdon, Cromwell was educated in the grammar school under the Puritan Thomas Beard and in Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. As a member of the Parliament of 1628 and of the Short and the Long Parliaments (1640-1649) he displayed an unrelenting hostility to bishops and Puritan* sympathies which led him to become an Independent. A military leader of marked ability, he organized the army which defeated Charles I and the Scots. Having become Protector (1653-1658) through its support, he granted toleration to all except Roman Catholics, Anglicans, and the extremist sects, and attempted to establish a national church, Calvinistic in dogma, which should embrace Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists.
Wilbur Cortez Abbot, A Bibliography of Oliver Cromwell (1929); id., The Writings and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell (1937-), which when completed (the third, and last, volume is now being written), will be the definitive biography of Cromwell. E.W.K

crosier, crozier: A bishop's pastoral staff in the form of a shepherd's crook, symbolizing episcopal jurisdiction and pastoral office. P.V.N.

cross: In the N.T. the Cross is often used as a synonym of the death of Jesus. Paul declares that his Gospel is that of the Cross, i.e., it centers on the fact that Christ secured man's redemption by his death. The Cross is thus identified with the "blood of Christ" though, properly speaking, in crucifixion* there was no shedding of blood. It is the fact of a violent death, not the manner of it, which is uppermost in the minds of the N.T. writers. Often, however, a special significance is attached to the mode of death, and all the ideas connected with crucifixion are woven into the Christian message. It was tormenting, and the followers of Christ are to bear pain without shrinking. It was long drawn out, and they are to suffer patiently. It was ignominious, and they must brave ridicule and abasement. A symbolic value is found even in the details of this manner of death, e.g., crucifixion took place outside of the city gate, it involved a lifting up, the Law had pronounced a curse on those who suffered it, the offence they expiated was placarded above their heads (cf. Col 2 14) Again and again in the N T. the Cross is brought into sharp contrast with the exaltation of Christ. By humbling himself to the uttermost he attained to the sovereign glory (Phil 2 8, 9. Heb. 12 2. Rev 5 9-14). Much of this reflection on the mere circumstances of Jesus' death may appear morbid or fantastic, but it must be remembered that in N.T. times crucifixion was a familiar spectacle, with many degrading associations. Christian teaching had to take account of these, and change the impression they had left on men's minds. Perhaps it was the chief triumph of Christianity that it transformed the Cross into the symbol of all that is grandest and most sacred. See atonement in Christianity, propitiation, stations of the Cross.

F C. Porter, The Mind of Christ in Paul (1934) G B. Stevens, The Pauline Theology (1892); W. Morgan, Religion and Theology of Paul (1917). E.F.S.

Crozer Lectureship Fund, The Samuel A.: A lectureship established at Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Penn., by Mr. Samuel A. Crozer in 1880. A gift of $10,000 provided that the topics of these lectures be profitable for Christian ministers and students and may be given by laymen as well as ministers from any evangelical denomination or country. The course continued annually until 1926 and since that date no course of lectures has been given by any one man Lectures are now provided by outstanding men during the school year. The first lecture was given by the President of McGill University, Canada, in a large auditorium in Philadelphia, the Pennsylvania railroad providing students of the school with free transportation. (Data from the office of the President of the Seminary.) V.F.

crucifix: (Old Fr. or late Lat., crucifixus, from crux, cross; figere, to fix or fasten) A representation of Christ on the cross; loosely, a cross* used as a Christian symbol. The cross has always been a sacred Christian sign. The Crucifix came into general use after the sixth century. At first, Christ was usually represented as robed. Oriental artists began to depict the crucifixion realistically during the sixth century, probably as a reaction to the Monophysite* contention at the time. In the west the realistic presentation became normal from the ninth century on. See symbols, particular Christian. C.V.

crucifixion: This mode of execution was adopted by Rome from Carthage, and was notoriously the most dreadful of all tortures. It was devised to rack every part of the body, and to protract the suffering over a period of many hours, and sometimes of several days. See cross.   E.F.S.

Crusades: (From Med. Lat., cruciata, marked with the Cross, through Sp. cruzada and Fr. croisade) Originally a series of wars for the recovery of the Holy Places of Christendom, particularly Bethlehem and Jerusalem, subsequently, any war against heretic or infidel sponsored as such by the Bishop of Rome.

Causes: With the decline of the Abbāsid Caliphate of Baghdad, the Seljuk Turks conquered Armenia, routed the Byzantines at Manzikert (1071), subdued Asia Minor, established their capital at Nicaea and, marching on Palestine, they proceeded to take Jerusalem (1076), where their atrocious cruelties to Christian pilgrims caused the greatest indignation and horror. It is important to notice that they were as much enemies to the Caliphate as to Christendom. A period of intense propaganda followed in the West, particularly under Peter the Hermit* (1093), leading to the decision to send an army of warriors bearing the Cross at the Council of Clermont 1095, proclaimed by Pope Urban II. The date fixed was August 15th, 1096. The desire of the Western Church to assist the Holy land was not unmixed with practical motives—the desire to provide the lawless feudal barons of the West with a more remote outlet for their fighting energy. The promise of plenary absolution, great wealth if they survived and a direct path to heaven if they perished ensured the initial success of the movement.

The principal Crusades are: The First Crusade (1096), in which no king took part. It captured Antioch (1098) and Jerusalem (1099), where they set up the Latin Kingdom (1099-1143). The Second Crusade (1147-1149) as a result of the fall of Edessa 1144, led to the preaching of Pope Eugenius III and St. Bernard who persuaded the Emperor Conrad III and Louis VII of France to lead it. It was a failure. The Third Crusade (1189-1192) was summoned by Pope Gregory VIII on account of the capture of Jerusalem (1187) by Saladin, the leader of united Muslim forces. The Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, Philip Augustus of France, Richard I of England and William of Sicily all took the Cross. Frederick was drowned in 1190. Acre fell after "prodigies of valour" in 1191; Saladin promised the return of the True Cross and an indemnity. Quarrels between the leaders and the consequent failure to capture Jerusalem and when peace was concluded with Saladin (1192) rights of pilgrimage and trade were all that was accomplished. The Fourth Crusade (1202-1204) owing to the treachery of the Genoese resulted in the capture of Constantinople (July 1203 and April 1204), which yielded a booty of over $7,500,000 for the Latins. The Latin Empire was established (1205-1261) and the Byzantine power was broken on the eve of the rise of the Ottoman Turks. There followed The Children's Crusade (1212), The Fifth Crusade (1216-17), which was a complete failure; Frederick II's Crusade (1228-1229), which is not recognized as Frederick was under the ban of excommunication. Frederick II concluded a treaty with El Kamil of Egypt (February 1229) and crowned himself as King of Jerusalem (March 1229), as the local clergy refused to cooperate. Had the ecclesiastical authorities cooperated, his success would have been greater. Smaller crusading parties continued to go, e.g., Theobald, King of Navarre (1239-40), Richard of Cornwall and Simon de Montfort (1240). The Sixth Crusade (1248-1254) was led by St. Louis (King Louis IX of France), who after a series of defeats was taken prisoner at Damietta (1249) by Turan Shah, who was murdered the following year (1250). A fifteen year truce was arranged with his successor Musa of Egypt. Louis returned to France in 1254. He pressed the pope to be reconciled with Frederick II. In 1270 he undertook his second crusade, with Prince Edward (Edward I) of England but died of plague at Carthage 1270. Edward left Palestine in 1271 and reached England 1274. This is the last of the genuine crusades. The Crusade of Pius II, the author of the Bull Execrabilis (1460), assembled at Ancona and the death of the Pope (1464) marks the end of the movement.

It is impossible to notice more than a few of the results: the rise of the towns, the rôle of chivalry*, the decay of serfdom, the development of national monarchies, the rise of romantic literature, heresy, the widening of interest and trade, banking and shipping. The main result was the final separation of Christendom and Islam on terms of bitter enmity. The second result was the increased power of the Papacy ("the Crusades were the foreign policy of the Papacy"), partly from the initial prestige, partly by way of diversion of attention from papal policy and partly through the extension of legatine power. In the end, the policy of Crusades was either abandoned owing to royal demands for a General Council, or was diverted to the suppression of dissent and movements for reform. It may be mentioned that General Allenby's march on Jerusalem (1917) was not a Crusade, and that Muslim troops who participated were so assured. See military religious orders.

T. A. Archer and C. L. Kingsford, The Crusades (Story of Nations) (1900); E. Barker, The Crusades (World Manuals) (Oxford, 1925); Camb. Med. Hist., esp. vol. IV; L. Halphen, L'Essor de l'Europe (XI-XIII) (Paris, 1932).   F.W.B.

Crusius, Martin, The Philhellene: (1526-1607) Humanist and Professor of classical languages in the University of Tübingen, Germany. He promoted the idea for the Union of the Greek Orthodox and the Lutheran Churches and worked with all his zeal for it. He also cultivated the friendship of many important laymen and clergymen in Greece. He introduced the study of the Modern Greek language in Germany. He was the first real philhellene in the 16th century. He also wrote important books for the study of Modern Greece as Turcograecia (Basileae, 1584) and Germanograecia (Basileae, 1585). His books are of great value today.   G.E.Z.

crux ansata: The cross with a handle, or ankh, carried in the hand of gods and goddesses in Egyptian inscriptions. Presumed to be a symbol of life, or indicating that existence is a quality of the person who holds it.   P.G.M.

crypt: (Lat., crypta, a concealed, subterranean vault) Early Christian subterranean burial place or catacomb*. Later, an excavation under a church used for burial purposes. Often just "Lower Church" or "Subterranean Chapel."
                                                          S.M.G.

Crypto-Calvinism: (Gr. kryptos, hidden) An opprobrious term applied during the doctrinal controversies of the latter half of the sixteenth century by the strict adherents of Luther's theology to Lutherans suspected of secret preference of Calvin's* views on Christology* and the Lord's Supper*. The Wittenberg theologians Major, Eber, and Crell, and the physician Caspar Peucer, Melanchthon's son-in-law, were the leading Crypto-Calvinists, while Matthias Flacius* was their principal opponent. See Augsburg Confession.
                                                          T.A.K.

Cuchulainn: (Pronounced coohoolin) The champion of the king of Ulster, in Irish mythology. He killed the hound of Culann, and in atonement acted as Culann's hound, guarding his castle as a watch-dog does, for a period. He finally perished in battle, overcome by Druidic spells. At his death his wife, Eimer, died of a broken heart.
                                                          P.G.M.

Cudworth, Ralph: (1617-1688) The most prominent of the Cambridge Platonists*. He believed qualities to be absolute and eternal no matter how they may be labeled. (The squareness of a square could be called circular, but the label would make no change in the eternal quality either of squareness or circularity). Whatever exists, exists by nature, and not by will. His work was designed to refute Hobbes and is based largely on teleology. Author of The True Intellectual System of the Universe; A Treatise On Immutable Morality.
                                                          W.G.H.

cujus regio, illius religio: See Westphalian treaties.

cultural anthropology: See anthropology.

culture: An anthropological term defined by E. B. Tylor as "that complex whole which includes knowledge, belief, art, morals, law, custom, and any other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society." It comprises the totality of human invention and achievement, including all the principles, agencies, and techniques of control which man has acquired over physical nature and human behavior, and all the personal and social experience he has externally accumulated, stored, interchanged, and transmitted by means of tools and symbols.

Physically, culture consists of artifacts, the material inventions and objects made and used by man as a social being, including all man-made modifications of nature, both animate and inanimate. Socio-psychologically, it consists of (a) customs, or socially acquired behavior patterns, folkways, mores, and all overt usages and modes of action habitual to the group, (b) traditions, or all verbally transmitted systems of thought, beliefs, moral codes, philosophy, science, religion, and the like, considered as objectively distinguished from their creators, and stored externally in oral and written language, and (c) group feelings, or sentiments, attitudes, predispositions, and mental sets habitual to the group and basic to its thought and behavior. Culture also includes combinations of traditions, customs, feelings, and artifacts such as institutions, technologies, and occupational and professional skills. Since the material aspects of culture are the products of man's mental life, some anthropologists now refer to them as cultural equipment, reserving the term culture for the subjective aspects of man's group life. The totality of culture and cultural equipment conceived of as handed down from the past is sometimes referred to metaphorically as the social heritage or group inheritance.

Custom or usage is the totality of the acquired ways of acting which are habitual to a group. They are distinguished from inherited or biological determined behavior patterns or instincts on the one hand, and the purely personal idiosyncracies of individual habit on the other. Thus, the biologically determined behavior of eating is inherited, but the custom of eating with oriental chopsticks or occidental cutlery is learned. Habit and custom are for the most part correlative terms. Habit is used to designate a learned behavior pattern if it is thought of as residing in the individual, custom, if it is conceived of as having its locus in the group. The customs of the group are the source of most of the habits of the individual, but the latter, if they diverge from the group patterns, may become customs if they correspond to a group need and the individual is able to impress them on his fellows. Although historically custom had its origin in individual habit which became diffused throughout society by the interaction of individuals, in any given group custom as a factor in forming individual habit so overwhelmingly predominates over individual habit as a factor in creating custom that the sociological aspects of the process take precedence over the psychological aspects. Many customs become so stereotyped and mechanical through repetition that they are performed unreflectively, involving little conscious awareness or deliberate personal judgment. To these W. G. Sumner has applied the term folkways. Other customs are conceived of as normative. They are believed essential to the group welfare, and the individual is coerced to conform to them by the disfavor of his associates if he fails to respect them. To designate such usages Sumner revived the old Latin term mores. The foregoing distinctions are universally recognized by anthropologists and sociologists, but there is wide difference in terminology, some designating the folkways and mores as here defined by the terms, usages and customs respectively, while others limit the term usage to the field of language. Linguistic peculiarities which have not become established as usage constitute slang If customs are thought of as prescribed rules of conduct apart from legal, moral, or religious sanctions, they are referred to as conventions, manners, or etiquette, if such sanctions are added they become respectively law, mores, ritual or ceremony. A custom of short duration is referred to as a fashion, if it is still more ephemeral it is a fad, craze, or vogue.

Tradition is the total body of accepted group beliefs. It is the subjective or ideational side of social behavior, as custom is its objective or behavioristic side. It provides the historical background and rationalization of custom. Tradition may be either oral or written. Legends are traditions of slow growth embodying popular feeling and consisting of admixtures of fact and fancy which are presented as historical. Myths are legends which lack the nucleus of fact. Some authorities would limit tradition to beliefs which lack a competent rational or factual basis, and hence would exclude such transmitted systems of thought as philosophy, and especially science and mathematics. But it may be observed that discoveries in these fields, once made, establish themselves as traditions and are dislodged with difficulty by new discoveries not in accord with the accepted beliefs.

Culture also patterns the affective life of man. Sentiments, attitudes, and the like are ways of feeling which differentiate groups, and which are acquired by the individual as a result of his social experiences.

Finally, institutions are vast complexes of social behavior integrating elements of custom, tradition, sentiment, and material equipment in the furtherance of basic life interests, such as the domestic, the economic, the political, the esthetic, the recreational, and the like. A family, a school, a church, a state, or any other institution, consists of such an integration of cultural features. Technologies and professional and occupational skills are also composed of such combinations. Medicine, the ministry, or any skilled occupation or profession, requires the mastery of the accepted body of knowledge, the assimilation of the customs and sentiments of the group, and the skilled manipulation of the cultural equipment which provides its tools and physical instrumentalities. In a word, culture, which was invented to facilitate the process of human living together, has become increasingly its dominating factor. See environment; folklore; law.

E. E. Eubank, The Concepts of Sociology (1932); E. S. Bogardus, Contemporary Sociology (1931).

H.E.J.

culture epochs: 1) In anthropology, the stages in the evolution of culture through which it was formerly believed all peoples had passed. The theory has a long history, but its modern development is largely due to Lewis H. Morgan who, in his Ancient Society (1877), revived the eighteenth century classif. into savagery, barbarianism, and civilization, and attempted to give it greater precision by sub-dividing each of the first two epochs into lower middle, and higher stages and by specifying the cultural characteristics of each stage. Alexander Sutherland, in his Origin and Growth of the Moral Instinct (1898) similarly subdivided civilization, and added a fourth status which he called "Cultured," in which he also distinguished three stages.

Modern anthropologists have objected to this classification because the popular connotations of the terms employed imply characterizations of peoples not justified by the facts, and because the earlier theory that they represent necessary historical stages which every people has had to traverse in consequence of an inherent natural law of cultural evolution has been rendered untenable by the progress of anthropological research. The course of cultural evolution is not unitary or unilinear. It presents many alternatives of development, and the different races and peoples diverged early, rapidly, and in many different directions. Nevertheless, as C. A. Ellwood has pointed out in his Cultural Evolution (1927), since cultural development is the process whereby man has learned control of physical nature and human behavior, its evolution in the history of mankind as a whole must necessarily conform psychologically to stages in a learning process, however much the history of any given people may have deviated in historical details owing to varied conditions both internal and external to the group, including its isolation from or contact with more advanced peoples. Thus, the late L. T. Hobhouse and his collaborators, in their Material Culture and Social Institutions of the Simpler Peoples (1930), classified the races studied into Lower and Higher Hunters and Lower, Middle, and Higher Agriculturalists, adding Lower and Higher Pastoralists as alternative developments to Agriculture, and concluded that these stages represent "an order corresponding to the degree of control over nature and mastery of material conditions manifested in each."

2) In educational theory, the cultural epochs theory involved the idea that the development of each child recapitulates* the stages in the development through which the race or people to which he belongs has passed, and that this parallelism provides the guiding principle for the sequence of topics of instruction in the educational curriculum. But with the passing of the view that there is just one inherent natural line of concrete development for every culture, this theory has collapsed, due to the loss of its former supposed scientific basis.   H.E.J.

Cumberland Presbyterian Church: In the need for ministers caused by the revivals in Kentucky and Tennessee about 1800 the Presbytery of Cumberland of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. gave standing as licentiates to several young men who were not college graduates, as required by the church, and who also subscribed to the church's Confession of Faith partially, dissenting from its predestinarian* statements. On appeal by a minority of the presbytery the Synod of Kentucky disciplined the licentiates and the majority. The General Assembly at length in 1809 upheld the Synod. Thereupon in 1810 an independent Presbytery of Cumberland was formed By 1813 this had become a synod, and in this year the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church was adopted, including a confession omitting predestinarianism. As the United States expanded this church, zealously evangelistic and liberal, grew rapidly in the south and southwest. By 1890 it had about 180,000 communicants. In 1903 a revision of the Confession of Faith by the Presbyterian Church* in the U. S. A. opened the way for a reunion between it and the Cumberland Church, which was accomplished in 1906. A minority dissented and continued the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, which in 1943 had about 72,500 communicants. There is also a Colored Cumberland Presbyterian Church.   R.H.N.

cuneiform: ("wedge-shaped", Lat, cuneus) The term refers to wedge-shaped signs made on wet clay, a method of writing invented by the Sumerians in Mesopotamia during the 4th and 3rd millennia B.C. It was employed for the writing of many different languages of antiquity during the 2nd and 1st millennia, finally displaced entirely by the Egyptian pen, ink, and paper (papyrus) shortly before the Christian era.   G.E.W

curate: (Lat, curatus) Priest responsible for "cure of souls"—in France parish priest is curé; in England he is rector or vicar, curate commonly means (assistant) curate.   E.R.H.

cure of souls: A term used in Roman and Anglican communions to describe the pastoral work of the priest, to whom at ordination is committed the "cure of souls" in whatever parish he may serve. Normally included in this commission are administration of sacraments, visitations, supervision of parochial matters, etc. A similar idea is found in Lutheran circles in Germany, where the pastor is spiritual father of his flock, with seelsorge. See counseling, personal.   W.N.P.

Curia Romana: The body of sacred congregations to whom the Pope* delegates part of his jurisdiction to be used by them in the government of the universal Church. At present the Curia consists of twelve Congregations, three Tribunals and five Offices.   B.R.

curriculum of religious education: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

cursing: See blessing and cursing.

cursives: Manuscripts written in running, or small-letter hands, such as were anciently used for personal and business purposes, and later from the tenth century on came to prevail in literary manuscripts or as we would say, books. See manuscripts of the Bible.   E.J.G.

custom: See culture; folklore; law.

Cybele-Attis Cult: See Mother Goddesses; mystery religions.

cycles of time: The regular rhythm of death and rebirth of the seasons probably suggested the idea of a cyclic movement of decay, destruction and renewal of the world as a whole. Usually the perfect age is placed at the beginning of the cycle and is followed by periods of progressive deterioration. The selection of fire, flood and wind as the universal agents of destruction at the end came from sad experience with nature's forces. The Aztecs added famine to the other three destroyers. The last night of every fifty-second year was for them the critical moment—the beginning of doom or the renewal of life Hesiod set the pattern for Greek thought with his four ages—golden, silver, brazen and iron—each later era worse than the one before. The idea of cyclic renewal was established by Plato's time. Measurement of the time span of a cycle he borrowed from Babylonia. It was the period required for the sun and all the planets in conjunction at the beginning to return to the same position at the end. Zoroastrianism* divided the duration of the world into four ages of three thousand years each but had no theory of eternal recurrence. The four ages of the Hindu* cycle lasted twelve thousand divine years, equal to 4,320,000 human years. In a beginningless and endless universe this time seemed too modest. Later thinkers multiplied it by a thousand and to the cyclic period added a night of equal length before a new cycle began. The Buddhist* cycle begins with the age of destruction and moves through four vast periods to the age of perfection and then back again to the evil age. Each of these eras is of immense length. Texts and countries vary in their calculation of the time, but whether we accept the number of year as 1 followed by 52 ciphers or 1 followed by 168 ciphers it is still a long time. These great periods constantly recur to end in cosmic cataclysms of fire or water or wind followed by renewal. The Jain cycle begins with an ideal age four hundred trillion oceans of years in length, declines through six ages of decreasing length and returns through six ages to the starting point. See church year cycle, cosmogonies; creation, philosophy of history.
                A.E.H.

Cynics: A Greek school of ethics founded by Antisthenes (disciple of Socrates) and named for the gymnasium (Cynosarges) where he lectured. Antisthenes (fl. 400 B.C.) taught that the good life should be sought for its own sake, and should be restricted to essentials. The good man is independent of externals (such as family, wealth, happiness), keeping his desires under the strict control of reason. Later Cynics regarded all pleasure as evil, including even mental pleasures like the study of philosophy. Some Cynics, like Diogenes, rebelled against social courtesies and even against law. Stoicism* was a less severe and more humanitarian outgrowth of Cynicism.   J.E.N.

Cyprian of Carthage: (ca. 200-258) The greatest church-man of the third century. Born in Carthage of a noble and wealthy heathen family. About 245 A.D. he was converted to an ascetic type of Christian life. Became Bishop of Carthage, and thus head of the North African clergy, two years later. Martyred under Valerian, September 14, 258 A.D. Contributed to the theory and practice of ecclesiastical administration and discipline rather than to theology.

Cyprian went further than Ignatius* of Antioch in developing a "high" doctrine of the Church, for he insisted that there is no salvation beyond the bounds of the visible Church, and that the Church is in the bishop. He also contributed to the doctrine of works of super-erogation*, which later played a large part in the Romish penitential system. See clergy.   A.K.R.

Cyrenaics: A Greek school of ethics founded by Aristippus (a disciple of Socrates) of Cyrene, hence the name. The good life, they held, was that which contained the most pleasure and the least pain. The satisfaction of physical desires brings more intense pleasure and is regarded as higher than mental satisfactions. But the wise man must exercise prudence, not from moral scruples but in order to avoid pain. The theory was known as hedonism*.   J.E.N.

Cyril of Alexandria: (376-444) An acute theologian, but violent controversialist, who became Patriarch of Alexandria about 412 A.D. He administered this high office in a high-handed and not disinterested manner. His Alexandrian rivalry with the Antiochians* led him to active opposition to Chrysostom*. After 428 he became the most influential, but an unprincipled, champion of Christological* orthodoxy against the Nestorians*. He was a zealous advocate of veneration of the Virgin Mary*.   A.K.R.

Cyril of Jerusalem: (ca. 315-386) Became Bishop of Jerusalem about A.D. 350. From 357 to 381 he suffered much as a champion of the Nicene faith against the Arians*, though he found it possible to be friendly with Semi-Arian* bishops. He made contributions to the doctrine of the sacraments and to the liturgy of the church.   A.K.R.

Czech Church Reform: See Hus; Hussitism; Bohemian Brethren. See also Eastern Orthodox Churches, Milic.

D

D: Symbol used for the author(s) of the Book of Deuteronomy* and for a school of historians or editors of the century following publication of Deuteronomy (621 B.C.) who employed the same vocabulary and style as that book, and were imbued with similar religious viewpoints. These editors were responsible for editions of Joshua, Judges, I, II Kings, Jeremiah, and possibly other books.

See R. H Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941) pp 284f , 304ff , 332ff , 365ff., 377ff., 410 ff , J P. Hyatt, "Jeremiah and Deuteronomy," Journal of Near Eastern Studies I (1942), pp 156-173.

J.P.H.

Dagan: An early god of Babylonia, associated with Anu* and Ninib (Ninurta*). He was identified with Bel*, and by many authorities with Dagon*. P G.M.

Dagda: (dago, devos: good god) An old Irish god who ruled the Tuatha de Danaan after their defeat by the Milesians. He was the father of Oengus, and possibly a god of fertility. See Revue Celtique, v. 4, 12 and 16. P.G.M.

Dagon: A god of the Philistines*, mentioned in the Bible, and supposed by some scholars to have been adopted by the invading Philistines from the aborigines of Palestine. Apparently a god of agriculture.

A T. Clay, Amurru (1909), p. 146; ERE, v. 4, p 326. P.G.M.

D'Ailly, Pierre: (1350-1420) Bishop of Cambrai and Puy, Cardinal, Chancellor of the University of Paris where he was the teacher of Jean Gerson*, conciliarist. Ardent worker for the unification of the church during the great western schism, he is most distinguished for his leadership in the Council of Constance*. See conciliarism.

F.W.N.

daimon: (Greek) Before 600 B.C. a) In Homer: A common name used for the gods; personalized powers derived from non-human objects and forces. b) Hesiod imagined a Golden Age in the remote past when the psyche after death became a daimon, but such, he held, was not true in the later Silver Age and Bronze Age; 'power' worshiped independently of the cult of the 'dead'.

After 600 B.C., Pythagoras held diamones to be the same as the psyches of men. Heraclitus identified 'character' in man with the daimon. For Plato the daimon is a tutelary divinity, the nous in every man. Similarly, the daimon, to the Stoic philosopher Marcus Aurelius, is every man's understanding and reason 'Let the daimon in thee be the guardian.' See nous, psyche; Socrates.

F.L.P.

dakhma: "A tower of silence", constructed for the disposal of the dead in Zoroastrianism. The bodies are laid upon stone slabs, naked, to be devoured by vultures.

D. Menant, Les Parsis (Paris, 1898) gives illustrations and floor-plans P.G.M.

Dale, Robert William: (1829-1895) English Congregationalist, was born in Bermondsey. He was educated at Spring Hill College, Birmingham and in 1853 became connected with Carr's Lane Chapel of which he was sole pastor from 1858 till his death. Dale was a public spirited citizen of Birmingham and did much to promote education and religious freedom. He was a strong denominational leader, wrote a Manual of Congregational Principles and was president of the Congregational Union of England and Wales before he was forty. He presided at the first International Congregational Council in London in 1891. He was a strong advocate of ministerial education and it was largely through his influence that Spring Hill College was moved to Oxford and became Mansfield College. He was the first Englishman to give the Beecher Lectures at Yale.

He edited the Eclectic Review and the Congregationalist for eight years, and contributed largely to Quarterly Review, the Nineteenth Century, Contemporary Review, Good Words, and the Sunday School Magazine. His Lectures on the Atonement are a permanent contribution to theological literature. Among his many other notable works are a History of English Congregationalism, (edited by his son in 1897) and several volumes of homiletical and expository work.

Eng. Congreg. Yr. Bk. (1896), p. 208. F.T.P.

dalmatic: An embroidered over-tunic, worn as a mark of honor—first ecclesiastical use by deacons at Rome, later extended (in West) to other deacons, and Bishops. Cf. tunic. E.R.H.

dancing: Emotional expression by patterned, rhythmic movements of the body.

The two principal sources of dancing are religion and romantic love. In most savage communities dancing comprises a considerable part of traditional religious observance. The periodic ceremonial Indian dances in the southwestern United States are well-known examples. They are also typical of both the dancing and the religion of rude cultures, in being closely associated with the seasons and the food supply. In many tribes dancing has also an important role in courtship, often bearing marked resemblance to the strutting and pompously formal self-display of certain birds and animals. Sometimes, on the other hand, it seems to be primarily a means of auto-intoxication for strenuous activity, as, e.g., in the war dance. Again, it may be thought a method of working magic*, as when the women of a tribe dance continuously while the men are away in battle. In such use it obviously serves also to release excess nervous strain.

The Greeks were the first to develop the dance as a value in itself, for the sheer beauty of line and movement, without regard to the occasion. They may therefore be said to have originated the dance as a form of art. It was sensualized and degraded by the Romans, however, until only harlots were dancers. The Christian Church revived the dance in pantomimes and ballets before the altar in the Middle Ages. At the same time it continued as an independent art in Spain. The first theatrical ballet was composed by Cardinal Riario (c 1500).

In modern times the dance has been in a perpetual conflict among forces appearing within the activity itself. Among the degrading trends are the tendencies to gorgeous display, mere motor skill, and sensuality. In the middle of the eighteenth century, in France the ballet had sunk to the level of a bold advertisement of prostitutes under royal command. The damage to morals and health inflicted by much social dancing in American public halls and other poorly supervised places, especially when accompanied by alcoholism, is well-known. On the other hand, there has occurred, since 1900, a new revival of the dance as a fine art, and since 1918 this movement has made rapid strides.

Both the recreational and artistic values of dancing at its best are undeniable. As a manifestation of religious and ethical feeling, too, the dance may be remarkably effective, because of the complete personal commitment involved in this form of expression. Lucy Lampkin stresses this value in her book, The Dance in Art (1935), the motto of which is the call of Edwin Markham, "Come, let us live the poetry we sing." But the fact that the human body is itself the artistic medium in the dance, the very fact which makes possible some of its finest symbolism of self-purification and consecration, constitutes also an ever-present threat of abuse and degradation, as its history shows. For this reason, and through the influence of Puritanism* and other ascetic movements, many religious groups have been led to oppose dancing in every form, and others to tolerate it only under watchful suspicion.

See La Meri, Dance as an Art-Form (1935), W O E Oesterley, The Sacred Dance (1923)
L H DEW

Daniel: Hebrew book with large Aramaic enclave 2 4b-7 28. The latter is presumably somewhat older "eastern" material hurriedly adapted to new use in Palestine by revisions in chapters 2 and 7 and Hebrew introduction 1 1-2 4a and additional visions, ch. 8f., in the crisis under Antiochus Epiphanes (175-163 B.C.)* The book, as a whole, is composed of two parts: 1-6 the story, 7-12 the visions of Daniel. Historical errors (Belshazzar not last king of Babylon, Darius not first ruler after fall of Babylon) make sixth century origin of stories impossible. Dating of present book can be determined from visions, especially "prophetic" survey of history of Greek kingdoms in chapter 11, which becomes more detailed as the author's own time is reached and only becomes genuinely predictive in 11 40f. Of particular importance because of its influence on Jesus and the primitive church is the vision of chapter 7, with its figure of the "one like a Son of Man*." The book's acceptance of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead (12 2-3), and the later Jewish angelology is also noteworthy. Daniel is the only Jewish apocalypse* to get into the Palestinian Canon. Great influences, both good and bad, have gone forth from it. On the credit side stand the book's philosophy of history and the strength and courage it gave to men, on the debit side there is the prominence given apocalyptic calculation and the first use of devices for reinterpreting or revising figures that prove disappointing (chapter 9). Identification of the fourth empire of chapters 2 and 7 with Rome rather than Greece (so already the Jews of the time of Christ) is totally untenable. Cf. Susannah, History of. See beast.
See R. H Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941), J. A Bewer, Literature of the Old Testament (rev ed., 1933).
E.G.K.

Dante, Alighieri: (1265-1321) Italian poet, author of the Divine Comedy. He was born in Florence of a Guelph family, in early youth came under the transforming influence of Beatrice (Portinari?), the "glorious lady of his mind", was exiled in 1302 after a brief but turbulent political career, wandered throughout most of Italy, finally settling at Ravenna, where he died. The Divina Commedia, begun about 1300 and finished shortly before his death, is an allegorical epic, recounting the poet's journey through Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven under the guidance of Virgil and at last of Beatrice. Replete with symbolism and allusion, it is generally regarded as the supreme poetic embodiment of medieval thought. Besides the Commedia, Dante wrote in Italian the Vita Nuova, containing the story of his love for Beatrice, an unfinished philosophical discourse, the Convivio; and a number of lyrical poems. In Latin he wrote a political treatise, De Monarchia; a treatise on philology, De Vulgari Eloquentia; and several epistles and eclogues.

For the English reader the most satisfactory editions are those in The Temple Classics, containing parallel texts and translations together with brief commen tancs. Among the more notable verse translations of the Commedia are Cary's (1812), Longfellow's (1867), and J. B. Fletcher's (1931). Paget Toynbee's Concise Dante Dictionary (1904) is a valuable handbook.

L.W.C.

Danu: Old Irish goddess of knowledge and culture. Often identified with Brigit*. Much of her cult and ritual passed over to St. Brigit. She was a daughter of Dagda*.

P.G.M

Darwin, Charles: (1809-1882) Having studied medicine and theology without feeling attracted by either, Darwin, in the interest of natural science, joined the Beagle in its voyage around the world (1831-1836). The observations gained therefrom formed the first foundation of his famous biological theory.

As an inquirer he was distinguished by his open and childlike mind. He guessed at an all-pervading interconnection, contending that definite and constant laws prevail throughout nature. He was a good observer by reason of his ability in speculation and in making hypotheses about what he perceived as new in nature. He had a remarkable capacity for grasping objections and keeping them in sight. He admitted that his evolutionary theory did not admit of any direct proof. He regarded the proof of his theory as centering in the intelligible thread of reason by which it connected a vast number of facts. He introduced the habit of dispensing with theological causes In inquiry it was a victory for the principle of natural causation, the principle of which he brilliantly verified. The significance of his method and its results extended far beyond his special field of interest. His works exercised a significant influence on our entire conception of the world, above all upon the historical sciences, including politics and morals. In fact, his method affected every department of thought. He initiated a great revolution in biological views, adumbrations of which he gladly acknowledged. His merit does not consist in his having been the first to conceive the idea of evolution, nor in the causes of transmutation, but in the application and verification of these in the world of facts. His discovery of natural selection shows a painstaking checking up of preconceived ideas by accurately determined facts and a readiness to discard hypotheses that did not square with such facts. He did not regard his theory as a dogma but as a tool to set on foot further inquiries. He neither offered a rounded philosophical system as Herbert Spencer* and Ernst Haeckel claimed, nor a generalized theory of evolution to break down the line between the non-living and the living, the mental and non-mental. His general theory is that organic forms are the result of a long process of development from the most insignificant beginnings under the continual influence of the environment. He opposed to the dogma of the immutability of species the facts of their variability. According to Darwin man is the descendant of a favored variety of apes. According to Genesis our species sprang from a clod of earth, a much more humble origin than the origin from apes (not monkeys as popularly assumed). The real greatness of man suffered in his view no diminution because man developed out of lower forms. He opposed the theological and romantic view of men as fallen angels He held the realistic view that man developed from an animal into a spiritual and moral being. Neither psychologically nor physically did he allow any but quantitative differences between man and beast. Darwin's scientific materialism is characterized by its mechanical explanation of the world, its absolute negation of final causes, and its denial of design.

His evolutionary hypothesis was at first bitterly opposed by many, if not all, theologians. In time an ever increasing number of them embraced it. Not a few of them justified it speculatively, though Darwin would not have accepted their views of adjusting his theory with their theology. Objections of an ethical and religious nature were brought against his theory by theologians and radical thinkers. Darwin himself proposed to reconcile evolution with traditional ethics through the concept of adaptation. He never could bring himself to regard natural selection as a means in the hands of Providence. First a theist and later an agnostic, he lost his religion when he assumed that religion depended upon a definite scientific view. Those who see in Darwinism the final destruction of religion fail to realize that religion does not rest upon a hypothesis concerning the origin of living beings any more than that it rests upon an Aristotelian-Ptolemaic cosmology. Organized religion undermines its own existence by affiliating itself with and demanding of its members a blind subscription to any scientific system. Living religion has no biology and cosmology. It does not rest upon unexplainable natural events, but upon the experience of the heart. See evolution.

Origin of Species (1859) ; Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication (1868) ; Descent of Man (1871) ; Expression of the Emotions in Men and Animals (1872) ; S. P. Cadman, Charles Darwin and other English thinkers, with reference to their religious and ethical value (1911) ; L. Husley, Charles Darwin (1927) , G. Jaeger, Die Darwin'sche Theorie und ihre Stellung zur Moral und Religion (Stuttgart, 1869) , B. Stolzle, Charles Darwin's Stellung zum Gottesglauben (Leipzig, 1922).

H.H.

Dasyus: The name applied by the Aryan invaders to the dark skinned aboriginal inhabitants of the Punjab. The word may originally have meant enemy. It may also refer to demons or supernatural enemies.

C.S.B.

datum: (Lat. datum, that which has been given; pl. data) In logic, epistemology, psychology, or any inductive science, datum generally refers to that which is used as a basis for knowledge. In epistemology it refers specifically to the object of consciousness given to, rather than created or supplied by, the mind. See religious datum.

P.A.B.

Daub, Karl: (1752-1836) Professor of theology at the University of Heidelberg. At first he held to the critical standpoint of Kant*. Later he approximated the mystical theosophical elements and the doctrine of identity of Schelling*. As a decisive adherent of Hegel*, he finally attempted to reinterpret the Protestant dogmas in terms of Hegelian ideas.

Judas Ischariot, oder das Böse im Verhältnis zum Guten (Heidelberg, 1816), Die dogmatische Theologie jetziger Zeit, oder der Selbstsucht in der Wissenschaft des Glaubens und seiner Artikel (Heidelberg, 1833); Philosophische und theologische Vorlesungen 7 vols (Berlin, 1838-1844), W. Herrmann, Die speculative Theologie in ihrer Entwickelung durch Daub (Hamburg u Gotha, 1847)   H H.

David: King of Judah and Israel (c. 1016-976 B.C.) mentioned in the books of Samuel and the first book of Kings. Many-sided personality, warrior, politician, and poet, he rallied all the Israelite tribes around the new capital city of Jerusalem F James, Personalities of the Old Testament (1942).   S L.T.

David of Dinant: A man of whom we only know that he came from Belgium and lived for a while in the papal curia of Innocent the third. He is the most outspoken of all medieval pantheists*. He identifies the first substance of everything with God who is the underlying stuff for both corporeal and spiritual reality. This materialistic pantheism summed up in his Quaternuli, was condemned by the church at the Council of Paris in 1210. See cause.   S.C T.

David, House of: See communistic settlements, religious.

Davidson, Andrew Bruce: (1831-1902) Professor of Oriental Languages at New College, Edinburgh (1870-1900). His unfinished commentary on Job (begun 1862) was the first really scientific commentary on the O.T. in English. He was a member of the O.T. Revision Committee. He was the author of many commentaries, particularly on books of the O.T., "Theology of the O.T." in the International Theological Library, and the article "God" in Hastings' Bible Dictionary.

He also wrote two volumes of sermons, The Called of God and Waiting Upon God.

    H.K.—L.F.

Day of Atonement: See Atonement, Day of.

Day of Yahweh: 1) Day popularly anticipated (between time of Solomon and Amos) when Jahweh would bring unprecedented prosperity, intervene to eliminate foreign enemies, and reestablish his nation on a glorious scale even surpassing Solomon's time. 2) Amos and his successors reversed this. Yahweh would come, but to punish his sinful nation by immediate military conquest. 3) In post-exilic times the "Day of Yahweh" concept was eschatologized and referred to the Judgment Day. An editor from this school inserted excerpts here and there throughout the prophetic writings, giving their already fulfilled predictions new validity for "the Great Day." See Amos; Joel; Post-exilic; Solomon; Zephaniah.   R.E.W.

deacon: In the N.T. a ministerial order generally associated with assisting the bishops (see Phil. 1:1; I Tim. 3: 1-13), perhaps, though not definitely, established by the apostles to relieve them of such external duties as administering the charities of the early church (see Acts 6 2-6). Later it was the next to the highest of the seven Roman Catholic orders, preparatory to that of the priesthood A deacon is one of the two necessary assistants at a High Mass In Anglicanism* the diaconate is the lowest of the three orders and primarily the normal ordination required before that of priest. Similarly in Methodism* it is the lower of the two orders of ministry, a stage in the advancement to the eldership. Among European Lutherans it is not a separate order but the function of a parish minister's fully ordained assistant. In Reformed* churches the deacon is an ordained layman entrusted with the care of the physical and material properties of the church and with the customary administration of its charitable activities. Thus in Catholicism, Anglicanism, and Methodism the deacon is a minister of a lower degree preparing to become a member of a higher order. In European Lutheranism the diaconate as a clerical order is lost and refers merely to a subordinate function or duty performed by a fully ordained minister. In Reformed Protestantism and American Lutheranism it is a lay order separate and distinct from both the lay eldership and the ministry and is not a necessary qualification for either of them. See clergy.   A.C.

deaconess: In the N.T. the term which means servant or minister was given to men, especially to those officially appointed to care for the needy women and children of the congregations (Acts, VI). Women helped voluntarily in church work, such as Phoebe, whom St. Paul names as deaconess in commending her to the church in Rome. (Rom. XVI) Pliny of Bithynia (c. 110 A.D.) records the torturing of two deaconesses by civil authorities in order to secure information about prevalent Christian practices. In "The Apostolic Constitutions" (current during the first five centuries of the church's history) the work of deaconesses is prescribed. Chrysostum* (d. 407) when Bishop of Constantinople had as assistants in his parish forty deaconesses and eighty deacons. During the next thousand years, deaconesses were replaced by the cloistered nuns and deacons had become an order of the clergy. Within the R.C. Church St. Vincent de Paul* (1576-1660) formed an association of women, not cloistered, who ministered to the poor and sick, and became known as "Sisters of Charity". In the nineteenth century, deaconesses appear locally in the Reformed churches, e.g., among the Mennonites in Holland. In Kaiserswerth, Germany in 1836, Pastor Theodor Fliedner established the first institution for the special training of church women for works of mercy to be done in the spirit of Christ. With this parent institution, by 1940, 50,000 Lutheran deaconesses in Germany, Holland, Scandinavia, Switzerland, U. S. A., were affiliated. There are at least three other German church institutions for training deaconesses. Similarly other communions such as the Anglican, Ev. Methodists, Presbyterian have educated deaconesses at work in local parishes and in benevolent institutions caring for the sick and needy. The program of work varies with community needs. See Löhe, W.

A.S.

dead, the, prayers for: See office of the dead, prayers for the dead. Also baptism for the dead, death and burial practices.

Deae Matres: Goddesses of the Celtic & Germanic peoples in Roman times, about whom little is certainly known, although much has been written. The standard work on the subject is still Max Ihm's Der Mütter-oder Matronenkultus und seine Denkmäler, Bonner Jahrbucher 83 (1887) pp. 1-200.

P G.M.

dean: (Lat , decanus, the head of a group of ten) The presiding dignitary of a cathedral or collegiate chapter (Dean and canons). By extension, the head of an academic faculty.

Rural Dean A priest, usually appointed by the bishop, having general supervision over a group of parishes constituting a deanery.

P.V.N.

death and burial practices: Man has always been a protestant against death. Even high cultures have refused to recognize its universal rule and projected the hope of an immortal life free from all future assaults of death Confucianism alone has accepted a "good death" as the normal term of a life fully lived. In the early world death seemed unaccountable. Primitive thinkers could not believe that sickness and death were intended to have a place in the human scene. They explained that it must have come as a result of a mistake or failure of one of the lower animals or the disobedience, or curiosity or carelessness of the first human pair. Usually the woman was blamed. Some stories attribute man's loss of immortality to the anger or enmity of a god. Whatever the theory regarding the origin of death, rarely was the death of the individual taken as natural. Some deaths were clearly the work of nature gods acting in storm or lightning or torrent. Death by violence might result from the superior magic of an enemy, the malignancy of an unhappy ghost or a hostile spirit. Death by disease was commonly credited to sorcery. Masters of magical techniques, of powerful curses and spells, with or without the help of malicious spirits, were believed to be effective dealers in death.

The many modes of treatment of the dying and the dead are the result of the accretion of ages and combine ideas drawn from earlier and later levels of culture. Some practices arose from a primitive fear of contact with the defilement and danger of death—carrying the dying out of the house, lifting him from the bed to die in contact with the earth or in a prepared grave; abandonment of the dying, destruction of the hut in which he died, or removal of the settlement from the death scene; preparation of the dead for burial by medicine men* or professional corpse handlers immune to the death danger; and the universal rites of protection and purification*. Some practices depend upon the idea of a separable soul*—calling to the spirit to come back immediately after death, instructing the dead man regarding his changed condition and separation from his former habitat, safeguarding the living from the death demon or from the dead if he should become an angry and malignant ghost*. When the dead man dwelt where his body was placed he was fed there, consulted, advised as to happenings in the family. The later idea of a special abode for souls in a realm of the fathers, a heaven or paradise gave rise to ceremonies to secure safe passage. Extreme unction* in Christianity, recitation of the Patet and Ashem-vohu by the Parsis are such rites for the dying. In Tibet a lama draws the soul out of the body immediately after death and shows it the way to the Western Paradise. Teachers of the dead instruct the Moslem in his tomb how to reply to the two examining angels. Because customs are retained after the ideas underlying them are outgrown, death and burial practices are often complex and confusing but the rites clearly combine three purposes—to protect the survivors from the dangerous contact with death, to initiate the dead man into his new status of separation from the living and to give him safe conduct to his new abode.

Immediately after death most peoples wash the corpse, close his eyes and change his clothes. Sometimes the hair and nails are cut and the feet tied. Weeping is not universal. In some cases it is expected, there may even be hired mourners. In old Japan the relatives wept while friends caroused. Hinduism and Zoroastrianism forbad tears because they hurt the dead or made his passage to the afterlife difficult. It was bad form to weep for a Moslem saint or for an old man in China. Food for the dead was sometimes provided, more frequently the mourners ate a meal in the presence of the corpse setting aside a portion for him. In many lands friends watch the body while it is waiting for burial. This wake* is often the occasion for feasting and eulogizing of the dead man. The watchers are supposed to protect his body and soul from demon assault. In Buddhist countries the priests recite the sacred texts in relays, day and night, during this period. Death also demands a change of garb and appearance for the mourners, usually a reversal of the ordinary mode. Black and white garments are most common. Moslem women wear blue. Sometimes all customary work must be stopped, care of the body neglected for a time, and no jewelry or adornments worn It may be that this altered appearance, like the wreath or branch placed outside the death house, was once intended to give warning of the presence of the pollution of death.

The funeral may follow within a few hours after death or may be delayed several months. Primitive precautions to guard against the return of the soul still linger in some lands, for example, taking the body out through a window or a hole broken in the wall, going to the grave and returning by circuitous routes, crossing water, turning the body around several times on the way. The funeral procession is often elaborate. In cultures thousands of years old it may combine primitive with more sophisticated usages or forms contributed by the successive religions that have shaped the lives of the people. The funeral may include images, animals, musicians or noisemakers to clear the path of evil influences, specially selected wailers, public recognition of the virtues of the dead man, provisions for his future well-being, carrying or recitation from a sacred book, rites to safeguard the mourners. Circumambulation* of the corpse, of the church, of the grave, of the funeral pyre is practically universal.

Many modes of disposal of the dead are used. Priestly preference may give one form dominance in an area but uniformity is rare. The monetary, moral, social or ecclesiastical status of the dead man may decide the mode Eating the corpse was an approved practice in some tribes Exposure in trees, on platforms or on the ground was common. In ancient Iran the dead were given to the dogs and birds. The modern Parsis retain this practice by exposing the bodies to vultures on the towers of silence. In one form of disposal in Tibet the flesh is cut from the bones and fed to dogs and birds. The bones are then buried or crushed, mixed with meal and given to the animals. A more careless variant of this form is throwing the body into water or jungle or desert places. There is a ceremonial mode of burial in water when the body is placed in canoe or ship, escorted to the deep and the vessel sunk or set on fire. Cave burial has been practiced since prehistoric times. Commonest of all forms in past ages and generally preferred in modern cultures are burial in the earth and cremation. The Egyptian theory of the afterlife required the preservation of the body which led to the construction of magnificent tombs for the aristocrats. In Tibet the bodies of grand lamas are embalmed and kept on display for worship as deities.

Generally slaves and common people received less ceremonial treatment than priests, kings and nobles. Children dying before initiation* were disposed of with little ceremony. The unbaptized in Christian Europe were denied church burial and a place in holy ground. The unmarried, barren women and women dying in childbirth who might become vengeful ghosts were often buried with rites to counteract the danger. Criminals, suicides, lepers and those who met accidental death were in many lands refused burial rites, thrown away or buried with protective ceremony.

The body may be buried in a crouching or sitting posture, or lying extended on the side or back, with or without a coffin. The orientation of the face is fixed by tribal or religious tradition. The East is the favorite direction, but some peoples turn the dead toward the sunset, the South, the North, the old home of the clan, the birthplace of the dead man or the holy city of his faith. In ancient times it was customary to put into the grave food and drink, tools, weapons, personal belongings, clothes, money and mementos of his friends. An important man might take with him in death his wives, companions, servants, his favorite horse and dogs. This waste of human life and property was overcome later by the substitution of effigies of persons and symbolic forms of material goods.

A feast usually followed the funeral at the tomb, or at the home or both and was often repeated at stated times afterward until the dead man was settled in his new abode Thereafter he shared in anniversary feasts or in the general ceremony in which all souls were fed. In some lands, however, the feeding of the dead was a fixed ritual of the family cult The annual and anniversary feasts tended to become memorial occasions

Before taking up the regular routine of living, purification was necessary for all closely in contact with the dead. If the impurity remained, as some thought, from one to thirty days, the usual work, attire or toilet could not be resumed during that time. Individuals and the home, sometimes the village had to be cleansed of pollution. The individual was purified by passing through fire or smoke, touching fire or water, sprinkling with water or cow's urine or by taking a bath Fumigation or sprinkling with cleansing fluids made the death room safe again. There were also formal ceremonies to separate the dead from the living and restore the normal rhythm of life. The mourning period varies widely from a few days to three years. See burial practice, R. C.

"Death and Disposal of the Dead" Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. by J. Hastings, IV, 411-511; "Burial of the Dead" and "Death" A Dictionary of Islam (1885) by T P Hughes, pp. 44-47, 79-81; U. S. Bureau of American Ethnology, Annual Report . . . nos. 1, 5, 26; L. A. Waddell, Buddhism of Tibet (1895); J. J. Modi, "On the Funeral Ceremonies of the Parsees, their Origin and Explanation", Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bombay, v. 2 (1892), R. P Bender, "Beliefs, Rites and Customs of the Jews Connected with Death, Burial and Mourning" Jewish Quarterly Review (1894), ff J A Dubois, Hindu Manners, Customs and Ceremonies (Eng trans 1897) A.E H.

decalogue: (Gr., deka, ten, logos, word, matter) The "Ten Commandments" held to be the foundation of Christian morality, and said to have been given to Moses* by God at Mount Sinai, written on table(t)s of stone Exod. 31.18, 34 1. (See Tables of the Law) Found in their most familiar form in Exod. 20 2-17 and (with a different reason given for the 4th Cdt.) in Deut. 5 6-21. A different version specifically designated (Exod. 34 28) as "the ten words (Eng., commandments)" but dealing only with festivals and offerings appears in Exod. 34·10-26; it is said to be what was written on the second pair of stone tablets after Moses had broken the first, which contained the "ten words" of Exod. 20.2 ff. No explanation is given of the inconsistency, which is doubtless due to the unresolved claim of each version to priority. Still other by-forms of the Decalogue appear in Deut. 27 and in Levit. 19.

The several forms of the Decalogue apparently were "threshold liturgies' whereby worshippers at different sanctuaries and in different periods acknowledged the essential requirements of Yahweh* worship (cf. Psalms 15, 24:3-6; 118·20, and the place of the Ten Commandments in the Anglican office of Holy Communion). The reason for the number "ten" is mnemonic. The variety witnesses to this usage as characteristic from the earliest times but makes the ascription of any single form of Moses precarious. The Decalogue of Exod. 20—Deut. 5 was evidently in familiar use both in Israel and in Judah in the time of the classical prophets (Jer. 7 9, Hos. 4 2), and is commonly held to embody their teaching. Since, however, the prophets* represented a renewal of the prophetism of Moses there is no sufficient reason to deny the possibility that this Decalogue, in the terse original form preserved by the 6th, 7th and 8th commandments or "words", may be Mosaic in origin. See Torah.   R.B.Y.S.

Decius: (201-251) Roman Emperor 249-251; soldier and administrator. Adherent of ancient faith. For reasons of state began systematic persecution to exterminate the Christians.   K.H.C.

decrees, Divine: See Divine decrees.

decretals: (epistolae decretales) Papal decrees collected and inserted in medieval law books as well for the student of Canon Law* as for the faithful and clergy who are bound to observe them, but in particular for ecclesiastical superiors and judges who are to regulate their actions and judgments according to their tenor. The name "Decretal" appears for the first time in the Roman Synod of 496. In general a Decretal like a Constitution (cf. under "Encyclical") is some universal law in contradistinction to a "Rescript"* intended for an individual or for some particular case. If, however, a Rescript is later made the norm for all similar cases, it assumes the nature of a D. The oldest known and preserved D. is that of Pope Siricius, 385, sent to Bishop Himerius of Tarragona concerning clerical celibacy. One of the earliest collections of D. is the "Avellana", which contains besides papal also imperial decrees. We distinguish between authentic and false D. e.g., the Pseudo Isidoran, a collection originating most probably in France, not in Rome, during the IX century and intended to curb the growing power of the Metropolitans, Provincial Synods and State interference by emphasizing episcopal jurisdiction and centralization in the papacy to which the "causae majores" were to be referred. D. are distinguished from the decrees of General Councils*, which are usually termed "Canones". After Gratian's* time however, the term D. was used to designate any collection of Church Laws (Decrees or Decretals of Gratian). Among such important medieval collections were the "Compilationes antiquae", the "Corpus Juris Canonici" (comprising the D. collected by Raymond of Penafort by order of Gregory IX*, the "Liber Sextus" (D. of Boniface VIII*) and the "Clementinae" (D. of Clement V), as also the unofficial "Extravagantes (X.=Extra decretum Gratiani vagantes) Communes"; the Extrav. of John XXII and finally the "Liber Septimus" (D. of Clement VIII). More recent collections of papal legislations are known as "Bullaria". All the provisions of the medieval D., as embodied in the venerable old Corpus Juris Canonici, the last redaction of which by Jean Chappius gave way to the new Codex Juris Canonici, begun by Pius X* and promulgated as of May 19, 1918 by Benedict XV*. The old D. still retain historical, and many of them, as in so far as they are embodied in the new Code, even legal value. (Cf Codicis Juris Canonics Fontes EMI. Petri Card. Gasparri Edits (Rome Typ. Polylgl. Vat., 1923. ff) dedication: 1) consecrating an object to a god, saint or sacred use, 2) name of the being to whom a church is dedicated, 3) anniversary of the dedication, often degraded by excesses.   W.W.R.

Litt. Dict. Théol Cath. IV, 206-22; Cath. Encyc. IV, 670-73.   R.M.H.

Dedication, feast of: See Jewish religious festivals.

Defender of the Faith: (Fidei Defensor) A title bestowed on Henry VIII* by Leo X* on 11th October 1532 in recognition of a work on the seven sacraments against Luther. It was Henry's desire to have a papal title like Rex Christianissimus (France) and Rex Catholicus (Spain).   F.W.B.

Definite Synodical Platform controversy: See American Lutheranism, Schmucker, S.S.

deicide: The killing of a totem animal or of a priest-king in primitive religions, either real or symbolic. Discussed at length in J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough (1890) See also Gerald Heard, The Substance of Religion (1931) and The Ascent of Humanity (1929).   P.G.M.

deification: (or, from the Greek, apotheosis) The ceremony or social process of some kind which raises man to divinity. It was known among the Greeks after scepticism and Euhemerism had narrowed the gap between human and divine. Imperial Rome by degrees adopted deification, at first for deceased emperors, then for the living ones. Alexander the Great obtained his first apotheosis* at the oracle of Amon in Egypt. See hero worship.   P.G.M.

deism: (Lat. deus god) An important rationalistic movement in England arising in the seventeenth century and continuing through the eighteenth. Deism asserted belief in one God, creator of the universe, but regarded him as detached from the world and making no revelation. The light of nature (lumen naturae) i.e., reason, was man's only reliance. Thus while there was a wide diversity in the opinions of the several deists, they were at one in their opposition to revealed religion in general and to Christianity in particular. The Old and New Testament alike aroused their attack as a collection of unauthentic and fabulous books. Among the more extreme deists were Thomas Morgan (The Moral Philosopher, 1737), Thomas Chubb (Discourse concerning Reason, 1731, True Gospel of Jesus Christ, 1739, Posthumous Works, 1748), and Thomas Woolston (Six Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour, 1727-1729). Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1583-1648), usually styled "the Father of Deism," had been far more guarded in his strictures, being content to commend natural religion, free from the errors and corruptions incident to transmission, which was not to be accepted on the basis of authority but because it was demanded by reason itself. He thus studiously sought to avoid denying the validity of Christianity or of revealed religion in general. His successors were less restrained. The two writings which are perhaps to be accounted the most influential were John Toland's* Christianity not Mysterious (1696) and Matthew Tindal's Christianity as Old as the Creation; or the Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature, (1730). This latter work, which went through four editions in as many years, was the most complete and balanced statement of the position of deism and is commonly called the "deist's Bible." As such, it aroused the especial attention of Bishop Butler.*

None of these men was a scholar of the first order, many of their utterances seem by present standards, sheer bombast and schoolboy criticism. Nevertheless the movement is not to be easily dismissed as simply a vagary. Rather it was the natural expression of suspicions, which, though crude, grew into the critical sciences, and an indication of a wholesome unwillingness to allow a few doors to remain locked, even though they bore the sacrosanct seal of ecclesiastical sanction. Thus its championship of freedom for inquiry and its desire to reach solid foundations make it one of the real milestones in the history of theological thought. See Enlightenment, the, theism, Theophilanthropy, Society of.

Leslie Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, Vol I (2nd ed. 1903); and John Hunt, Religious Thought in England (rev. ed. 1896).   M.S.E.

Deissmann, Adolf: (1866-) New Testament scholar of Heidelberg and Berlin. His observation that N.T. Greek was the Greek of the papyrus documents of every day life (Bibelstudien, 1895, 1897) led to the modern speech movement in N.T. translation. Drew attention to the distinction between private personal letters such as Paul's, in the N.T., and more formal epistles, such as Hebrews, written in imitation of them. Especially active in bringing the papyri and the inscriptions to bear upon the N.T. (Licht vom Osten, 1908) and in presenting a vivid biography of Paul (1910).   E.J.G.

delinquency, juvenile: See juvenile delinquency.

Delitzsch, Franz Julius: (1813-1890) German Christian Hebraist (of Jewish parentage) and Lutheran theologian. Professor of Theology at the University of Leipzig. He was a champion of the scientific but reverent study of the O.T. He was a great student of Hebrew literature, not only Biblical and Rabbinic, but also medieval.

He wrote many commentaries on the O.T., works on Hebrew poetry, and on Lutheranism, and translated the N.T. into Hebrew. He was the father of Friedrich Delitzsch, the famous Assyriologist.   H.E.—L.F.

Delphos: A king of Delphi mentioned by Aeschylos in his Eumenides.   P.G.M.

deluge: The legend of a disastrous flood which destroyed all but a few of the inhabitants of the earth is found in the religious traditions of almost all peoples. That there was a universal deluge, the evidence of science denies. That there were devastating local floods which brought death to most of the people in ancient river-valley or island civilizations is probable. Fire and hurricane are credited with the destruction of the world in some cultures. Water was not the only destroyer but more usual and more wide-spread and therefore more far-famed in story. These deluge legends were magnified by time and molded by theology. There are also signs of borrowing and of mutual influence. The biblical story is a variant of the Babylonian, refined and adapted to fit the theological and moral ideas of Israel. Native myths in modern times have been colored by missionary teaching. In Babylon and Greece the divine decision to destroy all mankind was thwarted by friendly deities who warned their favorites. In the biblical version Yahweh both willed the flood and gave advance warning to Noah. In Iran the high god instructed Yima to build a walled enclosure to save the good people. In these cases the original stories have been shaped to moral ends. In India the flood was not the result of a divine decree but one of the series of cosmic cataclysms which periodically destroy the world. According to one version of the legend, Vishnu* took the form of a great fish to save Manu who had befriended him. The Chinese flood was clearly a local affair. See Gilgamesh epic.   A.E.H.

Demeter: See Mother Goddesses; mystery religions.

demiurge: An old Greek term for a craftsman, literally a "worker for the people." In Platonic* philosophy it was applied to the creator of the world, and in that sense it was used by the Gnostics* to designate the inferior deity who had created the evil world of matter, in contrast with the supremely good god of the purely spiritual world whom Jesus had come to reveal.   S.J.C.

democracy: In 1639, the people of Connecticut resolved to "associate and conjoin ourselves to be as one Public State or Commonwealth, and do, for ourselves and our successors and such as shall be adjoined to us at any time hereafter, enter into combination and confederation together, to maintain and preserve the liberty and purity of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ which we now profess, as also the discipline of the churches, which according to the truth of the said gospel is now practiced among us, as also in our civil affairs to be guided and governed according to such laws, rules, orders and decrees as shall be made, ordered and decreed . . ." Democracy is evidently a two-fold compact, of individuals forming a body politic and of this body with government. It is the sovereignty of the people and the political equality of all citizens. It is representative government. Its roots are in the Graeco-Roman civilization and the Judeo-Christian religion. The former transmitted the particularly Stoic ideas of purpose, providence, forethought, progress, and natural law; the latter, the Bible, the decalogue, and intangible values such as God, evermore one and the same, dependable and good, obedience to God's law the supreme duty of man, the dignity of man and all men brothers, justice tempered by kindness and goodwill, ability patiently to endure with faith in the ultimate triumph of the truth, and the sense of destiny.

The Reformation* by emancipating the state from control by the church and exalting the significance of the individual through making him a child of God, dependent upon his own conscience and finally responsible to a sovereign God, provided the religious basis for the compact theory of government   If men belong to God and therefore can only grant and not assign to their rulers use of a sovereignty inherent in themselves, political freedom is on its way. Thus, John Locke* insisted that government exists for man and should have only "the authority which reasonable men living together in a community . . . might be disposed to submit to willingly." Puritanism* interpreting freedom as an inherent right of the individual made the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States with its "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" inevitable. Rousseau* basing sovereignty of the people upon the higher right of the community arranges for a state-religion in his Social Contract. The Anglo-American way discriminating between political and individual rights uses the former to protect the latter.

Democracy, then, is unity amid difference, faith in the higher law and the worth of the individual, a government in which the people as a whole participate and share responsibility. It is the recognition of freedom of conscience and the classification of the churches as corporations. It is representative government, an enlightened electorate, the acceptance of the verdict of the majority, and progress by growth. It is education for life. See American theology, early.

Bibliography: W. A. Dunning, A History of Political Theories, 3 vols. (1902-1920) ; E. B. Greene, Religion and the State (1941) ; Gilbert Murray, The Stoic Philosophy (1915) ; C. E. Stevens, Sources of the Constitution of the United States (1894) ; C. G. Haines, Revival of Natural Law Concepts (1930) ; C. H. Moehlman, American Constitutions and Religion (1938).

C.H.M.

demonic: (Gr. daimon: spirit working unconsciously in nature and man) D. is the power applied to devilish purposes, especially the perversion of merely human and selfish concerns into supposed divine and holy commandments or institutions.

R.K.

demons and demonology: Universally accepted notions particularly at early cultural levels. In general demons are superhuman beings who lack the dignity of gods but who may be either benevolent or malevolent in their dealings with men. In Hebrew and Christian thinking it became customary to regard all demons as evil, in contrast with God, Christ and the angels* of heaven. Demons were the angels of the Devil active in implementing his will and breeding trouble for man. The early Christians took very seriously the widespread belief of the time in the menace of demon possession. Since both mental and bodily ill health was thought to be caused by the indwelling of a demon, cures were to be effected by expelling the evil spirit. This could be accomplished by summoning to the aid of the sick person a more powerful good spirit before whom the evil spirit would flee. Thus Jesus commanded the demons and they obeyed him (Mark 1 27) because as supernatural beings they recognized in him a unique divine presence bent on destroying them and their works. The disciples of Jesus also cast out demons by pronouncing his powerful name in the presence of persons possessed (Acts 16.18, Mark 9 38, Luke 10.17). Belief in the activity of demons was especially widespread among gentiles where Christianity at first won many disciples and naturally the early church gave serious attention to the practice of exorcism*. Paul might proclaim the nothingness of the idol, but the demon behind the idol was a reality to be feared and shunned, and only when one was fortified by the indwelling presence of Christ could the demons be rendered harmless. By the third century the church had a class of officials who were professional exorcists charged with the task of driving away the demons. See devil, incubi and succubi; jinn, malleus maleficarum, spirits.

H. Duhm, Die bösen Geister im Alten Testament (1904) ; M. Dibelius, Die Geisterwelt im Glauben des Paulus (1909) , J Tamborino, De antiquorum daemonismo (1909) ; E. H. Zaugg, A Genetic Study of Spirit-Phenomena in the New Testament (1917).

S.J.C.

Denck, Hans: (c. 1495-1527) Turbulent figure in the Reformation period. Rector of a school at Basel, then at Nuremberg, ejected for preaching Anabaptist* views. Similarly expelled from other German cities. Died at Basel.   G.R.C.

Denis, Saint: Martyr, patron saint* of France and first bishop of Paris. Started work in Gaul c. 250. For a time was mistakenly identified with Dionysius the Areopagite*.   K.H.C.

Denny, James: (1856-1917) A prominent N.T. scholar and theologian of the United Free Church, Scotland. Born in Paisley; educated there and in Glasgow; was pastor in Broughty Ferry, 1886 to 1897, and then became Professor of N.T. in the U. F. College, Glasgow. Author of Studies in Theology (1894), The Death of Christ (1902), Jesus and the Gospel (1909), Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation (1918); and others.

A.K.R.

De Nobili, Robert: (1577-1656) Italian Jesuit, original and successful missionary in Madura, India. The first European to master Indian literature, he is noted for his defense of Indian social usages.   E.A.R.

deontology: Science of moral obligation or duty. The term was used by Bentham* as a title for an ethical treatise. It is sometimes used to distinguish a theory which emphasizes obligation or duty as opposed to what is required by the agent's own interest or self-realization, or even as opposed to a purely utilitarian ethic.   R.B B.

deposition: Judicial deprivation of clerical office, variously performed according to the disciplines of different churches. Sometimes a deposed cleric returns to lay status, sometimes excommunication follows deposition.   R.H.N.

depravity: The absence of original righteousness involving an innate moral corruption and tendency to evil* inherited by man from Adam as the result of Adam's fall into sin* and exposing man in his sinful condition to the wrath of God*.

Total Depravity. The doctrine that man whose entire being is infected by his sinful inheritance from Adam is of himself totally incapable of making any availing effort toward salvation* and must therefore be regenerated* by the Spirit of God who takes the initiative in man's redemption. Many theologians, while claiming to affirm the doctrine of total depravity, admit the presence in man of qualities or traits which are commendable as judged by human standards, but maintain nevertheless that the controlling disposition of man being destitute of love to God is self-centered, possessed of a latent or active hostility to God, and subject therefore to an increasing progression in depravity unless saved from that condition by the grace* of God. See original sin.   H.W.J.

dervish: From the Persian word for mendicant, although most dervishes are actually from the laboring class. Refers to members of Islamic ascetic orders, closely related to and intellectually derivative from the Sufi* sects, first appearing in the 12th and 13th centuries, although religious exercises going beyond ordinary rituals date back as far as the time of Mohammed himself. They are peculiar chiefly because of the form of their devotional exercises, which includes the repetition of religious formulae. This may be done silently, but the better known orders engage in chants, accompanied by a precisely defined sequence of bodily motions, which usually become more violent and rapid as the exercise proceeds, often ending in some kind of trance or ecstasy. Some orders conclude their exercise with forms of self-laceration. See faker.

    L. M. Garnett, Mysticism and Magic in Turkey (1912); J. P. Brown, The Dervishes (1868).

            R.B.B.

Descartes, René: (1596-1650) French philosopher and mathematician. Born at La Haye, he was first educated at the Jesuit College of La Flèche and later studied at the U. of Poitiers. From 1617 to 1621, he served in the armies of Maurice of Nassau and of the Duke of Bavaria. The rest of his life was spent in travel and private studies; he lived in Holland from 1629 to 1649 and died at the court of Queen Christina of Sweden. Though apparently a devout Roman Catholic throughout his life, Descartes' views on many topics were far removed from Thomism*. Cartesianism has, in fact, many affinities with Augustinianism. His interest in the use of mathematical method in philosophy, his application of mathematics to physics and music, his method of doubt, his opposition to the authority of Aristotle —these are characteristic of his rationalism and entitle him to be called one of the "Fathers" of modern thought. Chief works: Discours de la méthode, Meditationes de prima philosophia, Le monde, and Traité des passions de l'âme. See Cartesianism, Enlightenment, the.

    Oeuvres complètes, ed. Adam et Tannery, 13 vol. (Paris, 1896-1911); Haldane, Descartes, his Life and Times (Lond. 1905).   V.J.B.

descent into hades: (descensus ad inferos) Legends and myths of the visits of mortals and deities to the lower world, the abode of the dead, are quite common in the religions of the world. These descents are reported not only among primitive peoples, but are also related in basic myths of the Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans. To a more limited extent similar visits are also found in Jewish sources, but with less significance attached to them. The motives for these descents are varied: to satisfy curiosity, to obtain some boon or gift; to rescue relatives and friends; to warn the living upon return to earth, and to conciliate or control the spirits or deities of the nether regions. At times the descent motif is connected with religious rites, such as the initiations of the Hellenistic mysteries. The earliest Christians, Paul among them, believed that the spirit of Jesus was in Sheol* or Hades* in the period between his death and resurrection* (however, cf. Lk. 23 43 for a different view). Before long Christians were teaching in addition that Jesus had preached to the dead while in hades, saving some (the O.T. patriarchs, as a rule), and that he had also overcome the power of Satan* and Death during his stay there Further, the motif was associated with baptism, the Christian counterpart of the mystery initiations. The belief, in one form or another, became increasingly common in the early centuries, and at length was generally accepted by the church, being written into the Apostles' and Athanasian creeds. In the Middle Ages it became a popular theme in miracle plays*, art, and literature. During the Reformation period it was quite generally included in confessions and other statements of belief. In more recent times the Descensus has been a subject for controversy. However it is still accepted, but with varying interpretations, by the greater part of Christianity, both Catholic and Protestant, although an increasing number of the evangelical denominations have rejected it.   M.R.

design argument: See Butler, Joseph; God; Paley; teleology.

determinism: See cause, fatalism; fate; libertarianism and necessitarianism; predestination.

Deutero-Isaiah: See Isaiah.

Deuteronomic School of Historians: See D.

Deuteronomy: The last book of the Pentateuch* purporting to be in the main final discourses delivered by Moses* in Moab, giving to the Israelites the laws they would need in Canaan, it contains also the Song of Moses (ch. 32), the Blessing of Moses (ch 33), and an account of his death and burial (ch 34). Jewish and Christian tradition ascribe the work to Moses himself, but the Talmud (Baba Bathra 14b) excepts the last eight verses, ascribing them to Joshua. Modern critical scholarship is almost unanimous in maintaining that the original nucleus of Deuteronomy (probably the bulk of chapters 5-26, 28) constituted the basis of the reforms of Josiah in 621 B.C. as described in II Kings 22-23, the book having been written sometime earlier." This theory was adumbrated by Jerome and formulated by DeWette in 1805, recent attempts to prove that Deuteronomy was much earlier than Josiah (Welch, Oestreicher et al.) or of exilic or later date (Holscher, Kennett et al.) have not found wide acceptance. The Book of Deuteronomy is a harmonization of priestly and prophetic ideals of religion, seeking to establish on the one hand exclusive and pure worship of Yahweh in a single sanctuary, and on the other hand a high social morality based on prophetic teachings. In its conception of Yahweh as a God of love and justice and its lofty humanitarianism, it is one of the finest books in the Old Testament and represents a pivotal point in Hebrew religious history. See D.
See S R. Driver, Deuteronomy (International Critical Comm 3rd ed, 1902); Bewer, Paton and Dahl, "The Problem of Deuteronomy· a Symposium," Journal of Biblical Literature XLVII (1928) pp 305-379.   J.P.H.

Deva: The Devas in ancient Aryan religion were the "bright heavenly ones", sons of the sky father Dyaus. The term becomes the general designation for God in Hinduism* In Zoroastrianism* it is applied to the evil spirits which are opposed to Ahura Mazda*. It is the Sanscrit word from the Indo-European root from which come also the Latin deus, Greek theos, as well as devil.   C.S.B.

devil: The chief of evil demons*. In later Jewish and early Christian usage he was identified with Satan*. He was the source of all evil and was bent upon enslaving mankind. It was he who tempted Jesus at the beginning of his public ministry; he was at the head of the demonic powers in conflict with Jesus, he was the "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2 2) to whom Paul would hand over the Corinthian offender for discipline in the flesh (I Cor. 5 5), and he was the author of the bloody persecution feared by the author of the Book of Revelation*. In the subsequent history of the church he continued to figure conspicuously in Christian speculation even though his power was thought to have been undermined by Christ. But in spite of this reverse the Devil was always close at hand to tempt and destroy the faithful whenever he might catch them off their guard. As the responsibility for evil in recent times has been saddled more definitely upon man himself, modern theological thought has become somewhat dubious about the actual personality of the Devil. See spirits devil worshippers: The Yezidi religious community numbering about 20,000 and living in Kurdistan (East of Mosul) and elsewhere (near Aleppo, Diarbekr, Bitlis). Yezidi (from the modern Persian ized, angel or deity), means "Worshiper of God" They call themselves Dasin or Dasni (from the name of a Nestorian diocese) and for the most part speak Kurdish They isolate themselves strictly from the rest of mankind (issued from Adam and Eve), regarding themselves as descendants of Adam alone. Their religion is a mixture of pagan, Zoroastrian, Manichaean, Jewish, Nestorian, and Muslim elements. Their two sacred books are "The Book of Revelation" and "The Black Book." The supreme, transcendent God is passive, leaving the preservation of the world to seven angels of whom the most important is Malak Ta'us (peacock angel), who fell but repented (his tears extinguished the fires of hell) and is worshipped because he is good and active (his name "Satan" must not be uttered), he manifests himself in Shaikh 'Adi (d. 1161), who through transmigration has become divine.
W Fischer, Die Geschichte des Teufels (1906).
                                                                          S.J.C.

Th Menzel in The Encyclopaedia of Islam (1934) vol IV, pp. 1163-70   R.H P.

devotions and devotional literature: See Baxter, Richard, Bunyan, John, Dionysius the Areopagite; Forty Hours' Devotion, Francis de Sales, Gerhard, Groote, hymns, Hebrew and Jewish, Imitation of Christ: liturgics, liturgies, mysticism; Pascal, pietism, poetry and theology, Psalms; spiritual direction, spiritual life, the, stations of the cross; Taylor, Jeremy, Theologia Germanica, worship.

De Wette, Wilhelm Martin Leberecht: (1780-1849) Professor in Heidelberg, Berlin and Basel, Switzerland. Creative in all fields of theology, his works attained an extraordinary influence. As he grew older his thought assumed a dogmatically more conservative tenor. He discussed with uncommon clarity the great questions that moved the theology of his day the relation of religion to the general intellectual life, the relation of Christianity to history, of theology to the general science of religion. By connecting Fries's* philosophy of religion with the strict historical-critical study of the sources and a warm personal Christianity, he procured a theological structure that was independent of the speculative, rationalistic theology and of Schleiermacher's theology. His theology, remained, in decisive points, enchanted by the natural religion of German idealism. His estimate of Jesus Christ showed an unclarified interlacing of revelation and the apotheosis of the humanistic ideal of mankind. He did not succeed in showing the relation of feeling and foreboding to the theocentric, to the objective question of truth.

Lehrbuch der christlichen Dogmatik, in ihrer historischen Entwicklung dargestellt, 2 vols (Berlin, 1813-1816), Über Religion und Theologie (Berlin, 1815), Theodor oder des Zweiflers Weihe, Bildungsgeschichte eines evangelischen Geistlichen, 2 vols. (Berlin, 1822; 2 ed., Berlin, 1828).   H.H.

dharma: A Hindu word of many meanings, law, justice, sometimes religion. The Laws of Manu*, is a Dharmasastra. Popularly used to designate the customs, usages, practices of any caste or group.

In Buddhism it is one of the three jewels, "the law", in which the monks take refuge.   C.S.B.

dhyāna: Meditation. A very important practice in Hinduism and Buddhism, requiring freedom from the distractions of the work-a-day world and concentration upon a single idea. Sometimes synonomous with yoga*.   C.S.B.

dialectic: (Lat. fr. Gk., dialektike, art of debate; dia, through, legomai, converse). The art of discussion (Aristotle) or of logical controversy. Concern with the Ideas (Plato). The self-development of the Idea (Hegel). This term is ambiguous or at least analogical, signifying among other things, logic, discursive thought, problematic knowledge (opinion), criticism of ideas, history of ideas, etc. See Zeno of Elea.   D.C.O'G.

dialectic: (Gr. dialegesthai: to converse) I. The term is best known today as characterizing the theory of Karl Marx* and his followers, commonly called "dialectical (or historical) materialism". But this is only one of a multitude of meanings connected with the term d. and not the most important nor the original one. D. signifies a certain mode or method of thought and at the same time the nature of things known by means of this method. The meaning of the term d. is thus at once logical (or epistemological) and ontological (or metaphysical). This coincidence is based upon the cardinal supposition that things happen in accordance with a principle (or principles). D. relies ultimately on the metaphysical conviction (or dogma) that thought and reality, essence and existence are in perfect agreement with each other, and that it is therefore possible to give a satisfactory account of the necessity of all changes be it in nature or in history. Marx e.g., believed in the possibility of expounding and even foreknowing and forestalling the course of social and political life.

II. D. issues from the fact that thought always moves from one point to another point, from one concept to another concept, be it from the subject to the predicate in a proposition, or from the principle of a theory to its conclusions, or from the conditions to the consequences, or from the cause to the effect, or howsoever. It maintains furthermore that reality is modelled after this precept, that the real also is divided into opposite elements, links, poles, stages and so on. There is always, according to the principle of d., action and reaction in the world as there is always thesis and antithesis in the movement of thought, for at bottom both the world and our theories originate from the same source and belong to one and the same Universe. Indeed, they themselves (world and theories) represent only one of the opposite sides that can be distinguished by thought, which also exist as poles in the Universe.

III The underlying assumption of all d. systems and theories is that an identical reality exists divided against itself into opposite sides or aspects or parts, and that these parts integrate each other and form together the whole. This identical root of all appearances can be conceived by dialectical means either as the radical unity of the opposites existing before all actual differentiation, or as the final synthesis emerging out of the strife between the opposites, or as the one and the other at the same time. The latter possibility, of course, is the most comprehensive form of metaphysical d. It was developed by the system of Hegel*, from whom Marx borrowed the method of his own theory.

IV. The first dialectician in the history of European thought was the Ionian thinker Heraclitus*, who declared it a law of nature to be determined by opposite poles, such as day and night, winter and summer, black and white, moist and dry and so forth. He asserted that there is a conflict between those extremes the result of which is a certain balance or harmony in the Universe. "War is father and king of all", he says; "everything is generated by strife". A twofold movement in the world, an upward and a downward path characterize the opposite directions in which all things continually change Nothing stands ever still, everything flows Heraclitus not only described thus the cosmic flux, he believed also that a cosmic law, a universal "logos", rules over the flux and directs it so that no chance, but an eternal necessity regulates all movement.

The d. of Heraclitus had an enormous influence upon almost all systems of European thought. It is onesided to characterize his d. as materialistic, but it is also onesided to call it spiritualistic, since this opposition, like many other ones later connected with d., was not yet developed in the philosophy of the first dialectician. Following Heraclitus, it should be noted, stood Plato* as one of the greatest dialecticians of all times, if not the greatest. He was the first to coin the term and to apply it to his method of exhibiting and discussing problems by way of a conversation depicted in his dialogues (the name of which is derived from the same word as d.). The specific type of dialectical metaphysics as propounded by Plato is commonly called idealism* because of the central position of the Ideals in it. But many different shades of Platonic d. have been propagated in the course of the history of Platonism which is almost the course of European philosophy itself.

V. The term d. has been used also by an important theological school in recent days, although it has not its original and proper meaning in this theological d. founded by Karl Barth*. He asserts that a certain d. is the main feature of the Christian conception of man and history. A d. opposition is the fundamental principle of Christian faith: the opposition between God and man.

Other oppositions like that of heaven and earth, the Infinite and the finite, the Eternal and the temporal, the Holy and the profane, the Creator and the creature and so on are derived from the fundamental principle. But whereas d. in the original sense and in all philosophical systems means that the oppositions are to be conceived and unified by logical means and by means of reality as well, the dialectical theology on the contrary maintains that they cannot be treated in such a way, but that they are revealed by God, and that God alone can overcome the gulf between them. See socialism.

For further references see books on the history of philosophy, especially those on Plato and Platonism, also books on Marx and Marxism; on Barth and Barthianism (often partial and onesided).   R.K.

dialectic materialism: See dialectic.

diaphony: See organum.

Diasia: The festival of Zeus Meilichos (the Propitious). Mommsen places it in the month Anthesterion (Feb.-Mar.). See his Feste der Stadt Athen (Leipzig, 1906).   P.G.M. diaspora: (Gr., dispersion) Name given to Jewish communities scattered outside of Palestine, especially after the Babylonian Exile, 597 and 586 B.C. (II Kgs. xxiv, 12-16, etc.).

See Elephantine Papyri; Babylonian Captivity, the; Judaism.

A. Causse, Les Dispersés d'Israel, les Origines de la Diaspora et son rôle dans la formation du Judaisme (1929); W. O. E. Oesterley and Th. H Robinson, History of Israel, vol. ii (1932).   S.L.T.

Diatessaron: A harmony* of the 4 gospels, combining their accounts into a single narrative, especially that compiled by Tatian* in 2nd century. Popular in Syrian church*. See versions of the Bible, ancient.   K.H.C.

Dibelius, Martin: (1884-) He first lectured at the University of Berlin. Now he is at the University of Heidelberg. He also lectured at Yale. The most positive and perhaps the most permanent results of his labors are his emphasis on preaching as a formative factor in early tradition, his claim that the Passion narrative was from the beginning a continuous story, and his identification and discussion of certain narratives in the Gospels to which he gives the name paradigms. He plays a prominent part in the progressive and comprehensive development of Gunkel's* form-historical program of the N.T. sources. Not only is he one of several N.T. scholars who makes earnest with eschatology, but he also is with M. Kaehler*, K. L. Schmidt, Rudolf Bultmann* and Karl Holl*, one of those who has done most to destroy the usually liberal conception of Jesus, Paul and Luther. His work and theirs was carried on by the most approved modern methods that undermines modernistic illusions. See Form Criticism.

Die Geisterwelt im Glauben des Paulus (Göttingen, 1909); Die urchristliche Überlieferung von Johannes dem Taeufer (Gottingen, 1911); Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Tubingen, 1919, 2 ed., Tubingen, 1933), Geschichtliche und übergeschichtliche Religion im Christentum (Gottingen, 1925, 2 ed, Gottingen, 1929); Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur (Berlin & Leipzig, 1926), Evangelium und Welt (Gottingen, 1929), From Tradition to Gospel (1934), Botschaft von Jesus Christus (Tubingen, 1935), A fresh approach to the New Testament and early Christian literature (1936).

An authoritative criticism of Form Criticism is found in E. Fascher, Die form-geschichtliche Methode (Giessen, 1924).   H.H.

dichotomy: See soul.

Dictatus Papae: Dictatus Papae, also called Dictatus Hildebrandini, has been until lately believed to be a statement of Gregory VII's* regarding papal rights and prerogatives. It is now known that the statement is not Gregory's composition but the compilation of his followers drawn up around 1085, several years after Pope Gregory's death. The dictate of the Pope is a collection of twenty-seven theses and is a powerful document expressing Gregory's views in matters of Church and State.   S.C.T.

Didache, The: The Teaching of the Apostles, or The Teaching of the Lord through the Twelve Apostles, a short manual of church life and morals, written probably about A D. 150. The first part of it gives a series ot terse prohibitions and warnings embodying a somewhat legalistic code of conduct. (The substance of this appears also in the Letter of Barnabas*, ch 18-20, and seems to have come from an earlier form of the Didache, now extant only in Latin.) This is enriched with material taken from the Gospel of Matthew. The second part consists of directions as to baptism, fasts, prayer, and the Lord's Supper. Forgotten for a thousand years, it was discovered in 1873, and published in 1883. See Apostolic Constitutions, catechism.   E.J.G.

Dies Irae: (Lat., Day of wrath) A Latin hymn attributed to the thirteenth century Franciscan, Thomas of Celano, and used as the sequence in requiem* masses.   P.V.N.

Diet of Worms: See Worms, Diet of.

Dietrich of Niem: (ca. 1343-1418) German conciliarist. After many years of service as a papal secretary he broke with Gregory XII (1408), and supported the council of Pisa. John XXIII's maladministration led him to thorough conciliarism*. His numerous writings include De modis uniendi et reformandi ecclesiam (1410).

H. Heimpel, Dietrich v. Niem, (Munster, 1932).   J.T.M.

diffusionist school, the: See anthropology.

Diggers, the: A group of revolutionists appearing in 17th century Cromwellian England, insignificant in numbers, who called themselves the True Levellers. (See Levellers). They conceived the political revolution as an opportunity to bring about economic equality. They were the beginning of utopian communism regarding political reform as superficial unless it could redress the inequalities of the economic system. They drew their numbers from the ranks of the propertyless They were the first English appearance of a proletarian philosophy.

L. H. Berens, The Digger Movement in the Days of the Commonwealth (London, 1906) , Ed Bernstein, Cromwell and Communism (London, 1930).

H.H.

Dillmann, Christian Friedrich August: (1823-1894) German Lutheran O.T. scholar, professor at Kiel, Giessen, and Berlin, distinguished for research in Ethiopic language and literature and Jewish apocalyptic.   T A.K.

Dilthey, William: (1833-1911) Rebelling against scientific positivism and naturalism and influenced by Hegel, Dilthey turned to the stream of history as experienced, first, in one's self, and then in the phenomena of culture, for an understanding of both philosophy and the world His Einleitung in die Geisteswissenschaften (1883) directed attention to the Geisteswissenschaften or "sciences of spiritual things" which had their own methods and were independent of the natural sciences. One must erleben the life within and then verstehen the cultural evidences in society. Dilthey's influence grew rapidly after his death. It is especially noteworthy in Heidegger, Spranger, and Spengler.

Other works Das Erlebnis und die Dichtung (1905) , Das Wesen der Philosophie (1907) ; Gesammelte Schriften, 9 vols. (1913-34). See psychology, schools of.   J S.B.

Dinsmore, Charles Allen: (1860-1941) Minister, theologian, and educator. After thirty-two years in the pastorate of Congregational churches, he joined the faculty of the Yale University Divinity School in 1920, as lecturer on the spiritual content of literature. Unsurpassed among American scholars in the interpretation of Dante, concerning whose work he published three volumes, he wrote also upon the English Bible, the great poets as guides to the meaning of life, and the problems of religious faith His most widely read book, Atonement in Literature and Life (1906), has won a permanent place in the literature of theology.   L.A.W.

diocese: (Gr. dioikesis, a governor's jurisdiction or district) Originally used to describe the Greek provinces of the Roman Empire, and, apparently, followed by the church to describe the Episcopal areas of jurisdiction. In the West, the Diocese is the unit of a bishop's jurisdiction, at one time larger than the present dioceses, which are the result of subdivision.   F.W.B.

Diocletian: Roman Emperor (284-305). Reorganized and divided administration of empire for sake of efficiency. Feared strength of Christian church. Instituted the last great persecution. Cf. Elvira, Synod of.   K.H.C.

Diognetus, Epistle to: A highly rhetorical apologetic fragment, dating probably from the third century. It is ostensibly addressed to Diognetus, perhaps meaning the tutor of Marcus Aurelius*, and pictures the Christians as being to the world what the soul is to the body. The closing chapters 11, 12, are from a homily by some other hand. See patristics.   E.J.G.

Dionysiac Mysteries: See mystery religions.

Dionysius of Alexandria: (d. A D. 265) "Great bishop of Alexandria" (Eusebius), "teacher of the Catholic Church" (Athanasius), and eminent pupil of Origen*. Dionysius undertook the task of refuting the Atomic Materialists, but is notable in the History of Doctrine as having opposed both Chiliasm and Sabellianism, and as himself having been taken to task by his "namesake" and colleague, Dionysius of Rome*, for unsound doctrine (pluralism verging on tritheism). For an account of this controversy, labelled by Harnack a "prelude to the Arian* conflict", see the latter's History of Dogma and other standard works of the same subject.

For a radical interpretation of the differences between the Dionysii, see F. R. Green in Essays on the Trinity and the Incarnation (1928), ed A E J. Rawlinson, pp 254-7 See also Athanasius, De Sententia Dionysii, and Ante-Nicene Fathers, Vol. VI

C.W.L.

Dionysius the Areopagite: An unknown writer, claiming to be the judge whom Paul converted on the Aereopagus (Acts XVII, 34) and by legend the first bishop of Athens and a martyr in Paris where he was believed to be the first bearer of the Christian evangel, he commended his mystical writings to the Christian world and for a period of a thousand years from 500 A.D.-1500 A.D. was a principal influence on Christian theology. His works, On the Celestial Hierarchy, On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, On the Divine Names, On Mystical Theology, together with ten letters are now generally agreed to date from the end of the fifth century, to be heavily infused with Neo-Platonism* derived especially from Proclus, and to be the work of a devout Neo-Platonist Christian. It is almost impossible to overestimate the influence of these writings as a bridge over which Neo-Platonism traveled in order to fuse with the Christian thought and the devotional practice of the Middle Ages. See canons of various churches, Denis, St.

Works, tr. by J. Parker (London, 1897-99) ; Divine Names and Mystical Theology, tr. by C. E. Rolt (London, 1920).   D.V.S.

Dionysius of Rome: (d. A.D. 269) Bishop of Rome, eminent promoter of the authority of this See in matters of the Faith, and opponent of the extreme "Origenistic" doctrines of Dionysius of Alexandria*. The extant fragments of the Roman Dionysius—preserved by Athanasius*—have been printed in English in the Ante-Nicene Fathers, Vol. VII. Their title and the Editors' comments on Dionysius must be viewed with caution. See Dionysius of Alexandria.   C.W.L.

diplomatics, papal: The two main documents issued by the Papacy are the Bull*, (from bulla, the globular leaden seal) and the less formal Brief, sealed with red wax by "the fisherman's ring." Bulls are registered and indexed under the opening words, e.g., Inter cetera (1492) and Regnans in Excelsis (1570).　　　　　　F.W.B.

diptychs: A term used to describe the lists of persons, dead and living, for whom prayers were to be offered in the eucharistic services of the primitive Church. The diptychs are still retained in some liturgies, as, e.g., the Latin canon of the mass, which has a number of names mentioned at each offering of the sacrifice.　　　　　W.N.P.

Directory, Catholic: A large, paper-bound volume of nearly one thousand pages, published annually by P. J Kenedy and Sons of New York. The Directory presents the names, location, and other statistical data about the Catholic Hierarchy, its secular and regular priests, its brothers, nuns, dioceses, parishes and manifold institutions. Topographically arranged, the book follows four main divisions. 1) Vatican City, 2) The United States, 3) Canada and New Foundland; 4) Ireland, England, Scotland, Wales, Mexico and Cuba.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　C.V.

dirge (O.T.): Lament for the dead, of which two fine examples are ascribed to David (2 Sam. 1·19-27, 3 33-34). Used figuratively in psalms lamenting desolation of Jerusalem (Bk. of Lam.), and by prophets in announcing coming downfall of their own people (Amos 5 2), or (ironically) that of foreign oppressors (Isa. 14 4-21). As a literary form it is characterized by exclamatory "how!", by contrast of past and present states of the lamented one, and by a limping (3 2) metre.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　R.B.Y.S.

discant: (discantus, or descant) 1) The simultaneous and harmonious sounding of two or more melodies in metrical rhythm. The addition of meter to "new organum"*. Described first by Franco of Cologne in Ars Cantus Mensurabilis, discant originated in the 12th century.

2) The second counterpoint added to the plainsong* was called the discant. Derived from this idea, a discant came to refer to any melody added to a given melody. It was often improvised.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　E.H.B.

discernment of spirits: 1) Recognition of authenticity of ecstatic utterance (as in primitive church). 2) Recognition of source of moral and spiritual impulses (as in rules given by St. Ignatius). See spirits.　　　　　　　　　K.H.C.

Disciples of Christ: The largest religious body of purely American origin, having (1942) 1,664,-943 members, 8,002 churches and 7,693 ministers in the United States and Canada, and a world membership of 1,826,434. In 1942 they expended $13,480,374 for local church maintenance and gave $2,023,614 for missions and benevolences.

Thomas Campbell* gave the initial impulse and his son Alexander* was the leader of the movement when it gained, or had forced upon it, a separate identity, and for many years after. Thomas Campbell was an Irish Seceder Presbyterian minister who migrated to America in 1807, was soon disciplined by the synod of his church for divergence from its practices and doctrinal standards, specifically for admitting persons of other communions to the Lord's supper and for holding that a qualified layman (e.g., a ruling elder) might conduct a religious service when no minister was available. Back of this lay a zeal for the reunion of the divided church and a belief that the ground of its divisions was the use of creedal and theological terms of fellowship instead of the simple requirements practiced by the apostolic churches as recorded in the N.T. Upon these, he believed, there was general agreement among all Christians. Divisions had occurred because more had been required than the Apostles required, so that faith was buried under a mass of theological opinions codified into creeds. The remedy, obviously, was to discard creeds and their contents as tests of fellowship and to do and say what the Apostles said and did in regard to terms of communion and the structure and practices of the church. This was called "restoring primitive Christianity."

While still a Seceder Presbyterian, Thomas Campbell gathered about him a group, most but not all of whom were Presbyterians, whom he organized into "The Christian Association of Washington (Pa)" for which he wrote a "Declaration and Address" (1809) as a statement of principles and purposes. The Disciples of Christ count this as their beginning and therefore celebrated their centennial in 1909. The Christian Association soon became the Brush Run Church. One of its first acts was to license Alexander Campbell to preach. He had recently arrived from Ireland by way of Glasgow, where he had spent a year in the University. In seeking the Apostolic way, the group came to the belief that only the immersion of believers was Apostolic baptism. Agreement with the Baptists* on this point led the Brush Run Church to join the Redstone Baptist Association. From 1813 to 1830 the "reformers" were Baptists, but Baptists with the distinctive views indicated above. Through A. Campbell's magazine, the Christian Baptist (1823-30), his debates with the Presbyterians, Walker and McCalla, and his preaching tours, these views obtained a wide acceptance among Baptists. Separation from the Baptists was precipitated by Walter Scott who, as evangelist for the Baptist Mahoning Association in eastern Ohio, developed a simple and preachable formula of conversion which combined Campbell's Lockian conception of faith as the belief of testimony (an act of which the natural man is fully capable with no special act of enabling grace), repentance as sorrow for sins and amendment of life, and baptism as the final requirement upon which the promise of remission of the penitent believer's sins is conditioned. This was in sharp contrast with the theory that the penitent and "mourning" sinner must await some definite action upon him by the Holy Spirit, and must have an inner experience of this action and of his acceptance with God before he could have saving faith. The new slogan was, "In conversion, the Holy Spirit acts only through the Word." The resulting evangelistic technique was highly effective. The dissolution of the Mahoning Association (1830) led to the dissolution of several other Baptist associations which had been permeated by these views, the exclusion of the "reformers" from still other associations and churches, and the beginning of their separate existence as Disciples of Christ. Their local churches were generally called "Christian Churches" or "Churches of Christ."

Meanwhile a similar body known as "the Christian Church"* had been formed by the coalescence of three movements of independent origin but similar principles. The first of these was started by James O'Kelly, Methodist, in North Carolina, the second, by Elias Smith and Abner Jones, Baptists, in New England, the third, by Barton W. Stone and four associates, Presbyterians, in Kentucky. A considerable part of this group, especially the part most directly influenced by Stone in Kentucky and southern Ohio, united (1832) with the movement led by the Campbells and Scott. To this combined nucleus of independent "Disciples" and "Christians" were soon added thousands of converts. The appeal of the new rational evangelism was effective both with dissatisfied members of other denominations and with unbelievers who had hitherto resisted the mourner's bench type of revivalism that was current on the frontier. Proselytism was practiced without restraint or apology, but the evidence indicates that the gains were far more from the "world" than from the "sects."

As members and churches multiplied, the need of organization was felt. The first national convention met at Cincinnati in 1849 and formed the American Christian Missionary Society, which did both home and foreign missionary work—but not much of either, for the first foreign missions (to Jerusalem and Liberia) were failures, and by far the greater part of the expansion in America was due to the work of individuals, local churches and migrant Disciples who were moving westward with the tide that followed the frontier. The Disciples went through the Civil War without division, but later a conservative group gradually withdrew because of a conviction that missionary societies and instrumental music in public worship were alike "unscriptural." These anti-society separatists (known as "Churches of Christ" in the federal census since 1906) were not anti-missionary and had no theological affinity with the "anti-means"* Baptists. An awakening of missionary zeal among the Disciples led to the formation of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions (1874), the Foreign Christian Missionary Society (1875) and, soon after societies for church extension, benevolence, ministerial relief, and education. In 1920 these societies were merged to form the United Christian Missionary Society, with headquarters first at St. Louis, later at Indianapolis, Ind.

The earliest colleges were Bacon (1836), later merged with Transylvania at Lexington, Ky., and Bethany (1841), at Bethany, W. Va., of which A. Campbell was founder and for twenty years president. Many other colleges were founded—more, in fact, than could be supported, for scores of them died young. There are now listed, as co-operating with the Board of Higher Education, 13 colleges and universities, eight foundations at state universities, one independent divinity school, and the Disciples Divinity House of the University of Chicago.

Disciples of Christ have taken an active part in all interdenominational movements for Christian cooperation or union, from the International Sunday School Association and Christian Endeavor to the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America and the nascent World Council of Churches.

Errett Gates, The Disciples of Christ (1905) ; E. Gates, The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples (1904) ; W. T. Moore, A Comprehensive History of the Disciples (1909) ; W. W. Jennings, A Short History of the Disciples (1929) ; W. E. Garrison, Religion Follows the Frontier, A History of the Disciples of Christ (1931).   w.e.g.

disinterested benevolence: See benevolence, disinterested.

Dispater: Father Dis, a god of the underworld, synonymous with Hades or Pluto. Current in Rome after 249 B.C.   p.g.m. dispensationalism: An interpretation of God's work in history which finds its classical expression in the Scofield Bible. The root idea is that God has tried various expedients that have not succeeded, each one having been completely abandoned before its successor has been tried, so that the divine prescriptions for one "dispensation" have no force in the next.   a.k.r.

Dissenter: A term used after 1662 to replace Puritan* which had gained ill-repute in many quarters during the Protectorate. The term included all Protestant groups dissenting from the Anglican church, yet it was not quite the equivalent of Puritan which covered the non-conformist Episcopalians who did not break away from the church. In modern usage the term is frequently utilized in a much broader sense; e.g., Champlain Burrage in his Early English Dissenters (1912). See Corporation Act of 1661; nonconformity; Separatist.   w.s.h.

divination: Practises aiming at gaining knowledge of future or otherwise unknown events. In the O.T., diviners are listed among influential men, together with judges, prophets and elders (Is. iii, 2). Divination by Urim and Thummim (perhaps some sort of sacred dice) was widely practised in early times (I Sam. xiv, 41, reading of LXX; I Sam. xxviii, 6; Deut. xxxiii, 8), divination by necromancy or evocation of ghosts was already prohibited by Saul in the eleventh century B.C. (I Sam. xxviii, 3). Diviners of all kinds (Heb. qosemim) together with necromancers, sorcerers, interpreters of dreams and of clouds, were censured by the great prophets (Mic. iii, 6-7; Is. ii, 6, read miqqesem instead of miqqedhem; Is. viii, 19; Jer. xxvii, 9; Deut. xviii, 10, 14; II Kgs. xxi, 6; cf. Lev. xix, 26, 31; xx, 6, 27; etc.). See Etruscan religion; gambling; hepatoscopy; medicine men; omen; shu shu s.v. Chinese T'm.; sooth saying. Also see magic.

A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination among the Hebrews and the Semites (1938).   s.l.t.

divine decrees: The decretive will of God is distinguished, as relating to what He proposes to effect or to permit in time, from the preceptive will which relates to what His creatures ought, or ought not, to do. Thus the divine decrees are the distinguishable acts of His will which together constitute His purpose, and which, as realized by Him in time, constitute history in the widest sense, but especially involving the eternal destiny of men and of angels. See election; predestination.

A.K.R.

divine law: See ius divinum, law.

divine liturgy: See liturgy.

divine office: (Lat. officium, duty) The daily services of prayer, so called as constituting (with the Eucharist) the Church's duty of praise to God. From the ancient Vigil observed before Sunday (Acts 20 7) and on other occasions were derived Matins and Lauds, and Vespers in the evening. Private prayers at the 3rd, 6th, and 9th hours came in the fourth century to be observed in common by monks, and Prime and Compline were soon added; some monastic uses had an even more extensive series of hours of prayer. In the Greek Church since the 8th century rhythmical hymns have become prominent in the Office, in the West it still consists mainly of Scriptural elements— Psalms, canticles, and lessons. As time went on the feasts of saints multiplied, and by the 15th century the offices were complex and monotonous, in the 13th century they had been abridged into one volume (hence called Breviarium), and in practice were often said in two or three groups. The Roman Breviary has been several times reformed, most recently in 1911, to restore the ancient use of the whole Psalter, its recitation is binding on all in Holy Orders. In England two daily offices were formed out of the Breviary* in 1549, and have since remained the staple of Anglican non-eucharistic worship. See notes on individual services. See liturgy.

P. Batiffol, History of the Roman Breviary (3d ed, 1912); W. C. Bishop, The Mozarabic and Ambrosian Rites (1924); E. C. Ratcliff, "The Choir Offices," in W. K. L. Clarke, Liturgy and Worship (1932).

E.R.H.

divine right: A modern theory of kingship, chiefly associated with the Stuart monarchs in seventeenth century England, which held that kingship is a personal and hereditary right of divine institution. It should be distinguished from the ancient doctrine of the divinity of the ruler and from the medieval notion of the divine authority of the king's office. Under this theory, as expounded by James I and later Stuart adherents, the king possesses a personal right to rule by virtue of his birth and the divine authority inheres in his person and not in his office. See kings, divine right of.

J. N. Figgis. The Divine Right of Kings (1896).

W.S.H.

Divine Science Church: An "egocentric" sect based on divine healing, founded at San Francisco in 1885 by Mrs. Malinda E. Cramer who believed she had been healed after an illness. It has an involved teaching similar to that of Christian Science* and reports 18 churches and 4,000 members.

E.T.C.

divorce: The legal dissolution of the union between husband and wife. May be of two types absolute divorce, a vinculo matrimonis, which provides complete and final dissolution of the marriage* with freedom to marry again; legal separation or partial divorce, a mensa et thoro (separation from bed and board) which provides for establishment of separate residences without freedom to marry again.

Almost all peoples have recognized divorce yet the conditions under which it is granted have varied widely and continue to do so. The oldest divorce regulations are to be found in the Assyrian code of Hammurabi*, about 2300 to 2500 B C., which provided that man might divorce his wife at will without stating a reason. Among preliterates, one finds peoples such as the Veddas of Ceylon who do not permit divorce, others not only recognizing it but making the procedure quite simple. Thus a Zuni wife who no longer wishes to keep her husband makes known her decision by placing his personal belongings at the entrance of the house and upon seeing these, he returns to his parent's home. In the United States the first divorce was granted in Massachusetts in 1639.

The divorce rate varies widely from country to country and state to state within a country, the United States probably having the highest divorce rate among those countries having a modern culture. In the United States one finds not a single divorce in South Carolina for the year 1932 while in Nevada a high rate of 428.9 per 10,000 population. The explanation of this wide variation in the divorce rate lies in the lack of uniformity of divorce legislation. South Carolina has no law under which divorce may be granted while Nevada because of its liberal residence requirement encourages persons from other states having strict legislation to go to Nevada for divorces. Likewise there is found considerable variation in rate between rural and urban areas, the rural rate in 1932, the latest available, being approximately one-third the urban rate. Thus the divorce rate reflects the process of urbanization in modern society.

Among the more general legal grounds for divorce are: desertion, cruelty, drunkenness, adultery, and neglect to provide, these varying from state. Thus whereas New York State recognizes only one cause for divorce, adultery, several states recognize ten or more separate causes. The divorce rate in the United States, seven times as great in 1937 as in 1870, reflects the process of social change in our society. The divorce rate is often assumed to be an index of family instability but is in fact highly unreliable since it is no measure of the large number of cases of domestic discord which never reach the divorce court as well as the cases of desertion and non-support which although known to the special courts are not there for divorce action. Neither do the grounds upon which the divorce is granted reflect the causes of family instability since they are only legal straight-jackets into which the real causes must fit in order that the decree may be obtained. See family, infidelity.

Ernest W Burgess and Leonard S. Cottrell, Predicting Success or Failure in Marriage (1939), Alfred Cahen, Statistical Analysis of American Divorce (1932), Mabel A. Elliott, "The Nature and Extent of Divorce," in Becker, Howard and Hill, Reuben (ed) Marriage and the Family (1942); J. P. Lichtenberger, Divorce. A Social Interpretation (1931), Ernest R. Mowrer, Family Disorganization (rev. ed., 1939), E. R. Mowrer, Disorganization: Personal and Social (1942); E R Mowrer and Harriet R. Mowrer, Domestic Discord (1928); Harriet R Mowrer, Personality Adjustment and Domestic Discord (1935); Lewis N Terman and Associates, Psychological Factors in Marital Happiness (1938).

H. R M.

docetism: The doctrine that Christ was too' divine to suffer agony and death, and that he only seemed (Greek, dokeo) to do so. Some color was found for it in the cry upon the cross, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Ps. 22·1) the Hebrew of which might be rendered "My Power," as in Aquila's version. This position was supported in the Gospel of Peter, A.D. 120-140, which translates the cry in this way, and in the Acts of John, A.D. 170-180, which describes Jesus as appearing to John on the Mount of Olives while his body was apparently being crucified across the valley. Docetism is opposed in the Gospel of John, which insists upon the reality of Jesus' death, 19·33-35, and in the Letters of Ignatius, A.D. 110-117, who declares that Christ's sufferings were real, not merely semblance, and that the Docetists themselves are but semblance. The Docetists had much in common with Gnosticism*, but eventually became a distinct sect.

E. J. G.

Doctor of the Church: Official title given to one who has distinguished himself by holiness and learning. The title must be conferred by the Pope or a General Council. The eminent learning of the person enables him to be followed as a safe guide in theology, as a doctor of the Church as well as a doctor in the Church. Pope Boniface VIII* was the first to confer the title in 1295. At present there are 28 doctors of the Church.

Also a title bestowed on learned theologians in the Middle Ages. Thomas Aquinas is known as the Angelic Doctor, Duns Scotus as the Subtle Doctor.

Cf. The New Catholic Dictionary (Vatican Edition); National Catholic Almanac (1941), p. 109.

S. C.

Dods, Marcus: (1834-1909) Scottish minister, Professor of N.T. at New College, Edinburgh from 1889, and Principal from 1907. Author of commentaries on Genesis and I Cor. in the Expositor's Bible and on John and Hebrews in the Expositor's Greek Testament.

S. M. G. dogma: (Gr. dogma) Decrees or edicts: used in the N.T. of government decrees (Lk. 2:1; Acts 17:7) and of ordinances of Jewish law (Eph. 2:15; Col. 2:14). Used of Church promulgation once only in N.T. (decrees of Council of Jerusalem: Acts 16:4). Dogma may mean any fixed belief, as when the mechanistic view of nature is spoken of as a dogma of the 18th century physics. But more properly it is Church belief, not essays in doctrine by individual theologians, but doctrine formulated in Creeds and Articles for acceptance by the Christian Community. Individuals may receive and explicate dogma (e.g., Barth, Church Dogmatic). Dogma is the body of truth in which people who grow up within the Church are instructed, for Roman Catholics it is the authoritative law of the Church and acceptance of it is necessary, for Protestants too it bears the Church's authority as being vital or even essential to Christian faith and life.

N Micklem, What is the Faith? I. The Nature of Dogma; II. The Content of Dogma (1936), O C Quick, Doctrines of the Creed (1938).

J. L.

dogmatic theology: "Dogmatics is the presentation of dogmas* in a coherent system" (Haering, The Christian Faith), the attempt to construct a 'Science of Christian Faith' by orderly explication of its intellectual content and meaning. The substance of dogmatic theology is revealed truth, but the discipline is continuous of giving this truth arrangement and form suited to the comprehension of each succeeding age. See systematic theology.

T. Haering, The Christian Faith: A System of Dogmatics, tr. Dickie and Ferries (1913).

J. L.

dogmatism: (Gr. dogma, opinion or belief) 1) Belief in propositions supposed to embody revealed truth or required articles of faith. "Dogmatism is necessary to religion (Catholic Encyclopedia). 2) Any system of philosophy "which assumes a certain set of principles as its starting point" (Stetson in Baldwin). Particularly, since Kant, belief in metaphysical propositions without preliminary epistemological criticism of the nature and limits of knowledge; Wolff is a typical dogmatist in this sense. 3) Positiveness in the assertion of opinions (Webster). 4) Belief in any propositions for which there is insufficient evidence. 5) Fixed, arrogant, or arbitrary belief, accompanied by unwillingness to examine its grounds or to modify it for any reason; the National Socialist world view seems to be dogmatic in this sense.

E. S. B.

Döllinger, Johann Joseph Ignaz von: (1799-1890) Theologian and church historian, he was ordained a priest in 1822 and since 1826 taught theology, later church history, at Munich. He was early connected with Lamennais* the Liberal Catholic, and corresponded with the English Tractarians. Döllinger was the leading German savant to oppose the R. C. definition of the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception* (1854) and of the Papal Infallibility* (1870). Upon refusing to submit he was excommunicated. Fellow-dissentients organized the Old Catholic Church*, ordination being provided by Dutch Jansenist bishops. He promoted efforts towards union of Old Catholic, Greek, and Anglican churches. Among the eminent men who had been his pupils was Lord Acton. Notable works of Döllinger are The Reformation, 3 vols. (1846-48), Past and Present of Catholic Theology (1863).

J. Friedrich, Ignaz von Döllinger, Sein Leben auf Grund seines Schriftlichen Nachlasses (Munich, 1899-1901), is by a contemporary, Catholic Encyclopedia, "Dollinger"; C Mirbt, Quellen . . . , (1934 ed, Tubingen), p. 572 f   Q.B.

dolmen: A Celtic name, probably meaning stone table, given to a structure of two or more upright monoliths supporting a flat roof-stone. Since bones are sometimes found beneath the table, a dolmen is commonly regarded as a tomb. It might have been a primitive temple.   P.G.M.

Dominic, St.: Founder of the Order of Preachers (O. P.), and with St. Francis* of Assisi a leader in the medieval reform of Christian living. He was born at Calaroga in Castile ca. 1170, and died in 1221 in Bologna. A tireless apostle and incessant traveler, he prayed constantly, preached with great success up and down Europe, practiced extraordinary penance, and down to the present time exerts influence for good through his spiritual sons and daughters, the members of the three divisions of the Dominican Order*.   C.V.

dominical letter: An old-time chronological device for finding the day of the week for any given date.   L.R.W.

dominicale: (Lat., from dominus, lord) A veil worn by women when approaching the Communion table. According to the Council of Auxerre (585 or 587) it is explained as a cloth with which women were to cover their hands when receiving the Eucharist. But the Penitentiale of Theodosius refers to the dominicale as the prescribed head-covering of women. Accordingly, dominicale has the sense of both a head-dress and a napkin. It may well be that the same veil served both purposes: placed upon the head, the hanging ends could be grasped by one or both hands, and thus the Eucharist could be placed in the latter.   C.V.

Dominican Order: The Order of Preachers, an order of mendicant friars, founded by St. Dominic* early in the 13th century, to assist in the reform of Christian life. The main purpose of the Dominicans has always been preaching the Word of God, which work they have accomplished effectively down to the present time. They have manifested great ability as controversialists, scholars, experts in social studies, and the standard they have maintained in ecclesiastical studies is exceptionally high. St. Thomas Aquinas*, known universally as the "Angelic Doctor", is the greatest glory of the Dominican Order. See Black Friars; magister sacri Palatii; Lacordaire, mendicant orders.

D. A. Mortier, P. Conway, B. Jarret, The Lives of the Brethren of the Order of Preachers (1924).   C.V.

dominicum: (A substantive formed from the Lat. dominus, lord, hence "The Lord's House")' The term designating the buildings in which Christians celebrated their liturgical functions during the periods of the early persecutions. They were houses like ordinary residences of the time, but somewhat larger and more ornate. The term dominicum was still in use in the fourth century.   C.V.

Domitian: Roman Emperor, 81-96. Undertook reforms in administration, morals and religion. First emperor to assume divine honours in lifetime. Took measures against Christians in Rome.   K.H.C.

Donation of Constantine: A document in which the Emperor Constantine* is represented as conferring sovereignty over the western portion of the empire to Pope Sylvester I. It was generally accepted as authentic and was utilized as the basis for the papal claim to temporal supremacy until 1440 when Lorenzo Valla thoroughly demonstrated its spuriousness.   W.S.H.

Donatism: A schismatic sect of the ancient Christian church, which arose from personal and local controversies in the Carthagenian church over the requested surrender of sacred writings during the Diocletian persecution. Initiated at first within a local church, a number of factors contributed to its rise the pride of martyrs, the revitalized piety caused by the pressure of persecution, the conception of the holiness of the church, archaic religious reminiscences, the pressure suffered from magistrates, the alliance of the Catholic church with the state and miserable social conditions. It had not even a nominal membership outside of North Africa. Its membership grew particularly among the lower social classes. Socialistic ideas, extreme separatistic and exclusive tendencies, blind fanaticism resorting to destructive violence, characterized its members. The movement was declared heretical in 405 A.D. Being essentially a conservative movement, largely rooted in Cyprian's* ideas, it underwent various schisms. It advocated an episcopal basis of the church, demanding of its bishops that they be holy men, and contending that only under this condition were the sacraments effective. At the Synod of Arles* (314 A.D.) it was decided that the validity of ordination and baptism was not dependent upon the merit of the administrator. See intention, sacramental.

F Ribbeck, Donatus und Augustinus 2 vols. (Elberfeld, 1858); D. Volter, Der Ursprung des Donatismus (Freiberg im Breisgau, 1883).   H.H.

Donne, John: (1572-1631) English poet and churchman. In early life a Roman Catholic, Donne took Anglican orders in 1615, having long before that date essayed the roles of soldier, minor diplomat, and man of the world as well as having explored the learning of Oxford, Cambridge, and Lincoln's Inn. From 1621 until his death, he was Dean of St. Paul's, London, considered by many the most eloquent preacher of the 17th century. The extraordinary range of his experience, both secular and religious, found full expression in his poetry, the first collection of which appeared in 1633. His Divine Poems, although not numerous, are among his most important, setting the pattern for Herbert, Crashaw, and others of the so-called metaphysical school. As a prose writer he is at his best in his Ser- mons, of which three folios were published between 1640 and 1669. Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624) is also memorable.

H. J. C. Grierson's edition of the Poetical Works (2 vols., 1912) is standard, as is the Life and Letters of John Donne by Edmund Gosse, 2 vols. (1899). There is an excellent volume of selections from the Sermons, edited by L. P. Smith (1919).
L.W.C.

Dordrecht Confession of Faith (Dutch Mennonite): Though considering the making of theological distinctions inimical to the life of the spirit the Mennonites adopted a Confession of Faith at a Conference held in Dordrecht, in Holland, April 21, 1632. It consists of eighteen articles heavily weighted with Scriptural proof texts. The distinctive articles are. XI, The Washing of the Saints Feet, XIV, Defense by Force, XV, The Swearing of Oaths; XVII, The Shunning of Those Who are Expelled. See Confessions, Formal.
W.W.S.

Doric style: See temples, Greek and Roman.

Dorner, August Johannes: (1846-1920) A son of the mediating theologian of the same name, he was professor in Königsberg. He continued liberal theology most strictly. As he considered metaphysics a meeting of philosophy and religion, the proofs of God, above all the ontological one again played an important role.

Grundriss der Dogmengeschichte (Berlin, 1899). Enzyklopädie der Theologie (Berlin, 1901); Religionsphilosophie (Berlin, 1903); Enzyklopädie der Philosophie (Berlin, 1910); Metaphysik des Christentums (Stuttgart, 1913).
H.H.

Dorner, Isaac August: (1809-1884) An eminent German Lutheran theologian, taught in the Universities of Tübingen, Kiel, Königsberg, Bonn, Göttingen and Berlin (1862-1884).

His great work was, The History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ (1835-1839), (enlarged ed. 1845-1856). He also published the valuable History of Protestant Theology (1867, English tr., 1871) and Christliche Glaubenslehre (1879-1881).

Dorner was widely esteemed for his Christian character as well as for his teaching and his creative work in theology. He was active also in the service of the Church and a leader in the cause of Christian unity, in the interest of which he visited America in 1873 as a delegate to the Sixth Conference of the Evangelical Alliance.
J.W.B.

Dort, Synod of: The Synod of Dort (Nov. 13, 1618—May 9, 1619) was called by the States-General of Holland to pass upon the Arminian* controversy. It was intended to be a general council of the Calvinistic churches. Representatives from England, the Palatinate, Hesse, Switzerland and Bremen were present but these were very few compared with the large number from Holland itself. The Arminians were Republicans. The Calvinists of Holland supported the efforts of Prince Maurice, the Stadholder, to centralize authority in himself. Maurice and his followers were in control. By unanimous vote, the five articles of the Remonstrance* were condemned and the Arminian ministers were deposed. See Belgic Confession; five points of Arminianism; five points of Calvinism.

W.E.R.

Dositheus, Patriarch: See Jerusalem, Synod of.

Dostoievski, Fyodor Mikhaylovich: (1821-81) Russian writer, born in Moscow on October 30, 1821. In 1841 he graduated from the School of Military Engineers in Petersburg, but he abandoned his military career to devote himself to literature. His first novel Poor Folk (1845), written under the influence of Gogol, won him early fame as a writer. In 1849 D. became involved in the trial of the Petrashevski circle, a group of young radicals advocating social reform. He was sentenced to penal servitude in Siberia. During years of extreme physical suffering he underwent a profound spiritual transformation. Through his discovery of the spiritual depth of Russian folk religion, D. became an opponent of the materialistic atheism and nihilism of modern European civilization. After his release from prison, D. wrote The House of Death (1861), containing the memoirs of his Siberian captivity, and a novel Humiliated and Insulted (1862). Financial reverses following the failure of two magazines he had founded after his return to Petersburg, forced D. to go abroad to escape his creditors. These years represent a time of tremendous literary production. In 1869 he wrote Memoirs from Underground, Crime and Punishment, The Gambler, The Idiot; in 1870 The Eternal Husband, in 1871 The Devils. In 1871 D. returned to Petersburg. He reached the climax of his literary career with the publication of his novel The Brothers Karamazov (1880) and his famous address at the unveiling of the Pushkin memorial in Moscow. He died on January 28, 1881.

D. has exerted a strong influence not only upon modern European literature, but also upon contemporary theology. Particularly the Swiss theologian Karl Barth* found in D.'s profound analysis of man an interpretation of human existence which supported his own attack against the anthropology of modern humanistic idealism. D.'s sympathetic portrayal of the downtrodden and the humiliated furnished the modern background for Barth's reformulation of the original Christian understanding of sin and grace.
H.H.fk.

Douai Bible: The Bible translated into English at Douai in Flanders by Gregory Martin and other Englishmen in the 17th century, and revised by Bishop Challoner in the 18th century. The translation of the N.T. was completed at Rheims. This is the Bible used in English by Roman Catholics. See Bible, English.
L.R.W.

double predestination: The belief that God in His inscrutable wisdom issued before all worlds a twofold decree, whereby He chose some for life everlasting (election), while condemning others to eternal death (reprobation). The milder doctrine, single predestination*, is that God by His sovereign will purposed positively only the decree of election*, taking merely negative action with regard to the remaining men and angels, simply passing them by (preterition), leaving them to suffer the just consequence of their sin. Cf. Gottschalk.

A.C.

double standard of morals: This term is used to refer to the widespread social practice of permitting greater freedom in sexual conduct to men than to women. Generally this has taken the form of permitting illicit sexual experiences upon the part of men until marriage while requiring that women remain virgins. Not infrequently this tolerant attitude toward sexual irregularity upon the part of the male has been extended beyond marriage although no such freedom was accorded the female. The existence of this double standard of sexual conduct has led the femininists to take one of two positions. 1) the standard of sexual conduct imposed upon women should also be enforced upon men, or 2) women should be allowed the same liberties as are men.

E.R.M.

double truth: See twofold-truth theory.

Doukhobors: See communistic settlements, religious; Russian sectarianism.

Dowieites: See communistic settlements, religious.

doxology: A formal ascription of praise to God. Traditionally used by Jews and Christians at the conclusion of public prayer. Bishop Ken's doxology "Praise God from whom all blessings flow" has become a popular form among English speaking congregations. See gloria in excelsis; gloria patri; Te Deum. Also see amen; kaddish; trisagion.

V.F.

dragon: The common designation for the mythological serpent that appears in various early cultures. The Hebrew tradition made it the source of evil in the world, and Christianity carried forward the same idea. In the Book of Revelation* the dragon is "the old serpent," the Devil and Satan (12:9). As a menace to mankind dragons were especially feared during the middle ages, and popular saints or heroes were reputed to have slain these mythological monsters. See beast.

s.J.C.

drama, religious: See religious drama.

Dravidian: A rather loose term generally used to designate that portion of the Indian population which is neither Aryan, Scythian or Mongoloid, or still more loosely as the indigenous inhabitants of India before the coming of the Aryans. Their religion corresponds well to the cultural level at which they are found today. Much of it has been taken over into Hinduism*. Indeed Hinduism at its lower levels is in great part ancient Dravidian religion. It is animistic to a considerable degree. Its deities are many, most of them animal or nature objects or powers, and many are malevolent. One of the most common is the Small-pox deity, known under many names. Most of them are quite local. Unlike Hinduism proper, the worship does not require Brahmin priests but is carried on by functionaries which resemble the medicine men or shamans* in other cultures. There are many religious festivals, and they have to do largely with the food supply, such as hunting festivals, and planting and harvest feasts, though many are designed to control the malevolent spirits.

Their faith and practise have been well described in Henry W. Whitehead, Village Gods of Southern India (1916, Second Ed , 1921), and W. T. Elmore, Dravidian Gods in Modern Hinduism (1915).

C.S.B.

Driesch, Hans Adolf: (1867-1940) He worked experimentally at the zoological station in Naples, Italy. In 1907-8 he was Gifford lecturer at the University of Aberdeen and taught successively at the universities of Heidelberg, Cologne and Leipzig. He also was guest professor at the University of Peking. He was the most eminent representative of the neo-vitalistic movement which began in Germany with Eduard Johannes Reinke. Epistemologically, he was intimate with neo-realism and phenomenology. He recognized the special significance of parapsychological* phenomena for the future of metaphysics.

God, the superpersonal entelechy, expresses itself for Driesch developmentally in the ethical consciousness of human history. God is the apex of the teleological structure of the world. He is the reality who is the metaphysical basis of the development of the super-personal life. He is conceivably and factually unconditional, conditioning everything. As an empirical rationalist, Driesch rejected atheism. He reached the conclusion that genuine pantheism (in Bergson's formula Dieu se fait in freedom, in timeless development); emanatory theism (the same God passes completely through stages of development, He is the existing stage of reality and is able to attain other levels); and creative theism (God creates the world next to Himself and endures from eternity to eternity as complete totality)—are irresoluble theological questions. Sceptically and cautiously, yet solemnly, Driesch proceeded toward transcendent human interests. Regarding death as the door to the highest metaphysics, he gave the problem of death a central place in his doctrine of reality. His view of reality ended in a supernaturalistic philosophy of redemption according to which salvation consists in a change of our metaphysical reality. Death is conceived as a change to a new form of knowing and experience. Freedom being a part of the question of God, immorality. His view of reality ended in a superworks distinguish themselves by their most rigorous matter-of-factness.

The Science and Philosophy of the Organism (London, 1908) ; Ordnungslehre. Ein System des nichtmetaphysischen Teiles der Philosophie (Jena, 1912, 2 ed., Jena, 1923) ; The Problem of Individuality (London, 1914) ; The History and Theory of Vitalism (London, 1914) ; Wirklichkeitslehre (Leipzig, 1917, 2 ed. ,Leipzig, 1922, 3 ed., Leipzig, 1930) ; Das Problem der Freiheit (Berlin, 1917, 2 ed., Darmstadt, 1920) ; Wissen und Denken. Ein Prolegomenon zu aller Philosophie (Leipzig, 1919) ; Die Probleme der Naturphilosophie im Rahmen eines Systems (Berlin, 1922) ; Relativitätstheorie und Philosophie (Karlsruhe, 1924) ; Grund probleme der Psychologie. Ihre Krise in der Gegenwart (2 ed., Leipzig, 1926) ; The Possibility of Metaphysic (London, 1926) ; Die sittliche Tat (Leipzig, 1927), Mind and Body. A Criticism of Psychophysical Parallelism (London, 1927); O. Heinichen, Drieschs Philosophie (Leipzig, 1924), A Gehlen, Zur Theorie der Setzung und das setzungshafte Wissen bei Driesch (Leipzig, 1927), Festschrift Hans Driesch zum sechzigsten Geburtstag. vol. I, ed by E. Becher et al; vol. II, ed. by P Biro et al(Leipzig, 1927), H Burchard, Der Entelechiebegriff bei Aristoteles und Driesch (Munster i W, 1928), Der Mensch und die Welt (Leipzig, 1928), E. Heuss, Rationale Biologie une ihre Kritik (eine Auseinandersetzung mit dem Vitalismus H. Drieschs) (Leipzig, 1938).   H.H.

druids: Priests of the early Celts, given much publicity by Julius Caesar in his commentaries They figure as weavers of spells in Irish folk-lore, and Welsh writers have woven a magnificent legend of philosophy and wisdom about them. Their rite of cutting mistletoe with golden sickles is fairly well authenticated.

J. Williams, Barddas (Llandovery, 1862).
                                                        P G.M.

Drummond, Henry: (1851-1897) Born in Stirling, Scotland August 17, 1851. Drummond was educated at Edinburgh University, studied for the ministry in Free Church College, and was made Lecturer on Natural Science in the same in 1877. He was associated for two years (1874-1875) with D. L. Moody* in evangelism in Britain and America. In 1880 he published Tropical Africa, in 1883 Natural Law in the Spiritual World, which won wide approval but was criticized for confusing analogy and identity, and in 1894 The Ascent of Man (Lowell Lectures) depicting the struggle for the life of others in the animal world. Drummond was peculiarly adept in presenting the Christian life in its intellectual and spiritual appeal to students. His address "The Greatest Thing in the World" became widely known and valued.

Cf. George Adam Smith, Life of Henry Drummond (1899); also The Ideal Life (1897).   J.W.B.

Druses: A religious sect named for one of the founders, Darasi, who in the 11th century claimed al-Hakim, Caliph of Egypt (996-1021) to be the incarnation of God. He fled to the mountains of Lebanon and taught the people there, who have maintained religious and political independence for nearly nine centuries. Their faith mingles the teachings of the Mosaic law, the Christian Gospels, the Koran and the Sufi allegories. They believe in one God, (calling themselves Unitarians), transmigration of souls, constant progress, and final perfection. The territory of Jebel Druse was created in 1925 when Syria was divided under French mandate into four territories. Their population is numbered at 86,000. They have created an extensive theological literature.   P.E.J.

dryad: In Greek mythology, a tree nymph* or spirit of a tree, inhabiting it and appearing occasionally to men as a beautiful maiden. She perished when her tree was cut down or died.
                                                        P.G.M.

dualism, epistemological: See epistemology.

dualism, metaphysical: See ontology.

Duck River Baptists: A group of conservative Baptist churches, all in the South, usually grouped as "Duck River and Kindred Associations of Baptists," and sometimes called the "Baptist Church of Christ." They drew apart from other Baptists and joined separate associations in early discussions over Calvinism and missionary work. They are mildly Calvinistic and believe in the "perseverance of the saints" They practice immersion and feet washing and oppose a salaried ministry. While they have no missionary work they do not class themselves among the antimissionary groups. These churches differ little from the United and Regular Baptists. There are 91 churches claiming nearly 8,000 members, nearly all being in the hill country of Tennessee and Alabama   E T.C.

Dudleian Lectureship: Founded in 1751 by the will of Paul Dudley of the class of 1690 at Harvard it provides for "an Anniversary Sermon or Lecture to be held or preached at the said Colledge once every year successively." Three subjects specified by the testator are now treated in rotation 1) natural religion, 2) revealed religion, 3) the validity of non-episcopal ordination. Recent appointees to the lectureship have included: J. B. Pratt, L. P. Jacks, James Moffatt, D. C. Macintosh. The lecturer for 1942 is Reinhold Niebuhr.   J.S.B.

Duhm, Bernhard: (1847-1928) He taught at the universities of Gottingen and Basel. He wrote significant commentaries on Isaiah, the Psalms and Jeremiah. Unlike Wellhausen* who sought to determine the historical place of prophetism, Duhm was essentially interested in opening up the understanding of the content of the prophetic message.

Theologie der Propheten (Bonn, 1875), Israels Propheten (Tübingen, 1916).   H.H.

Dukhobortsy: See Russian sectarianism.

dulia: See Mary, cult of; saints, veneration. Cf. latria.

Dunant, Jean Henri: See Red Cross.

Dunkards: See Dunkers.

Dunkers (also Dunkards or Tunkers): A popular name for the German Baptist Brethren, from the German tunken, to dip. In 1708 at Schwarzenau, Germany, Alexander Mack* led eight persons in founding a religious fellowship which held the N.T. as their only creed and agreed to accept new light as it came to them. They practised adult baptism by trine immersion*; held love-feasts* including feet-washing, kiss of charity*, meal called Lord's Supper, and the communion; anointed the sick for healing; emphasized simplicity in living; opposed legal oaths, lawsuits, and military service; urged non-resistance to evil and non-coercion in religion.

In 1719-29 they settled in Pennsylvania which remains their strongest center, although they have members in nearly every state. Colonial activities included the press of Christopher Sower* and his famous German Bible published in 1743 They were mostly farmers until 1850 after which they revived their publishing, established colleges and theological schools, and sent missionaries to India, China, South America and Africa. With many urban settlements they remain predominantly rural They continue their historic peace position by maintaining, with the Mennonites and Friends'*, Civilian Public Service Camps for conscientious objectors.

Beside deacons and ministers, they have ordained elders who preside over local congregations and larger church bodies The traditional free ministry is slowly shifting to paid pastors In polity they are congregational but since 1742 their Annual Meeting, composed of a Standing Committee of elders and a general delegate body from the congregations, has made decisions which are considered binding on the whole church.

After the schism of 1728 led by Conrad Beissel of the Ephrata Society*, various offshoots have appeared, but the main present groups stem from the 1881-82 division, viz The Old German Baptist Brethren ("Old Order"), numbering in 1936 3,589, who publish The Vindicator at Brookville, Ohio; The Brethren Church ("Progressive") numbering in 1936 30,636 (now two groups), who publish The Brethren Evangelist at Ashland, Ohio, and The Church of the Brethren ("Conservative"), numbering in 1941 178,271, who publish The Gospel Messenger at their headquarters in Elgin, Illinois Cf River Brethren.

Martin G. Brumbaugh, A History of the German Baptist Brethren in Europe and America (1899), Henry R. Holsinger, A History of the Tunkers and the Brethren Churches (1901) ; Otho Winger, History and Doctrines of the Church of the Brethren (1919).   W M.B.

Dunkmann, Karl: (1868-   ) He was professor in Greifswald. Now in retirement he writes mostly on sociological questions. As a dogmatic theologian and religious philosopher he belongs to the modern positive group.

Geschichte des Christentums als Religion der Versöhnung und Erlösung (Leipzig, 1907), Der historische Jesus, der mythologische Jesus und Jesus der Christus (Leipzig, 1913), Metaphysik der Geschichte (Leipzig, 1914), Die theologische Prinzipienlehre Schleiermachers (Gütersloh, 1916), Religionsphilosophie (Gütersloh, 1917), Der christliche Gottesglaube (Gütersloh, 1918).   H.H.

Duns Scotus, John: (ca. 1266/1274-1308) His astute, virtuose handling of the scholastic method was normative for the dissolution of scholastic theories. As a realist, maintaining both the reality of universals and individuality (haeccity) in things, he held that a complete certainty of the reality of a thing can only be attained by sensory experience. He considered individuality to be the real purpose of nature. The doctrine of the primacy of the will was also central to his thought. In view of the fact that an absolutely certain knowledge of the existence of God, of the immortality of the soul, of the resurrection is unattainable by scientific means, that the objects of faith are never logically necessary and certain of proof, his evident scepticism and emphasis on the relative character of religious knowledge made him a pioneer of nominalistic criticism. He radically distinguished between theology and metaphysics He developed a definitive ecclesiastical positivism, he studied the idea of predestination, and his Christology exhibited more understanding for the human life of Jesus than the rest of the great scholastics Accused of formalism by his successors, he also taught them to apply dialectics without consideration for the deepest religious mysteries He doubted the agreement of dogma and philosophy, whereas the incomprehensible and irrational was truth for him by virtue of the authority of the church See scholasticism.

P Minges, "Ist Duns Scotus Indeterminist?" (Beiträge z. Geschichte d. Philosophie d. Mittelalters) (Munster, 1905), other studies of Minges on Duns Scotus in the Philosophisches Jahrbuch (Fulda, 1906, 1907), P Minges, Das Verhältnis zwischen Glauben und Wissen, Theologie und Philosophie nach Duns Scotus (Munster, 1908) ; P Minges, Der angebliche excessive Realismus des Duns Scotus (Munster, 1908), E Pluzanski, Essai sur la philosophie de Duns Scotus (Paris, 1887), R. Seeberg, Die Theologie des Johannes Duns Scotus (Leipzig, 1900), K. Werner, Johannes Duns Scotus (Vienna, 1881).   H.H.

Dunstan, Saint: (ca. 924-988) Abbot of Glastonbury, archbishop of Canterbury. As primate he brought about a thorough reform of the church and was virtually leader of the Anglo-Saxon government under several kings, notably Edgar.   E.C.K.

duomo: (Lat. domus, a house) The common Italian term for a cathedral*.   F.T.P.

Durandus of St. Pourcain: (1270-75 - 1334) A substantial, independent thinker, the doctor resolutissimus of his age who preferred reason to authority. Although a Dominican, he stood in strong opposition to Saint Thomas Aquinas* (1225-6-1274) for which he was repeatedly censored. His views are Platonic-Augustinian, untainted by Nominalism*. As Bishop of Meaux he concurred to the condemnation of William of Ockham* (circa, 1300-1349).   S.C.T.

Dürkheim, Emile: (1858-1917) According to Durkheim, the essence of religion is to maintain the distinction between profane and sacred things, manifested in innumerable forms and exhibited in ceremonies, the purpose of which are to purify man from sin, make a profane individual a participant of the sacred, or give an added portion of it. It is his theory that the source of religion is society itself, that religious conceptions are nothing but symbols of the characteristics of society, that the sacred, or God, is but a personified society, that the social function of religion consists in the creation, expansion, reinforcement and maintenance of social solidarity. The essence of religion is eternal, only its concrete forms change. See primitive religion.

E. Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of Religion (London, 1915).   H.H.

Dutch Radicals: A term applied to an extreme school of critics of the history and literature of early Christianity. In their view none of the writings of the N.T. are earlier than the second century. In contradistinction to the Tubingen scholars* they regard history as a gradual and slow evolution. Among representatives holding this general point of view may be mentioned Pierson, Loman, van Manen, and van den Bergh van Eysinga. The most convenient treatment in English is to be found in the volume of the last named scholar, Radical Views about the New Testament (1912).   M.S.E.

Dwight, Timothy: (May 14, 1752 - Jan. 11, 1817) Congregational clergyman, theologian, revivalist, educator, graduated from Yale College in 1769, was Principal of the Hopkins Grammar School to 1771, and tutor at Yale until 1777 when he resigned to become a chaplain in the Colonial forces. In 1779 he left the chaplaincy to care for his widowed mother and family at Northampton, Mass., and in November, 1783 was ordained over the church at Greenfield Hill, Conn. There he conducted a "school for both sexes," wrote some of his well known poems, and became a leader among the clergy. Upon the death of Ezra Stiles in 1795, Dwight was elected President of Yale College, in which position, and as professor of theology, he served until his death. Dwight was a great teacher and a forward-looking educator who gave Yale its first appearance of a modern university. Tremendously concerned over the encroachments of "French infidelity" and the decline of Christianity in America, he shaped his theology (Theology: Explained and Defended, 5 vols., 1818) to meet the challenge, and under his powerful preaching a revival was started that grew into what is now known as the Second Great Awakening. Dwight was the theological teacher of Lyman Beecher, Nathaniel W. Taylor and those who later shaped the New Haven Theology*. He taught them to go back to the Old Calvinism* of pre-Revolutionary days for their basic tenets, and their views were built upon that foundation. See American theology, early.

Charles E. Cuningham, Timothy Dwight (1942); Memoir, vol. I of his Theology; Charles R. Keller, The Second Great Awakening in Connecticut (1942); S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor (1942).

                                                                 S E.M.

Dwinell, Israel Edson: (1820-1890) Theologian and Professor of Homiletics, Pacific School of Religion, 1884-1890. Author. "Christianity a Religion of Expectancy," "The Mind Back of Consciousness" (articles). Associate Editor, Bibliotheca Sacra.

See also Memoir (1892) by Henry Jewett; Religious Progress on the Pacific Coast.   J.W.B.

Dyananda Sarasvati: See Arya Samaj.

Dyaus: The ancient Aryan sky god, already clearly past the zenith of his development by the time the Vedic hymns were composed. Corresponds with the Greek Zeus, Roman Jupiter, and Teutonic Ziu or Tiu.   C.S.B.

dynamics: Change of intensity of tone denoted by such terms as crescendo, diminuendo, sforzando.
                                                                 E.H.B.

dynamism: See ontology.

dynamistic monarchianism: See monarchianism.

Dyophysites: (Gr., dyo, two; physis, nature) Those in the 5th century who held the doctrine of the coexistence in Christ of two natures, the human and the divine, defined in the Chalcedonian formula (451) as without "confusion, change, division or separation." Opposite of Monophysites*. See Chalcedon, Council of, Christology.
                                                                 S.M.G.

dyotheletism: The Christological doctrine that Christ the god-man had two wills (human and divine) corresponding to the two natures. Orthodox theologians, in particular, taught the doctrine. There also were monotheletes* who adhered to the two-nature Christology adopted by the Council Chalcedon*.

H. v. Schubert, Geschichte der christlichen Kirche im Frühmittelalter (Tubingen, 1921).   H.E.

E

E: Symbol used for one of the component narratives of certain O.T. books, derived from the initial letter of the divine name Elohim which it employs before the revelation of Jahveh to Moses. It is found in Genesis-Judges, and possibly also in I, II Samuel*. E was written in the northern kingdom, Ephraim, probably in the eighth century B.C. The existence of E as a separate narrative has recently been contested by some scholars (Volz, Rudolph), who assign certain parts of the supposed E document to other documents (J, D, P) and consider other parts as editorial matter. See Hexateuch.

See E. S. Brightman, The Sources of the Hexateuch (1918), W. Rudolph, "Der Elohist" von Exodus bis Josua (Beiheft z. Zeitschrift fur die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, 69) (1938). J.P.H.

Ea: (Sumerian Enki, "lord of the deep") Babylonian-Assyrian god of the waters and of wisdom, master of crafts and learning, particularly of magical arts, the creation of the world, originally his work, was later attributed to his son Marduk*, his chief temple was at Eridu on the Persian Gulf. See Mesopotamian religions. R.H.P.

Earl Lectureship, The E. T.: Established by Edwin T. Earl at Pacific School of Religion in Berkeley, California, in 1901, by a capital gift of $50,000. The purpose of the foundation is to aid in securing at the University of California, as the center of secular learning for California, the adequate presentation of Christian truth, by bringing to Berkeley, California, year by year, eminent Christian scholars to lecture upon themes calculated to illustrate and disseminate Christian thought, and minister to Christian life, thus serving the purpose of a high evangelism.

At least one course of lectures shall be given each year. From the beginning occasional courses and lectures have also been presented yearly.

Among the Earl Lecturers have been Lyman Abbott, Henry Van Dyke, William Jewett Tucker, Francis Greenwood Peabody, James Bryce, George Adam Smith, Walter Rauschenbusch, Theodore Roosevelt, Arthur Cushman McGiffert, William Howard Taft, James Henry Breasted, T. R. Glover, Arthur Holly Compton, Henry Agard Wallace, Reinhold Niebuhr, and Carl J. Hambro. A.C.M.

early American theology: See American theology, early.

Easter: At the end of the second century, the celebration of Easter as the feast of the resurrection of Christ was general among the Christians. In all probability, its origins lie in the very beginnings of the Christian church.

The date of Easter remained uncertain for a long time. This was due to the fact that the ancient Christians celebrated both the death and the resurrection of Jesus at the time of the Jewish Passover*, which fell on the 14th day of the month Nisan. The early Jewish Christian congregations seem to have observed Easter together with the Passover. The gentile Christians rejected the Jewish custom. But they could not agree on the date on which they should celebrate Easter nor could they establish uniformity in the manner of the celebration. The Christians of Asia Minor, depending upon an old tradition, possibly determined by the gospel according to John, held that Jesus died on the day of the Passover (the 14th of Nisan) and they celebrated the death and resurrection of Jesus on that day of the year. The Western Christians, however, had developed the practice of celebrating the Resurrection on a special feast day, which they observed on the Sunday following the 15th of Nisan, on which day of the year they believed (in dependence upon the Synoptic gospels) Jesus to have been crucified. Thus they differed from the Eastern Christians not only in the manner but also the date of the Easter celebration. The Roman Bishop Victor (189-199) attempted to unify the practice and arbitrarily excommunicated the Easterners who refused to follow the Western example. The issue was definitely settled only by the Council of Nicaea (325) which decreed that Easter as the feast of the Resurrection should be celebrated on the first Sunday following upon the Spring equinox. The old Passover tradition was preserved in the celebration of Holy Week in which the whole passion of Christ from the entrance into Jerusalem to the Resurrection was celebrated.

Today, Easter is observed among us on the first Sunday following the first full moon after the Spring equinox.

Pagan practices were introduced into the Christian observance of Easter at an early age on account of the fact that the feast coincided with the beginning of Spring (the word Easter is derived from the name of Eastre, the Spring-goddess, the French word Pâques (Italian Pasqua) comes from the Greek pascha, the Passover!). At that season of the year, the New Year and the Creation of the World were celebrated in ancient times by an exchange of gifts (Easter-eggs) and by generous hospitality to friends, to the poor, etc. See church year; church year cycle, Quartodecimans

W.P.

Eastern Orthodox Churches: Originally comprising the Eastern patriarchates* of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, the number of the churches included in this confederation has been gradually increased by missionary work of the Byzantine* church and its daughter churches, and other causes.

The patriarchate of Constantinople, after the Arabs had conquered Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, in course of time practically absorbed the formerly autocephalous ancient patriarchates of the lost territories, although in theory they always remained separate. The Russian Church proclaimed its independence from Constantinople in 1448, just prior to the downfall of the Byzantine Empire* But the Byzantine church survived the fall, and the patriarch of Constantinople was granted, by Sultan Mohammed II, the office of the ethnarch, i e., the civil government over the Greeks within the Turkish Empire. This important prerogative finally gave the patriarch jurisdiction over all the Orthodox within the borders of the Turkish Empire, irrespective of their nationality.

During the nineteenth century, by a series of revolts against the political dominance of Turkey, a number of Balkan nations secured their political independence, which was followed by an ecclesiastical autocephaly. Thus arose the churches of Greece, Serbia, Roumania, and Bulgaria (where the religious independence preceded the political).

Before the World War, there were fifteen Orthodox bodies in existence. But the war made great changes in the political configuration of Eastern Europe, which resulted in a similar change in the ecclesiastical realm, the number of churches increased to twenty-one. Of these, the Greek group of churches consists of the greatly enfeebled and reduced Patriarchate of Constantinople, which barely survived the exodus of the Greeks from the Turkish Republic (with the exception of Constantinople and its environs) consequent upon the forcible exchange of population in 1923. The Church of the Republic of Greece, however, was the beneficiary of this exchange. The Orthodox Church of Cyprus, whose autocephaly dates back to 431, with the Church of the Dodecanese Islands (in the possession of the Italians), complete this group.

The so-called Melkite. churches (predominantly Syrian or Arab) comprise the numerically weak patriarchates of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch.

The third group, consisting of the Russian group of churches, is numerically by far the largest and prior to the World War was without doubt the most important In the first place, the Russian Orthodox Church at present consists of two groups 'the Patriarchal, under the leadership of the patriarchal locum tenens, Metropolitan Sergius, and the Synodical, which resulted from the union of a number of smaller bodies which had revolted from the jurisdiction of Patriarch Tikkon Under the Soviet régime, all church membership was greatly reduced, although there exist no reliable statistical data. Closely connected with the fate of the Russian Church is that of the Church of Georgia. Since 1801 it had been a part of the Russian Church, and suffers at present the same treatment as the latter. The other succession Orthodox churches, organized in countries formerly belonging (in part or wholly) to Russia, are the churches of Finland, Estonia, Lithuania, and Poland. Their status, in consequence of the situation arising out of the present war, is uncertain.

The Balkan group of churches, in consequence of the collapse of the Russian leadership, has become the most important, although the present war makes any definite judgment of the future impossible. The largest of the Balkan unit is the Rumanian Church, which after the World War more than doubled its territory, and consequently assumed the patriarchal rank. The Serbian Orthodox Church likewise was greatly expanded by the unification of six formerly independent units. The new church then assumed its former rank of patriarchate. Another, although relatively insignificant member of this group, is the Church of Albania. The Church of Bulgaria, although formally at schism with the Greek churches, is recognized by all the others as a rightful member of the Orthodox family.

Finally, a mention must be made of the small Czechoslovak, and the Japanese Orthodox churches.

The future of all Orthodox communions will undoubtedly be greatly affected by the outcome of the present war, so that all statements made about them are subject to that consideration.

Besides these Orthodox churches, the Eastern Christendom comprises a number of separated churches, such as the monophysite* groups of the Syrian National, the Coptic, and the Abyssinian, the Nestorian* Assyrian church, and the Armenian (Gregorian) church which is pre-Chalcedonian in its creedal statement. (See Gregory the Illuminator.)

The Orthodox churches form a loose confederation, bound together not by any centralized authority, but only by loyalty to a common faith. The ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople enjoys no special prerogative of jurisdiction, but only of honor. Each autocephalous church is self-governing and independent of all others.

As for the doctrinal basis, there is no generally acknowledged creed, such as the Tridentine* in the Roman Catholic Church. Instead, the doctrinal decisions of the Seven Ecumenical Councils* are held as dogmatically binding. The rest of the theological tenets although as a matter of fact traditionally fairly uniform, need not necessarily be so. Each autocephalous church has the authority to define the non-dogmatic teaching for itself. In the Russian church, since the middle of the nineteenth century, there has occured a remarkable theological revival, lay in character, which promises to produce an integration of the Eastern Orthodox theology with the modern culture. The leaders of the movement—men like Vladimir Solovev and Nicholas Berdyaev—are recognized as outstanding religious philosophers not only among the Eastern Orthodox theological thinkers, but among Christian leaders in general. See Basilians, canons of various churches, Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, exarch, Holy Synod, Jeremiah II, liturgy, proto-pope, Uniate Churches.

B. J. Kidd, The Churches of Eastern Christendom (London, n d) ; Hugh Y Reyburn, The Story of the Russian Church (London, 1924) ; Matthew Spinka, The Church and the Russian Revolution (1927) ; Matthew Spinka, Christianity Confronts Communism (N. Y. and London, 1936, 1937) ; Matthew Spinka, "Post War Eastern Orthodox Churches," in Church History, IV (1935), pp. 108-122; Sergius Bulgakov, The Orthodox Church (n d.).   M.S.

eating the god: See theophagy.

Ebenezer Society: See communistic settlements, religious.

Ebionism: (Ebionim, the Hebrew word for "the poor") Probably it was an early designation for the Jewish Christians* at Jerusalem. Later it was applied to the Jewish Christian sect communities. The name first appears in Irenaeus* (ca. 185) adv. haer. I, 26, 2. Apparently they held to the Torah*, rejected Paul, and denied the virgin birth, though Origen says this was not true of all. Their gospel was either a version of Matthew or the Gospel to the Hebrews.   C.T.C.

Ecce Homo: (Lat. of Joh. 19 5, Behold, the Man) The title of many paintings of the suffering Christ. A book on the teaching of Jesus by Sir John Seeley, published in 1880 and often reprinted.   S.M.G.

ecclesia: The N. T. denotes the local and universal fellowship of the Christians with the word, ekklēssa. The Latin Christians took it over in its original Greek form (ecclesia). The word means a "specially called assembly of people". It received a religious meaning when the translators of the Septuagint* adopted it in order to render the Hebrew words referring to Israel as the people of God and the people before God (the "true Israel") into the Greek. When the Christian community applied this name to itself, it therefore appropriated for itself the claim of being the "true Israel", "God's holy nation", the messianic fellowship.

The English translation of ecclesia is "church", a word which like its equivalents Kirche, Kirk, Kerk, etc., is probably derived from the word Kuriakon (—"that which belongs to the Lord"), used in late ancient or early medieval times to denote Christian properties (buildings, cemeteries, etc.).   W.P.

Ecclesiastes: Book representative of "pessimistic" type of Oriental wisdom literature*. The title replaces the name Solomon with "The Preacher" (Greek, Ecclesiastes, Hebrew, Koheleth). Solomon* was evidently regarded as a great "convener of assemblies" (Koheleth, cf. Hebrew, Kahal, "assembly"), which he then supposedly addressed in words of wisdom. While Egyptian and Babylonian parallels show that pessimistic books were possible at Solomon's time, traces of late origin are abundant in this particular work. It is to be dated in the 3rd century B C. and reflects the inroads made by Greek civilization. The book contains a loosely knit collection of materials. It is difficult to separate some of the entities or find any progress of thought. 9 17-10 20 could stand in "Proverbs"*. Other sections show the speaker reflecting on his own experience or admonishing another person. The basic philosophy that all is vanity (1 2) and that a young man should enjoy his youth (11 9-12 8) is subject to some qualifications. The book was already toned down in certain places by ancient editors (cf. 2 26, 3 17, etc.) The concluding additions, in particular, express both a criticism of the original book (12 12) and a new and forced interpretation of its substance (v. 13, 14). Its canonicity was still disputed in the Jewish schools at the time of Christ.

Cf. R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941) ; J. A. Bewer, Literature of the Old Testament, (rev. ed., 1933).   E.G.K.

ecclesiastical art, Christian: See art, Christian, ecclesiastical.

ecclesiastical commissions: Bodies of ecclesiastics juridically established to whom are committed certain specified functions or charges. The chief types of commissions are. (a) Pontifical These commissions consist of a group of cardinals appointed by the pope for some particular function such as the revision of the Vulgate*, the interpretation of the canon law*, etc. (b) Prelatitial: These are commissions of Roman prelates, secretaries, consultors, etc., they may be presided over by a cardinal. The commission for Sacred Archeology is an example of this type. (c) Diocesan: These commissions are four in number and exist in each diocese 1) The commission for seminaries, 2) The commission of examiners of clergy which is to aid in control of all competition for vacant parochial benefices, 3) The commission on sacred music, 4) The vigilance commission for the suppression of modernism*. The pontifical documents creating these commissions, the legislation pertaining to Roman congregations, or common ecclesiastical law* limit the scope of the authority of each of these commissions.   T.T.M.

ecclesiastical courts: Church courts, especially the courts of the Roman-Catholic Church, the Eastern Church and the Church of England. With varying success the medieval Church claimed for its courts an extensive jurisdiction far beyond the internal regulation of its organization and administration. (See art. Canon Law). While jurisdiction over such topics as heresy, marriage or, in some countries, testaments, was willingly conceded to the Church by the temporal authorities, the assumption of ecclesiastical jurisdiction over contracts provoked the jealousy of the lay courts and the Church's claims of exclusive jurisdiction over the clergy and over Church property resulted in violent clashes with the temporal rulers, for instance the fateful conflicts between Henry II and Thomas Becket or between the Emperor Henry IV and Pope Gregory VII*. After the Reformation the English ecclesiastical courts continued to play an important role as instruments of the policy of the Tudor and early Stuart kings to establish and maintain the union of the state and the established church under the common supremacy of the king. The Court of High Commission, the leading ecclesiastical court, exercised an extensive jurisdiction over the orthodoxy and morals of both clergy and laity and became one of the principal targets of the Puritan Revolution, by which it was abolished in 1641. However, the courts of the Church of England retained jurisdiction not only over matters of church discipline and organization but also over tithes, church dues and dilapidations and, until 1857, over certain matrimonial causes and testamentary matters, a jurisdiction which was continuously narrowed not only by legislation but also by the jealousy of the common law lawyers. Such jurisdiction as is still left in the courts of the Church of England is now exercised mainly by the Archbishop of Canterbury's Court of Arches, the Consistory Courts of the dioceses, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

In some Roman-Catholic, Orthodox and Oriental countries ecclesiastical courts still exercise a more or less extensive jurisdiction over matters other than affairs of internal church organization. In Palestine, Egypt, Syria and French North Africa Christian, Mohammedan and Jewish spiritual courts are recognized as competent to deal with matters of personal status, family and inheritance of their native members and with rights in church property including real estate. In parts of the Balkans, Spain, Portugal, Peru and the formerly Russian parts of Poland matrimonial causes are still handled by spiritual courts. In Italy matrimonial causes of Roman-Catholics were handed back by the Fascist state to the Church by the Concordate of 1929. The corresponding concession of the Austrian Concordate of 1933 was undone shortly after Austria's annexation to the German Reich.

In the United States and other countries with disestablished or unestablished churches ecclesiastical courts can no longer exercise compulsory jurisdiction. Insofar as the faithful voluntarily submit to its jurisdiction the position of an ecclesiastical court is analogous to that of a commercial arbitrator voluntarily chosen by the parties.

For the internal organization of the Church and for the matrimonial causes of the faithful, the ecclesiastical courts of the Roman-Catholic Church still play an important role. The ordinary court for each diocese is that of the bishop who exercises his judicial function through a legally trained mandatory, the officialis. Appeals may be taken from the diocesan court to that of the archbishop or, if the case arose in the first instance, in the diocesan court of an archbishop, to the court of a designated bishop of the province. The supreme court of the Church is the Sacra Romana Rota at the Holy See, whose decision may in certain exceptional cases be subject to cassation by the Signatura Apostolica. The Rota consists of 10-12 judges who must be priests learned in the canon law. Its decisions are currently published since 1912 under the title of Sanctae Romanae Rotae Decisiones. See benefit of clergy, immunity.

F. W. Maitland, Constitutional History of England (1908) ; W. S. Holdsworth, History of English Law, vol. 1, 3d ed. (1922) ; H. W. Cripps, Law Relating to the Church and Clergy, 7th ed. (1921) ; H. D. Hazeltine, Ecclesiastical Courts, vol. 5, Enc. Soc. Sci., p. 307 ; see, furthermore, the literature referred to sub voce Canon Law.   M.Rh.

ecclesiastical Latin: The official, international, language of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. Differentiated in function from, though not rendered inferior to, the classical Latin, it has been especially adapted, through the centuries, to the administrative, literary, and liturgical needs of the Roman Church*.

See "Latin" in A Catholic Dictionary (1941), edited by Donald Attwater.   R.C.P.

ecclesiastical law: See Canon Law.

Ecclesiasticus: See Jesus, the Son of Sirach.

Eck, Johann Maier: (1486-1543) Catholic theologian of Germany and foremost champion of the Papacy against Luther and Zwingli. A skilful debater, Eck is best remembered for the public disputation in Leipzig in 1519, in which he succeeded in drawing from Luther the assertion that the general councils of the Church are subject to error. Luther's breach with Rome thus became irreparable, and in 1520 Eck obtained the famous papal bull Exsurge Domini condemning Luther. As professor and vice-chancellor of the University of Ingolstadt for three decades, Eck exerted tremendous influence. His Enchiridion adversus Lutherum ran through 46 editions between 1525 and 1576.   T.A.K.

Ecke, Gustav (1855-1920) A pupil of M. Kaehler, he taught in Königsberg and Bonn. He tried to understand Ritschlianism in the positive-ecclesiastical sense, to work out its truths and to come to an agreement with them.

Die evangelischen Landeskirchen Deutschlands im 19 Jahrhundert (Berlin 1905) ; Die theologische Schule Albrecht Ritschls und die evangelische Kirche der Gegenwart, 2 vols. (Berlin, 1897-1904) ; Unverrückbare Grenzsteine (Berlin, 1905, 5 ed., 1911).   H.H.

Eckhart, Johannes Meister, O. P.: (c. 1260-1327) Born in Thuringia; Magister Sacred Theology, Paris 1302; distinguished as administrator and teacher in Dominican Order, and as theologian, writer in Latin, as preacher of great vitality and clarity in German; best known as "father of German mysticism" and a religious genius. He strove to explain the mysteries of the Godhead and the relation between Creator and individual man in realistic terms; he ably defended himself against charges of heresy. Cf. Suso, Tauler.

Meister Eckehart. Edited by Franz Pfeiffer, 4th ed. (Leipzig, 1924), trans. by C. de B. Evans (London, 1924). A.S.

eclecticism: Eclecticism in religious philosophy may be defined as an endeavor to form a competent pattern of religious thought by means of the principle of selection. Irenic in spirit, open-minded (although not always without bias) eclecticism promotes intellectual breadth and tolerance and catholicity of spirit. It lacks organic and structural character, experiential valuational vigor and recognition of the principle of historic inception and development. There has been a tendency in the direction of eclecticism in left-wing liberalism and in that type of philosophy of religion which aims at a survey rather than a system of religious truth.

Most of the current religio-philosophical cults in America are eclectic in principle, with a strong' preference for Oriental and mystical elements, together with emphasis upon the optimistic and health-giving aspects of religion. They have arisen largely because of the neglect of principles inherent in Christianity relating to metaphysical and mystical truths and to physical well-being.

Among eclectic movements Bahaism* represents a more synthetic type, imposing teachings selected from various faiths, especially Christianity, upon a historic and personal Persian basis and adopting the principle of revelation through incarnation, although substituting successive incarnations for the single, unitary incarnation of Christianity. Christian Science*, being Christian and a church instead of a cult, is eclectic only in its eclection of certain Christian doctrines above others and its unbalanced metaphysical optimism and health-seeking emphasis. J.W.B.

economics: See sociology.

ecstasy: A trance-like state of emotional rapture and mental exaltation in which the subject is so transported by emotion or so engrossed in some object of contemplation as to be extremely if not completely insensible to normal external stimuli. It is the culminating point of the intuitive and affective experience of religious mystics and is often called the "unitive" stage (as distinguished from the "purgative" and "illuminative" stages which precede it) of the mystic way of life because of the subject's claim that he enjoys union with the divine. The state is marked by narrowness and unity of consciousness, exclusion of the world of sense, passivity, intensity of joyous emotion, visions, and the claim of an immediate experience of the divine which has noetic value and yet is ineffable. Plotinus* held that in ecstasy union with God and perfect knowledge of divine truth were realized. Ecstasy among primitive peoples is induced by drugs, fasting, flagellation and dancing and is interpreted as spirit possession. Among civilized peoples it is induced by definite mystic practices which involve bodily disciplines, prolonged contemplation and persistent auto-suggestion. The experience yields different types of exaltation and different kinds of satisfaction such as sensuous, intellectual, aesthetic and religious. It is generally agreed that some temperaments are more susceptible to the experience than others.

For variant interpretations see W. E. Hocking, The Meaning of God in Human Experience (1912); J. B. Pratt, The Religious Consciousness (1920); J H. Leuba, The Psychology of Religious Mysticism (1929); E. Underhill, Mysticism (1930); H. N. and R. W. Wieman, Normative Psychology of Religion (1935). R.W.F.

ecumenical councils: Lists vary according to conceptions of the nature of an ecumenical council. Two rival ideas prevail· One is that such a body should be composed of members representing all parts of Christendom, and that it is responsible to the represented churches or constituencies. The other holds that such a body is essentially head-and-members (pope-in-council) and only indirectly responsible to the churches; its primary function is the faithful interpretation of the traditional faith; and no conciliar deliverance is valid if the head disapproves. Universally acknowledged are the following:

Nicea I, 325 A.D., to which largely may be attributed the Nicene Creed, occasioned by the Arian controversy.

Constantinople I, 381, elaborated the Nicene Creed so as to define more explicitly the deity of the Holy Ghost.

Ephesus, 431, defined the personal unity of Christ, and the Virgin as Theotókos, as against Nestorius.

Chalcedon, 451, defined Christ's two natures.

Constantinople II, 553, reaffirmed the first four councils and condemned errors of Origen and others.

Constantinople III, 680-681, defined two wills in Christ, as against Monotheletism.

Nicea II, 787, regulated veneration of images.

Constantinople IV, 869, dealt with the Photian Schism. This council, in which East and West were undoubtedly represented, is not everywhere received as ecumenical.

(Protestants do not generally consider as ecumenical the councils since Chalcedon; they also hold that all councils, even Nicea I, may err, and that only the Scriptures cannot err.)

In addition, the following are held to be ecumenical by the Roman Catholic Church*, on the principle of pope-in-council:

Lateran I, 1123.
Lateran II, 1139.
Lateran III, 1179.
Lateran IV, 1215.
Lyons I, 1245.
Lyons II, 1274.
Vienne, 1311-1313.
Constance, 1414-1418, in part.
Basle-Ferrara-Florence, 1431-1439, in part.
Lateran V, 1512-1517.
Trent, 1545-1563.
Vatican, 1870, adjourned and unfinished.

G. D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum . . . collectio, 31 vols. (Venice, 1769-98) (the most generally available body of documents); C. J. von Hefele, Con- cilsengeschichte (1873-80), A. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbolen und Glaubensregeln der alten Kirche (3rd ed, 1897), H R Percival, The Seven Ecumenical Councils of the Undivided Church, vol XIV of Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (1900); P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom (1919); Catholic Encyclopedia, "Councils, General" ecumenical creeds: See s. v. Athanasian Creed, creeds of Christendom.

Q.B.

ecumenics: A word coined from the Greek ta oikoumenika, "the things relating to the oikoumenē (i e., inhabited earth)". Upon the analogy of the application of the term oikoumenē to the Greek, and later to the Roman, world, Ecumenics is used to designate everything pertaining to the Christian Church in its ecumenical aspect, that is, as coextensive with the inhabited globe. In Princeton Theological Seminary, where the term was first used in 1937 in the "Chair of Ecumenics", which took the place of the "Chair of Missions", Ecumenics means: the science of the Church as the world Christian community, its nature, function, relations, and strategy. Thus, as sociology is the science of society in general, so Ecumenics is the science of the world Christian community.   J.A.M.

Eddas: Derivation uncertain. The heroic literature of the Norse folk, written in Old Icelandic. The Elder or Sæmund's Edda was completed in the twelfth century, while the younger Edda, or Snorri Sturluson's (1179-1241) runs over into the thirteenth. The Eddas are the chief source of our knowledge of Norse mythology.   P.G.M.

Eddy, Mary Baker: See Christian Science.

Edersheim, Alfred: (1825-1889) English pastor, scholar, translator and author, sometime Lecturer on the Septuagint at Oxford. Best known for his Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1st ed., 1883), widely used in the late 19th and early 20th centuries as an authoritative text on the life and teaching of Jesus against the background of late Judaism.   S.M.G.

Edessa: The Gr. name of an ancient city in North-Western Mesopotamia (the modern Urfa). Capital of a semi-independent Syrian Kingdom which served as a buffer-state between Rome and Parthia from 132 B.C. until it was made a Roman Province in A.D. 244. Important as the earliest center of Syriac speaking Christianity and of Syriac Christian literature. The Syriac version of Tatian's *Diatessaron (Gospel harmony) was the popular form in which the Gospels were read from ca. 170 A.D. until the *Peshitta, a final revision of Old Syriac translations of the Gospels, displaced it early in the 5th century. See Antiochean School; Syrian churches.   S.M.G.

Edict of Milan: Document issued jointly by Constantine and Licinius in 313 granting toleration to the Christians and restoring church property. Marks end of the policy of persecution.   K.H.C.

Edict of Nantes: See Nantes, Edict of.

Edict of Worms: See Worms, Edict of.

Edomites: The people inhabiting Edom, the high table-land lying southeast of Palestine proper, between the southern portion of the Dead Sea and the Arabah on the west and the Arabian Desert on the east. The Edomites were a Semitic people, closely related to the Israelites. Biblical tradition represents them as descendants of Esau, the brother of Jacob. They settled in Edom in the thirteenth century B.C. and retained control of that country for almost a thousand years, until finally displaced by the Nabataeans. They subsisted largely as caravaneers, carrying on the traffic in spices and other precious commodities between Arabia and Damascus. They were conquered by David at about 1000 B.C. and remained tributary to Judah for approximately two hundred and fifty years. Early in the fifth century B.C. through political circumstance they became the arch-enemy of the little Jewish people, and for their ruthlessness in the ensuing war were scathingly denounced in various biblical writings of this period.   J.M.

Edwards, Jonathan: (Oct. 5, 1703-Mar. 22, 1758) Congregational minister, theologian and philosopher, was the fifth child and only son of eleven children born to the Rev. Timothy (1669-1758) and Esther Stoddard Edwards of East Windsor, Conn. He graduated from Yale College in 1720. In Feb. 1727 he was ordained colleague pastor with his grandfather, Solomon Stoddard of Northampton, Mass., and after Stoddard's death in Feb. 1729, Edwards remained as pastor until he was dismissed in June, 1750. In Aug. 1751 he went to the Stockbridge Indian mission, where most of his great theological treatises were written or completed. In Feb. 1758 he became president of the College of New Jersey (Princeton), and died the following month. In July 1727 he married Sarah Pierpont of New Haven. Twelve children were born, best known of whom is the second son, Jonathan Edwards the younger (1745-1801).

Although Edwards early rebelled against the Calvinistic doctrines of the day, his own most vivid personal religious experience left him "fully satisfied, as to this sovereignty of God" which thereafter appeared to him a doctrine "exceeding pleasant, bright, and sweet." This "delightful conviction" formed the basis of his·preaching that brought the revival to his Northampton congregation in 1734, and is the breath of life that he breathed into Calvinism*, warming and personalizing it.

Edwards, in his writings, wrestled with both the practical and speculative problems of his day. His works may conveniently be dealt with under four heads. 1) those written to defend the revivals in New England as truly a work of God, 2) those written against the Half-Way Covenant* plan and demanding a purified church of regenerate members only, 3) those written to champion Calvinism against the encroachments of Arminianism* (notably the treatise on the Will), and 4) those in which he laid the foundations for a modified system of Calvinistic divinity that was developed by his followers, especially by Joseph Bellamy, Samuel Hopkins, and Nathaniel Emmons. See efficient cause: See cause.

American theology, early; benevolence, disinter-- ested, Hopkinsianism, New England theology; New Haven theology, Taylorism. See also s v. Berkeley, George.

Sereno E Dwight, Life and Works of President Edwards, 10 vols., (1829) ; A. V. G. Allen, Jonathan Edwards (1889) , Ola E Winslow, Jonathan Edwards, 1703-1758 (1940) ; A. C. McGiffert, Jonathan Edwards (1932) ; H. B. Parkes, Jonathan Edwards, the fiery Puritan (1930) , Thomas H Johnson, The Printed Writings of Jonathan Edwards, A Bibliography (1940) , Clarence H. Faust & Thomas H Johnson, Jonathan Edwards, in the American Writers Series of the American Book Company (1935).s.e.m.

Egypt, religions of: The ancient Egyptian religion (c. 3000 B.C.-200 A.D.), Christianity, and Islam* (after 642). Before Menes united Egypt under his rule, the country had been divided first into independent districts (not to be identified with the 20 nomes of Lower Egypt and the 22 of Upper Egypt), then into two kingdoms (Upper and Lower Egypt). Each district or city had originally its patron god, retaining it in some cases through three millennia. The most important of these early local gods are the following: Anubis (See Hermes) of Cynopolis, jackal-headed god of the dead, Atum of Heliopolis, later identified with the sun-god Re* and regarded as the evening sun; Bastet, the cat-goddess of Bubastis; Hathor*, the cow-goddess of Denderah and Aphroditopolis, Horus, the solar falcon-god of Behdet (Hermopolis parva) and Edfu, who became the royal god of Egypt, Khnum, the ram-headed god of Elephantine and the cataract region, Khonsu, the moon-god of Thebes, Min, the ithyphallic god of Coptos and Akhmim, later a vegetation god; Montu, the hawk-headed war god of Hermonthis and the Theban nome, supplanted by Amon (whose sacred animal was the ram) in the 11th dynasty, Neith, the goddess of Sais and Esna; Nekhbet, the volture-goddess of El-Kab; Ptah, bull-god of Memphis, patron of artists; Sebek, the crocodile god of the Fayum and of Kom Ombo, Thot*, ibis-headed god of Hermupolis, inventor of writing, patron of learning, whose sacred animal was the baboon. In addition to deities with animal heads, the Egyptian worshiped actual living animals. Apis*, a black bull with white spots, at Memphis; Mnevis, a light colored bull, at Heliopolis, and others. Besides the local deities, gods of nature with a wider jurisdiction were recognized by the whole nation in early times (Re, the sun; Hapi, the Nile, Nun, the ocean; etc.). Some of them were joined together at Heliopolis, under the local god Atum, into an ennead: first Atum, then the couple Show (the air) and Tefnut (the dew); then the couple Geb (the earth) and Nut (the sky); then the two couples Osiris and Isis, Seth and Nephtys.

Moreover, the theologians of Heliopolis during the 5th dynasty (2560-2420 B.C.) played a leading rôle in the development of the Egyptian religion by identifying their local god, Atum, with the sun-god Re thus giving rise to a national religion. Already in prehistoric times Seth of Ombos had become the god of Upper Egypt and Horus of Behdet of Lower Egypt, apparently in another period the volture-goddess Nekhbet of El-Kab and the uraeus or cobra goddess Buto of Buto became the tutelary deities of Upper and Lower Egypt, respectively. Then Horus was identified with Atum-Re-Harakhte of Heliopolis and became the royal god of Upper and Lower Egypt, the patron of the Pharaohs ("the sons of Re"). This tendency persisted, and many local gods, like Sebek and Amon, became solar gods like Re and one with him; the hegemony of Thebes in the 18th dynasty made of Amon-Re the supreme god. But Amenophis IV (Ikhnaton) (1375-1358), in open opposition to Amon and his clergy, attempted to give to the solar theology of Heliopolis the character of a religion for the masses he chose the visible manifestation of Atum-Re-Harakhte, the solar disk surrounded by rays ending in human hands (Aton) as the sole god, creator of all animate beings and inanimate things, but this religious reformation ended soon after his death, and Amon triumphed again under his second successor, Tut-ankh-Amen. Other gods had greater attraction for the masses. They expected help in their daily problems from minor gods such as agricultural deities (Sekhet, the goddess of the cultivated land, Nepri, the god of grain, Rennut, the goddess of harvest), the goddesses of childbirth (Heket, Meskhenet, and the seven Hathors who, like the fairies, fixed the destiny at birth), the monstrous Toeris (with feet of a lion, arms and breasts of a woman, belly of a hippopotamus, and head of a crocodile) helpful in childbirth and against evil spirits, the ridiculous malformed dwarf Bes (with the tail of a leopard) who protected child-bearing women and concerned himself with music, dancing, and the toilette of ladies. Some Syrian deities also achieved popularity: Baal, Resheph, Qedesh, Anath, and Astarte. Serapis, the Hades of Sinope on the Black Sea, was introduced into Egypt after Ptolemy I (305-283) had seen him in a dream, his name was at once explained as Osiris-Apis and, being identified by the masses with Osiris*, his cult and that of his consort Isis flourished throughout the Hellenistic and Roman worlds. While the solar theology of Heliopolis tended to create an official national religion without stirring the masses profoundly; in early times the myth of Osiris, which arose among the common people, was incorporated into the official religion and the Osiris cult became eventually so dominant that early Greek visitors, like Herodotus (II 42), received the impression that Osiris and Isis were the only national deities of Egypt. This popularity was due to the happy immortality which Osiris was thought to assure to his worshipers. The Egyptians believed that at death the ba (soul) and the ka (a ghostly double or a guardian spirit) could live on if the body be preserved (hence the practice of mummifying the corpse) and the necessary shelter (tombs) and food (funerary offerings) be provided. A happier immortality was offered to the Pharaohs in the Pyramid Texts of the 5th dynasty: the deceased king could ascend to the sky and sail over it in the ship of the sun-god Re; or he could be restored to life like Osiris. According to the myth, Osiris (originally a vegetation god) was killed by his brother Seth (Greek: Typhon), restored to life by his wife Isis, and avenged by his son Horus; he then became the king of the dead, absorbing the earlier gods of the Underworld· Khentamentiu (the dog-headed god of Abydos), Ptah-Sokar of Memphis, and Geb. Many scattered temples housed parts of his body, but Abydos (where his head was buried and his tomb was shown) became the center of his worship. Led by the jackal-headed Anubis, the soul of the deceased appeared before the tribunal of Osiris, in the presence of 42 terrible judges of the dead, the soul denied having committed 42 sins (ch. 125 of the *Book of the Dead, from the New Kingdom); Anubis and Thoth weighed its heart on the balance; if justified, the soul enjoyed a happy immortality with Osiris. The official worship in the great temples consisted in the personal service of the god, primarily dressing and feeding him, performed by the clergy. The layman did not have any part in the worship, but on certain festivals he could see the statue of the god (hidden by a veil) carried in procession. With the coming of Christianity in the 2nd century this ancient religion lost its hold on the people, and it ceased to be practiced in 391, when Theodosius I closed the great ancient temples of Egypt. See death and burial practices, mystery religions

G. Steindorff, The Religion of the Ancient Egyptians (1903-4), A. Erman, A Handbook of Egyptian Religion (London, 1907); Die Religion der Aegypter (Berlin and Leipzig, 1934); J. H. Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt (1912); The Dawn of Conscience (1933); A. W. Shorter, An Introduction to Egyptian Religion (London, 1931); S. A. B. Mercer, Horus: Royal God of Egypt (1942).   R.H.P.

Egyptian temples: See temples, Egyptian.

eigenkirche: In early medieval Germanic law lay lords who at their own expense had built churches were held to have rights of appointing clerical incumbents as well as rights over the physical properties. By the 9th century both the state (cf. Capitulare ecclesiasticum of Louis the Pious, 819) and the church (cf. Defense of Eigenkirche by Hincmar of Rheims, c. 860, in Collectio de ecclesiis et capellis) were hedging these boundless rights of possession. Appointment became presentation*. See also patron.

Meyers Lexikon (Leipzig, 1925), "Eigenkirche," vol III, 1272; C. Mirbt, Quellen, pp 122-128, gives valuable material from Louis the Pious' "Capitulary" and Hincmar's "Defense."   Q.B.

eisegesis: The opposite of exegesis*; interpreting a Biblical passage so as to express one's own ideas.   B.S.E.

El: See Baalism; Phoenicians.

elder: Generically, a word referring to the leaders of a group or community, by senior age or character. The NT records "elders" in Christian organization, the word being a translation of Greek presbuteroi, plural of presbuteros, transliterated "presbyter."* The word has come down in many Christian churches. In Reformed polity it refers commonly to "ruling elders," chosen by and out of congregations for spiritual oversight and possessing in general church affairs authority equal to that of ministers. The latter are sometimes denominated "teaching elders." In Methodist polity "elder" is the ecclesiastical title of ministers, and they are called elders in some other churches.   R.H.N.

Eleatics: Eleaticism developed from one of the two philosophic principles of the Milesian school: all things come from one cosmic substance. Its reputed founder was Xenophanes,* its real founder was Parmenides.* It built its structure of thought upon what is now called the principle of rational consistency, whose first specification is due largely to Parmenides, the Eleatic: how can the existent, non-exist and the non-existent, exist? Accordingly reason had no answer, therefore the Eleatics denied change and its corollary, motion. See Zeno of Elea.   P.R.H.

election: See American theology, early; double predestination; Edwards, Jonathan; predestination; reprobation.

election, canonical: Designates a person to an ecclesiastical office. In a loose sense it includes presentation,* collation* and nomination;* but more precisely it is appointment by an electoral college, e.g., cardinals* for a pope,* cathedral chapter for a bishop, etc.   Q.B.

elements: 1) The simplest constituents of the object under investigation; what cannot be further divided. 2) In theology, the bread and wine used in Holy Communion.   J.E.N.

Elephantine Papyri: Documents written in Aramaic, discovered at Elephantine, Egypt, in 1901. They offer valuable information on the social and religious aspects of the early Jewish Diaspora. See A. Cowley, Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C. (1923); A. Vincent, La Religion des Judéo-Araméens d'Eléphantine (1937).   S.L.T.

Eleusinian rites: See mystery religions.

elevation of the host: The ceremonial action, dating from the early Middle Ages, of lifting up the sacred Host* for the adoration of the faithful immediately after its consecration, which, in Catholic belief, transubstantiates the bread into the Body of Christ. The action is now, from the ceremonial aspect, a climax of the Mass,* accompanied by bells, torches, and incense, and momentarily interrupts the sacrificial action to make this solemn act of adoration of the Real Presence* of Christ in the Eucharist. Cf. Corpus Christi.   C.V.

elf: In Norse mythology, diminutive beings who live in hills and woods, like the Celtic fairies,* who are sometimes friendly, sometimes malicious, to men.   P.G.M.

Elijah: Prophet of Yahweh, living in the ninth century B.C. (I Kgs.* xvii-xix; xxi; II Kgs. i-ii). A religious and political influence, he precipitated the fall of the house of Ahab and ·repared indirectly the prophetic movement of Amos and Hosea. See F. James, Personalities of the Old Testament (1942) pp. 166-186.   s.l.t.

Elipandus: Adoptionist archbishop of Toledo, opposing Islam and Nestorianism, distinguished God's natural Son, the divine Jesus, from God's adoptive Son, the human Jesus, a heresy condemned by Hadrian I, 785.   A.C.

Elizabeth, St.: (1207-1231) Daughter of an Hungarian king and wife of a Thuringian prince, Elizabeth, in the midst of her obligations to husband and children, gave herself to a career of charitable works. Her early spiritual development was fostered by Franciscan* advisors, and upon her husband's death she sought a more markedly ascetic vocation. Prevailed upon to forego convent life, she distinguished herself by a social ministry as a Franciscan Tertiary. She was canonized by Gregory IX* in 1235.   R.C.P.

Elizabethan Settlement: The term used to describe the English church as established at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign by the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity.   w.s.h.

Elkesaites: Followers of Elkesai, the reputed recipient through angels of a revelation teaching the forgiveness of all sins however great to those who would accept a certain form of baptism and believe the doctrines set forth in his book, which was brought to Rome early in the third century, and called forth the vigorous opposition of Hippolytus.* They seem to have formed a school, of wide influence, which was active later in Babylonia and existed in Arabia as late as the tenth century.
                                           E.J.G.

Elohim: Hebrew word for deity; a plural form which usually should be translated "gods" (in contrast with individual deities such as Yahweh, Dagon, Bel, etc.) in documents written before the exile. During this period the singular form became so obsolete that when monotheism came in the plural elohim was retained but understood in singular sense of "God." Usually, Hebrew writers speak of gods (elohim) and Yahweh (their god) before the exile but God (elohim) thereafter. See exile, henotheism; monotheism.   R.E.W.

Elvira, Synod of: A synod attended by nineteen bishops and twenty-six presbyters, at Elvira (possibly on the site of modern Granada) in Spain, in A.D. 306 the year following the cessation of the Diocletian* persecution in that area. Its leading spirit was the famous Bishop Hosius* of Cordova. Its canons were severe in condemning heathen immoralities, especially those of the numerous Jews, and in favoring strict ecclesiastical discipline.   A.K.R.

Ely Lectureship: The Elias P.: Established in 1865 by Zebulon Stiles Ely with a capital sum of $10,000 and given at least once in two or three years at the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. The course is given with the purpose of establishing the proposition that "Christianity is a religion from God" and that "it is the perfect and final form of religion for man." Topics range from the nature and need of revelation to the philosophy of religion "in its relation to the Christian system." Among the lecturers, the following have served: James McCosh, H. P. Smith, J. Moffatt, E. F. Scott, G. H. Palmer, John Baillie, B. H. Branscomb.

(Data furnished by the Office of the Registrar of Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.)   v.f.

Elysium: The paradise of Homer and Hesiod, "the Elysian plain where life is easiest for men. No snow is there, nor yet great storm, nor any rain; but always ocean sendeth forth the breeze of the shrill West to blow cool on men." Odyssey 4.563 (Butcher and Lang). Later poets placed it in the underworld.   P.G.M.

Ema, Emma-O: (Jap) See Yama.

emanation: The doctrine that all existing things have issued from the supreme, absolute Reality or Being. Gnosticism,* an early Christian heresy, taught that Christ was such an emanation. See Neo Platonism.   R.E.E.H.

Ember Weeks and Days: Periods of fasting at the four seasons (Lat. quatuor tempora), observed on the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday following December 13, the 1st Sunday in Lent, Pentecost, and September 14; the custom, of Roman origin, spread through the West with the Roman rite; the Ember Weeks are traditional times of ordination, marked in the Anglican Prayer Books (since 1662) by special prayers.   L.R.H.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo: (1803-1882) American philosopher and man of letters. Educated at Harvard for the Unitarian ministry, he resigned his pulpit in 1832 because of his indifference to the sacraments, settled in Concord, Massachusetts, after a brief sojourn in Europe, and thereafter devoted himself to writing and lecturing. His first book, Nature (1836), contained the essence of his ideas, which were given fuller development in The American Scholar (1837), the so-called Divinity School Address (1838), two famous series of Essays (1841, 1844), and numerous other publications, including two collections of poems. The chief exponent of New England Transcendentalism,* Emerson exerted a strong influence on subsequent liberal thought in England as well as in America. See communistic settlements, secular.

The Complete Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson (12 vols., 1903-04) are supplemented by his Journals (10 vols., 1909-14) and Letters (ed. R. L. Rusk, 6 vols., 1939). Among notable biographies are those by O. W. Holmes (1884), J. E. Cabot (1887), and O. W. Firkins (1915). F. I. Carpenter's Ralph Waldo Emerson gives the best brief introduction.
                                           L.W.C.

Emmons, Nathaniel: (1745-1840) American theologian, follower of Samuel Hopkins.* Attempted to reconcile human activity and responsibility with the utter dependence of each human "exercise," virtuous or vicious, upon the omnipotent First Cause. See Edwards, Jonathan; New England theology.   W.M.H.

emperor worship: Among the Romans perpetuated an ancient custom derived from the east where worship of rulers had been in vogue for many centuries. The kings of Egypt, Babylonia and Persia were thought to be semi-divine beings, and the ideal king of the Jews was to be an individual especially anointed by God and thus a superman. Among the Greeks heroes were half divine and were elevated to full divinity after their departure from the earth. Both the Greek and the Oriental heritages combined to accredit Alexander the Great as an incarnate deity. Alexander's successors in Syria perpetuated the idea that the ruler was "God manifest" and Antiochus IV tried to impose worship of himself upon even the Jews in Palestine. When Octavius (Augustus) brought an end to the civil war following the assassination of Julius Caesar certain communities in the east requested the privilege of building temples in honor of Augustus and celebrating religious festivities in recognition of the divine gift of peace that had been bestowed upon mankind when Augustus had been born to be the world's savior. At Rome the republican spirit was still too strong to deify outright a living monarch, but the senate voted divine honors to the deceased Julius Caesar and in the provinces Augustus was worshiped during his lifetime. Later emperors, such as Caligula and Domitian, urged worship of themselves upon their subjects. Thus the demand to acknowledge the lordship of Caesar and offer incense before his image became a typical form of oath of allegiance to the state. Jews, being recognized as an established social group that refused to take this oath, were excused, but Christians lacked this social prestige and for two centuries were subject to intermittent persecution for their refusal to say "Caesar is lord." See hero worship, kings, divine right of, Roman religions.

E. Beurlier, Essai sur le culte rendu aux empereurs romains (1890), S. J. Case, Evolution of Early Christianity (1914), pp. 195-238; L. M. Sweet, Roman Emperor Worship (1919); Lily R. Taylor, The Divinity of the Roman Emperor (1931).

s.j.c.

empirical psychology: See psychology, schools of.

empirical theology: A theology may be called "empirical" in the broad sense if a) its fundamental conceptions are drawn from experience, and if b) its basic propositions are accepted because they seem required by experience, perhaps as generalizations from it or as hypotheses which make it intelligible, or at least if the theology approximates to these two features. As such, it is contrasted with theologies which draw upon alleged revelations, use concepts not drawn from experience and hence regarded as innate and a priori, dispense with reasoned proofs altogether, or rely upon a priori principles and metaphysical reasoning (such as epistemological arguments, or proofs that space and time are self-contradictory). Theologies which are empirical in this broad sense may be grouped in several classes. First, some (F. R. Tennant*) are empirical in the sense that they support their doctrines by reference to observable facts drawn from all kinds of fields (including natural science); in this sense a use of the teleological argument* could be said to make a theology to some degree "empirical." Second, some writers (Sorley*), regarding moral experience as the reveleation of an objective realm of values, would make this "experience" either the central theological fact, or at least one of the central data on which a theology may be constructed. Third, some writers emphasize the specifically religious "experience" (e.g., D. C. Macintosh, R. Otto*) as the largely sufficient basis of theology, and it is writers of this persuasion whose doctrines have been especially identified as "empirical theology," and whose work would generally be referred to by this name. It should be noted that the term "experience" has been used in many differing senses, and consequently some writers of these second and third groups seem to include within the denotation of "experience" not merely data which are "immediately given" in the way in which, say, an after-image is given, but also entities allegedly revealed by "intuition" or "insight"; and on this account their right to call themselves "empiricists" would be strongly contested by many philosophers. Members of this third and more specifically "empirical" type of theology (the origination of which should probably be credited to Schleiermacher*) have in common a general opposition to traditional doctrines about Christ, the church, sacraments, etc., which they desire to transform into statements about religious experience, so that they can be verified by ordinary scientific methods. A significant difference of opinion among these writers, which affects their attitude to scientific method in theology, concerns the essential nature of religion, especially whether in religious experience generally (and particularly in mystical experience) there is a peculiarly religious cognition, and whether, if so, it is the grasp of an unique datum* (e.g., of the numinous*), or rather the synthetic grasp of a whole of experience somewhat along the line of Bergson's* conceptions. An interesting method of some of them is to define "God" so that there is no doubt of his existence (e.g. as the reality to which we must adjust ourselves in order to achieve the greatest goods), and then to rely on religious experience (in this case, experimental adjustments, and observation of results) for ascertaining further the nature of "God" and the laws governing his behavior, especially in relation to human beings. The conception of God arrived at in this way may eventually approximate the traditional theist idea, but it is common for most of these theologians to admit that this purely "scientific" method has so far taken theology little, if at all, beyond naturalism, and on this account to admit that if the concept of God is to be of religious value the purely "scientific" method must be supplemented and more personal characteristics ascribed to the divine being on more speculative, or even pragmatic, grounds. It would be widely recognized that the carefully "empirical" writers, who eschew "intuition," are apt to have very great difficulty in justifying any "transcendent" divine being, and hence in distinguishing theology as a science from psychology or sociology. There is no sharp line dividing these writers from professed humanists, who assert that the methods of empirical science cannot reach any conclusions significantly similar to traditional beliefs about God

Discussions of branches of this movement, both pro and con, will be found among the following treatises.

John Baillie, The Interpretation of Religion (1926) and Our Knowledge of God (1939) ; P A Bertocci, The Empirical Argument for God (1938) , C A Bennett, A Philosophical Study of Mysticism (1923) , E A. Burtt, Types of Religious Philosophy (1939) , W M. Horton, Realistic Theology (1934), and article in Religious Realism (1931), D. C Macintosh, editor, R. M Jones, The Testimony of the Soul (1936) , E. W. Lyman, The Meaning and Truth of Religion (1933) , D C Macintosh, Theology as an Empirical Science (1927),, and The Problem of Religious Knowledge (1940) , essays for D C Macintosh, The Nature of Religious Experience (1937) , A. C. McGiffert, The Rise of Modern Religious Ideas (1915) ; John Oman, The Natural and the Supernatural (1931) , F. D. E. Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith (English translation, 1928) ; F R Tennant, Philosophical Theology (1929-30) ; H. N. Wieman, The Wrestle of Religion with Truth (1927).

R B.B.

empiricism: See epistemology.

Ems, Congress of: Protest meeting (1786) of certain German archbishops against interference of Curia* through papal nuncios.* Ems agreement stated their position and suggested reforms but no concessions were secured.   K.H.C.

Encratites: "The Self-disciplined". Name given to certain 2nd century Christians regarded as heretics. Really represents an attitude rather than a sect. Was early expression of ascetic tendencies.
                                                       K.H.C.

encyclicals: An encyclical (Litterae Ensyclicales, from the Gr. engkuklios, in a circle, hence the German Rundschreiben) signifies any communication sent to many people, specifically however, a letter formerly sent by a bishop to his flock (now more commonly known as a "pastoral" letter) but especially by the pope to several dioceses, as e.g. of a Province, or to the whole world in matters of grave importance. Encyclicals are usually dictated by some grave and timely necessity e.g. those of Leo XIII* on the Labor Question (Rerum Novarum) and of Pius XI* on Atheistic Communism (Divini Redemptoris) and on the Persecution of the Church in Germany (Mit brennender Sorge); by anniversaries of important historical events or personages e.g. the one of Pius XI on the 1500th anniversary of the Council of Ephesus* (431-1931) and on the 700th anniversary of the death of ,St. Francis* (1226-1926), or by the desire to promote some special devotion e.g. Leo XIII on the Rosary, on the Christian Family to be modelled on the Holy Family etc. Some of the encyclicals of Pius XI were awaited with keen interest throughout the world. His Casts Connubis (on marital relations and birth control, Dec. 31, 1930) is said to have been one of the longest single trans-Atlantic communications sent to any newspaper in the U. S. A. Encyclicals differ from Papal Constitutions or Bulls* in as far as they are instructions rather than dogmatical definitions Similarly, they differ from decrees* which enjoin some command or prohibition, and from a Rescript,* which is personal or local in nature, unless later universally extended to the whole Church. Encyclicals are written originally in Latin and then translated into the various living languages of the world Like Papal Bulls they are quoted by their initial words. They are considered officially promulgated when they appear in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis * Many have appeared singly in English, published e g. by the America Press, by the Paulist Press (both of N. Y. C.) or by the NCWC of Washington, D. C.   R.M.H.

Encyclopedists: A group of French scholars of the Enlightenment* who collaborated in the preparation of the 35 volume Encyclopédie, ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers par une Société de Gens de Lettres (ed. by Diderot and others, 1751-1780). Diderot was responsible for the first 17 volumes D'Alembert was his chief collaborator but other famous contributors were Montesquieu, Voltaire, Turgot, Holbach, Grimm, and Rousseau. Diderot tried to combine a twofold purpose first, to give an inventory of all human knowledge and, secondly, to expose prejudices, which meant the undermining of much of contemporary Christianity, in the interests of "natural morality." The articles on religion vary widely as the two interests are fulfilled. Many of the articles are orthodox (as on the Trinity) but patently insincere. Naturally such a work was unpopular with the Church and it was violently attacked by Jesuits and Jansenists alike. The first two volumes were suppressed for a time and the editors were repeatedly threatened with imprisonment. A full account of their difficulties can be found in the Encyclopedia Britannica article on "Encyclopedia." For an analysis of the religious aspects of the Encyclopédie see J. E. Barker, Diderot's Treatment of the Christian Religion in the Encyclopédie (1941).   J.E.N.

endogamy: A social practice in which marriage* is restricted to members of one's own group. A common practice in stratified societies, particularly among the ruling and aristocratic classes. Thus in modern Europe marriage in the royal families has been restricted to royalty, and the aristocracy has maintained its "purity" by inbreeding. Taboos against intermarriage between religious and racial groups in America are also expressions of endogamy. Compare with exogamy.   E.R.M.

Engi Shiki: "The Ceremonies of Engi." So-called because of compilation in the Engi Era (901-922 A.D.) of Japanese history. The actual date of publication is probably 927 A.D. A collection of fifty books relating to ancient court life and Shinto shrines and ceremonies.   D.C.H.

England, Church of: See Church of England. See also Free Church of England.

England, Lutheranism in: Toward the end of the 17th century, many people from Lutheran countries migrated to England. In the year 1694 a congregation was established in London, which became known as St. Mary's Evang. Lutheran Church of the Unaltered Augsburg Confession.* Queen Anne (r. 1702-1714) married a Lutheran, and this fact gave prestige to the Lutherans of the city.

King George I, (r. 1714-1727), was a nominal Lutheran. He was a German by birth and training, and throughout his reign German was the spoken language of the immediate family of the King. He brought two German Lutheran court chaplains to London, and St. Mary's congregation seems to have worshiped in a building adjoining the Savoy palace. A parochial school was maintained, and its sessions were held within the palace grounds.

Lutherans grew numerically, with an influx of people from the European continent. Other Lutherans from the Scandinavian countries settled in the English cities bordering on the North sea. Other congregations were organized in London, York, Sunderland and elsewhere.

Later, St. Mary's church was moved to Cleveland street, near Fitzroy square, where it exists to this day, although in later years it became affiliated with German State Church tendencies. Another congregation exists in the Dalston section of London, and adheres to the Hamburg Confession. Lutherans in the past have maintained a hospital and an orphanage in London. In 1866 a considerable number of deaconesses were brought over from the Rauhe Haus, and found fields of labor in London, in Sunderland and even in Ireland. A large hospital was founded in Tottenham by a wealthy Lutheran, and its staff was made up of German deaconesses.

Some fifty years ago a group of young men withdrew from St. Mary's Lutheran church and founded Immanuel in Kentish Town and Holy Trinity in Tottenham, and these two congregations united with the American Missouri Synod. They are the only two congregations in England with a direct connection with the American bodies.

The Swedish Lutheran church in Paddington occupies a beautiful modern stone church building. All told, there are less than twenty Lutheran congregations in London. Scattered congregations may be found throughout England, and one or two in northern Ireland. A number of Lutheran families throughout England, and in Scotland, are visited from time to time by the Missouri Synod* pastors from London, and occasional services conducted.

In 1935 an energetic lay missionary, Mr. J. H. Pedlar, went to Cornwall, and has met with considerable success in establishing a number of preaching stations.   F.R.W.

English Bible, the: See Bible, English.

English school of psychologists: See psychologists, English school of.

Enlightenment, the: The name of the movement which characterizes the general atmosphere of the 18th century. Its origin is to be sought in the mental coming of age and spiritual emancipation of man in the Renaissance* era, which with its naturalistic and individualistic tendencies evoke in the minds of people a proud consciousness of the autonomy of reason. As a historic phenomenon, the Enlightenment movement represents the effort of applying the rule of reason to actual life. Western mankind was to be raised to the height of an intellectual civilization by the "Aufklarung," i.e., illumination of every phase of life with the dominant principle of rationality.

This movement of general enlightenment penetrated every domain of life· religion, literature, the arts, philosophy, the sciences and political establishments, revealing itself in a variety of forms in the various parts of Europe. Beginning from the Netherlands and England, the Enlightenment reached its climax in France, the waves breaking in Germany and in the rest of Europe up to the Volga river.

Enlightened religion in the several forms of Deism* was conceived as a set of rational propositions, indispensable for life. From Herbert of Cherbury (1581-1648), whose De veritate (1627) pronounces the autonomy of reason in religion to John Locke's* (1632-1704) The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695) and John Toland's* (1670-1722) Christianity not Mysterious (1696), up to Matthew Tindal's (1656-1733) The Deists' Bible, the same idea of a purely natural religion is expressed.

The enlightenment in literature is represented by the classical spirit which pervaded most of the literary products of the period and can be admired in the superb achievements of the great trio Pierre Corneille (1606-1684), Jean Racine (1639-1699) and Jean Baptiste Molière (1622-1673). Nature controlled by reason, is the keynote of their productions. Perhaps the most typical representatives of this enlightened literature were the Frenchmen· Montesquieu (1689-1755) with his L'esprit des lois (1748), Diderot (1713-1784) whose Encyclopedie (1751-1780) is the summary of the results of the Enlightenment through reason and Voltaire* (1694-1778), the torchbearer of the light of intellect.

The Enlightenment in art may be traced by a dominance of the "Apollonian element" of clarity, formal discipline and impersonal restraint in the artistic creations of the era. The light of controlling rationality and objective formality characterizes the symmetrical dignity of the palace at Versailles; the stateliness and sobriety of the Dutch Rembrandt (1606-1669) and the Flemish Rubens (1577-1640); the classicist externality of France's landscapist Wattean (1684-1721); the surface glory of the paintings of England's Gainsborough (1727-1788) and Turner (1775-1851); and the sublime transparency of Germany's enlightened musician Bach (1685-1750) and his school. Typical for the application of a reasoned-out-art-autocracy is the rigid intellectuality of the French Academy of Sculpture and Painting, founded in 1648.

Philosophical Enlightenment may be seen in the monumental achievements of Descartes'* (1596-1650) "I think, therefore, I am" methodology, in Spinoza's* (1622-1677) world, reduced to a geometrical scheme, in Leibniz's* (1646-1716) monads which unfold toward higher and higher degrees of clarification.

For the scientific Enlightenment Newton's* (1642-1727) Principia Mathematica (1687) is usually pointed out as the crowning accomplishment of a world-view, conceived in terms of intelligibility.

Enlightened economics found its expression in the rationally controlled and centrally regimented system of mercantilism, while Enlightened politics can be followed up in the ideal of the "Enlightened Despot," such as Frederick II, the Great of Prussia (1740-1786), Joseph II of Austria (1780-1790), and Catherine II of Russia (1762-1796), whose aim was to rule by the light of right reason.

The Enlightenment movement declined, as many movements decline, by an overemphasis of its own principle. See Encyclopedists.   s.c.t.

Enlil: See Mesopotamian religions.

Enoch: The seventh of the ten ante-diluvian patriarchs of Gen. 5. The biblical record tells that he lived three hundred and sixty-five years; "and Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God had taken him." This biblical record has furnished the motif for two Jewish, post-biblical, non-canonical, apocalyptic books. Both books recount the journeyings of Enoch, under divine guidance, through the entire earth and through the seven heavens, and the divine revelation to him of all the mysteries of heaven and earth, that he, in turn, might reveal them to manknd. The older and larger book, usually designated as I Enoch, was of composite authorship, written in Palestine, probably in Aramaic, between the third and first centuries B.C., and is preserved complete only in an Ethiopic translation, though some fragments of the ancient Greek translation likewise exist. II Enoch was probably written in Egypt, in Greek, during the first half-century A.D. It has survived only in a Slavonic translation. See parable, pseudepigrapha.   j.m.

ens: The present participle of the verb esse, to be, usually translated as "being." In philosophical terminology it is used as a noun. As such, the term has the most abstract signification conceivable. It is predicated about anything that exists or may exist, actual or possible things, without implying any reference to their existence or non-existence. Ens, then, or entity, simply means a something which is not entirely nothing. In that sense it may be predicated about the infinite and the finite, the substance and the accidence and about any other thing which is not pure nothing.

                                                                s.c.t.

Enthusiasts: See Eu-chites.

environment: The natural and social conditions under which mankind, or groups of men, have developed. a) Natural conditions refer to geographic and meteorological factors, such as location, climate, rainfall, soil fertility, food, minerals and other resources, altitude, temperature, humidity, mountain barriers, access to the sea and other water ways, land contours, and other aspects of the physical environment. Such conditions have profound influence on areas of settlement, physical types of men, distribution of races, migrations, diet, health, and other human affairs. Moreover, certain mental habits and the outlook of men, their religion and social organization, may reflect influences from their natural environment. It is obvious that the very survival of man depends upon such products of the natural environment as food, water and the means of shelter.

b) Assuming that physical survival is assured, the major concerns of men are with their social environment, which consists of institutions or groups such as the family, state and community, regulatory techniques as may be found in traditions, folkways, customs of laws; forms of association, and all the other elements of social structure. These comprise the superorganic or cultural environment. Within such a framework the hebavior of men and their social interaction are controlled. They constitute the sociological aspect of environment, but are subject to profound changes from age to age. See culture, heredity.

K. Young, Source Book for Sociology (1935).

                                                                a.e.w.

Ephesians, Epistle to: The words "in Ephesus" (1.1) are wanting in the best MSS, and Paul can hardly have written a letter so impersonal to a church with which he was so intimately associated. According to one conjecture it is the letter to Laodicea referred to in Col. 4 16; others would regard it, perhaps rightly, as a circular letter, in which a blank was left for the name of each particular church. The authenticity of the letter has sometimes been doubted, chiefly because it follows so closely the lines of Colossians, but this argument is inconclusive, and in view of its intrinsic excellence and its profound understanding of Pauline thought it may safely be attributed to Paul. Its theme throughout is the Church, regarded as the Body of Christ. This idea is developed in a mystical sense. Christ has reincarnated himself in the church, so as to fulfil God's hidden purpose of reconciling all things. In the whole creation some cleavage has taken place, which has introduced conflict everywhere. In Christ "all things have been gathered together into one" (1 11) and through the church, in which old divisions have been broken down, he carries out his work of harmony, which will finally include the universe. If the Epistle was written by Paul, during his Roman imprisonment, it may be assigned to 60 or 61 A.D.

J. A. Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians (1904); E. F. Scott, The Literature of the New Testament (1932).   e.f s.

Ephesus, Council of: Third Ecumenical, A.D. 431. Condemned Nestorius.* Composed of opposing groups of Alexandrians and Antiochans which met separately. Larger Alexandrian group under Cyril* was later officially recognized after reconciliation effected   K H.C.

Ephesus, Robber Synod of: A.D. 449. Phase of Eutychian controversy. Bishop Dioscurus of Alexandria secured temporary restoration of Eutyches* and condemnation of Antiochans. Denounced by Leo I of Rome as "Synod of Robbers."   K.H.C.

ephod: Part of the sacerdotal costume among the Israelites, and/or instrument of divination* (Jud viii, 24-27, xvii-xviii, II Sam. vi, 14, 16, 20-22, etc.) See W. R. Arnold, Ephod and Ark, (1917).   S.L.T.

Ephrata Society: A celibate and communistic religious movement founded at Ephrata, Pennsylvania in 1732 by Johann Conrad Beissel. He was originally closely associated with the Dunker* movement and drew many followers from them. The community included solitary Brethren, Sisters, and married couples who gave themselves to religious exercises, farming, and trades They were also noted for their music and their publication of religious literature. They kept the seventh day as the Sabbath and after 1814 were known as the Seventh Day Baptists.*   ,

The Society flourished well past the founder's death in 1768 and the original cloister buildings still stand as a monument. The membership, however, is limited to a few small communities in the counties of Bedford, Franklin, Lancaster, and Somerset, Pennsylvania. See communistic settlements, religious.   W.M.B.

epiclesis: The invocation* of the Holy Spirit which follows the words of institution in the office of the eucharist of the Eastern Orthodox churches. It is believed by the members of these communions that the miraculous change in the elements of bread and wine into the body and blood of Jesus Christ occurs at this moment of the service, rather than during the recitation of the words of institution, as the Roman Catholics believe. However, most orthodox theologians consider both the words of institution and the epiclesis as essential.

F E. Brightman, ed., Liturgies Eastern and Western (Oxford, 1896)   M.S.

Epictetus: (ca. 50-120) Stoic philosopher and slave of Epaphroditus in Rome. He was later freed and taught philosophy, first in Rome and, after banishment by the Emperor Domitian, in Nicopolis in Epirus. He held that happiness* depends upon the will and therefore is within the grasp of everyone who can control his will. Externals are unimportant. His ethical theory is essentially religious, resting on belief in a rational God who controls the universe and cares for men. Since all men are children of God, they should love one another. His Discourses were reported by his pupil, Flavius Arrianus, and are available in many translations (cf. Everyman's Library and Loeb Classical Library) See fate.   J.E.N.

Epicureanism: A system of ethics developed by Epicurus*. Like the Cyrenaics* he regarded happiness* as the summum bonum, but, unlike them, he stressed the lasting pleasures of the mind rather than present satisfaction of physical appetites. He adopted Democritean atomism because it abolished for him all superstitious fears of death and future punishment. Death is not an evil since the dead have no feelings and, for the living, death does not yet exist. The gods have no interest in human affairs Therefore we need not fear the future and may concentrate on present happiness.

Epicurus taught the value of the simple life with few desires. Prudence was for him a cardinal virtue. He gave high place to friendship but was indifferent to political affairs. His views were expounded by Lucretius* and later by Gassendi*.   J.E.N.

Epicurus: (ca. 342-270 B.C.) A Greek philosopher, founder of the school of ethics which bears his name. He wrote several works, but only a few letters have been preserved.   J.E.N.

epigraphic: An archaeological term referring to written inscriptions of all types, as distinct from material or unwritten remains discovered in excavations.   G.E W.

Epiphanius: (c. 315-403) A fourth century bishop of Constantia (Salamis), capital of Cyprus (elected in 367), celebrated for his violent opposition to every form of heresy, particularly to what he regarded as the dangerous teachings of Origen*. His chief work, the Panarion, a treatise describing and refuting some eighty heresies, survives, as also his treatise on Christian doctrine, the Ancoratus. See Migne, Patr. Graec., 41-43. See lapidaries.   E.T.R.

Epiphany: (Gr., epiphaneia, manifestation) The festival (Jan. 6) commemorating the manifestation of Christ as God Incarnate In the East it was the original feast of the Nativity (as it still is with the Armenians) and now commemorates primarily Christ's baptism. In the Western Church it is associated with the visit of the Magi. See church year cycle.   P.V.N.

episcopacy: Government of the church by bishops, as the chief of the three orders of bishop, priest and deacon. See clergy.   T.J.B.

Episcopal Church: See Church of England.

epistemology: (Gr., episteme: knowledge, logos: study of) The problem of knowledge. The following are definitions of various positions taken as to a theory of knowledge.

The doctrine that knowledge comes by way of experience is known as empiricism. Realism in epistemology is the doctrine which asserts that there is a world-out-there independent and prior to our knowledge of it which we somehow grasp in the knowledge relation. Generally it is assumed that the world-out-there is other-than-mind in character. When an idealist (metaphysical idealist) claims to be a realist he redefines the term to mean a world-out-there independent of an individual's mind although of the same character as mind. Representative realism holds that ideas in the mind represent the objective reality. Epistemological dualism is the doctrine that the object and the idea of it are two separate elements. Subjective idealism, psychological idealism, subjectivism* are names for the position that the only world we know is that of our idea. (See idealism, epistemological.) Such a doctrine leads to the position known as solipsism only the ideas within myself constitute the extent of knowledge and the range of reality. Mentalism is the term sometimes given to subjective idealism. Objective idealism affirms the objective reality of idea. Sensationalistic empiricism is the view that experience as presented by the senses is the datum of knowledge. Common sense realism is the term attributed to the so-called Scottish School which built its epistemological theory upon the view held by the man in the street, viz., a world-out- there independent of mind but somehow known by mind. Rationalism in epistemology is the view that knowledge comes by way of reason. Phenomenalism (the Kantian view) is the position arrived at in view of the claim that knowledge is limited to the world of appearance as distinguished from a world-in-itself (the noumenal world). Such a view is sometimes referred to as agnostic realism. Epistemological monism is the view that the real object of knowledge and the knowledge of it are one in the knowledge-relation. Naive realism is the view of the man on the street who holds uncritically a real world and our knowledge of it as dependable. Critical realism in the general sense is an inclusive term referring to any realistic position defended by some critical view, as such critical realism is opposed to naive realism. "Critical Realists", however, are those who have set up a special school so named by their published manifesto Essays in Critical Realism (1920). This school, in general, holds that the object is given to the subject through media, the object is not directly presented in the knowledge-relation. Critical realists differ among themselves in their exposition of this school. The following were members of this school D. Drake, A. O. Lovejoy, J. B. Pratt, A. K. Rogers, G. Santayana, R. W. Sellars, C. A. Strong.

New Realists is the name given to those epistemologists who rebelled against metaphysical idealism. Their position is· knowledge comes by way of a direct (monistic) contact with the object in the knowledge-relation. There are no media, no representations. The external world is literally given to the knower. There is a direct disclosure. Two schools of New Realists are: the English (G. F. Stout; G. E. Moore; B. Russell, S. Alexander, T. P. Nunn, A. Wolf) and the American (F. J. E. Woodbridge; G. S.

Fullerton, E. B. McGilvary and the six men who joined in a published manifesto The New Realism (1912) E. B. Holt, W. T Marvin, W. P. Montague, R. B. Perry, W B. Pitkin, E. G. Spaulding). According to the New Realists, mind is not a unique stuff or soul standing over against the objective physical world, the mind is a part of that objective world (hence, panobjectivism). The English group of New Realists affirm that the mind is a kind of awareness or diaphaneity through which the objective world is directly disclosed. The mind is a relation of awareness within the world. The American group tended to make mind less "mental" and leaned towards calling it a behavior-activity of the organism or a relation among relations. If the external world is physical the view then developed into a materialism, e.g., Woodbridge; Montague, however, if the world is neutral the view developed into a neutralism, e.g., Holt and Russell. In other words, many of the extreme New Realists (the American variety) developed an outspoken materialistic ontology and their psychology into behaviorism. In a word, whereas idealists stressed the world in terms of mind, the New Realists stressed the mind in terms of the world.

Critical monism, the view developed by D. C. Macintosh, is a form of critical realism, asserting that knowledge of the external reality is a two-way affair monistic in that the world is actually disclosed to the mind in terms of the primary qualities (number, rest, motion, figure, solidity, extension), critical in that the mind furnishes the secondary qualities (color, taste, sound, smell).

Intuitionism is the view which claims that knowledge is immediate. The immediacy may be rationalistic, e.g., a priori innate ideas (the older intuitionists), or it may be "pure perceptions" as distinguished from concepts (e.g., Bergson), or it may be that of "feeling" (Hocking) or primitive animal awareness; or it may be empirical in the sense of a perception in a complex of sensation (Macintosh) Pragmatic realism is the view (held by J Dewey) that knowledge is not affair of a spectator-mind looking out at the world but an instrument of adjustment, reason and experience are but two names of a process by which the organism gets on in a world; the organism being a part of that world. Realism thus stresses the objective world, and pragmatism points to biological adaptation.

For a discussion of the development of epistemological theories as applied to religious epistemology, see D. C. Macintosh, The Problem of Religious Knowledge (1940). For a thorough discussion of the general field of the problem of knowledge see D. C. Macintosh, The Problem of Knowledge (1915); W P. Montague, The Ways of Knowing (1925). For an introductory survey of epistemology see V Ferm, First Adventures in Philosophy (1936), Chaps. XX-XXII.   V.F.

epochs: See ages, culture epochs.

Epworth League: See Young People's Societies, Christian.

equalitarianism: A term likely to be applied either approvingly or disparagingly to any view proposing equality for all individuals in some important respect not customary at the time. e.g., equal civil and political rights and abolition of the privileges of the aristocracy during the French Revolution; at present, equal economic and educational opportunities for all, or complete social equality among persons of all races and religions.   W.K.W.

equiprobabilism: The theory that in debatable moral questions one may adopt either of two courses of action, if the arguments for both are equally probable. It represents the mid point between probabilism* and probabiliorism (that the more probable course is to be chosen). The theory was developed by St. Alphonsus Liguori* who had previously defended both the other views.   J.E.N.

Equity (Ohio): See communistic settlements, secular.

equivocation: (Lat. aequa, equal, and vox, voice or word) The use of one word with two or more meanings, fallacies (and puns) arise from it. "Things are said to be named 'equivocally' when, though they have a common name, the definition corresponding with the name differs for each" (Aristotle, Categoriae, 1). Equivocation is sometimes used in casuistry*, theoretically differentiated from lying.   E.S.B.

Erasmus: (1466-1536) Dutch scholar and man of letters, occupied a unique position in the learned world of the early sixteenth century. For the famous Froben press of Basel he edited a notable series of the Fathers, and in his prefaces revealed a gift of appealing to his readers' interests and showing the relevance of ancient works to current needs. His edition of the Greek N. T. exposed the inadequacy of the Vulgate*, and opened the way for a critical study of the text. His own writings were very popular. In the religious struggles of the day he occupied a neutral position which exposed him to the hostility of both sides. The explanation lies not in timidity but in a certain quality of mind to which partisanship is an impossibility. See Renaissance.   G.R.C.

Erastianism: The theory concerning the relations of church and state developed by Thomas Lüber (1524-1583), known as Erastus. Opposing Genevan claims that excommunication belonged to the church, Erastus taught that in a Christian state the magistrates possessed the disciplinary power, and he attacked the infallibility of the church. His views were developed by John Selden and other Erastians in the 1640's to combat the militant presbyterianism of the Westminster Assembly*, and reached their most extreme expression in Thomas Hobbes'* Leviathan (1651). See caesaropapism.
   J. N. Figgis, "Erastus and Erastianism," in The Divine Right of Kings, 2d. ed. (Cambridge, 1914);

E. W. Whitney, "Erastianism and Divine Right," Huntington Library Quarterly, II, 373-398.
                                         E.W.K.

Eriugena, John Scotus: (ca. 800-ca. 880) An Irish scholar and philosopher with a command of Greek who appeared in France some time before 847 A.D., became a favorite of Charles the Bold, headed the Palace School, and translated the Pseudo-Dionysian works from Greek into Latin making their mystical doctrine available for the centuries that followed. In theological controversy with Gottschalk* over the doctrine of Predestination, Eriugena produced a very free mystical optimism declaring God's all-loving nature to be incompatible with any evil in His dealings with men. His greatest philosophical work is his On the Division of Nature in which his mystical interpretation of the ever hidden yet eternally self-revealing creator God is set forth in a highly original and suggestive manner. See reason in religion, scholasticism; William of Malmesbury.
   Huber, Johannes Scotus Eriugena (Munich, 1861); Henry Betts, Johannes Scotus Eriugena (Cambridge, Eng. 1925); Thomas Whittaker, Apollonius of Tyana and other Essays (London, 1905).   D.V.S.

Erlangen School: A theological school of thought, starting from the pupils of John Christian Konrad Hofman* (1810-1877), whose work on the unity of the bible and antagonism to the doctrine of vicarious atonement coincided with the rise of the opposition to the Origin of Species. Of these pupils the most outstanding was Franz Herman Reinhold von Frank* (1827-1894) who changed 'the mode of teaching the old truth,' admitted the doctrine of Evolution by extending it to 'the humanity of God as the order of salvation.' He was known as "the theologian of the School." See neo Lutheranism; Thomasius.   F.W.B.

Ernest, the Pious, of Gotha: See catechumenate.

Erskine, Ebenezer: (1680-1754) A minister of the Church of Scotland*, first at Portmoak and then at Stirling. Being suspended from the ministry on account of his opposition to the state connection, he and three others organized a separate church court, called the Associate Presbytery, in 1733. The Established Church made this break official in 1740. When, in 1747, the Associate Presbytery split into Burghers and Anti-Burghers, Erskine adhered to the former body. He continued to preach in Stirling until his death.
                                         A.K.R.

Erskine, Thomas: (1788-1870) A Scottish writer who, on inheriting the family estate of Linlathen in 1816, retired from the practice of law in Edinburgh, and devoted the rest of his life to the propagation, by tongue and pen, of his peculiar theological views. Determined in all his thinking by his flattering view of the value and dignity of man, he was an early advocate of the characteristic humanistic theology of the nineteenth century, and a close friend of such men as F. D. Maurice, Edward Irving, and Thomas Carlyle.

A.X.R.

eschatology: (Gr., eschatos furthest, last, logy) Literally the doctrine of the last things, derived' from such phrases in the N.T. as "it shall come to pass in the last days" (Acts 2 17). The term, arising from the early Christian confidence that the end of the present age was at hand and that Christ would soon appear to set up the Final Judgment*, has come to include all that seems to be taught in the Bible about the fate of the individual, the nation, and the world in general.

In early Hebrew thinking there was, properly speaking, no doctrine of the hereafter, at least for the individual. At death the "breath of life," i.e., the animating principle (ruach) left the flesh (basar), and the individual (nephesh) ceased to exist. "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in sheol*, whither thou goest" (Eccl. 9 10) reveals the early orthodox view of the hereafter, as is evident from the almost fanatic desire for a son and the institution of levirate marriage*. To the gloomy haunt of sheol all must go—good and bad alike. From it there is no return. There is hope for a tree that "if it be cut down it will sprout again," but "man dieth, and is laid low; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" (Job 14: 7 ff.). Attempts to read back into early Hebrew thinking later notions of a resurrection—even worse, the Greek idea of immortality—are quite unjustified by the evidence.

Such hopes for the future as there were were in terms of the nation. Israel's history, a little state constantly worsted by her more powerful neighbors, was hardly commensurate with her growing confidence that the supreme God of the whole world was actually King in a peculiar sense of Israel alone. The years had told a sad story of internal discord, a divided kingdom, the successive collapse of the north and south before the inroads of the invaders. Could this be Israel's fate? There seemed but one answer. Eventually the scales of the balance would right themselves. A good time was coming. God had promised it; he could not forswear himself. The days of David and Solomon—seen in a romantic and unhistoric haze by the abject nation—would return. Purged of her sins, freed from oppression, Israel would enjoy an era of peace and blessing, with her God recognized and worshipped by all.

In the centuries subsequent to the exile Judaism underwent many changes and accumulated much that was alien to her inheritance. The notion of life after death, of a cataclysmic dissolution of the present world and the birth of a new one, the garish display and eschatological nightmares of the apocalyptic literature* peopled by angels and hideous beasts—all these came into the picture, due in no small part apparently to the influence of Persian dualism upon Jewish thinking. A new emphasis on the importance of the individual emerges, and with it a belief in future life for the individual in terms of a resurrection of the body at the time of a great final judgment. This distinctly non-Hebraic view eventually became a part of orthodox Jewish belief and was read back into the scriptures, as is evidenced by Josephus, the N.T., and the rabbinical writings.

Early Christianity was the heir of these views and developed them. From the start it was confidently expected that the kingdom of God, which had apparently bulked large in the teaching of Jesus, was speedily to appear, and that Jesus himself would return spectacularly on the clouds of heaven to preside at the Final Judgment. Gradually this passionately held belief passed from the forefront of Christian thinking, a long delay must be expected, but eventually it would come (see millenarianism). As Christianity spread out into the Mediterranean world of thought other and drastic modifications of the views of the future resulted, for here too there had been far-reaching changes. A clear-cut notion of the dual nature of man—an imperishable soul tenanting a mortal body from which it received welcome release at death—had resulted in the hellenistic world in a wide (but by no means universally held) belief in the immortality of this all-important soul—the real man. In addition, the earlier view that at death good and bad alike passed to a dreary and drab ghostlike existence on the asphodel plains (cf. the Hebrew Sheol) had yielded to the view that the soul, as the thinking and willing part of the man, would receive in the hereafter rewards or punishments appropriate to the kind of life lived.

Christian thinking has attempted to combine these originally contradictory views of the resurrection* of the body and immortality* of the soul, a great Final Judgment at the end of this age and the immediate rewards and punishments to each individual at death. See also apocalypticism, Messianic hope; Mohammedanism; soul.

G. F. Moore, Judaism, 3 vols. (1927 and 1930); W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums im späthellenistischen Zeitalter (3rd ed., 1926).

M.S.E.

Esdras, Books of: Esdras is the Greek and Latin rendering of the name of the biblical hero, Ezra*. Various books, popularly attributed to Ezra, are known as the Books of Esdras. There is some confusion in their enumeration. Both Septuagint and Vulgate designate the biblical books of Ezra and Nehemiah as I and II Esdras. Two other non-canonical works, included in the Vulgate, are called III and IV Esdras. Not infrequently, however, they are spoken of as I and II Esdras, while the two biblical books are referred to by their customary titles, Ezra and Nehemiah. Occasionally the last two chapters of IV Esdras, really a separate work, are designated as V Esdras. III Esdras is a pseudo-historical work, which recounts freely certain portions of the narrative of the biblical books, Ezra, Nehemiah and Chronicles, with some legendary material added. It seems to have been written in the second century B.C. and probably in Greek. IV Esdras is an important apocalyptic* work, of composite authorship, written in Hebrew during the first century A.D., but preserved only in translation in various ancient languages. See apocrypha, Old Testament; pseudepigrapha.

R. H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (Oxford, 1913), I, 1-58; II, 542-624; W. O. E. Oesterley, II Esdras (The Ezra Apocalypse) (London, 1933)   J.M.

essence: (Late Lat., *essentia, from esse, to be) That by which a thing is what it is, as distinguished from the thing's existence, that by which a thing is constituted in a definite species. In God essence and existence are necessarily identical, but in all other things they are in some fashion distinct. "I can understand what a man is, and still not know whether he actually exists", as St. Thomas states in his De ente et essentia, chap. 5.   C.V.

Essenes: A Jewish sect* which flourished in Palestine during the second Jewish Commonwealth. Its members lived in monastic communities from which women were excluded and they generally limited their occupations to handicrafts. The origin of the name remains obscure. Some have traced it to the Syriac term for pious, while others have derived it from the Aramaic asya, physician, because the Essenes served as popular healers. See asceticism; communistic settlements, religious.   B.Z.B.

essentia: (Lat., esse, to be, for Gr., ousia) That which makes a thing what it is as opposed to accidents or properties and attributes. It is used also in contradistinction to existence or that by which a thing is Essentia or essence is roughly equivalent to .substance, nature, quiddity and is virtually the same as the popular terms constitution, stuff, composition.   D.C.O'G.

Established, or State Churches: These churches enjoy legal privileges and endowments not accorded to other ecclesiastical bodies. In spite of the legalization of Nonconformist churches, the Church of England*, for example, continues to be the national church. Until 1834 the ministers of the Congregational churches in Massachusetts were paid from town taxes. The rights and actual procedures of established churches vary greatly so that each particular case' must be considered on the basis of both law and fact.   W.W.R.

Esther: A book of the O.T., placed at the end of the historical books in the English Bible (following the Septuagint and Vulgate), but in the Hebrew canon included in the third and latest division, the "Writings" or Hagiographa*. It is one of the five Megilloth ("Scrolls") which are read at certain Jewish festivals, Esther being used at the Feast of Purim. The book relates the story of how the Jewess Esther was elevated to be queen of Ahasuerus (apparently Xerxes I) and thus saved her people from the destruction which had been planned by Haman, and tells of the institution of the Feast of Purim in commemoration of that deliverance. While the author shows some accurate knowledge of Persian architecture and customs, and Ahasuerus is a fairly authentic figure, the story as a whole is not history, but fiction It was probably written in the second century B C. to inspire nationalistic patriotism and to afford a quasi-historical occasion for the Feast of Purim (the actual origin of which is unknown). The Septuagint contains 107 additional verses not found in the Hebrew text, which have been relegated to the Apocrypha Their purpose was to supply the religious element which is conspicuously absent in the Hebrew version. See apocrypha, O.T.

See M. Haller and K. Galling, Die fünf Megilloth (Handbuch z. Alten Testament, 1940).   J.P.H.

Esther, fast of: See Jewish religious festivals.

eternal: (Lat., aeternus for aeviternus, akin to Gr. aion, lifetime, age) Existing or obtaining primordially and forever, without beginning or ending in time. It is often taken as synonym for changeless, but this usage is questionable, for it tends to obscure the fact that "ever-existing" and "never-changing" are logically quite independent ideas. For, on the one hand, the unchanging need not exist forever. Thus, according to Bergson, Whitehead, and other philosophers and theologians, every event, or portion of process, once it has come to be, is changelessly itself (see time). It is immortal, not eternal; temporally without ending, but not without beginning. Further, some thinkers believe that abstract qualities can be created at a given moment in time, and yet remain ever after fixed and self-identical. On the other hand, what exists forever might change, provided it never began and never ceased to change, and provided the change was in its accidents, never in its individual essence. (The denial that these conditions can be met is too controversial to be put into the definition of so commonly used a term as eternal.) Thus the unchanging may or may not exist forever, and the ever-existent may or may not be unchanging. The ever-existent which is ever-changing may be called "everlasting " Since it embraces both self-identity and self-difference, both permanence and change, whereas the other form of eternity* abstracts from self-difference or change, it is difficult—in spite of tradition—not to see in it the concrete and ultimate form of eternity, of which the unchanging form is an abstract aspect and not the whole.

See omniscience; perfection; transcendence.
dence.

E. S. Brightman, "A temporalist view of God," Jour. of Relig. (1932), 12, 545-55; A. E. Garvie, The Christian Faith (1937), p. 105.   C.H.

eternal law: See law.

eternally begotten: The words have reference to the doctrine of Origen* (185-254) who taught that the Logos as Son proceeds from God the Father not by way of division but spiritually by an eternal generation. The Logos as Son, Eternally Begotten of the will of the Father, is a numerically distinct subsistence or hypostasis but in substance or nature He is essentially one with the Father though subordinate to the Father. See Trinity.   H.W.J.

eternity: The state of being eternal*. Has been conceived in three ways. 1) The absence of time and change: timelessness, immutability (the view of Aquinas and many others). 2) The inclusion, in one unique, determinate state or "single now", of all time taken as a fixed total of events (Royce*, et. al.). The totality of mutations is thus taken as immutable. However, it is doubtful if they could really be mutations, since every item, in its place in the whole, simply is what it is, and no item changes. Such a view "spatializes time" (Bergson*) or contradicts the distinctive character of time as the dimension of creation, not of mere being. 3) The inclusion in a protean, partially indeterminate, state of all time taken as a growing totality of events, each of which is first indeterminate (within limits), and then determinate, or is first future and incomplete in its reality, and then present and complete. Each event as it becomes complete or present is an addition to the previous totality of complete events. Thus eternity as 3) is the summation of all actual or elapsed events in an ever-growing present, to whose increase there is neither beginning nor end. The content of such a present, so far as acquired, is henceforth immutable; the only mutation being the acquisition of new content, or the change from the potential and indefinite to the actual and definite. Thus 3) combines elements of 1) and 2), and in addition is able to account for time as real change within the eternal being; whereas 1) leaves the relations of time and eternity unintelligible, being able to construe time-and-eternity neither as a temporal nor as an eternal whole; and 2) puts time within eternity only through denial of its temporality.

See foreknowledge; omniscience; time; Whitehead.   C.H.

ether: (Lat., aether; Gr., aither, upper air, sky) In physics, the all-pervasive "fluid" formerly assumed as medium of impalpable radiations, e.g., light, magnetism. Today one admits that no fluid nor other palpable body gives much idea of the property of space (or of reality in space) whereby wave-phenomena are transmitted through otherwise vacuous regions.   C.H.

Ethical Culture Societies:

The Ethical Culture movement was inaugurated by Professor Felix Adler (1851-1933) in New York City, on May 15, 1876. Adler had come to this country as a child of four from the Rhineland, and after taking his degree at Columbia College became instructor in oriental languages and literature at Cornell University. He had been trained to succeed his father as rabbi of the Temple Emanuel in New York, but he revolted against the theology and ceremonialism of the Hebrew religion and founded, with the support of a few sympathizers who left the synagogue with him, a society pledged "to assert the supreme importance of the ethical factor in all relations of life, personal, social, national and international, apart from any theological or metaphysical considerations." The New York Society for Ethical Culture grew steadily until it reached its present membership of 1150 persons. Meanwhile similar societies were formed in Chicago (1882) by William M. Salter, in Philadelphia (1885) by S. Burns Weston, in St. Louis (1886) by Walter L. Sheldon, in Brooklyn (1906) by Leslie Sprague, and in Westchester County (1927) by David S. Muzzey. These six societies, with a membership of about 2500, are affiliated in the American Ethical Union (1889), which publishes as its organ The Standard, now in its thirtieth year. Societies were also established in England, France, Germany, Austria and Japan, but it is only in England that the movement has survived the onslaught of nazi and fascist tyranny.

Besides the proclamation of a purely ethical religion from their Sunday morning platforms, the societies have engaged in a variety of educational, philanthropic, and social reform activities. The Ethical Culture Schools, founded in New York as a Workingman's School at the beginning of the movement and in Brooklyn in 1923, have introduced the systematic teaching of ethics in all the grades and have stressed the democratic idea by the inclusion of rich and poor, Negro and white, in their enrollment, by a system of scholarships. The New York society introduced the free kindergarten and district nursing, and the societies generally have been active in such reform projects as settlements, child labor, adult education, tenement house reform, improvement in the condition of the Negroes, and, since the outbreak of the war in Europe, aid to the refugees from nazi persecution in getting acclimated to their new homes in America and learning our language and the principles of our democratic "way of life."

Though the Ethical Societies have a membership so small that they are not listed in most of the tabulations of American religious bodies, and though they are not recognized, as are Catholics, Protestants and Jews, as a "religious" sect by the registrants of the Selective Service, yet their influence has been a decided factor in the liberalizing of orthodox churches, and their educational contributions have been acknowledged by the schools and colleges of the country. Their "leaders" perform the usual functions of ordained ministers in conducting marriage and funeral services. Their property, insofar as it is devoted to religious and educational uses, is exempt from taxation.

Membership in the societies is open to all persons who accept the single doctrine of the ethical aim as the supreme aim of life, without regard to their individual opinions on such questions as the existence of God or the immortality of the soul. Theists, deists, and atheists (if there be any) are equally welcome. Men and women have come to the societies from the church, the synagogue, and the great mass of the "unchurched." Members and leaders are alike free to entertain and to express whatever theological or philosophical convictions they may have, the only bond of union being a common devotion to "the increasing knowledge, love, and practice of the right." The public "services" are extremely simple, consisting of music, inspirational readings, and the ethical address, or "sermon." Some of the societies have introduced congregational singing and responsive readings, but there has generally been a reluctance to "copy" the service of the churches. There is no oral prayer, but, again, in some of the societies a brief period of "meditation" has been adopted.

On Professor Adler's death in 1933, the senior leadership of the New York society passed to his colleague for 40 years, Dr. John L. Elliott; and on the latter's death in 1942, the board of (five) surviving leaders shared the work without the appointment by the trustees of a "senior leader." Meanwhile the founders of the other societies had passed away, to be succeeded eventually by the present leaders. Horace J. Bridges in Chicago, W. Edwin Collier in Philadelphia, J. Hutton Hynd in St. Louis, and Henry Neumann in Brooklyn.

Felix Adler, An Ethical Philosophy of Life (1918) and The Reconstruction of the Spiritual Ideal (1923); William M. Salter, Ethical Religion (1889); Horace J. Bridges, The Ethical Movement (1911); Alfred Martin, The Distinctive Features of the Ethical Movement (1926), Percival Chubb, On the Religious Frontier (1931); Henry Neumann, Education for Moral Growth (1923).   D.S.M.

ethics: (Gr., ta ethika, customs) Moral philosophy, the scientific or philosophical investigation of moral judgments which pronounce conduct "good", "bad", "right", "wrong", what "ought" or "ought not" to be done. All men make moral judgments of some kind. Primitive peoples base moral judgments upon customs deemed obligatory, sometimes attributed to ancestral or divine origin, but rarely explained rationally. In the early civilizations of Egypt, China, India, Persia, and Israel, morality became sufficiently reflective for sages to enunciate precepts and proverbs. However, Socrates* was probably the first philosopher to criticize moral judgments constructively and prepare the way for the rise of systematic ethics. Among his pupils, Plato* advanced the best system of moral philosophy. While Plato, in the Republic and elsewhere, affirmed that ethics has an ultimate metaphysical foundation in the Idea of the Good, he conceives ethics largely in terms of citizenship in a free state in which every individual performs his proper functions guided by the virtues of wisdom, courage, temperance, and justice. Aristotle*, who dictated the first treatise devoted exclusively to systematic ethics, gives a longer list of moral virtues, each of which is a golden mean between vices: e.g., courage lies between cowardice and foolhardiness. A moral virtue is an acquired habit, which should be intelligently cultivated. Ethics is organically related to Politics, and the moral virtues to citizenship. Higher than moral virtues and civic life, however, are the dianoetic virtues, chiefly rational insight and understanding, the only activities in which the gods conceivably engage.

With the downfall of the Greek free city states after the Macedonian conquest, later moral philosophers were forced to think of man less as a citizen than as an individual. Epicurus* and his followers counselled the wise men to seek a life of simple but refined pleasures for himself and his friends, avoiding entanglement in public affairs. Zeno and the other early Stoics* advocated a life of strict virtue and the cultivation of calm apathy, undisturbed by internal emotions and external calamities. Later Stoics, especially in Roman times, like Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, were less rigid and more humane all men are by nature equal, sparks of the divine fire, children of God and brothers, citizens in an ideal state; class distinctions are artificial and irrational. Ancient Skeptics, in view of the uncertainty of all supposed knowledge, advocated a life in which one should not commit oneself in any avoidable manner. Plotinus and other neo-Platonists found the highest good in mystical absorption in the One, of the Absolute.

Gleams of systematic ethical insight can be found occasionally in the writings of the later ancient church fathers like St. Augustine of events, and finding its criteria and motivation in Hippo*; while the great scholastics of the thirteenth century, notably St. Thomas Aquinas*, incorporated the best of ancient systematic ethics in Christian teaching, and themselves made valuable contributions to ethical theory. However they subordinated ethics to moral theology. Attempts were made by Bruno in the sixteenth century and by Hobbes and Spinoza in the seventeenth, to emancipate ethics from theology, and general recognition of ethics as an independent discipline was finally won in the eighteenth century by the third earl of Shaftesbury, Francis Hutcheson, and other British moralists*. Most but not all of these moralists tended to be empiricists, basing morality upon the observation of psychological processes like natural affections, a moral sense, the desire for pleasure, conscience, immediate intuitions, the association of ideas, and sympathy.

Kant, dissatisfied with British empiricism, thought that ethics must be based on principles as certain and universal in application as mathematics. These he believed that he found in his formulations of the categorical imperative*. Hegel* distrusted subjective intuitions and sought an objective foundation in social institutions,—the family, civil society, the state. Subsequent German moral philosophers have been likely to find a point of departure in either Kant or Hegel, much as they have diverged from them in the elaboration of their own systems. British moral philosophers in the nineteenth century included supporters of Utilitarianism*, Intuitionism*, and neo-Hegelianism,—see Green, T. H.—which last maintained a non-hedonistic moral ideal, known eternally by the Absolute and gradually realized ın human moral progress. French moral philosophers of the last hundred years have often favored positivism e.g., Auguste Comte*, and in different ways, J. M. Guyau, Durkheim*, Levy-Bruhl, G. Belot, and A. Bayet. They reject supernatural and metaphysical sanctions and approach ethics largely from a sociological standpoint.

British moral philosophers of the twentieth century sometimes have mediated between Idealism and Utilitarianism (e.g., Hastings Rashdall*), or reduced ethics to a few unanalyzable intuitions supplemented by empirical generalizations—G. E. Moore in Principia Ethica (1903), and in a quite different manner Sir W. David Ross in Foundations of Ethics (1939)—. Edward Westermarck in England and Finland, and with reservations John Dewey in the United States have supported ethical relativism*. A recent movement, represented in the United States by W. M. Urban, R. B. Perry, et al., seeks to incorporate ethics within systematic treatments of values* in general (axiology). The contemporary German moral philosopher who is now attracting most attention in the United States is Nikolai Hartmann* whose humanistic system is a synthesis of elements derived from Kant, Plato, Aristotle, recent German value theories, and other sources.

This article has discussed systematic ethics, the attempt to evaluate moral judgments and incorporate them into systems. Other fields of ethics to which (the present writer thinks, unfortunately) less attention is now given than a generation ago are: Comparative Ethics, critical investigations of moral judgments in different stages of social evolution, Psychological Ethics, study of mental processes in order to ascertain their function in human conduct; Political and Social Ethics, applications of the conclusions of systematic ethics to contemporary public problems. Work in these last three subjects, so far as i is continued, seems to be passing from philsophy departments to the social sciences. See eudaemonism; happiness; haustafel; mean, Aristotelian; Puritan ethics, seven virtues; social ethics; summum bonum.

J. Dewey and J. H. Tufts, Ethics (1908, rev. ed., 1932) ; H. Rashdall, Theory of Good and Evil, 2 vols. (1907) ; N. Hartmann, Ethics, 3 vols. (1925, Eng. Trans, 1932).   w.k.w.

ethics, Confucian: See Confucianism.

ethics, Christian: The term is employed to designate. 1) the conduct of Christians; 2) statements of principles or rules which are recommended as norms of such conduct; 3) the critical effort, carried on in the Christian community, to discover, systematize and apply moral principles of greatest generality and certainty and to use such principles for the sake of gaining greater consistency and precision in conduct. While descriptions of Christian behavior and injunctions to it abound in Christian literature and while ethics ın the third, critical, sense has been a part of theology from the beginning, the separate study of Christian moral principles is the relatively late development of the modern period, despite some earlier instances such as Abailard's* Scito te ipsum. Such separation, save as it is a limited device used for educational purposes, rests largely on the assumption that moral principles are both more general and more certain than those of religious faith—an assumption which is widely challenged in the twentieth century not only by theology but also by critical secular ethics. Insofar as it is recognized that moral principles in general and those of Christians in particular are dependent upon a pre-ethical acceptance of a final good or goods Christian ethics is seen to be inseparable from theology as secular ethics is understood to be dependent on a "science of values". From this point of view Christian ethics may be defined as that part of Christian theology which deals with the principles of human response to divine action in creation, revelation and redemption. The types, schools and problems of such ethics are not independently analyzable but must be understood with reference to the fundamental theological orientation.

Insofar as the critical study of the Christian moral life can be abstracted from the study of Christian faith it appears that the main problems and schools of Christian ethics parallel those of philosophical ethics in the West. The problem of method (whether ultimate principles are to be sought by means of analysis of value—or of duty-consciousness) has led to the development of both teleological and deontological types of Christian ethics, though the influence of the Hebraic tradition and especially the Christian conception of God makes a deontological element inevitable in even the most pronouncedly teleological theories. In Christian teleology the questions at issue are those of the relative importance of the objective end (e.g., the glory of God) and the subjective end (e.g., the happiness or perfection of man), and of the individual or social character of the latter (theological utilitarianism, the social gospel). The deontological method is used in a positivistic manner by those who regard revelation as disclosure of specific demands and as taking the place of reason. Such moralists regard right Christian conduct as consisting of obedience to the specific injunctions of Scriptures as a whole or in part (the Ten Commandments, the words of Jesus, the Sermon on the Mount). More formal schools reduce the revealed principles to two—love of God and of neighbor—or to one—obedience to the will of God or the law of love. The differences between all schools of thought are modified by common reference to God as both the good and the source of right and to Jesus Christ as the exemplary righteous man. The problem of the knowledge of good and evil, or of right and wrong, has led to the development of more rationalistic schools for whom revelation is fundamentally republication of rational principles, of intuitionist or spiritualist schools, and of positivistic as well as critical revelationism. See revelation, social ethics.

K. E. Kirk, The Vision of God. The Christian Doctrine of the Summum Bonum (London, 1931) ; C. E. Luthardt, History of Christian Ethics (Edinburgh, 1889) ; E. Troeltsch, The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches transl by Olive Wyon, 2 vols (London, 1932); E. Brunner, The Divine Imperative (London, 1937); E Gilson, Moral Values and the Moral Life. The System of Thomas Aquinas (1931).   H.R.N.

ethics, social: See social ethics.

ethnarch: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

ethnology: (Gr., ethnos, race, logos, science) A science that treats of the classification of mankind into races, their origin, distribution, relations, and peculiarities.   F.L.P.

etiology, aetiology: (Gr., aitia, cause) Theory of causes.   C.H.

etiquette: See culture.

Etruscan religion: The Etruscans remain largely enigmatic, as does their religion. Archaeology* and Latin literature supply most of our information. Themselves influenced by the Greeks, the Etruscans helped to transform the Roman animistic religion into an anthropomorphic one, especially during their domination of Rome, introducing their triad, Jupiter, Minerva, and Juno, along with other divinities. Their religion was one of fear, which they likewise transmitted to the Romans, emphasizing meticulous attention to detail in the performance of religious ritual. We know most about two aspects of Etruscan religion, 1) the art of divination*, and 2) their beliefs in the after-life and the rites attached to them. Liver divination is undoubtedly Oriental, reflecting possibly the Lydian origin of the Etruscans who practised it in Italy. They adopted the Orphic-Pythagorean belief in rewards and punishments in the after-life, as shown in tomb paintings from the fourth century B.C. The torturing Devils in Dante's Inferno seem reminiscent of Etruscan tomb paintings at Corneto. Rescue from the torments in the after-life could be effected only by postmortem sacrifices performed by priests. Cf. the Masses for the Dead of the Roman Catholic Church. See prayers for the dead.
 Robert Seymour Conway, Ancient Italy and Modern Religion (Cambridge, 1933); Friedrich Poulsen, Etruscan Tomb Paintings (Oxford, 1922); David Randall-MacIver, The Etruscans (Oxford, 1927).   E.M.N.

eucharist: This is properly the Greek word for "thanksgiving". In the N.T. it is used of prayer in general, which springs out of a sense of thankfulness to God. It is applied more specially to thanks offered before or after a meal. Hence it became the regular term for the Lord's Supper*, at which Christ distributed the elements "when he had given thanks". See agape; arcani disciplina; sacraments.   E.F.S.

eucharistic liturgy: See liturgy; missa.

eucharistic sacrifice: See mass, Roman Catholic.

Eucken, Rudolf: (1846-1926) Professor of philosophy at Jena, winner of the Nobel prize for literature in 1908. Eucken was a prolific writer on philosophical subjects but is known more for his personal influence as a teacher than for the originality of his thought. His philosophy was an "activism" which accepted Kant's moral rigorism while rejecting his skepticism and consistently emphasized both the reality of spiritual values and the need of realizing them practically in human life. His thought affected the early work of Max Scheler*. His influence continues in the "Euckenbund" and the periodical Die Tatwelt (Jena). See Fichte.

 Main Works in English: The Problem of Human Life (1909); The Life of the Spirit (1909). See W. R. Boyce Gibson: Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy of Life (1907).   J.S.B.

Eu-chites or Euchetes: 1) Also known as Messalians (praying people). Acc. Epiphanius date from reign of Constantius (337-361) a mystical cult in Syria and Mesopotamia, with strange exorcist practices. Their mystical technique similar to Muslim mystical practices. Male and female votaries. Attacked by Flavian of Antioch and at a Council of Side. Called Enthusiasts by Theodoret*.
 2) A recrudescence of the earlier form with Manichaean elements in the 10th and 11th centuries.   F.W.B.

eudaemonism: (From Gr. eudaimonia, happiness, well-being) The theory, first propounded by Aristotle*, that the aim of the good life is happiness* or well-being. For Aristotle happiness is the life of highest excellence. The term is often confused with hedonism* by later writers.   J.E.N.

Eunomianism: Sect holding Anomoean* (extreme Arian) views, named after Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicus, who established a separate organization at Constantinople. Did not long survive his death (c. 393).   K.H.C.

eunuch: A male who has been castrated. In the religious practice of various Semitic peoples, close neighbors of the Israelites, eunuchs played a peculiar role as devotees of the mother-goddess*. Chiefly for this reason, no doubt, they were formally disqualified from membership in the Jewish community and participation in Judaism (Deut. 23.2). However, an anonymous prophet, at about 500 B.C., took up the cudgels for them in this respect (Isa. 56. 3-7), but apparently to no avail. See Skoptsy.   J.M.

Eusebius of Caesarea: (A.D. c. 263-c. 340) Premier church historian, eminent scholar and Christian apologist, influential ecclesiastical statesman—Bishop of Caesarea, "head of Judea", for a quarter of a century. The character of Eusebius has puzzled modern historians and remains a matter of dispute. The same is true of his precise doctrinal standpoint. What is certain is that he was a second generation Origenist, that he was a staunch adherent of the philosophical Logos-theology, that he was sympathetic with Arius in the latter's dispute with the Bishop of Alexandria, and that he was embarrassed by the final recension of his Caesarean creed adopted at Nicea. Later also Eusebius sided actively with the Arian* faction against Eustathius, Athanasius*, and Marcellus* "his acts", wrote Neuman, "are his confession."

The great work of Eusebius' life was the preparation of the Ecclesiastical History, published in 324 or 325. When all criticisms are registered, it remains true that Eusebius after St. Luke is the pioneer in this field. Of the other volumes published by Eusebius, which according to Jerome were "innumerable", the most important among those extant are the Chronicle, Preparatio evangelica, Demonstratio evangelica, Contra Marcellum, De theologia ecclesiastica, and Commentaries on the Psalms and Isaiah.

J. P. Migne, ed. Patrologia Graeco (161 vols); Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, 2nd Series, I; Stein, Eusebius Bischof von Caesarea (Wurzburg, 1859); arts. Dict. Chr. Biog. and Ency. Brit. (11th ed); standard histories of doctrine and of Christian literature.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　C.W.L.

Eusebius, bp. of Nicomedia: (d. A D. 342?) Leader of the Arianizing party from 325 (Nicea) till his death. A "fellow-disciple" with Arius of Lucian of Antioch, Eusebius never deviated from radically Arian views*. He was, however, more of a politician than a theologian. He signed the Creed of 325 against his convictions and thereafter gained an influential position in the royal household. He is believed to have been the baptizer of the emperor Constantine as the latter was dying.　　　　　　　　　　　C.W.L.

Eutyches: Archimandrite* of a monastery outside Constantinople in the first half of the fifth century, was a devoted disciple of Cyril of Alexandria*. He interpreted the teaching regarding the natures of Christ in such a manner as to deny the two natures in Jesus Christ—the human and divine—affirming that after the incarnation He possessed only the divine nature. At a council held by Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople, Eutyches' teaching was condemned, and he himself deposed and excommunicated. But this sentence was interpreted by Dioscurus, Patriarch of Alexandria and successor of Cyril, to impugn the orthodoxy of the latter. The controversy which ensued led to the calling of the Second Council of Ephesus (449) at which Dioscurus by sheer physical violence annulled the excommunication of Eutyches (Pope Leo called it the Robber Council and refused to recognize it as legal—See Ephesus, Robber Synod of). In turn this led to the calling of the Council of Chalcedon* (451) which decided the controversial question by ruling that Jesus Christ possessed two natures in one person, and condemning both Eutyches and Nestorius alike, while approving Cyril of Alexandria. Dioscurus was deposed, but his Egyptian church rallied about him and repudiated the Chalcedonian decision. Thus the Egyptian church, along with the Ethiopian, adopted monophysitism* (the doctrine of one nature in Christ, the divine) as its creed, and drifted into a permanent schism with the Orthodox (i.e., the Chalcedonian, Imperial) church. In this they were followed by the patriarchates of Jerusalem and Antioch. The Arab Mohammedan conquests of Syria, Palestine, and Egypt made the monophysite schism permanent. See Christology.

J. B. Kidd, The Churches of Eastern Christendom (London, n d.); Arthur A Luce, Monophysitism, past and present (London, 1920)　　　　　M.S. evangelical: (Derived from the Greek word euaggelion meaning "gospel" or "good news") That which pertains to the gospel* is evangelical. Since the Reformation considered itself a return to the Bible, the word came to be used in Germany and Switzerland as a contrast to Roman Catholic. In England it is roughly synonymous to "low church". It is currently used for those expressions of Christianity which stress the need for atonement for sin and the rebirth of the individual.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　C.T.C.

Evangelical Church, the: The Evangelical Church was begun in Pennsylvania in 1800 by Jacob Albright (1759-1808) (then Albrecht), a son of German immigrant parents and a member of the Lutheran Church who was religiously reborn under the preaching of pietistic Reformed ministers and joined the Methodist Church. Sensing a real need for evangelical preaching among his fellow German-Americans, Albrecht left the Methodist Church, which offered little to the Germans, organized his three classes in 1800 in eastern Pennsylvania and by the time of his death in 1808 had won several hundred followers and had begun a Discipline—a Book of Rules and Order—which was completed by Rev. George Miller (1774-1816) and published in 1809 in Reading, Pa. John Dreisbach (1789-1871) was the first presiding elder and founded Evangelical Press at New Berlin, Pa. in 1817.

The Evangelical Church spread westward, catering almost exclusively to German speaking people for fifty years, and now has expanded to the Pacific. In 1850 a mission was begun in Germany in 1875 in Japan, and in 1900 in China. Other missions are located in Africa, among the mountaineers of Kentucky and among the Italians in Wisconsin. Three colleges and two theological seminaries* are maintained in the United States.

A division in the Church in 1891-4 led to the beginning of the United Evangelical Church which reunited in 1922 to form the present body of about 250,000 members in the United States and Canada and about 30,000 on the mission fields. Negotiations have been practically completed for the merging of the Evangelical Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ* (a similar contemporary group of Reformed and Mennonite background, William Otterbein and Martin Boehm founders in 1800) which may occur by 1946. Both groups are Arminian* in theology and have a modified episcopal form of government. See Ev. Congregational Church.

R. W. Albright, A History of the Evangelical Church (1942).　　　　　　　　　R.W.A.

Evangelical and Reformed Church, the: See s. v. Reformed Church in the U. S.

Evangelical Congregational Church: A sect (formerly a part of the United Evangelical Church) tracing back to the evangelistic work of Jacob Albright* in Pennsylvania, a Methodist preacher who evangelized among the Germans and became the founder of the Evangelical Association. The United Evangelical Church branched off in 1894. A reunion was effected in 1922, but the East Pennsylvania Conference remained apart and became the Evangelical Congregational Church. It is a Methodistic body with no distinctive doctrines or principles.

E.T.C.

Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America, The:

An immigrant population in America deeply influenced by the revivals in Sweden and conditions in the churches of the Swedish Mission organized in 1878 would naturally seek to found a similar church in America. After unsatisfactory affiliations, representatives from Swedish Mission Churches met in Chicago in 1885 and organized the Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant of America. In the rapid process of assimilation, the name has been changed to the Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America. The Year Book of 1941 reports 453 affiliated churches comprising a membership of 46,617 in 30 states and Canada.

In church polity the Covenant seeks to combine Congregational and Presbyterian principles. The local church has complete freedom. This freedom, however, is voluntarily cooperative in the 13 Conference Meetings and the Annual Conference to which the churches send delegates whose decisions control matters such as license and ordination, the missionary enterprise in Alaska, China, and Africa, and the larger policies of Covenant institutions.

Two schools are maintained by the Covenant: North Park College and Theological Seminary in Chicago, and Minnehaha Academy in Minneapolis. In addition, the Covenant and its Conferences operate two hospitals, eight homes for the aged, two orphanages, and two sailor's homes.

Theologically the denomination has its deepest roots in the Lutheran tradition. But inasmuch as there is deliberately no specific creed, and educationally the historical approach to theology is encouraged, a considerable variety of conservative theological opinion exists. Clergy and people unanimously approve the general theological principles as formulated by the president of the Covenant, Theodore W. Anderson, in Covenant Memories, 1935: the supremacy of the bible; the necessity of spiritual life, belief in the unity of all true Christians; the autonomy of the local church, and, the urgency of the missionary task.

Headquarters: 1005 Belmont Avenue, Chicago, Illinois. See Waldenstrom, Paul Peter.

The Covenant Weekly; David Nyvall, The Swedish Covenanters (1930); George M. Stephenson, The Religious Aspects of Swedish Immigration (1932); Leland H. Carlson, A History of North Park College (1941).

E.G.H.

Evangelical Union:

This organization was founded in 1843 by James Morison who with three other ministers had been expelled from the Evangelical Synod of Scotland because of their dissent from its Calvinistic doctrines. They founded an independent denomination with each church complete in itself. They founded a theological academy with Morison at its head and established an annual Conference. Their energetic measures gathered a considerable membership and their periodicals had a wide circulation. They became pioneers in the temperance movement in Scotland and no liquor dealer was allowed in their membership. In 1896 they were merged with the Congregational Union of Scotland.

Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, v. 4, p. 224.

F.T.P.

evangelicalism and evangelical revival:

The term "evangelical" refers to the Evangel or Gospel and has a long history. In the Synodical Letter of A.D. 382, sent by the Eastern Bishops to those assembled at Rome, which contains the first full-fledged theological statement of the doctrine of the Trinity*, the "evangelical faith" is spoken of as that for which persecutions have been endured and as having been "ratified by the 318 fathers at Nicea." In Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic tradition "Evangelical" commonly refers to the imitation of Christ according to the counsels of perfection set forth in of Europe "evangelical" is a usual designation for the Churches of the Reformation. In English the Gospels. In Germany and adjacent sections however the term "evangelical" refers to the position and emphasis of the movement known as the Evangelical Revival, which began in the third decade of the eighteenth century and had a continuous history for over a century. The precursors of Evangelicalism were Moravianism, Pietism, and Cocceianism* or Federalism (in Holland), in theology it represented a return to the doctrines of the Reformation, in ethics and conception of the Christian life it was largely influenced by the High Anglican ascetic William Law.

The founders of Evangelicalism were Charles and John Wesley and George Whitefield. The movement arose within the Church of England, its first phase being the "Holy Club" started by Charles Wesley at Oxford and presided over by John Wesley upon his return from Epworth to Oxford in 1729. Methodism as a term of designation dates from this phase, though the theology of the first Oxford Movement was Anglican of the right-wing High Church variety and its devotional and liturgical practices were those of the primitive Church. The Evangelical element was the serious and strenuous imitation of the life of Jesus Christ as urged with brilliant persistence and stirring effect by William Law. It was only after John Wesley's experience of disillusionment and failure as a Missionary and Parish Priest in Georgia, and after his return to England in 1738, that Evangelicalism emerged as at once a saving doctrine of Justification* by faith alone and a consciously felt experience of God's saving power. The media here were the writings of Luther and the example and personal direction of the Moravians*. Whitefield's partly independent experience of the New Birth and discovery of power in preaching deserve mention as a distinct factor in the total complex of the Revival. Likewise his Calvinism exerted a strong influence upon the so-called Anglican Evangelicals*. The doctrine of the Wesleys in contrast remained definitely Arminian*. This divergence in theology together with the foundation and remarkable growth of the "United Societies", which were patterned on the old Religious Societies of the Church of England but were organized and governed largely by John Wesley himself, was a potent factor in the independent establishment eventually of Methodism. Equally important, though by no means the sole element making for separation, was the latitudinarian apathy of the English Bishops.

The Evangelical Revival was eminently a preaching revival. This preaching, which was primarily of the Gospel of God's saving grace and power against a background of His judgment upon all sin and unrighteousness, was of three kinds: Parochial, Field, and Society. Parochial preaching met opposition but continued and developed into what may be called Anglican Evangelicalism. Whitefield was the pioneer and great exemplar of 'field preaching, in which however the Wesleys early joined him. It was in the meetings of the Religious Societies, a well established institution of the Church of England of which Samuel Wesley of Epworth had been a patron and advocate, that the marked conversion phenomena of the Revival were first manifest. The Revival spread rapidly, meeting an astonishing response in the hearts and lives of the masses of the British people, and is commonly credited by historians as having averted a counterpart of the French Revolution. For its sociological results see evangelicals, Anglican. See also Law, William; Methodism; Wesley, Charles and John; Whitefield, George; Zinzendorf, Nicolaus. Cf. Pietism; Pietistic sects in America.

George R. Balleine, History of the Evangelical Party in the Church of England (1908); Leonard Elliott-Binns, Evangelical Movement in the English Church (1928); W. E. H. Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century (1882-91); John H. Overton, Evangelical Revival in the Eighteenth Century (1886); James Stephen, Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography (1849); Leslie Stephen, History of English Religious Thought in the Eighteenth Century (2 vols., 1876).   C.W.L.

evangelicals, Anglican: The English use of the word for those who preach the gospel of personal conversion as the heart of religion dates from c. 1750. Modern English-speaking Evangelicalism in general derives from the religious revival of that period. In England Evangelicals were distinguished from Methodists* by their loyalty to the parochial system of the Church; most of them in the early period were Calvinist in theology. After 1790 they acquired more cohesion around two centers—Clapham near London, where a group of active laymen lived, and Cambridge University, where Charles Simeon (died 1836) was their leader. The chief writings of the Evangelicals were sermons, commentaries, devotional works, and hymns, their chief practical achievements were in the field of missions (the Church Missionary Society, founded 1799, soon became and has remained the largest Anglican Society) and reforms related to personal morality—Wilberforce leading the anti-slavery movement and Shaftesbury that for factory reform. After 1840 the Evangelicals were for a while largely absorbed in controversies—against ritualism*, evolution, and higher criticism, but from about 1880 their traditional interest in missions and personal religion again became central. In the present century there has been a Liberal Evangelical movement, endeavoring to combine the religious emphasis of evangelicalism with freedom of thought and dignity in worship. In reaction the strict conservatives, finding the standards of the C. M. S lax, organized in the early 1920's the Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society, based on the inerrancy of Scripture as a fundamental of the faith. But this group, though well supported, is only a fragment of the Evangelicals, whose chief influence is probably in the emphasis on personal devotion and conduct common to all forms of English religion. See Church of England.

L. E. Binns, The Evangelical Movement in the English Church (1928); C. Smyth, Simeon and Church Order (1940).   E R.H.

Evangelistic Associations: A group of sects so classified by the census because, while virtually denominations, "they are dominated by the evangelistic conception rather than by doctrinal or ecclesiastical distinctions." Some object to the designation of denomination. Many have holiness leanings and are Methodist in character. See under the headings: Apostolic Christian Church; Apostolic Christian Church (Nazarean); Apostolic Faith Mission; Christian Congregation, Church of Daniel's Band; Church of God (Apostolic); Church of God as Organized by Christ; Hepzibah Faith Missionary Association, Metropolitan Church Association; Missionary Bands of the World, Pillar of Fire. See holiness churches.

E.T.C.

evangelization propaganda: See religious tract movement in the U. S.

evensong: An English name for vespers,* the sixth of the seven canonical hours, applied since the Reformation to the Anglican office of Evening Prayer which is derived from vespers and compline*. See divine office, matins.   T.J.B.

Everyman: See religious drama.

evil: (A.S. yfel; Ger., übel) Antithesis of good or value*, disvalue, whatever is harmful, painful, or undesirable, or disapproved; what is contrary to any purpose (dysteleological) or ideal, especially to the moral or to the religious. Moral evil is called wrong and religious evil, sin*.

I. Types of evil. Evil is chiefly a relative term, its meaning being dependent on the kind of good which it negates or excludes. We must, however, distinguish between instrumental and intrinsic evil (see Value), there are states of pain and misery which are evil in and of themselves, whether they hinder or promote the good. Evils are usually, but oversimply, classified as moral (voluntary) and natural (independent of human volition). More concretely, we may list 1) evil will (wrong, sin), 2) intellectual evil (ignorance, error); 3) aesthetic evil (ugliness), 4) religious evil (irreverence, blasphemy), 5) maladjustment (psychological, biological, social), 6) incompetence, 7) surd evil (evil of any sort in which there is no principle of improvement, its only function is to be endured, rejected, conquered, or passed by).

II. Problem of evil. Problems arise from the presence of contradictions or incoherencies in experience. Good and evil seem to be contradictory. The problem is: How can we think the real in such a way as to account for its seemingly contradictory manifestations of good and evil? James's question, "Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter?" may be asked of the universe. The need for a coherent explanation of good and evil exists for every thinker, whether he be theistic or not.

III. Theodicy. (Gr., theos, God, dikē, justice) This is the attempt to "justify the ways of God to man," that is, to solve the problem of evil in the light of faith in the love and justice of God. The problem of evil is obviously more acute for theism* than for any other type of philosophy or theology, if it cannot be solved, theism must be abandoned, retained by faith in hope of a future, as yet unattainable, solution, or held as a truth above reason (or a credo quia absurdum).

IV. The apparent insolubility of the problem. Many hold that the origin and explanation of evils are a mystery hidden in the divine counsels and impossible for man to solve. They point to the climactic words of Job, "I am vile . . . I will lay my hand upon my mouth . . . I abhor myself and repent," overlooking Jehovah's endorsement of Job's arguments against the 'comforters', "Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath." The tendency to treat the problem as insoluble arises from agnosticism, from humility (the fallacious belief that reason is essentially proud), from the belief that a practical solution suffices (oppose evil!), and from the variety of proposed solutions. Yet the same arguments which declare this problem insoluble would readily lead to atheism*. Most thinkers are challenged by difficulties, rather than being led to abandon search for truth. Those realists and naturalists who hold that the universe is indifferent to good and evil (neutral), offer their neutralism as evidence that the problem is artificial; but their neutralism leaves wide areas of experience (values) irrelevant to reality.

V. Proposed solutions. 1) Moral evil (sin) is explained by human freedom; this is accepted by most theists as a reasonable explanation, thus leaving natural (nonmoral, nonvoluntary) evil as the seat of the chief problem. 2) All natural evils are a product of freedom. Macintosh, on a panpsychistic basis, has suggested that natural evil is explicable as due to the free choices of the monads constituting nature, but it must be pointed out that the effects of these free choices on man is most unjust, and that God is responsible for creating beings capable of producing such evils. 3) Nonmoral evils are a deserved punishment for Adam's (or man's) sin This (still popular) theory of Genesis and of Theosophists is rejected by Job and by Jesus (Jn. 9.3), and is refuted by the obvious lack of correlation between sin and suffering. 4) Nonmoral evils are disciplinary. Their purpose is to refine, to develop strength, to teach man energy and dependence on God. This is logically and morally conceivable (if the use of nonmoral evil as a means to moral good is justifiable), but the frequent failure of evil to effect discipline and its maladaptation to that end raise questions. 5) Evil is incomplete good. This theory, often advanced in absolute idealism*, has much basis in experience. Part of a painting, or a character, may be offensive, whereas the whole is good. Yet from incompleteness alone the goodness of the complete cannot be inferred; some apparent goods are parts of an evil whole. The view proposed may be granted only partial validity. 6) Evil is said to be needed as a contrast to good. Variety is itself good. This aesthetic principle is destructive when applied to moral values. It is not necessary to sin in order to enjoy virtue any more than it is necessary to eat a rotten apple in order to enjoy a ripe one. Further, there is more evil than is needed for effective contrast. 7) What is evil for man may be good for other beings in the universe. This argument is a sound rebuke to human pride and to undue anthropocentrism, but it does not explain why God has to give man earthquakes, alcohol, insanity, and cancer in order to benefit superhuman or subhuman beings. Why could not our good also be their good? 8) All evils serve an unknown good. This is conceivable, but how do we know that the unknown is good? Does the unknown good make the known evils less evil for man? 9) Evil is illusory. This view is held by some Buddhists, Hindus, Christian Scientists, and others. Evil is "maya," "error of mortal mind." However, the illusion somehow exists, and belief that the illusion is evil is itself an unexplained evil. 10) Nonmoral evils are a result of factors in the universe which limit God's power. For a discussion of this solution, which is the most popular explanation of surd evil today (other than the traditional views mentioned in 3), 4), and 8), see finite God. See also Hume, wrath of God.

F. C. S. Schiller, Riddles of the Sphinx (1891, 1910); J. Royce, Studies of Good and Evil 1898); F. R. Tennant, The Origin and Propagation of Sin (1902); O. Lempp, Das Problem der Theodizee (1910); W. D. Niven, art. "Good and Evil" in ERE, VI (1914); E. S. Brightman, The Finding of God (1931); W. Monod, Le problème du Bien (3 vols, 1934); N. Berdyaev, Spirit and Reality (tr, 1939); Vergilius Ferm, First Chapters in Religious Philosophy (1937), section "Evil and Theodicy," pp. 145-174.   E S.B.

evil spirits, warding off of: See exorcism; spirits.

Evodius or Euodios: The predecessor of Ignatius* in the episcopal chair of Antioch. He is referred to by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History as the first bishop of the city. If St. Peter be regarded as the first bishop of Antioch, Evodius would then be the second. As such he was among the earliest monarchical bishops* anywhere.   M.S.

evolution: A term which denotes a process of orderly change from a simple toward a more complex state. In accurate usage it is restricted to processes which exhibit the characteristics of organic unity and growth. The three areas in which the concept is used are as follows. 1) In biology it refers primarily to the transformation of one species into another. It may also be' used to designate the process of growth within a species or within a biological individual. 2) In sociology and anthropology the term denotes the modification of human institutions and ideas when this process is considered as taking place according to a law which involves orderly change from simplicity to complexity, 3) in metaphysics the term is applied to the cosmic process in those philosophies which regard the universe itself as exhibiting a pattern of growth.

Biologists are practically unanimously agreed as to the fact of evolution in the course of life on this earth. The unsolved problems, from the standpoint of scientific theory, are related to the question of what factors and forces are to be regarded as operative in evolution. Various theories still are held on this point. 1) Following Charles Darwin* one school holds that the central factor in evolution is the natural selection of variations which aid in the struggle for survival. Modern Darwinians have developed this conception through the further analysis of the types of modifications which tend to be selected. In this connection new knowledge concerning mutations, modifications in the hereditary factors, is of prime importance. 2) Another school, following J. B. Lamarck, holds that modifications which occur during the life of an organism may be transmitted to its descendents. Neo-Lamarckians have attempted to show that the activities of the organism modify its structure; and that such modifications can be inherited. Others in this school have held that a psychic factor must be operative in inheritance, and have thus explained the inheritance of acquired characteristics. Evidence adequate to support the Lamarckian hypothesis has yet to be produced in the opinion of many competent biologists. 3) The theory of orthogenesis presupposes a developmental principle or factor at work within the biological species itself which brings about the evolutionary changes. The work of contemporary biology is laying stress upon detailed research and experiment in the many aspects of life including those studied in morphology, heredity, and ecology.

The conception of evolution has been applied to the development of human institutions by a school of cultural anthropologists who presuppose a fundamental unity in human nature and interpret the process of human culture as a gradual progress toward more complex and higher forms. This pattern is used to interpret also the development of particular elements in culture*, such as religion. Contemporary anthropology is less willing to generalize any one pattern of the history of human culture, and is inclined to reject the uniformitarian and deterministic assumptions which the older view involved. The social Darwinists should be noted as having tried to apply to human culture the biological laws which Darwin formulated as explaining the process of evolution. Thus Bagehot, Gumplowicz, and others interpreted human institutions in terms of the struggle of groups for survival.

Most modern philosophies have attempted to incorporate the notion of evolution into metaphysics. One influential school of "emergent evolutionists" has interpreted the cosmic process in terms of the emergence of new and unique orders of being out of previously existing orders. See cosmogonies.

On the theory of evolution see Bavink, The Natural Sciences (Eng. tr. of the 4th ed., 1932), Parts 3 and 4; Joseph Needham, article "Evolution" in the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (1930); Julian Huxley, Evolution, the Modern Synthesis (1943). For criticism of Darwinism see S Butler, Unconscious Memory (3rd ed, 1920). For the theory of emergent evolution see C. Lloyd Morgan, Life, Mind, and Spirit (1926); and S. Alexander, Space, Time and Deity (London, 1920) For general criticism of the doctrine of evolution see L T. More, The Dogma of Evolution (Princeton, 1925). For discussion of the evolutionary concept in anthropology see Alexander Goldenweiser, Anthropology (1937), chapters 30 and 31. For a general survey, see "The Idea of Evolution," Chap. XV in V. Ferm, First Adventures in Philosophy (1936).   D.D.W.

evolution, the controversy over: The theory of biological evolution, which was given its first adequate scientific defense by Charles Darwin* and Alfred Russell Wallace, precipitated a controversy in religious thought which involved questions concerning the nature of the Christian revelation and the re-statement of the Christian world view. Specifically, the theory of the evolution of species challenged the accepted religious doctrine of special creation*, which was claimed to be founded on the Scriptures. Thus the problem was posed of how the scriptural record is to be understood in relation to scientific knowledge. Further, the Darwinian theory that natural selection is the operative factor in evolution raised metaphysical issues concerning the ultimate cause or causes in the universe and forced a reconsideration of the traditional arguments for the existence of God, particularly the argument from design.

For a period of about fifteen years after the publication of On the Origin of Species in 1859, the reception accorded the new theory by theologians varied from cautious acceptance on the part of a few to a wider-spread rejection and denunciation. In the early 1870's the controversy became sharpened and a division developed in Protestant thought between those who denounced Darwinism as atheism and those who took biological evolution as an established fact and who were beginning to revise theological conceptions in order to incorporate the new knowledge. Many cultural factors contributed to the varieties of reaction. A militant fundamentalist* movement holding to a world view based upon a literal interpretation of the Scripture over against all scientific theories emerged from the reaction against Darwinism. On the other side theologians like George Harris and Lyman Abbott, and religious philosophers like John Fiske* interpreted evolution as God's method of creation. These thinkers also accepted the theory of historical development as the basis for interpreting revelation in the Scriptures and for understanding the history of the Christian movement and its thought.

The Roman Catholic Church avoided in large part an open rupture over evolution, though it had its own modernist² movement to contend with. The church kept itself from any open break either with science or with its own teaching by refraining from pronouncing for or against the theory, by holding to the church's right to interpret the Scriptures, and by holding to its own doctrine regarding the nature of man. A Catholic biologist, St. George Jackson Mivart, defended the theory of biological evolution in his Genesis of Species (1871). Catholic apologists now hold that the church can accept any scientifically established theory of biological development, always with the provision that the church's teaching concerning the supernatural and special creation of the human soul is not denied.

For the evolutionary controversy in America see B. J. Lowenberg, "Evolution in New England, 1859-1873," The New England Quarterly, Vol. VIII, 1935, No. 2; F. H. Foster, The Modern Movement in American Theology (1939). On the Roman Catholic reaction see W. M Agar, Catholicism and the Progress of Science (1940), Henri de Dordolot, Darwinism and Catholic Thought (1923). D.D.W.

Ewald, Georg Heinrich August von: (1803-1875) German Orientalist, Hebraist, biblical critic and historian; popularizer of the Development Hypothesis of O.T. growth, writer of the first great modern introduction to the O.T.

              R.E.W.

exaltation of Christ: The glorification of Christ in His Transfiguration, Resurrection, and Ascension, whereby He manifested His divinity, as opposed to His humiliation* at the instant of the Incarnation*, in which He concealed His divinity by assuming a human nature, and His obedience unto death for our salvation. The doctrine is strikingly outlined by St. Paul in Phil. 2:5-11.   C.V.

exarch: An ecclesiastical title in use among the Eastern Orthodox communions, which corresponds in general to the Western terms of apostolic vicar or primate. Originally it designated the office of a metropolitan* of such important sees which were more than metropolitanates but yet failed to attain the rank of patriarchates*. In the usage of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, the exarch has jurisdiction over the Bulgarians outside the boundaries of the tsardom. The primate of Georgia also bears the title of exarch. M.S.

ex cathedra: (Lat. "from the chair") A technical term employed by the Roman Catholic Church in connection with the infallibility* of the Pope*. According to the Vatican Council*, the Roman Pontiff is by divine assistance infallible when he teaches ex cathedra, that is, "when in the discharge of his office as pastor and teacher of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals, to be held by the universal Church." See chair of St. Peter. C.V.

excommunication: Partial or total exclusion, whether temporary or permanent, from a religious body. Such exclusion involves a privation of civil rights wherever participation in the religious fellowship is prerequisite to the exercise of the privileges of citizenship.

Among the Biblical passages which are cited in support of a doctrinal basis for excommunication are the following Ezra 10.8, Matt. 16:19, 18 15-18, Rom. 16 17; 1 Cor. 5 3-5, 11, 13; Eph. 5 11, 2 Thess. 3.6, 14, 1 Tim. 1 20, 5:20-21; Tit. 3 10, 2 Jn. 10, 11.

Excommunicates are grouped by the R. C. Church as vitandi and tolerati. The former group consists of those whom the Holy See has expressly excommunicated by name as persons to be specially shunned in religious matters and so far as possible in secular matters. Other excommunicates are tolerati.

Some groups of Protestantism place all responsibility for final disciplinary action in the assembled Church body; others delegate the responsibility for such action and the revision of membership roles to a Church council or committee. See apostasy, ban; sin. H.W.J.

exegesis: "Exegesis" is the transliteration of the Gr., exegesis, which could mean "narrative," "translation" or "interpretation." It is in the last sense that the noun is used in theology; "exegesis" is "interpretation," more particularly and usually "interpretation of Scripture." In technical parlance the word describes the actual interpretation of a concrete passage, while the general principles of Biblical interpretation are classed together as "hermeneutics"*.

In the O.T. period the official interpreters of the Law (see law, Hebrew) were the priests (Hag. 2.10-13), who in the "intermediate" and N.T. periods were succeeded by the scribes*; especially the scribes belonging to the Pharisaic* party, who alone continued after A.D. 70. Their hermeneutic principle maintained that the Law, being divine, foresaw all possible problems and so by fresh interpretation could be indefinitely expanded; the theory that produced the overwhelming luxuriance of Talmudic* Judaism. And this method was aided by allegory*, Greek in origin but adopted by the Jews before the Christian era, which sought for a "spiritual" sense underlying Scripture, Philo of Alexandria* exhibits the lengths to which allegory could be carried. The first Christian exegesis followed the contemporary precedents unquestioningly (1 Cor. 9 9-10; Gal. 4 21-31, etc.), and allegory in the second century reached fantastic heights, controlled only by insistence that "orthodox" theology must not be violated. The immense authority of Origen* virtually canonized the allegorical method, despite protests from the Antiochean school* and elsewhere, and its more extreme votaries disregarded the "literal" sense altogether. More usually, however, the literal sense* was supplemented by the "higher" senses, which in the scholastic age were usually fixed as three: "allegorical" (doctrinal or devotional), "moral" and "anagogical"* (describing the future life). With the Reformation the idea of a multiple sense of Scripture was less regarded but Protestants and Catholics alike continued to demand correspondence with accepted doctrinal formularies from exegetes. A true historical exegesis was not possible until the growth of a true historical consciousness in theology generally and in its major development belongs to the nineteenth century.

In contemporary Biblical study attempts to erect hermeneutics into a formal discipline have been largely abandoned. Correct exegesis is the final aim of all historical Biblical endeavor and to it all other fields of Biblical research contribute: textual criticism, to determine the precise wording of the passage to be interpreted; lexicography*, to assure correct translation of the words employed, Hebrew or Hellenistic Greek grammar, to determine the relation of these words to one another; historical criticism, to establish the authorship and historical setting of the passage; together with all possible further aids gained from archaeology*, historical geography, contemporary history, form criticism*, etc. Conversely a better exegetical alternative may react on the contributing fields to decide between textual, lexical, grammatical, historical and other possibilities. So a subjective element is always present. Biblical exegesis demands from its practitioners not only sound historical knowledge but fine religious and literary sensitivity as well; really eminent exegetes are as rare as really eminent figures in any other form of human endeavor.

Competence, however, can be attained by capable and sincere students who are adequately equipped in the contributing fields. The sole question to be answered is, "How did the writer expect his first readers to understand his words?" The simplest answer is usually therefore the best. And, generally speaking, this answer is to be deduced solely from the passage itself. Harmonizing with other Biblical passages is to be avoided unless from the same author, and even in this case harmonizing must be used very cautiously. And the utility of an interpretation for modern doctrinal, ethical and devotional purposes must never weigh with exegetes, who are concerned only with what the words meant when written, not with what we should like to have them mean today   See Biblical criticism, interpretation, senses of Scripture, types.   B S E.

exegetical preaching: Preaching based on sound exegesis* of a Biblical text or (more usually) passage, in which the historical sense is explained before a modern application is sought   B.S E.

exemplum: An anecdote, drawn from history, legend, or fictitious natural history, to enforce moral lesson of medieval sermon. Collections of exempla for preachers were common.   E.C.K.

exile: See Judaism, pre-exile, post-exilic.

existentia: (Lat. ex, out of, and stare, to stand) That by which a thing is or is constituted in the order of actuality.   L R.W.

existentialism: Psychology. see psychology, schools of. Phil. and Theol.: see Kierkegaard, S , Barth, K ; Heidegger, M., Jaspers, K.

ex nihilo: See cosmogonies; creation.

Exodus: The second book of the O.T., containing the account of the oppression of the Israelites in Egypt and their exodus from that land and journey to Mt. Sinai under the leadership of Moses (chapters 1-18); and the account of various events at Mt. Sinai, including the making of the covenant and the promulgation of certain laws (chapters 19-40). Although Moses* is traditionally considered as the author, it is a composite work by J E and P. Chapters 25-31, 35-40 are exclusively P material, the rest of the book is a combination of the three sources   Exodus is of special interest for its record of the revelation of Yahweh to Moses (ch. 3 JE, 6 2-13 P), and of the giving of the Ten Commandments. The ethical decalogue* is found in chapter 20, usually attributed to E, but a "ritual decalogue" was discovered by Goethe in chapter 34, and many scholars have maintained that this was the original Mosaic decalogue. This is improbable, since the prescriptions of this chapter are applicable almost exclusively to a settled agrarian society, if Moses did not give the familiar Ten Commandments of chapter 20 (in a shorter form, with restricted application), we do not know what laws he gave   The date of the exodus has been the subject of extensive debate. No theory has been advanced which fits all the archaeological and Biblical data, but a date in the thirteenth century B.C. seems most satisfactory in view of the archaeological evidence.

A. H. McNeile, The Book of Exodus (Westminster Comm., 1908) ; G. E. Wright, "Epic of Conquest," The Biblical Archaeologist, Vol. III, No. 3, Sept. 1940.   J.P.H.

exogamy: A social practice in which marriage* between members of one's own group is prohibited. In the definition of what constitutes one's own group customs vary widely. Universally, however, marriage is prohibited between parent and child, brother and sister. Cousin marriage is also widely prohibited. The group within which marriage is tabooed is most commonly that defined by common descent, but among many preliterate peoples there are many variations in which persons biologically unrelated are forbidden to marry and in other instances certain biologically related persons are eligible as marriage partners. Compare with endogamy.   E.R.M.

ex opere operato: A term used to indicate the R. C. teaching that the objectively administered N.T. sacraments do not depend for their primary effect upon subjective factors whether in minister or recipient, but are effectual of themselves conferring grace* "from the work wrought" (ex opere operato) providing that the recipient place no obstacle in the way. See opus operatum, sacraments.   H.W J.

exorcism: (Gr. exorkizo, to bind with an oath, to adjure, to exorcise) Exorcism expressly denotes the expulsion of malevolent spirits* or demons* from possessed persons (or from objects and places) by the utterance of an adjuration (or exorcism) in which the aid of more powerful spirits or deities, usually invoked by name, is sought. A possessed person exorcised in this way is presumedly freed from sickness, sin, uncleanness, death, or some other evil caused by the presence of these malevolent spirits. Various formulas, singly and in combination, with and without the invocation of the "name," came into use, among them entreaties, prayers; threats, maledictions, commands, quotations from sacred writings; and magical words of all kinds. Also, through further extension of its meaning, exorcism comprises any overt act or combination of acts, performed with or without a spoken formula, by which evil spirits are expelled. These include such techniques as flagellation; the application of various substances; the production of hideous sounds and foul odors, the offering of sacrifices, the making of some sign or gesture, and the use of charms, amulets, and phylacteries. Exorcism also came to refer to those preventive techniques performed to repel or ward off evil spirits. Almost universally practiced in primitive religions*, with the medicine man, shaman, or priest as the exorcist, exorcism has likewise had an important place in higher religions, including Christianity. In order to demonstrate the power of Jesus over Satan the Synoptic Gospels depict him as exorcising demons, but through his own supernatural authority rather than by the invocation of God's name and help. Christians, in both early and later periods, exorcised in the name of Jesus, less frequently in the name of God, claiming that the invocation of these holy names made their exorcism religious rather than magical. The rise of a minor order of exorcists in the church testifies to the wide currency of Christian exorcism. The present Catholic practice of pre-baptismal exorcism, together with the exorcism of demoniacs and of objects like oil, water, and salt, originated in early times. Today, however, the priest alone is permitted to exorcise. The power attributed to the "name" of Jesus survives in the customary conclusion to Christian prayers in which his name is invoked. See laying on of hands, magic.

W. Heitmuller, Im Namen Jesu (1903); T K. Oesterreich, Possession: Demoniacal and Other (tr. fr the German, 1930)   M.R. experimental psychology: See psychology, schools of.

expiation: See holocaust, propitiation; sacrifice.

explicit faith: The standard demanded of the higher clergy in the Middle Ages, requiring the intelligent acceptance of the doctrines of the Church, and involving therefore a clear apprehension of the details of those doctrines, opp. to implicit faith*.   H.W.J.

exposition: The explanatory or interpretative presentation of the content, purpose or significance of a writing or discourse, or other subject matter.   H.W.J.

expository preaching: That type of preaching which, utilizing the results of exegetical* and historical study of the subject matter though not unnecessarily exhibiting the terms or procedure of such prerequisite analysis in the sermon, attempts to expound and apply in a connected and systematic manner the main ideas or teachings contained in an extended passage, chapter, or book of the Bible; usually, though not always, distinguished from that type of homiletic* discourse in which a brief text is used as the basis or unifying idea of the sermon*.   H.W J.

exsultet: In the Roman rite, the deacon's praeconium at the lighting of the paschal candle, on Holy Saturday, named from the opening words, Exsultet jam Angelica turba.   E.R.H.

extreme unction: A sacrament of the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox church of anointing* the dying. The R. C. rite to be valid must be performed by a properly ordained priest using oil* consecrated to this purpose only. Eyes, ears, nostrils, lips, hands and feet are anointed, in each case the formula is repeated. "Through this holy unction, and His own most tender Mercy, may the Lord pardon thee whatever offences thou hast committed by sight (or hearing, etc.)." The rite differs somewhat in the Eastern Church. See sacraments.   R.E.E H.

Ezekiel: Book of a priest who was among those deported with Jehoiachim (II Kings 24.15) in 598 B.C., and was called to be a prophet in the fifth year after that event (1 2). The last date of a prophecy is the twenty-seventh year (29·17), 571 B.C. The book consists of three parts. 1-24 —prophecies against "Israel" (Judah) and Jerusalem; 25-32—prophecies against foreign nations (secondarily placed in the present position— prophecies 24:26-27 are continued in 33 21-22), 34-48—salutary prophecies for the Israel of the Future (40-48 the vision of the new temple, city and Holy Land forming a distinct unit within the section). The book has been a storm center of criticism in late years. Radical solutions such as Torrey's (a third century B.C. pseudepigraph!) have added to the confusion. The moderate critical position which seems best is the following. The "authentic" pieces giving experiences or utterances of the prophet are all dated except 12 1-10, where the date may have been lost (through transposition?), and are arranged in chronological order (now slightly disturbed, cp. 29 19, a later date than 40 1). But each date applies only to the first unit following it; other distinct pieces subjoined to dated units are suspect of having been placed there redactionally, and their authenticity must be judged separately. That the book has been much expanded by other hands, notably also in chapters 40-48, is certain. But even a critically "reduced" book will show that Ezekiel was a man of great originality of thought and character. His influence on the subsequent religious and theological development was large. He has been called the John Calvin of the O T. Cf. Gog and Magog.

R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941); J. A. Bewer, Literature of the Old Testament (rev ed., 1933).   E.G.K.

Ezra: According to the record in Scripture, Ezra was the leader of a caravan which returned from Babylonia to the Holy Land in the reign of Artaxerxes, King of Persia (Ezra 7.1). (It is usually assumed that this Artaxerxes is the first king of that name, and the date of Ezra's arrival in Palestine is thus fixed at 458 B.C. It has, however, been suggested that the Artaxerxes referred to is the second, and that the date of Ezra's arrival should be fixed at 397 B.C.). The authenticity of Ezra's memoirs, now included in the Book which bears his name, is being defended with increasing vigor by Bible students, and the tendency to declare his whole existence mythological is definitely weakening under the pressure of new studies in the Biblical text and more precise information regarding Persian life. Ezra's fame, so far as Judaism is concerned, rests only secondarily on the main incident recorded in his memoirs—his forcible separation of the Judaite from the heathen wives whom many of them had married. Tradition attributes to him the repromulgation of the Pentateuch* as the accepted and binding discipline of Law for all Israel. In this sense, Ezra is held to have completed the work initiated by Moses*, a millenium before him. It seems certain that Ezra was an important factor in the establishment of the synagogue* worship, the custom of reading the Law as part of this service, and the ultimate substitution of the student of the Law for the Prophet as the moral guide of the people. In this sense, undoubtedly, Ezra was the founder of Rabbinic legalism.

W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (1940), pp. 248ff, L. Finkelstein, The Pharisees, The Sociological Background of their Faith (1938), pp 557ff.; R. Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel (4th and 5th eds, 1921-22), III, 2, pp. 575ff; Albert T. Olmstead, History of Palestine and Syria (1931), pp 583ff; Robert H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941), pp 813 ff.; Hans H. Schaeder, Esra der Schreiber (1930).   L F.

Ezra: A historical book of the OT, which is contained in the third division of the Hebrew canon, the "Writings" or Hagiographa*. In Hebrew this book originally formed a single work with the Book of Nehemiah*, and the two books together recount the history of the return of the exiles from Babylonia in 538 B C. and the subsequent rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem (Ezra 1-6), and of the work of Ezra (Ezra 7-10, cf. Nehemiah 7.73b-10.39) and Nehemiah (Nehemiah 1-13). The chronology of the two books as they now stand is confused, and there must be displacements in the arrangement of material. The Book of Ezra is unusual in that two sections, 4 8-6.18 and 7 12-26, are in the Aramaic language. It is certain that the author of these books also wrote I, II Chronicles* because of the close similarities in diction, religious viewpoints, and historical methods. Jewish tradition attributes the Book of Ezra to Ezra*; if he was not actually the author, his Memoirs formed one of the author's sources. Another source was certain Aramaic documents, consisting chiefly of official papers of Persian kings. The authenticity of the latter has been widely questioned. Ezra himself has been considered by some modern scholars as a purely imaginary figure (Torrey, Holscher), but such skepticism is unwarranted. He is an authentic figure in the Persian era, standing for racial purity, promulgation of the Law, and strict ritualism, it is probable, however, that his importance has been exaggerated by tradition. His activity is to be dated in the first half of the fourth century, following Nehemiah, both upon internal evidence of the Biblical record and the evidence of the Elephantine papyri*. See Esdras, Books of; L.
Batten, The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah (International Critical Commentary), (1931; C. C. Torrey, Ezra Studies (1910).   J.P.H.

F

Faber, Jacobus: (c. 1455-c. 1536) French humanist and reformer (Calvinist). His work in Biblical studies was notable, and he produced the French version of the N.T. which underlies all subsequent translations. — G.R.C.

faculty psychology: See psychology, schools of.

fad: See culture.

fairy: When one religion triumphs over another the gods of the vanquished faith may be identified with those of the victorious one, or rejected as demons. The Celtic religion evaded both prongs of this fork, and by shrinkage of the old gods made fairies, brownies, or "little people" of them. Thus they are still here, still helpful, although sometimes mischievous, and always shrink from holy water and the sign of the cross. See elf. — P.G.M.

faith: Faith is the giving of oneself to be controlled and remade by what commands trust and devotion. What thus commands trust and devotion may be only a belief. On the other hand, it may be an operative reality so insistently present in all experience that we cannot seriously and practically doubt it no matter what logical devices for creating doubt may be invented. Examples of such insistent and inescapable realities are one's own self, other selves and the acquisition of thoughts, feelings and interests through communicative interaction with others. Any alleged instance of these realities may be doubted, but the practical coercions of everyday life make it impossible to doubt seriously that there are such realities.

The giving of oneself to be controlled and remade by a reality most surely known is an act of faith just as genuine as the giving of oneself to something not so surely known. The act of faith often occurs when there is little evidence or none to support it, but that is blind or ignorant faith and is not necessary to faith as such. Faith may be the surest knowledge. Such knowledge by itself alone is not faith but it becomes faith when one acts upon it in the manner of self-giving described above.

When the object of faith is a belief and not an actual reality most surely known by all inquiry, one does not want to be troubled by questions concerning the truth of his belief. In such case one guards it against all inquiries which might demand some revision or discarding of it. This protection of the belief against inquiry is accomplished by holding it to be supernaturally sanctioned. On this account it is alleged to be given by revelation or by indubitable intuition or by mystical experience or in some other way is set beyond the bounds of human inquiry and testing. He who raises a question concerning its truth is treating it as though it were a way of getting knowledge. But for him who treats it as object of faith it is not a way of getting knowledge. It is a way of sustaining his sense of worthfulness in living and he clings to it in faith for that reason.

It is true that some modernists are committed in faith to certain beliefs and at the same time hold these beliefs subject to criticism and every form of intellectual inquiry which is pertinent. But when they do this they weaken faith in two ways. They weaken it as faith because no faith can be strong under such conditions. They weaken it as commitment to actual reality because they do not give themselves in faith to something most surely known.

If the reality to which one gives himself in faith is physiologically and psychologically inescapable, one does not need to cling to any belief. However vaguely apprehended, one cannot doubt it. So one can criticize and cast out every belief he likes. The reality will not let him go and he knows that it will not, no matter how much he may cultivate his doubts. This something-or-other most important for all human living does not continue to be a mere vague something-or-other. It is this only in the beginning when it originates faith. It becomes more or less clarified into definite forms of knowledge as faith drives continuously to further inquiry into its nature.

Thus neither knowledge nor belief is the source of genuine faith. The knowledge which one gets is a consequence of the faith. The source of faith is in the human body. The body so reacts that one is coerced to be aware that one is sustained and that something-or-other is most important. Beliefs of the mind may distort, suppress, conceal or confuse this apprehension that emerges from the body. They may also clarify and inform this bodily apprehension with true knowledge. But beliefs of the mind cannot do this latter if they are themselves made the objects of faith. They can clarify and inform the faith only when used as means of reaching out after whatever may be most important however vaguely at first it may be sensed. Such a faith magnifies intelligent understanding. It also opens the way to all the supreme fulfilments of life. See reason in religion.   H.N.W.

faith, explicit and implicit: See explicit faith; implicit faith.

faith healing: See psychotherapy.

faith, Pauline: See Paul, the Apostle; righteousness, N.T. conception of.

faith, saving: See saving faith.

faker or faqir: (Arabic, poor) A Moslem monk. In general any ascetic holy man who becomes a wandering beggar or miracle-worker. The term *dervish is synonymous with fakir for Moslem monks who usually belonged to a religious order, but now often go about as independent mendicants.   P.E.J.

fakih: (Arabian, faqih, meaning one learned in the law) A title given in Africa to schoolmasters.   P.E.J.

Falashas: A tribe of dark-skinned Jews living in Ethiopia for many centuries. Their origin is unknown, but they claim ancient descent. They call themselves "Beta-Israel" (House of Israel) but the natives call them Falashas, or "exiles", "immigrants".

Although diverging from standard Jewish practice at many points, they hold steadfast by Judaism of Mosaic type, based on an Ethiopic version of the Pentateuch*, but considerably modified by their complete ignorance of Hebrew. They are strict monotheists and lead a highly moral life.

Living completely apart from the natives, they will not allow anyone outside their group into their hut-like homes or their synagogues (mesgid). They strictly observe laws of ritual purity and therefore establish themselves near running water.

Their leaders are divided into menokassie (Nazarites), kahens (priests), and dabteras (learned men), who are all non-professionals.   H.K.—L.F.

fall of man: Mythical story of Mesopotamian origin, adapted by the Israelites in the O.T. (Gen. iii), describing the temptation and transgression of the first man and woman, and their subsequent expulsion from the garden of Eden. The biblical narrative aims at explaining three aspects of the human lot: universal death, toil for man, travail for woman and her subjection to him. It implies also that human beings have acquired the faculty of discernment by an act of disobedience, but does not teach the doctrine of original sin* (IV Ezra iii, 7-8, Rom. v, 12, etc.). Cf. Gnosticism, golden age, progress.

See N. P. Williams, The Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin (1927), P. Humbert, Etudes sur le récit du Paradis et de la Chute dans la Genèse (1940).   S.L.T.

False Decretals, The: (commonly the Forged Decretals) A collection of documents of Canon Law* under the name of Isidore Mercator (or Peccator) emanating from Rheims before the middle of the ninth century c. 849-50 (Fournier). The collection is based on earlier collections of Isidore of Seville* and the Dionysia-Hadriana together with the record contained in Cassiodorus*, Historia Tripartita. The forgeries occur where decretals issued or presumed to have been issued had been lost, therefore the Pope Damasus writes in ninth century Latin! The underlying scheme is an attempt to deliver the Church from the menace of feudal disorder and violence, hence the author exalts the authority of the humblest priest over the greatest Emperor, giving his excommunication the full authority of the Church; a scheme of ecclesiastical reform is introduced, the authority of the bishop is maintained against the Metropolitans, they provide for an impartial tribunal and consequently for the development of Papal jurisdiction. Their authority was questioned by Hincmar of Rheims* in a letter to Nicholas I (858-867), the question whether Nicholas I* used them or not is still regarded as open; their authority was not effectively challenged until the Renaissance. They are ultimately the basis alike of Gregorianism, Ultramontanism and Laudian Anglicanism. See decretals.   F.W.B.

family, the: A group of persons united by common descent or by marriage* and practicing a common economy. The term is generally used to cover a number of different types of groupings. Thus a family may consist of a husband and wife with or without children, one parent with children if the other has deserted, died, or been divorced, brothers and sisters who live together after the deaths of their parents; the unmarried couple with or without children whose relationship constitutes a common-law marriage. Historically and among primitive peoples the family often comprised the larger unit of persons related by common ancestry, but in modern society we picture the typical family as a more or less stable relationship of husband and wife with or without children.

The origin of the family is unknown. There is every reason to believe that it is very old since in every record of early man there is evidence of family life. It is found in every known society both civilized and preliterate. Writings attempting to determine the prehistoric development of the family have been largely speculative and contradictory. Primarily these writers have dealt with the form of the family, especially as to whether the earliest relationship between men and women was promiscuous, or if not promiscuous, whether the first form was that of a patri-archate or a matriarchate. The family probably arose in response to the universal need in all societies for satisfying certain functions. While the basis for family life is undoubtedly sexual, these needs may be satisfied promiscuously, so this explanation alone cannot be accepted as the all important reason for the continuance of a permanent union. The dependence of the child upon the mother for satisfaction of its organic needs was probably another important factor in the development of a family organization. As the family developed, it undoubtedly took on numerous other functions consistent with its particular economy and cultural contacts.

It has been customary to speak of the historic functions of the family as economic, educational, religious, recreational, protective, and affectional. Of these, only the affectional survives in the modern family except in the most limited degree, the others having been taken over by communal agencies. Thus industry is no longer found in the home, the educational responsibility for the child after six or even earlier has been transferred to the school; recreation has for the most part been commercialized, and the church and Sunday school have largely taken over the religious function. Many writers have taken this loss of the functions of the family as the cause of its increasing instability. In so doing they have lost sight of the increased importance and nature of the affectional function. As modern life has grown more complex, social relations less primary, social distance greater, reactions more stereotyped and conventional, the individual has turned more and more to affectional satisfactions expressed through intimacies and demonstrations of affection, sympathy, sharing of aspirations, common goals, etc., whose locale is the family. The focusing of attention upon this one function, so intimate and emotional in character and thus naturally fraught with possibilities of conflict, has placed such a premium upon its attainment as to cause the success or failure of family life to be measured in these terms alone. Thus as modern life has inevitably made greater demands upon the individual, he in turn has placed greater strain upon the family relationship, in other words upon that continuous process of affectional adjustment and readjustment which marriage entails.

Another function of the family is often neglected, that of personality development. The family may be spoken of as the cradle of personality in that it is the first group which the child enters and it is here that his personality is molded through interaction with family members, the whole constituting a unity of interacting personalities. The family, adaptable institution as it is, has kept abreast of social change. It is upon this adaptability in fact and the shifting emphasis of its functions in terms of the cultural setting that its continued existence depends.

See divorce; infidelity; motherhood; widows, treatment of; woman, religious and ethical status of.

Ray E. Baber, Marriage and the Family (1939) ; Ruth S. Cavan, The Family (1942) , J K Folsom, The Family and Democratic Society (1943) ; Ernest R Mowrer, The Family (1932) ; Harriet R Mowrer, "Marriage Conflict" in Becker, Howard, and Hill, Reuben (ed), Marriage and the Family (1942) , Harriet R. Mowrer, Personality Adjustment and Domestic Discord (1935) ; M. F. Nimkoff, The Family (1934) , E B. Reuter and J. R Runner, The Family (1931) , Edward Westermarck, History of Human Marriage (London, 1921).   H.R.M.

fana: The final state of ecstasy as understood by Sufi* mystics. Lammens translates it as "the passing away of human personality" although not, of course, the cessation of the individual's life.

Henri Lammens, Islam, Beliefs and Institutions (London, 1929).   P.G.M.

fanaticism: (Lat., fanaticus, divinely inspired, mad, fr. fanum, temple) Such excessive and irrational zeal as to impair self-criticism and destroy moral perspective. While arduous support of any cause, especially of reform, may incur thoughtless charges of fanaticism, the word is now properly used only of extreme preoccupation with one narrow system of beliefs with consequent unreasonable and injurious neglect of other ideas and values.   L.H DEW.

fanon: (Gr., phano, a cloth) An ornamental shoulder-piece used by the Pope, the present collar-like form of which derives from the Middle Ages. Earlier the term was applied to various other cloths used in worship, such as the priest's maniple, the handkerchief used by the faithful in presenting their bread-offerings, the amice, the subdeacon's shoulder-veil, and even the flaps of a bishop's mitre.   C.V.

Far Eastern temples: See temples, Far Eastern.

Farel, G.: (1489-1565) Protestant reformer, born and educated in France, a bold and successful preacher of the reformed faith at Basel, Neuchatel and other Swiss towns; also at Strasbourg and Metz. While at Geneva, he was responsible for the beginning of Calvin's ministry in that city. See Calvin, John, Neuchâtel.   G.R.C.

Farrar, Frederic William: (1831-1903) Anglican divine, Canon of Westminster and Dean of Canterbury. Born in India, he studied at Cambridge and was a schoolmaster at Harrow and Marlborough before going to Westminster Abbey. He is known especially for his writings on Biblical times, including works on the early churches, a life of Christ, and a study of the Bible. He was a central churchman, with wide interests. W.N.P.

fashion: See culture.

fasting: The bodily and mental experiences of early man during times of lack of food may account for the practice of fasting as a religious technique. Prolonged hunger gives rise to visions. The fast was used for this purpose by the American Indian in acquiring his private totem,* by shamans in making contact with spirits, by those who consulted the Greek oracles. The suffering involved in fasting made it a fitting way of expressing penitence, seeking forgiveness or making atonement. The fast was practically universal as one phase of the ceremony of mourning. It was widely used as a preparation for participation in such ceremonials as firstfruits, baptism, initiation and communion. Where the flesh and the desires of the flesh were considered obstacles to the release of the soul from bondage, fasting was an essential of religious discipline. It was also a means of acquiring supernatural power. It gave added efficacy to a rite, and sometimes was combined with other austerities to command or control the gods. The amount of fasting required in the great religions varies widely. Judaism, Christianity and Islam have fixed fast days. Islam adds the annual fast of Ramadan,* which requires abstantion from food during the daylight hours for a month. The fast has been most extensively used in India. Zoroastrianism forbad fasting.

A.E.H.

fatalism: Fatalism, differs from fate*, in that the former provides for the inevitableness of events, causes or no causes, while the latter sees events determined within relation of cause and effect. In this sense, Fatalism is more nearly akin to the indeterminism of fortune.* Accordingly, fatalism is spoken of commonly as blind. It is recognized, of course, that there are those who relate fatalism to the consequences of fate and thereby subject it to the nature of circumstances or causes.

Fatalism is a Weltanschauungen whose logical issue is pessimism as is illustrated by the cyclical view of history. See kismet. Cf. determinism; predestination.

P.R.H.

fate: (Greek and Roman) Fate is the belief that events constitute a chain of causes* and effects within determinism. It differs from Fortune* in that the latter falls outside of determinism, and from Fatalism* which necessitates unconditionally the event. The conception of Moira is basic to that of fate. The notion of Moira is analogous to real estate allotments whose boundaries must not be transgressed. That is to each individual is assigned a sphere or a becomingness which he is obliged to acknowledge and observe. This applies, likewise, to all living objects including the gods. Phaeton transgressed his proper bounds and paid the consequences. Heraclitus* thought that if the sun over-stepped his bounds, the Errynes (Fates) would bring him back again.

During Homer's time the gods did the work of fate but with Hesiod, three individual characters emerged as spinsters with appropriate names. "Clotho the youngest, spun the thread of life . . . Lachesis the second, twisted it . . . and Atropas the third sister, armed with a huge pair of shears, remorselessly cut short the thread of life." (H. A. Guerber, Myths of Greece and Rome, p. 165).

Although recognized by thinkers prior to the time of the Stoics, such as Heraclitus and Plato, belief in fate came into its own with Epictetus and the Stoics who held that the will of God is inescapable whether one wishes it or not. In the situation it is the task of the individual to chasten himself into the conviction that somehow it will minister to his good.

P.R.H

Father Divine's Peace Mission: A Negro religious sect led by M. J. Devine, or Divine, formerly in the Harlem section of New York but later removed to Philadelphia. This cult leader achieved great notoriety because of the emotional excesses attending his meetings, alleged healings and other miracles, his unexplained possession of large sums of money, his valuable properties, called "heavens," "kingdoms," and "promised land," and the claims of divinity made by or for him. He was frequently before the courts on various charges but refused to divulge the source of his wealth. "I have money without limit," he said, "because my money comes from God."

It seems that "Father Divine" is really George Baker, who was born of Gullah slave parents near Savannah, Ga. In Georgia he was once sentenced to the chain gang and later tried for insanity because of his messianic claims and disorders incident thereto. He achieved fame in Sayville, Long Island, about 1920 and became a "lion" in Harlem about 1930. He gave elaborate banquets to his followers, who greeted each other with the salutation "Peace," and claimed millions of adherents. Meetings in the "peace missions" were characterized by emotional excesses of various kinds, and his halls were bedecked with signs bearing "Father Divine is God," "Father Divine, God Almighty," "Father Divine is the Messiah," "Father Divine is the King of Kings and Lord of Lords," and similar sentiments. In court he refused either to deny or affirm that he was God. See communistic settlements, religious.

E. T. Clark, The Small Sects in America (1937), Hoshar, God in a Rolls Royce (1936) ; Parker, The Incredible Messiah (1937). The Peace Mission publishes two papers in New York: The World Herald and The Spoken Word.

E.T.C.

fatherhood: State of being a male parent. More significantly, the character and social role of such a parent. In nearly all primitive and savage societies known, and in most civilized communities, fathers have been dominant in family life and fatherhood regarded with high respect or even with religious awe. Some anthropologists, as J. J. Bachofen, L. H. Morgan, and R. S. Briffault, believe that the few matriarchates* which now exist are vestiges of the once prevailing form of family. But, as E. Westermarck has argued (though with exaggerated emphasis), there is more evidence against this theory than in favor of it.

Jesus' description of God's relation to human beings as one of Fatherhood emphasizes 1) His creatorship to which men owe their very being, 2) our likeness to Him as persons, 3) His authority (for the father's authority was absolute in both Hebrew and Roman families of Jesus' time), and 4) His love. This description, so important to theology, also bears witness, as do many other evidences, to the kindness and devotion with which the typical Jewish father, in the first century, exercised his patriarchal* power and responsibility. See analogy.

L.H.DeW.

Fathers: See Ante-Nicene Fathers, Apologists, Apostolic Fathers.

Fatiha or Fatihah: (Arabian fatihah, that which opens) The short opening sura (chapter) of the Koran,* used by Moslems in prayer many times a day, and to whom it means as much as the Lord's Prayer does to Christians   P.E J.

fatwa or futwa: A Hindu and Moslem legal term, meaning a formal legal opinion given by a canon lawyer. Hence, a judicial sentence. P.E.J.

fauns: (Lat, faunus, from faveo, to favor, protect) Playful rustic divinities, like the Greek satyrs, deriving their name and characteristics from the old Latin god, Faunus, bestower of fruitfulness and foresight, who was himself identified with Pan of the Greeks; hence his horns and his goat's feet.   E.M.N.

Feast of Fools, Feast of Asses: A burlesque of the ritual by the lower clergy (hence sometimes called "Feast of the Subdeacons"), celebrated late in December or at the beginning of January from the 12th century to the opening of the 16th, in France and less commonly in England and other countries. Features of the celebration often included the election of a boy bishop and the entrance of an ass into the church. It was condemned by moralizing preachers such as Gerson and Huss See New Year's celebrations.
E K. Chambers, The Medieval Stage, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1903).   J.T.M.

Feast of Tabernacles: See Tabernacles, Feast of.

feasting: Feasts usually occur at the important transition times in the life of the individual, the turning points of the year, anniversaries of happy occasions in the history of a religion and events in the lives of the gods. In the first class are marriage feasts, the feast to celebrate pregnancy, the feasts at birth and naming. Where circumcision* was practiced, a feast was part of the ceremony. When childhood was outgrown, admission to adult privileges and responsibilities through initiation was celebrated by feasting. At the end was the funeral feast, followed by commemorative feasts at stated times afterwards. The seasonal feasts varied with the peoples. Usually they centered around the food* supply, but some religions included not only the turning of the seasons but also changes of the moon as times for festivals. On many occasions of animal sacrifice* to the gods the flesh made a feast for the people. The feasts which are peculiar to a particular religion usually celebrate events in the lives of its gods, saviors or saints. See death and burial practices, harvest festivals.   A.E.H.

feasts and fasts, Jewish: See Jewish religious festivals.

feasts and fasts of the Roman Catholic Church: Feasts are days designated by ecclesiastical authority for giving special honor to God, to Christ in His sacred humanity, to the Virgin Mary, the angels, saints, and holy things. Feasts vary greatly in liturgical significance. Of prime importance because of their influence on Catholic life are the holydays of obligation, that is, days on which the faithful are obliged to assist at Mass* and to abstain from servile works. The days of obligation include all Sundays, and some other feasts the number of which varies in different countries. In the United States six special feasts are observed as days of obligation three in honor of the Savior (Christmas, the Circumcision, Ascension Thursday), two in honor of the Virgin Mary (the Assumption, August 15, and the Immaculate Conception, December 8), and one in honor of the saints (All Saints', November 1).

Fasts are days of special penance.* The ecclesiastical fast consists essentially in the taking of only one full meal a day, either at noon or in the evening. Meat may be eaten at the full meal unless the day is also one of abstinence. Two very light meals are also allowed, the quantity and quality of which are defined by approved local usage. The times of fast are Lent, the Ember Days, and the vigils of Christmas, Pentecost, the Assumption, and All Saints'. The Ember Days, vigils, and some of the days of Lent are also days of abstinence. See Black Fast, the, festivals and holy days, Christian.
H. A Ayrinhac, Administrative Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law (1930)   C.V.

Febronianism: From the pseudonym Febronius used by N von Hontheim, Auxiliary Bishop of Trier (1701-1790), in De statu ecclesiae, 1763; a German Gallicanism, declaring papal primacy limited by General Councils in doctrine, national churches in discipline, basis of anti-papal policy of German Archbishops and Emperor Joseph II.   E.R.H.

februa: See s. v. Lupercalia.

Fechner, Gustav Theodor: (1801-1887) As a pantheistic panpsychist he advanced a doctrine of psycho-physical parallelism for which he had some impressive experimental evidence. As founder of psycho-physics or experimental psychology, he held that there is a definite mathematically determined quantitative relation between the mental and the material. Conceiving the universe as an organism imbued with a consciousness of itself, and being the body of God, for him God's perfection does not consist in a static completeness, but in unlimited progress. Plants, animals, planets, stars, and the cosmos as a hierarchy of souls are unified within the soul of God.
Zendavesta (Leipzig, 1851); "Uber die Seelenfrage (Leipzig, 1861); Die drei Motive und Gründe des Glaubens (Leipzig, 1863); The Little Book of Life After Death (1912), E. Dennert, Fechner als Naturphilosoph und Christ; ein Beitrag zur Kritik des Pantheismus (Gütersloh, 1902); W. James, The doctrine of the earth-soul and of beings intermediate between man and God; an account of the philosophy of G. T. Fechner (1909); C. Lulmann, Monismus und Christentum by G Th. Fechner (Berlin, 1917); F. A. E. Meyer, Philosophische Metaphysik und christlicher Glaube bei Gustav Theodor Fechner (Gottingen, 1937).   H.H.

federal census of religious bodies: The Seventh Federal Census, taken in 1850, was the first to publish religious statistics. Prior to that time religious groups objected to any federal action on the ground that a census of church membership might lead to governmental control of church members. Indeed, some church organizations did not believe that it was right for anyone to count their flocks, citing the pestilences and death which had come to seventy thousand men because David ill-advisedly had taken the census of the Israelites. Secular objection to a federal census of churches was raised as late as 1850 by the state rights school.

The federal government began cautiously in 1850 with figures on the number of churches, church accommodations, that is seating capacity, and the value of church property. These items were repeated in 1860. In 1870 a distinction was made between church edifices and church organizations. Ten years later elaborate attempts were made to broaden the scope of the religious census. Much material was collected, and partially compiled, but, for reasons which cannot now be determined, the material was not published. No more government figures were published until 1906 when Religious Bodies appeared, to be repeated each successive decade. The figures of 1906 included information on the date of establishment of local church organizations, debts, the language in which the services were conducted, and, most important of all, data on the history, polity, missionary and educational work of each denomination. In 1926 urban and rural churches were separately tabulated. In 1850 special marshalls were employed by the government to collect the figures. This method was then abandoned in favor of correspondence.

These religious statistics are not perfect. Yet historians have not fully utilized, and church leaders have not fully realized the significance of the extensive facts collected by the federal government.

The introduction to each special census report contains pertinent historical data. Part one of Religious Bodies: 1906 (1910) has the best historical summary.
                                                                  C.S.E.

Federal Council of The Churches of Christ in America:

An official federation of the national bodies of the churches, designed "to manifest the essential oneness of the Christian churches of America in Jesus Christ as their divine Lord and Saviour," and organized in 1908 "for the prosecution of work that can be better done in union than in separation." Most of the major Protestant bodies and one of the Eastern Catholic group are constituent members of the Council, having 140,-000 local congregations with a combined membership of well over 25,000,000. The Council meets biennially. Between meetings its business is carried on by the Executive Committee, of about one hundred representatives of the constituent bodies.

Among the objects of the Federal Council are "to encourage devotional fellowship and mutual counsel concerning the spiritual life and religious activities of the churches" and "to secure a larger combined influence for the churches of Christ in all matters affecting the moral and social condition of the people, so as to promote the application of the law of Christ in every relation of human life." It is specifically provided in the constitution that "This Federal Council shall have no authority over the constituent bodies adhering to it. . . . It has no authority to draw up a common creed or form of government or of worship, or in any way to limit the full autonomy of the Christian bodies adhering to it."

In addition to the Field Department, which encourages the formation of local and state councils of churches, and promotes the entire cooperative program on the field, the Council works through the Departments of Evangelism, International Justice and Good-will, the Church and Social Service, Race Relations, Research and Education, Relations with Churches Abroad, and National Religious Radio, together with various commissions dealing with specific fields of interest and activity. The General Commission on Army and Navy Chaplains is intimately related to the Federal Council, and the Council is partly or wholly responsible also for the work of the Christian Commission for Camp and Defense Communities, the Commission on Aliens and Prisoners of War, the Committee on the Conscientious Objector, the Committee on Foreign Relief Appeals in the Churches, and the Commission to Study the Bases of a Just and Durable Peace. A monthly magazine is published, called the Federal Council Bulletin, and a weekly Information Service furnishes accurate reports on contemporary public issues of interest to the churches. The officers for 1940-1942 are Dean Luther A. Weigle, President, Dr. Albert E. Day, Vice-President, Dr. Samuel McCrea Cavert, General Secretary. Cf. Interchurch World Movement of North America, social work of the churches.
                                                                  L.A.W.

federal theology: See covenant theology.

federated churches: This expression describes a development in church organization since about 1910 in hundreds of smaller American communities where over-churching has become a problem. Two or more churches of different Protestant denominations combine for worship and work, under one minister, preserving their own organizations, memberships and denominational connections. The churches do not really federate; "associated churches" would be more accurate. Sometimes an additional undenominational church, called "the federated church," springs up alongside the others. Methods of organization and work on this basis vary widely, as do the results. In some cases federation has led to union, in others it has long continued satisfactorily; in others it has been abandoned.
                                                                  R.H.N.

feet washing: A term which refers to the incident in Jn. 13:1-17. Washing of the feet was an incident always offered to a guest at an ancient feast, and a menial was set apart for this service. Jesus himself performed it for his disciples before the Last Supper. From his example the custom passed into the early church, and is mentioned in 1 Tim. 5:10 as one which fell to the charge of pious women. Religious kings in the Middle Ages (e.g. St. Louis) washed the feet of the poor at stated seasons, and the ritual is still observed by dignitaries in the Catholic church. See Dunkers, holiness churches; Mennonites; River Brethren, washing (ritual, in O.T.).   E.F.S.

Feinn Cycle: Legends of the old Irish heroes, Finn mac Cool, Fergus, Ossian and others. Also known as Fenian cycle.   P G.M.

Felix of Urgel: (Spain, d. 818) Bishop. With Elipandus,* the chief theologian of Spanish Adoptionism. His teachings, answered by Alcuin,* were condemned by synods of Ratisbon (792), Frankfort (794), Aix-la-Chapelle (799). Deposed, he was given into custody of Leidrad, bishop of Lyons, dying seemingly penitent and orthodox Agobard* later discovered tract showing his recantation was superficial.   A.C.

Fénelon: (Francois de Salignac de la Mothe) (1651-1715) Archbishop of Cambrai, perceptor of the Duc de Bourgoyne for whose instruction he wrote Télémaque, one of the most read French books. Adopted the Quietist* ideas of Mme. Guyon* for which he was condemned at Rome Author of a treatise De l'éducation des filles and other religious works.   w.w c.

fêng shui: See Chinese Terminology.

fenrir or fenrisulf: A wolfish monster, offspring of Loki.* One of the enemies of the gods, who is to swallow Odin* himself at the last day, only to have his jaws torn apart by Odin's son Vidar. He is also fated to swallow the sun. Saemund's Edda.   P.G M.

Ferrara-Florence, Council of: When the Council of Basel* (1431) proved intractable, owing to the feud which broke out between the adherents of the conciliar* theory and of papal supremacy, Pope Eugenius IV transferred his faction to Ferrara, where it held sessions from September 1437 to January 1439. The chief subject of discussion, and the main reason why this Council finally won out over the rump Council at Basel, were the negotiations with the Byzantine Emperor John VIII, which promised to result in the reunion of the Eastern and Western churches. However, during the Ferrara sessions, no agreement was reached. It was not until the Council was once more transferred, this time to Florence, that the Western Church scored a victory over the Eastern, insofar that the "Filioque"* clause of the Nicene Creed was admitted by the Easterns, but in the sense that the "Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father through the Son," not "and the Son." This and other concessions were virtually forced, for the Greeks came primarily to seek military aid against the Turks; consequently, the Council was in a position to dictate its terms. Finally, the negotiations resulted in the "Act of Union" proclaimed on July 6, 1439. This in theory terminated the Great Schism* which had lasted since 1054. Nevertheless, the Byzantines* in large numbers refused to acknowledge the decree, and after the capture of Constantinople (May 29, 1453), it lapsed. In Russia, the decree was never accepted.

   K J Hefele, A History of the Christian Councils, 5 vols. (Edinburgh, 1871-96).   M.S.

fertility cult: See Baalism.

festival of orthodoxy, the: See images.

festivals, harvest: See harvest festivals.

festivals and holy days, Christian: On the theory that every day ought to be a feast day for Christians, the Primitive Church recognized no festivals. Need for times of common devotion and the desirability of giving new significance to days and seasons long associated with Jewish or pagan tradition finally overcame the opposition to such observance and led to the establishment of special Christian solemnities. This movement, however, was of such slow growth that Easter and Pentecost constituted, with Sunday,* the only universal festivals of the Church until the addition of Christmas and Epiphany in the fourth century. After the triumph of Christianity, when these days had gained in sanctity and importance through legislation prescribing their observance, festivals increased more rapidly. Feasts in commemoration of the Virgin, the Apostles, and such events as the Circumcision, the Ascension, and the Invention of the Cross were introduced from the fifth to the ninth centuries. Wider celebration of local festivals honoring martyrs, confessors, and lesser saints* followed. By the time of the issuance of Gratian's* Decretum (ca. 1150?) no fewer than thirty-six holy days, besides Sundays, were tabulated by the Church for general observance. Further expansion of the ecclesiastical calendar the popes sought to control by reserving to themselves the right of canonization, and urging that the episcopal power to institute new festivals be exercised only in favor of saints recognized by the Apostolic See. Still the list of feast days grew substantially from the middle of the twelfth century to the Reformation. Since the Church stipulated that all compulsory holy days be observed with attendance at mass and abstinence from unnecessary servile work, many communities were bidden to keep virtually two Sundays in the week.

To practical reformers the celebration of holy days in such numbers seemed ill-suited to a people who lived by manual labor. As early as 1274 Humbert de Romans had therefore suggested to the Council of Lyons* that permission to work after mass be granted on all but the greater holy days. Although frequent complaints about the misuse of holiday leisure lent weight to this proposal, it met with little approval. The argument was gradually strengthened, however, by the feeling of men like Wyclif* that multiplication lessened the value of these days and fostered indifference to them. Such a point of view gained ground slowly until the opening decades of the fifteenth century, when the movement acquired impetus through the advocacy of Jean Gerson, Pierre d'Ailly, Francesco Zabarella, and Nicolas de Clémanges.* The efforts of these reformers are reflected in a recommendation to the Council of Constance* for the abrogation of lesser feast days Inasmuch as no action was taken here, or at the Council of Basel,* the matter did not become an issue again until Luther* made his appeal to the Nobility of the German Nation (1520). As a practical measure he then proposed the abolition of all holy days except Sunday, although New Year's, Ascension Day, and Pentecost were included in a later memorandum (1528). If additional festivals were observed, he suggested the transference of their celebration to Sunday. Other reform churches followed a similar, or even more rigorous, policy.

After severance of its ties with Rome, the English Church retained in its calendar few major holidays with special services, but kept a larger number of minor ones, without provision for their observance. In Catholic countries a comparable step was not taken until 1642, when, under Urban VIII, holy days of obligation were reduced to thirty-six, in addition to Sunday. In subsequent years the list of feasts for the universal church has been further curtailed, and certain countries have been made exempt from celebrating all of these. In the United States, for example, only the Feasts of New Year's, the Ascension, the Assumption of the Virgin, All Saints', the Immaculate Conception, and Christmas require observance. Since the middle of the last century, however, Protestant churches have shown a tendency to appoint new festivals such as Missionary Day, Children's Day, and the Feast of the Dead, and to celebrate with services national memorial days like Thanksgiving and Armistice Day. See church year, church year cycle; feasts and fasts of the Roman Catholic Church; New Year's celebrations; wake.

Nicolas de Clémanges, "De novis celebritatibus non instituendis", Opera omnia, edited by J M, Lydius (1613); L. M. Duchesne, Les origines du culte chrétien (1898). 2nd ed., Walker Gwynne, The Christian Year (1915); K A. H Kellner, Heortology (trans. from the German, 1908), E. C Rodgers, Discussion of Holidays in the Later Middle Ages (1940), Hutton Webster, Rest Days (1916).

E C.R.

festivals, Jewish religious: See Jewish religious festivals.

fetishism: The use of a material object, which is the temporary or permanent abode of a soul or spirit as a means of acquiring values. The term, fetish, has largely lost its usefulness in the religious sciences because of the variety of meanings which have crept into it since the close of the 18th century. August Comte* extended its meaning to include nature worship, but it is now generally agreed that nature powers are not fetishes. The term has been used as practically synonymous with idol and amulet. As distinct from a fetish an idol is a material symbol or representation of a god. An amulet is a material object effective through its own mysterious potency and not because of the power of an indwelling spirit. Like the amulet, a fetish may be any material thing.

It is selected because of its origin, as the tooth or claw of an animal, or a human skull; because of its unusual character, or because of some experience of the possessor with it. A priest or shaman may persuade a spirit to take up its abode in the object. The fetish may be specialized to provide one specific value. more often it has a general usefulness in giving protection, preventing or healing disease, assuring success, fulfilling the desire for children or for more material things. If it fails it is discarded. When a fetish belongs to a village or a tribe and acquires a social cult, the embodied spirit is close to the status of a god. See charms and amulets, idols and images, magic, spirits.

A.E.H.

feudalism: The state of society in Europe from the ninth to the fifteenth century, in which the decisive political power rested with a landed aristocracy (barons) and among these a measure of security was attained by an intricate series of contracts of suzerainty and vassalage. As the possessor of property the medieval church became deeply entangled in the feudal nexus (See· eigenkirche, advowson; patronage) The theological and ecclesiastical thought of the period in some degree reflects the feudal social pattern and its presuppositions. Hildebrand's claims of papal authority, and the papal policy of securing oaths of fealty from secular rulers, accord with the feudal conception of lordship. But papal claims went beyond the bounds of contract and mounted to absolutism. Anselm's doctrine of atonement seems to assume a concept of God as resembling a feudal suzerain, offense against whom has the degree of gravity which corresponds to his dignity or rank. Feudal notions of contract lie behind the typical seventeenth century political doctrines, and may have affected the rise of the "covenant theology" in the Reformed Church.

J. Calmette, La société feodale, 2nd ed (1927); O Gierke, Political Theories of the Middle Ages, (transl. F. W. Maitland, 1900).

J.T.M.

Feuerbach, Ludwig Andreas: (1804-1872) Belongs to the so-called "left wing" of the old Hegelian school. He taught that religion is the mirror of man's own nature and ideals only, that God and the gods are nothing but products of a merely human imagination. He criticized severely Hegel's* speculative metaphysic for having completely oppressed the element of sensation, and he finally propagated sensualism and materialism. Cf. Ullmann, Karl.

Grundsätze der Philosophie der Zukunft (1843); Wesen des Christentums (1841); Wesen der Religion (1845); K. Grun, Ludwig Feuerbach (Leipzig, 1874); K. Lowith, Von Hegel bis Nietzsche (1941).

R.K.

Fichte, Immanuel Hermann: (1797-1879) Son of J. G. Fichte,* Immanuel H. Fichte, was in succession professor of philosophy at the universities of Bonn and Tubingen. He demanded a return of philosophy to the principle of personality. God must no longer be conceived as the universal but as the personal. In his ethical theism he strongly emphasized the social question. He was the editor of the Zeitschrift fur Philosophie und Speculative Theologie.

Die Idee der Persönlichkeit und der individuellen Fortdauer. 2 ed. (Leipzig, 1855); Speculative Theologie (Heidelberg, 1846-47); System der Ethik (Leipzig, 1850-53); Die Seelenfortdauer und die Weltstellung des Menschen, eine anthropologische Untersuchung und ein Beitrag zur Religionsphilosophie, wie zu einer Philosophie der Geschichte (Leipzig, 1867), Die theistische Weltansicht und ihre Berechtigung (Leipzig, 1873).   H.H.

Fichte, Johann Gottlieb: (1762-1814) Holding professorships at the University of Jena and at the newly established University of Berlin, he worked for the restoration of the German nation. No philosopher has ever made a patriotic appeal upon a higher moral plane.

Intent upon upholding the reality of religious and spiritual aspects of human life, Fichte asserts the independence, inwardness and validity of spiritual life. All religious symbols being merely makeshifts are nevertheless valuable in proportion as they make clear and living the thought of an ethical world order. In the consciousness of our empirical ego resides the more comprehensive infinite principle, the pure ego, the higher moral world order. Not being finished and in continuous development, the realization of the moral world order is the true goal of man. Fichte's religion in his earlier works, consisting in the belief in a moral world order, is a religion of cheerful right-doing. In his later works he stressed the life that stirs and wells up within the individual. In curious contrast to the earlier stress he laid on individuality, he now contends that personality is only a means, a tool to work for the highest good. Being but of a vanishing importance, the individual annuls himself, not by mystical brooding, but in active service. The vocation of individuals and nations is union with God in perfect love. The individual can gain a consciousness of this union in the present life. Both Rudolf Eucken* and Hugo Munsterberg, the late technical pilosophers, owed much to Fichte.

Fichte's Popular Works, tr by W. Smith (London, 1889); L Albers, Der Gottesbegriff bei Fichte (Breslau, 1915); Fr. Gogarten, Fichte als religiöser Denker (Jena, 1914); E. Hirsch, Christentum und Geschichte in Fichtes Philosophie (Tübingen, 1920); Fichtes Religionsphilosophie im Rahmen der philosophischen Gesamtentwicklung Fichtes (Göttingen, 1914); J. v. Hofe, J. G. Fichtes religöse Mystik nach ihren Ursprüngen untersucht (Bern, 1904); J. A. Leighton, Typical modern conceptions of God; or, The absolute of German romantic idealism and of English evolutionary agnosticism, with a constructive essay (1901); Fr. Zimmer, Johann Gottlieb Fichtes Religionsphilosophie nach den Grundzügen ihrer Entwicklung dargestellt (Berlin, 1878).   H.H.

Ficino, Marsilio: (1433-1499) Central figure in Renaissance Florentine Academy. As a promising and winsome young scholar he became a member of the household of Cosimo de' Medici, who chose him to head the Platonic cult inspired by Gemisthus Pletho* a few years earlier. Translated Plato, Plotinus and Dionysius the Areopagite into Latin, and sought to make Platonism an introduction for cultured minds to Christian faith.

Marsilii Ficini Opera (Basel, 1576).   W.E.G.

fideism: Fideism has two distinct meanings in French religious thought. 1) In Catholic thought, it refers to the teaching of the Abbé Bautain* that "faith precedes reason" in the knowledge of God, and "reason alone" is metaphysically incompetent. Bautain was required to sign a formula declaring that "Reasoning can prove with certitude the existence of God and the infinity of His perfections." 2) In Protestant thought, it refers to the teachings of Ménegoz* that man is saved "by faith, independently of beliefs." Both types of fideism show the influence of Kant's* critical philosophy.

On Fideism in the Catholic sense, see bibliography in the Catholic Encyclopaedia, art "Fideism"; W. M. Horton, doctoral dissertation The Philosophy of the Abbé Bautin. On the "Symbolo-Fideism" of Sabatier and Ménegoz see the article "Symbolo-Fideism" in H. E. R. E.; W M. Horton, "The Theology of Eugène Ménegoz", Journal of Religion (March, 1926).   W.M H.

Fifth Monarchy Men: A radical politico-religious group in England in the 1650's. In its opinion the unsettled conditions following the Civil War and the execution of Charles I indicated that the time was ripe for establishing the Fifth Monarchy foretold in Biblical prophesy. Its schemes failed, but as late as 1662 it was a threat to political stability.

Louise F. Brown, The Political Activities of the Baptists and Fifth Monarchy Men in England during the Interregnum (1912).   E.W.K.

figurine: A small carved or molded figure of a human being, animal, or bird.   G E.W.

Filelfo, Francesco: (1398-1481) Most famous of migrant Renaissance scholars, by turns at Padua (where he was professor at 18), Naples, Venice, Constantinople, Florence, Milan. A racketeer of humanism who successfully employed his powers of satire for blackmail and distributed panegyrics for profit. But his comprehensive knowledge of Greek literature was probably unexcelled in his time.

J. A. Symonds: Revival of Learning (1877), pp. 268-288   W.E.G.

filioque: A Western addition to the Creed, defining the procession* of the Holy Spirit as "from the Father and the Son," partly as an emphasis on the renunciation of Arianism* (e.g. by the Goths). The doctrine was defined in the East (C. Nicaea, 787) as "from the Father through the Son," in the West (C. Frankfort 794) the "Filioque clause" was adopted under the influence of Charles the Great. It became one of the main causes of separation between the Eastern and Western Churches. See creeds of Christendom; interpolation; Trinity. See also Constantinople, Councils of; Ferrara-Florence, Council of.   F.W.B.

final cause: S~e cause; finalism; teleology.

finalism: (Lat., finis, end) The belief that the universe is striving for ends, or for one supreme end. Bergson* thinks of finalism as restricted to preconceived and fixed ends, rather than including developing or creative ends; most philosophers and theologians use the term in the more inclusive sense. Syn., teleology.*　　　　　　　　E.S.B.

final (or last) judgment: The assize to be presided over by God or Christ, at which time all men, living and dead, will be judged. Well before the beginning of the Christian era this belief is found in Judaism, although it is not improbable than the basic notion of one final judgment at the end of the age (instead of periodic judgments at times of historic crisis) and of all men (not Israel's enemies only) is Persian, not Jewish in origin. This view, with many shades and modifications, is prominent in the apocalyptic writings* and was eagerly taken over and developed by Christians who asserted that their crucified Christ would be the presiding judge. The final separation of good and bad is the theme of two of the gospel parables—Wheat and Tares, Dragnet. The canonical book of Revelation* (19.11-21 8) provides the classical (if garish) picture of the scene as adopted and adapted by Christians. It has been a favorite theme for artists and preachers alike and is probably still accepted by many Christians today. See also apocalypticism (with appended bibliographies); eschatology; millenarianism.
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　M.S.E.

final perseverance: A doctrine, characteristic of Calvinism,* that regenerated souls, in spite of their sins, would continue, not through their own merit or in their own strength, but through the grace* of God, as children of His household, until the end. The doctrine is based mainly on such Scripture passages as 2 Tim. I. 12. See five points of Calvinism; perseverance of the saints.
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　A.K.R.

fine arts: Such human activity as converts feeling into forms possessing a high degree of intrinsic value. The class normally includes music, poetry, painting, sculpture, architecture; also with more restriction, the dance, theatre, and various forms of literature other than poetry. The fine arts are distinguished by emphasis rather than by a sharp line from the practical, minor, or industrial arts, such as agriculture, pottery-making, or medicine, which latter alter man or his environment for the convenience of common life. The distinguishing marks of the fine or beautiful arts have been variously named. The most often given is· the tendency to produce pleasure or delight in the fit audience; but the sublimation of passion or skill into contemplation, the expression of emotion, the achievement of emotive language, and perfection of workmanship have also been given. For bibliography, see Aesthetics, the delimitation of the fine arts being normally considered one problem in any general treatise in the field.　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　K.E.G.

finite: See infinite.

finite God: A God* whose power is limited by realities which he did not create. These realities may be external to God (dualism) or may be internal to him (personalism). Antonyms to finite. absolute, absolutely omnipotent, infinite in power. A God whose will is limited by the free acts of persons whom he has created is not finite in the sense defined. Believers in a finite God have usually held that God is infinite in goodness and in knowledge (at least, that he knows all that is knowable), and that his power is adequate for man's needs. The belief has usually arisen from the problem of evil.*

All primitive Gods were finite. Polytheistic deities were limited by each other as well as by the primeval chaos.* Zoroastrianism,* with its conflict between Ahura Mazda and Ahriman, is the source of one type of finitism. Plato (see Platonism) was the first to develop a philosophic theory of God as finite, his Artisan God confronted a rational Pattern and an Irrational Receptacle (see the Timaeus) which were external conditions of God's activity. Epicurus (341-270) forced the dilemma that God is either able or unable, willing or unwilling, to do away with evils. The gods of Epicurus were finite and neutral toward man, neither omnipotent nor benevolent. Marcion,* the Gnostic, represented the Heavenly Father as perfectly good, but limited by evil matter ruled by the devil, and by the cruel Creator God of the OT. Mani* (215-276), an eclectic, developed Zoroastrian finitism into Manichaean theories, Mani, in turn, influenced Pierre Bayle (1647-1706). Meanwhile mystics, like J. Boehme (1575-1624), recognized a real struggle within God. The Philo of Hume's* Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779) discussed, not too seriously, the idea of a finite deity. Kant* in the Critique of Pure Reason (1781) admits that the teleological argument proves "at most" a limited world-architect, but does not carry the idea further. The Hegelian dialectic (see Hegelianism), although leading to an Absolute, points to antitheses, negativities, conflicts within God. Schelling* spoke of die göttliche Unvernunft and der göttliche Unwille (that in God which is not reason or will).

The rise of naturalism in the 19th cent. led Mill in his posthumous Three Essays on Religion (1874) to declare for a finite God who "was obliged to adapt himself to conditions independent of his will." In 1891, F. C. S Schiller stated that a finite God "may be proved," and in 1907 William James's Pragmatism advocated a God who is primus inter pares. J. M. E. McTaggart in Some Dogmas of Religion (1906) and The Nature of Existence (1927) held that a finite God is preferable to an infinite one, but he denies any Creator God, on the ground that creation presupposes the reality of time, which he rejects. H. Rashdall, a personalist, from 1910 on favored a finite God, L. P. Jacks takes a similar view. In 1917 H. G. Wells popularized the idea of a finite God in God the Invisible King, a curious and fantastic notion of a youthful God, recently born, but nobly developing. H. Bergson in Two Sources of Morality and Religion (Eng. tr., 1935), on empirical grounds, denied that God is the creator of suffering and drew the inference that he is not omnipotent.

Recent American philosophy and theology have witnessed a marked increase of belief in the finiteness of God J E. Boodin has been advocating it since 1916 A N. Whitehead's modern Platonism in Process and Reality (1929) has exercised a strong influence in favor of a finite God. H. N. Wieman has developed an impersonal naturalistic finitism, while C. Hartshorne has moved toward a panpsychistic theism (a finite-infinite God), both inspired by Whitehead. Meanwhile a finite God has been advocated independently by H. B. Alexander (1929), W. P. Montague in Belief Unbound (1930), E. S. Brightman (1930 on), especially in A Philosophy of Religion (1940), by W. T. Stace in The Nature of the World (1940), and by D. H. Parker in Experience and Substance (1941).

The chief sources of modern belief in a finite God have been awareness of the suffering and waste of the struggles for survival (prehuman as well as human), a keen sense of the problem of suffering on account of wars and economic depressions, the development of modern physics (quanta, indeterminacy), heightened religious sensitivity to the goodness of God, and increased confidence in empirical as distinguished from a priori methods.

Among contemporaries who accept a finite God differences center about one problem Is the Given (that which limits God's power) something external to God or something within his own eternal experience? Many naturalists (for whom the problem of the will of God does not exist), realists, and dualists (whether Platonists or creationists) find the Given external to God, for example, P. E More, H. N. Wieman, W. K. Wright, R. Demos, G. Harkness, and many others. Among those who find the Given (or some limitation) within God are E. S. Brightman (reason and brute facts like sensation and suffering constitute a rational and a nonrational Given within the unity of the divine personality), N. Berdyaev, P. Tillich, R. L. Calhoun ("rigidities" within God), John Bennett, C. Hartshorne (Vision of God, 1941), and P. A. Bertocci.

The idea appears in the poetry of Rainer Maria Rilke, as well as in the more popular verse of Studdert-Kennedy and Edwin Markham, and in the dramatic form of The Green Pastures.

See evil; infinite, value. Cf. Renouvier

In addition to the bibliography cited in the article, see V. Ferm, First Chapters in Religious Philosophy (1937), and, for the best critique of the idea of a finite God, A C Knudson, The Doctrine of Redemption (1933), R. B. Baker, The Concept of a Limited God (1934), is informing but not objective Methodologically illuminating is P. A. Bertocci, The Empirical Argument for God in Late British Thought (1938).   E.S.B.

Finney, Charles Grandison: (1792-1875) American evangelist and theologian, noted for his adoption of dramatic revival methods, such as the "anxious bench." These methods logically expressed his faith in the capacity of man's will to respond to God's just moral demands when clearly and decisively confronted with these demands. See Oberlin theology.   W.M.H.

Finnian: (Findian and various spellings) of Clonard (d. ca. 550). Irish monastic founder, called "Tutor of the Saints of Ireland" Finnian of Moville was a younger contemporary the Penitential of Finnian has been ascribed to the latter, but is more probably the work of the Clonard saint

J F. Kenney, Sources for the Early History of Ireland. I. Ecclesiastical (1929)   J.T M.

Fioretti: (Ital, "Little Flowers", full title, Fioretti di S. Francesco d'Assisi) A collection of popular legends concerning St. Francis* and his early companions, which exemplify the Saint's childlike faith and his sense of the supernatural The collection consists of fifty-three chapters, written about 1328, and four appendices, added later. There are several English translations. c.v.

fiqh: The authoritative theology and law of Islam. This canon law was developed by four orthodox schools 1) the Hanbolite of Arabia, 2) the Hanifite of central Asia, 3) the Malikite of upper Egypt and north Africa, 4) the Shafiite of lower Egypt, India, Malay and Syria.   P.E.J.

Fire Baptized Holiness Church of God of the Americas: A Negro pentecostal sect, found mainly in South Carolina but having congregations in several other states. It was organized by W. E. Fuller in 1898 at Anderson, S. C. The sect holds the customary doctrines of the pentecostal groups, stressing speaking in unknown tongues, feet washing, and divine healings. In its statement of doctrine to the U. S. Census it claims to uphold "the premillennial second coming of Christ" but opposes "false and unscriptural adventism." It has 59 churches and 2,000 members. See pentecostal sects.   E.T C.

fire gods: Agni and Atar: Agni* divinized fire in the Vedas* and in later Hinduism,* was the son of the earth, the bond between superhuman powers, the mediator between gods and men, the protector and purifier. In Zoroastrianism,* Atar,* the sacred fire, was not as fully personified as Agni, but as son of Ahura Mazda* he fought against the powers of evil, particularly the dragon Azhi.   R.H.P.

firmament: (Lat., firmamentum, from firmare—to strengthen) The arch or hollow vault of the heavens, in ancient astronomy regarded as a fixed sphere which contained the stars. Sometimes used for heaven, the abode of God.   J.E.N.

first cause: Metaphysicians generally feel the necessity of assuming a First cause, either as axiom or postulate. The evolutionary type of thought process, for example, has strengthened the tendency. It is claimed by some that the nature of thought requires a pou sto, a place to stand, as a condition of its activity. Also, that in selecting the character of a First cause, sufficient characteristics and qualities should be ascribed to it to provide adequate implementation of inference that may be desired later at any level of interpretation. That is to say that the potentiality of First cause should be adequate for the demands of actuality. See cause. P.R H.

First Day Sabbath: See Sunday.

first fruits: The first fruits ceremonies probably originated as a tribal method of protecting the food* supply until it was mature and ready for general use. The firstfruits were usually offered to the gods most concerned with the production of the crops or to the priests of the gods When ancestors were credited with control over the food supply they received the firstfruits. Where fish or animals were the main source of food, the first of the catch and the firstlings of the flock were ceremonially treated as firstfruits. The practice spread sometimes to include the human first born. Crops were usually released for use by a ceremonial eating by king or priest or chief or by a general feast. The shrines of Greece and the priests of Israel drew their revenues from the firstfruits. See harvest festivals, human sacrifice; tabu. A E H.

fish as symbol: The Greek word was Ichthus which is composed of the first letters of the words, Jesous Christos Theou Huios Soter, "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Savior." But this was probably a later explanation, and the origin is to be sought in other connections. The fish lives in water, as the Christian lives by his baptism. The fish in the story of the miraculous feeding made it a symbol of the Christ on whom they fed. There were many fish gods in antiquity. The Christian use of the acrostic may be traced to the second century. C.T.C.

Fiske, John: (1842-1901) An American historian noted also for his writings attempting to show that evolutionary theory is compatible with religious faith. He was graduated at Harvard College 1863 and at Harvard Law School 1865. Lecturer on Philosophy and History and thereafter assistant librarian at Harvard. Lectured at Washington University (St. Louis), University College London, and at the Royal Institution. According to Fiske, the events of the evolutionary process are the results of the immanent causality of the living God, "the infinite and eternal Power that is manifested in every pulsation of the universe." Since the evolutionary process has progressively tended toward the highest ethical and spiritual qualities of man, we recognize the essential kinship of the human soul with God and we affirm as a reasonable faith the "quasi-personal" and moral character of God the immanently operating Cause. The revelation of such immanent teleology* involving the "essential kinship" of the human soul with the "Quasi-Human God" suggests moreover that man is destined for personal immortality.* See immanence.

Among Fiske's main works are the following: Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy (1874) ; The Unseen World (1876) ; Darwinism and other Essays (1879) ; The Destiny of Man (1884) ; The Idea of God (1885) ; Through Nature to God (1899) ; Life Everlasting (1901). R.W.J.

Fitch, Eleazer Thompson: (1791-1871) Congregational clergyman and Yale professor, graduated from Yale College in 1810 and entered Andover Theological Seminary in 1812. Graduated after the regular three year course, he remained as assistant to the Professor of Homiletics, meanwhile helping Jeremiah Evarts to edit the Panoplist, the periodical established by the Orthodox to oppose the Boston liberals. In July, 1817, Fitch was called to Yale to succeed Timothy Dwight* as the Livingston Professor of Divinity in the College. In this position his chief duty was to supply the College pulpit, and to instruct undergraduates in Natural Theology and the Evidences of Christianity. Long concerned for the advanced training of theological students at Yale, he gave freely of his time and money and was an important factor in the foundation of the Divinity School in 1822. In that school he served as Acting Professor of Sacred Literature (1822-1824), and as Lecturer in Homiletics for almost forty years (1824-1861).

It was Fitch and his colleagues at Yale who shaped the New Haven theology*. His influence in the movement was considerable, and has probably been underestimated because he was outshown by his more colorful companions. His Two Discourses on the Nature of Sin (1826), were the outstanding pronouncement of the Yale group on that subject, and Taylor's* Concio ad Clerum of September, 1828, which has received the center of attention because it precipitated the controversy with the conservatives, has rightfully been called a re-statement of Fitch's position.

Franklin B Dexter, Biographical Sketches of the Graduates of Yale College, VI (1912), 316-321; S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor (1942). S.E.M.

five-mile-act: The Act of Uniformity of 1662 led to the dismissal of about two thousand of the clergy from the Church of England. They and numerous schoolmasters were leaders of the Dissenters * Restrictions were added: In 1664 the Conventicle* Act and in 1665 the Five Mile Act by which Non-Anglican ministers and schoolmasters were forbidden to come within five miles of a corporate borough or city. This intolerance was a considerable factor in giving a sort of united front to Dissenters till the Toleration Act* (1689). Q.B.

five points of Arminianism: In 1610, the Arminians addressed to the government of Holland a protest in five articles (The Remonstrance) against the five points of Calvinism*. Prepared by Uytenbogaert and signed by forty-five ministers (The Remonstrants*), the Remonstrance emphasized the following.

1) Election and condemnation, conditioned upon the faith or unbelief of men.

2) Atonement for all but only believers enjoy its benefits.

3) Man, unaided by the Holy Spirit, unable to come to God.

4) Grace not irresistible.

5) Doctrine of the perseverance of the converted open to inquiry. See Arminian theology; Dort, Synod of. W.E.R.

five points of Calvinism: The five points emphasized by the Calvinists in their discussions with Arminius came to be known as the Five Points of Calvinism. They are
1) Unconditional election.
2) Atonement limited to the elect.
3) Depravity, total as to ability and merit.
4) Irresistible grace.
5) Perseverance of the saints. See Arminian theology, Calvinism, Dort, Synod of, Remonstrants, the. w.e.r.

flabellum: (Lat., a fan) A fan used in Catholic worship. Originally designed for the practical purpose of warding of insects from the offerings at the Eucharistic Sacrifice, it was used in the East as early as the fifth century. It soon lost its primitive purpose, and was transformed into a metallic ornament, decorated usually with six-winged cherubim.* Never of very wide use in the West, it was principally a processional ornament. In solemn papal functions of a non-liturgical character, large, ostrich-feather fans accompany the papal entry. c.v.

Flacius, Matthias: (1520-1575) Lutheran Reformer, much involved in the religious controversies of his day. Disagreement with other reformers led to recurrent expulsion, but in spite of adverse conditions his extensive literary output was significant in exposing bad history and bad exegesis. g.r.c.

Flagellants: (Lat., flagellum, a scourge) Religious enthusiasts giving rise, sporadically, throughout thirteenth-century Europe in particular, to self-administered floggings, en masse, as penance for sin. Their processions, relatively moderate and often spiritually effective at first, took on chiliastic abandon and anti-hierarchical extremes that elicited mounting ecclesiastical disapproval and persecution. r.c.p.

Fletcher, John William: (1729-1785) Vicar of Madeley, Yorkshire, public supporter of the Wesleyan Revival, defender of Arminianism,* called by John Wesley the holiest man he had ever met, or expected to meet, "this side eternity." f.g.e.

Fliedner, Theodor: (1800-1864) He was the founder of the feminine diaconate. He first started a prison society which aimed to take care of dismissed inmates of penitentiaries. This became the seed for the origin of Fliedner's Kaiserswerth institution. He founded the house of the deaconesses* in 1836. The institutions of Kaiserswerth embraced practically all the branches of feminine evangelical welfare.
G. Fliedner, Theodor Fliedner, 3 vols. (Kaiserswerth, 1892); Th Schafer, Die weibliche Diakonie in ihrem ganzen Umfang, 3 ed. vol. I (Potsdam, 1911), 2 ed. vols II and III (Potsdam, 1892). h.h.

flood: See deluge.

Florence, Council of: See Basel, Council of; Ferrara—Florence, Council of.

Florilegia: Collections of choice passages from some author or literature. These florilegia or anthologies (for the Latin word is an exact translation of the Greek) were frequently made in early Christian times, when books in their completeness were difficult to procure. The best known example is the collection of extracts from Origen* by Basil and Gregory Nazianzen.
J. A. Robinson, Philocalia (1893). z.f.s.

Flournoy, Théodore: (1854-1920) Professor of experimental psychology at the university of Geneva; a pioneer in religious psychology. Many of his articles in this field appeared in the Archives de Psychologie between 1901 and 1915, which he founded with E. Claparède.
Etudes sur un cas de somnambulisme avec glossolalie (Geneve, 1900); La philosophie de William James (Sainte-Blaise, 1911); Le génie religieux (Sainte-Blaise, 1911); Métaphysique et psychologie, 2 ed. (Geneve, 1919). h.h.

Flowers Lectureship, the John McTyeire: Established in 1921 with a capital sum of $5,000, by Mr. B. N. Duke at Duke University, Durham, N. C. Primarily intended for the promotion of lectures on Far Eastern subjects although not limited to this field. The lectures are given at varying intervals. Among the lecturers Dr. Paul S. Reinsch; Dr. W. W. Keen, Prof. J. T. Shotwell. (Data furnished by the office of the Dean of the Divinity School.) v.f.

Flügel, Otto: (1842-1921) As pastor in Wansleben, Germany, he was one of the most active of Herbartians* of his day. God is finite and differs in degrees from every individual He is not strictly omnipotent as He is outside the world and as He depends upon the externally given reals. He is not eternal as the content of his spirit is due to His relation to the world. Only the moral attributes are unconditionally expressing Him. Christian revelation fills out the gaps of knowledge.
Der Materialismus vom Standpunkt der atomistisch-mechanischen Naturforschung beleuchtet (Leipzig, 1865); Das Wunder und die Erkennbarkeit Gottes (Leipzig, 1869); Die Speculative Theologie der Gegenwart kritisch beleuchtet (Cothen, 1881), Zur Philosophie des Christenthums (Langensalza, 1900). h.h.

folklore: Folklore is the science of tradition. It deals with superstitions, practices, tales and songs that are the property of the unlearned and are transmitted by word of mouth as contrasted with manuscripts or printed books. The study of folklore, like anthropology and archaeology, has as its purpose the reconstruction of the mental and spiritual history of mankind. It is based on the fact that in civilized as well as in savage communities there exist customs, beliefs, and memories that are relics of an ancient and often unrecorded past. It recognizes the truth that no superstition is completely without foundation and that, however, unscientific or otherwise insufficient may be the data on which superstitions are based, the superstitions themselves may be utilized in such a way as to cultivate greater tolerance and mutual understanding among the various races and communities of the earth and to minimize the conflict between classes and masses.

The data of folklore are found not only in customs current among the uneducated but also in fairy tales, ballads, and much else that has made its way into written history and into sophisticated literature. When history asserts that the site of a certain city was indicated by the movements of a supernaturally endowed animal, or when a literary work such as Hamlet has as a hero a noble youth disinherited by a wicked kinsman who has murdered his father and married his mother, we are dealing with themes that have their roots deep in the lore of the folk. Folklore is also connected with the history of religion in that it includes numerous saints' legends,* and many myths and practices belonging to the "elder faiths" of mankind but no longer accepted by the great organized religions. The Bible contains many allusions to folk customs and rituals, such as the distinction between clean and unclean. To the domain of folklore also belong many tales and traditions having to do with magic* and witchcraft*. Numerous popular superstitions are included in folk medicine and in peasant lore regarding crops, the seasons, and the weather. Folk tradition also explains most of the popular cures for warts, omens drawn from the howling of dogs and from black cats, and the belief that the planting of certain crops should be regulated by the changes in the moon. Folklore also embraces various types of animal stories, beliefs regarding lucky and unlucky numbers, popular proverbs, rhymes and riddles, including those current among children, and many short narratives, designed to inculcate some simple practical lesson, as in certain versions of Cupid and Psyche and Blue Beard. Especially instructive for the student of folklore are aetiological myths and pourquoi stories—tales told to explain why, for example, a certain cliff is called "Lover's Leap", why the robin has a red breast, or why the Pleiades consist of seven stars. Indeed, there is scarcely an observation or experience possible to simple folk from the cradle to the grave which does not furnish beliefs that belong to folklore.

The scientific study of folklore began during the late 18th century as a result of the Romantic Movement, and since that period numerous hypotheses have been proposed in explanation of the phenomena involved. Many scholars, beginning with Jacob Grimm, have sought to explain folk-tales and ballads as merely broken-down myths of the ancient Aryans, but their conclusions have gradually lost favor. Other investigators, known as the Anthropological School and best represented by Sir James G. Frazer's The Golden Bough, believe that many tales and superstitions now regarded as silly or incomprehensible originated in remote times in social groups where they had a very definite and understandable meaning. Another group have devoted their attention particularly to traditions which, though widely separated in place, bear a close resemblance in form or content. An illustration is furnished by the numerous stories of grateful, helpful animals of which versions exist or are known to have existed in India, in Europe, and in Africa. Opinion seems to be divided as to whether similar folk-tales arise independently under similar social conditions in different places (polygensis) or whether the parallels observed are due to transmission from one place to another. A certain amount of progress toward a solution of the problem has been achieved by the Folklore Fellows, an international organization composed of scholars who, by analyzing as many variants as possible of a given popular tale or superstition, attempt to reconstruct the archetype and to establish its approximate place and date of origin. In general, however, the folklorist must content himself for the present with collecting materials in the hope that when larger numbers of examples are available in recorded form, they may serve as the basis of more convincing theories.

Alexander H. Kroppe, The Science of Folk-Lore (1930) ; E. Hoffmann-Krayer, ed , Volkskundliche Bibliographie (1917-, Berlin and Leipzig, 1919-) ; Stith Thompson, Motif-Index of Folk-Literature (1932-36) (F F Communications), 6 vols   T.P.C.

folkways: See culture.

fomorians: Powers of darkness, in Celtic legend, overcome by the children of Danu, Tuatha De Danann, usually represented as misshapen giants. They came from under the sea.   P.G.M.

Fondren Lectureship: Established in 1919 at Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Texas, by Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Fondren, from whom a gift of $10,000 was received. Its purpose is to provide each year at the University a series of lectures on Christian Missions or the Christian Faith. Among the lecturers have been R. E. Speer, J M. Moore, J. Moffatt, F. J. McConnell, C. R. Brown, A. C. Knudson, E. H. Hughes, Edwin Lewis, A. E. Day.   A.C.K.

font: (Lat., fons, fountain) The vessel for the baptismal water. In the early church a tank, later a bowl mounted on a pedestal, often elaborately decorated.   B.S.E.

food: Food has always been a primary value for man. In early cultures, the necessity of securing, protecting and guaranteeing the food supply gave rise to a very large proportion of the religious ceremonies. Practical and ceremonial techniques were always combined, the ceremonial expressing the emotional tension centered in the hunger drive. In addition to these fundamental techniques for securing food a bewildering number of rules were made to control its use or misuse and to forbid the eating of certain forms. Where the supply was precarious, restrictions were placed upon the young or upon women, groups abstained from eating their totem* animal and performed the ritual to multiply it for the use of others; a closed season was often established to protect food sources growing scarce; the law of first-fruits* guarded the crop until it matured. Some tribes refused to eat certain animals for fear of acquiring their qualities. Groups on all the continents, for different reasons, avoid the eating of pork. Jewish law forbad the eating of certain animals, the blood and intestinal fat of food animals, and all animals torn by beasts or dying a natural death. The development of the rule of non-injury in India restricted the killing of animals for food. Owing to the sanctity of the cow after the Vedic period, beef was especially banned although the Laws of Manu* permit the eating of it under certain conditions. Food was generally offered to the dead and to the gods. In some cases these ceremonial offerings developed into communion meals. See animals, worship of; cannibalism, feasting, kosher, milk and honey, nature worship; sacramental meal, tabu   A.E H.

Fools, Feast of: See Feast of Fools.

foreknowledge, Divine: Traditionally, God's view of events, to us future, from His supertemporal standpoint. According to Thomism,* God knows our future acts, even though they are free, because he knows events, not through their conditions in earlier events, but directly, in themselves. He is as the center of a circle, equally near to every point of time. This assumes that events to us future are yet in themselves real and determinate, or that time is analogous to a circle and not to an endless line whose points are added to it from moment to moment and form no completed sum. Scotists* reject the Thomistic view, but hold that God knows the future because its determining conditions are in his will, but thereby human freedom is contradicted. Ockham* held that the philosophically reasonable view is that the future, being more or less indeterminate or free, cannot be known determinately, even by God; but revelation, he thought, forces us to renounce this view. Yet the Socinians* and others later adopted it as precisely the one supported by Scriptural religion. Many philosophers and theologians now hold that only past events—inclusive of the present—are fully real or determinate, so that for God to "know" "all" events as determinate would be for him to know some of them falsely or as they are not. Future events being indeterminate, not merely in relation to earlier events, but intrinsically, it follows that perfect knowledge grasps the past inclusive of the present as determinate, but the future only with such determinacy as it really has—this depending upon the not unlimited extent to which past conditions already determine it. Any determination beyond that can exist and be known as existent only, it is held, when the future comes into full being as a present, new in itself and for all true knowledge. Time is not a complete whole, to be viewed in one complete vision, but a whole ever-to-be-increased-somehow-or-other, that is, in a way not determined either in advance or eternally. ("What will be will be" begs the question of whether time consists wholly of will-be's and will-not-be's, rather than, in part at least, of may-or-may-not-be's reducible to determinate being only by their creation as present events. If time be such, then omniscience* is only possible as itself temporal— as knowing new facts when there are new facts to know, but always knowing all the facts there are at the time. See eternity; perfect; predestination; reprobation; time.

See G. T. Fechner, Zendavesta Ch. 11, (1851), O Pfleiderer, Grundriss der Christlichen Glaubens-und Sittenlehre (1888), A E Garvie, The Christian Faith (1937).   C.H.

foreordination: The doctrine that the nature of God, who is perfect in wisdom and knowledge, and whose Holy Love is the sovereign power of all being, necessarily involves the existence of His eternal and determining purposes with reference to all events, including the volitions of men. The particular theological interest in this doctrine has been concerned with the relationship of the divine teleology to human freedom, responsibility and assurance in the matter of salvation. See predestination.   H.W.J.

forged decretals: See false decretals.

forgeries: A number of writings have appeared in medieval and modern times based wholly or in part on biblical or apocryphal literature, or suggested by sources and incidents recorded in the Bible (e.g., the Book of Jashar or "the Upright"), which have been fraudulently represented and published as ancient and authoritative documents. The nature of these publications makes it often difficult to trace their origins and editions. For accounts including these data as well as descriptions of contents one may consult encyclopedias of Religion and Bible and E. J. Goodspeed, Strange New Gospels (1931), and New Chapters in New Testament Study (1937), chap. VIII. The following are some of the better known of such spurious documents. The Confession of Pontius Pilate, The Aquarian Gospel, A Correct Transcript of Pilate's Court (known also under various other titles, especially the Archko Volume), the Unknown Life of Jesus Christ or Life of St. Issa, Best of the Sons of Men, The Letter of Benan, The Letter of Jesus Christ or Letter from Heaven, The Twenty-ninth Chapter of Acts, The Gospel of Josephus or Concerning the Life of Jesus of Nazareth, The Book of Jashar (various forms), .The Crucifixion, by an Eyewitness. For other lesser works see Goodspeed, op. cit. See also Lost Books of the Bible.   A.P.W.

forgiveness: The Christian religion is supremely distinguished from other religions by placing the divine forgiveness of sins in the center of the relation between man and God. To be sure, all religions that know of a relation with a personal deity teach the forgiveness of sins. But it is the special character of the Christian gospel that it proclaims on the authority of the life and teaching and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, that it is the nature of God to be a forgiving, merciful Father. The source of the Christian life is therefore the forgiveness of sins as it is assured by Christ. Because this is so, the Christian ethic is pre-eminently a religious one. For the Christian is taught to acknowledge himself a sinner in the presence of the merciful God and, having been released from his sin through forgiveness and responding with gratitude to the divine gift, to be an agent of forgiving love in the relations with his fellow men.

Christian theology has expounded the gospel of forgiveness by devoting special attention to the meaning of the work of Christ as the author and perfecter of the faith in this gospel (see Jesus Christ, Christology; atonement, justification) and by explaining how forgiveness is related to justice, namely by superseding it without destroying its validity (see justice, and gospel). See absolution, pardon; penance, redemption, retention of sins, satisfaction; sin.   W.P.

form: (Lat., forma, form; Gr, eidos, shape, form) In Aristotle and the Scholastics, the intrinsic determinant of existence in any being; in material beings, form is what actualizes, specifies and makes determinate. In Kant, the form of knowledge is one of the a priori molds, such as time or space, causality or relation, into which our experiences fit. See Aristotle and Aristotelianism, Kant.   L.R.W.

formal cause: See cause.

formalism: The attachment of great significance to the scrupulous observance of external rules in morality or religion, with a view of thereby earning the rewards which are believed to follow from such a course of action. The critics charge formalism with jeopardizing the autonomy of the human spirit by failing to give proper recognition to the essentially inward character of the moral and spiritual realities which are the sources and the controlling factors in the outward expression and the external embodiment of the genuinely moral and religious life.   H.W.J.

form criticism, or Formgeschichte: A method of research which has grown up in Germany since 1919 when Martin Dibelius* published Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Eng. tr., From Tradition to Gospel, 1935). The method had been anticipated in a number of earlier works, e.g. those by Johannes Weiss* and, especially with reference to the OT, by Hermann Gunkel.* Form criticism is really an attempt to recover the units of oral tradition which were in circulation before the gospels were written; a better name for it would be 'Tradition Criticism.'

As practiced by Dibelius, Rudolf Bultmann,* and other leaders of the school, the first step is to classify the material in the gospels. Dibelius' scheme is the following: The Old Stories (including the Passion Narrative), Parables, Sayings, The Great Miracle Tales, Legends. It is of course recognized that later editorial settings (or 'frames': Rahmen), interpretations, revisions, and constructions must be removed. Some critics undertake to distinguish Hellenistic from earlier Jewish-Christian material; no doubt there are traces of Hellenistic influence in the method of telling or in the interpretation given to some of the stories in the gospels, but it does not necessarily follow that 'Hellenistic' material is necessarily 'later' than Jewish-Christian—the Hellenistic movement began very early in the history of the church. One point is of special interest· the form of the oldest stories is much simpler than that of 'the great miracle tales,' which upon other grounds probably were later in date of formulation. Another important feature is the recognition of the poetic structure in practically all Jesus' sayings Like many other wisdom teachers, he was a poet

Form criticism stresses the dependence of the tradition upon the community which handed it down. Some critics go the length of assuming that the community produced most of the tradition; the majority, led by Dibelius, assume that the community preserved the tradition, emphasizing and interpreting and of course first of all selecting those traditions which best met current needs and problems. In other words, the gospel tradition was a community tradition, from the start, and was not the private possession of individuals. Perhaps the chief value of form criticism is its emphasis upon the fact that the gospel tradition was handed down within the group, the church. The significance of this for the earliest interpretation of the tradition and also for the growth of doctrine is clear.

See Dibelius, as above, also The Message of Jesus Christ (1939), Gospel Criticism and Christology (1935); R Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 2nd edition (1931); R H Lightfoot, History and Interpretation in the Gospels (1935), V. Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (1933); B. S Easton, The Gospel Before the Gospels (1928), F C. Grant, Form Criticism, a New Method of New Testament Research (1934) (incl. tr of The Study of the Synoptic Gospels, by R. Bultmann, and Primitive Christianity in the Light of Gospel Research, by K Kundsin), Dibelius' Message contains his reconstruction of the Oral Pericopes which underlie the gospels   F.C.G.

Former Prophets, The: See Old Testament, Canon, Old and New Testament.

Formula of Concord: The latest of the Lutheran confessional writings, this document was issued in 1577 by the Lutheran Church of Germany and later incorporated in the Book of Concord.* It is a deliberate effort to arrive at a final solution of the doctrinal conflicts raging since Luther's death between the rigid adherents of Luther (Gnesio-Lutherans) and the more liberal followers of Melanchthon (Philippists) The Formula, based upon a critical use of documents evolved in previous efforts at unity (Swabian Concord, Formula of Maulbronn, Book of Torgau), was the work of mediating theologians, chief of whom were Jacob Andrea and Martin Chemnitz.* It has two parts, a brief Epitome, written by Andrea, and a larger "Solid Repetition and Declaration" of joint origin. In its twelve articles on the mooted questions of original sin, free will, justification, good works, law and gospel, eucharist, Christology, descent into hell, adiaphora, predestination, and sects, the Formula steers a careful middle course between the extremists of both sides, but succeeds in reaffirming the basic teaching of the Augsburg Confession.* Submitted to Lutheran princes and city councils for official adoption, it met with only limited success. It became, however, a permanently significant statement of the consensus of Lutheran belief, the basis of Lutheran orthodoxy, and the means by which Lutheranism* has maintained its independence from Calvinism * See antinomian-ism, Confessions, Formal of the Christian Church, perichoresis.   T.A.K.

Fortunatus, Venantius: See hymns.

fortune in the Greek and Roman religions: Tyche (Gr. Tychē, from tyncháno, to happen), Fortune or Chance, never became fully personified in Greek religious thought nor a subject of myth-ology, but her importance grew as the authority of the old gods declined. Fortuna (Lat. Fortūna, from fero, to bear), an ancient Italian oracular divinity, Destiny, worshiped at Praeneste as Primigenia, first-born daughter of Jove. She is represented with cornucopia and ship's rudder. As pure chance, the goddess is known as Fors Fortuna. Cf. fatalism, fate.   I.M.N.

forty hours' devotion: Also called Forty Hours' Adoration. Forty Hours' Prayer. Consists of forty continuous hours of prayer in presence of the Blessed Sacrament publicly and solemnly exposed, in order to adore and praise and thank Christ in the Eucharist for the benefits granted to man-kind, and to petition Him especially for public needs, in particular for peace. In places where it is too inconvenient to have the adoration continue during the night, the exposition may be inter-rupted for the night. It is continued for forty hours because of the supposed forty hours that Christ was in the tomb

The devotion is accompanied by special services. It opens with a public votive Mass* of the Blessed Sacrament, followed by a procession of the Blessed Sacrament and the chanting of the Litany of All Saints. It closes on the third day with the public votive Mass of the Blessed Sacrament, the chant-ing of the Litany of All Saints, and the proces-sion of the Blessed Sacrament. On the second day a public votive Mass for some necessity, usu-ally peace, is celebrated. At least twenty candles burn continuously on the altar where exposition takes place, and it is adorned with many flowers. The faithful who make a visit to a church where Forty Hours is in progress and fulfill the other conditions required may gain a plenary indul-gence each day during the Forty Hours; and since the decree of Pope Pius X* in 1914, these indul-gences can be gained even when the Forty Hours is interrupted for the night. Since the promulga-tion of the Code of Canon Law in 1918 Forty Hours Devotion is obligatory in all churches where the Blessed Sacrament is habitually reserved, unless it is too inconvenient or impossible.
History·
The origin of Forty Hours' Devotion lies hid-den in obscurity. Some historians think that the Barnabites, St. Anthony Mary Zaccaria and Father Bonus of Cremona began it about 1527-1529. Others think the honor goes to the Capuchin Father, Joseph of Fermo who about 1534 organ-ized forty continuous hours of prayer to be held successively in all the churches of Milan so that Milan would not be without Forty Hours' Prayer throughout the year, in order to counteract the forces that were threatening the peace of the Church at that time. During this Forty Hours the Blessed Sacrament was on the altar but not necessarily exposed to the view of the faithful. Shortly after St. Philip Neri and the Jesuit Fathers introduced Forty Hours into Rome. It was approved by Pope Paul III in 1539.

In 1592 Clement VIII issued the apostolic constitution Graves et disuturnae by which he prescribed the Forty Hours' Devotion for Rome. In 1606 Paul V confirmed the decree of Clement VIII and established it in perpetuity for Rome. It seems that he ordered the public votive Masses to be said during Forty Hours. Succeeding Popes issued various regulations governing the Forty Hours' Devotion. These were collected under Clement XI in 1705 and are known as the Clem-entine Instructions. In 1730 Clement XII made a few slight changes and promulgated these in-structions anew for Rome. They are still the law for Rome and have been the guide for Forty Hours elsewhere.

When Forty Hours Devotion was introduced into the United States is not clear. It seems that it was introduced as a form of diocesan devotion by the saintly Bishop Neumann in the diocese of Philadelphia in 1853, although it was practiced in individual churches prior to that. The Plenary Council of Baltimore of 1866 formally enjoined Forty Hours upon all the dioceses of the United States.   D.U.

Forty-Two Articles: Articles of faith framed largely by Cranmer, issued (without formal au-thorization) for the Church of England in 1553, later served as basis of the Thirty-Nine Articles*. See Thirteen Articles.   E.R.H.

fossarians: (Lat., fossor, a digger) Christian grave-diggers who, in the Church of the second or third century, came to have a specialized, pro-fessional status. Probably at one time counted among the minor clergy, they were remunerated from voluntary offerings, out of the common treasury, or through economic immunities. By the fifth century their abuse of far-reaching corporate rights led to their dissolution as a group. R.C.P.

Foster, Frank Hugh: (1861-1935) Graduate Harvard Univ. 1873, Andover 1877. Professor of Systematic Theology, Pacific Theological Seminary, 1892-1902; Philosophy and History, Olivet Col-lege, 1907-1916. In his earlier teaching an ex-ponent and defender of New England Calvinistic orthodoxy, he later announced its collapse and became its leading historian.   .
Author: Grotius' Defence (1889) a translation with notes; Fundamental Ideas of the Roman Catholic Church (1899) ; Christian Life and Theology (1900) ; A Genetic History of the New England Theology (1907) ; The Modern Movement in American The-ology (1939), lectures published by Dr. J. G. Green.   J.W.B.

Foster, George Burman: (1858-1918) The-ologian and philosopher. Noted as a great teacher and as a champion of freedom in religious think-ing. Educated at Shelton College, U. of W. Va., Rochester Theol. Sem., Univs. Göttingen and Berlin. Ordained Baptist ministry, 1878. Pastor of the First Baptist Church, Saratoga Springs, N. Y. 1887-1891. Prof.. of Phil., McMaster Univ. 1892-1895. At the Univ. of Chicago as asso. prof. (1895-1897) and prof. (1897-1905) in the Department of Systematic Theology, and as prof. of the Philosophy of Religion in the Department of Comparative Religion (1905-1918). Among Foster's most influential writings are the following. The Finality of the Christian Religion (1906); The Function of Religion in Man's Struggle for Existence (1909). Foster also made contributions which include. a) a sermon on The Function of Death in Human Experience in Univ. of Chicago Sermons (1915), ed. by T. G. Soares; b) a chapter on "The Contribution of Critical Scholarship to Ministerial Efficiency" in A Guide to the Study of the Christian Religion (1916), ed. by Gerald Birney Smith, numerous articles in The Biblical World, The American Journal of Theology, Journal of Religion, and other publications. Most important among the writings published posthumously are· a) a volume embodying Foster's lectures on the dogmatics and ethics of the Christian religion, ed. by Douglas Clyde Macintosh under the title Christianity in Its Modern Expression (1921); b) Foster's lectures on Nietzsche, ed. Curtis W. Reese, and published in a volume entitled Friedrich Nietzsche (1931).

Foster was profoundly concerned with the problem of the objective validity of religious faith and especially with the problem of the ontological reference of the God-idea. The history of Foster's religious thinking is the record of his pilgrimage from theistic supernaturalism to Ritschlianism* and thence under the increasing influence of the functional interpretation of religion to an emotional naturalism which retained a deep devotion and loyalty to human values. Acceptance of the conclusion that Foster at the end had intellectually abandoned theism and had adopted a humanistic naturalism has been rendered difficult for some of his interpreters because of the fact that Foster continued to utilize emotionally the God-idea which intellectually he declared to be without objective, ontological validity. Foster's thought has exercised a great influence upon the rise and development of "religious humanism"* in America.

"The Religious Thought of George B. Foster" by H. W. Johnson (An unpublished dissertation dep. in the Yale Library)   H.W.J.

foundling asylums: Homes where infants or children, deserted by their parents are cared for and educated. Many such homes are supported by private charities. St. Vincent de Paul* was the illustrious apostle of the movement.

Cf. The National Catholic Almanac (1941), p. 279.   S.C.

Fourier, Charles: (Fourierism) See communistic settlements, secular.

Four Square Gospel Church: See International Church of the Foursquare Gospel.

Fourth Gospel, the: See Gospel and the Gospels; John, Gospel of.

Fox, George: (1624-1691) Founder of the Society of Friends* (Quakers*) Fox was of devout middle-class Lancashire parentage. In 1643 he turned against the shallow insincerities of accepted religious and social practice, 1646, received his great mystical "opening", 1647, having composed his views, he commenced active preaching; was frequently persecuted for blasphemy, disturbing the peace, etc. and imprisoned eight times, 1669, married Margaret Fell of Swarthmore Hall; 1671-1673, led a mission to Barbados, Jamaica and North America, 1677, 1684, led missions to Holland and Germany. Fox's mysticism was indirectly, but strongly, influenced by the Familists and Boehmists. Though meagrely educated he was an effective and indefatigable evangelist, traveller, pamphleteer and correspondent in "publishing Truth," and possessed an intuitive genius for democratic organization. All histories and expositions of Quakerism include detailed discussions of Fox. See Society of Friends.

George Fox, Journal (two vols., 1901), frequently published; Rufus M Jones, George Fox, Seeker and Friend (1930) ; Rachel H King, George Fox and the Inner Light (1940) ; R M Jones, Story of George Fox (1919), Rachel Knight, Founder of Quakerism (1922) , T. E. Harvey and others, New Appreciation of George Fox (1925) ; A N. Brayshaw, Personality of George Fox (1918) , Thomas Hodgkin, George Fox (1896).   H.C.

Foxe, John: (1516-1587) The English martyrologist and Marian exile. While on the continent he wrote his most famous work Actes and Monuments of these latter and perillous Dayes, which is more commonly known as the Book of Martyrs..   W.S.H.

Francis of Assisi, Saint: (1182-1226) The spiritual founder of the Friars Minor*. His conversion from worldly acquisitiveness to the imitation of Christ's voluntary poverty elicited a small following. He presented them for papal approval as Christ's chosen few, peculiarly destined as men of His church for world service through gospel renunciation. Their subsequent transformation into an order at the hands of the hierarchy weakened neither his loyalty to the church nor his example of service, through liberating poverty, to all human need. Popularly revered as a saint at his death, he was canonized two years later. See Fioretti, Franciscans, Gregory IX, hymns.

L. Salvatorelli, The Life of St. Francis of Assisi (1928) , R. C. Petry, Francis of Assisi, Apostle of Poverty (1941).   R.C.P.

Francis (Francois) de Sales, Saint: (1567-1622) Bishop of Geneva, director of souls, and co-founder of the Congregation of the Visitation, who was also the author of the devotional classic Introduction to the Devout Life and of a work of high importance in ascetical theology, The Treatise on the Love of God. See Visitation, Order of the.   D.V.S.

Franciscans: Francis' brethren whose tentative papal authorization to follow him in renunciation soon led to their institution as an order. Their early years were characterized by rigid poverty of possessions, individual and collective, and the limited use of material goods. They labored diligently for their livelihood but received no money. They begged alms for soul discipline and as a further means of suport. Humblest services rendered rich and poor, leper and outcast, town and country made theirs an unprecedented social ministry. Freedom from worldly cares obligated them to preach peace and repentance as the preparation for the imminent coming of God's kingdom. Even in Francis'* lifetime they experienced a growing tension between the demands of poverty idealism and the exigencies of practical life Contending parties, whose divergent poverty observance sadly rent the order, were given belated papal recognition. Today, the Frairs Minor,* now a united order (The First), comprise "three distinct and independent branches" They are the Frairs Minor, the Friars Minor Conventual, and the Friars Minor Capuchin, with some 34,500 professed members in all. With nuns of the Second Order, the Poor Clares, and the Tertiaries, regular and secular, they continue their ministry to church and society. See mendicant orders; Visitation; William de la Mare.

See P Gratien, Histoire de la fondation & de l'évolution de l'ordre des frères mineurs au xiii siècle (Paris, 1928) ; V. D Scudder, The Franciscan Adventure (1931).   R.C.P.

Franck, Sebastian: (1499-1542) German freethinker of the Reformation. First a Catholic priest, later a Lutheran, Franck emerged as a self-appointed champion of heretics, fighting single-handed every form of ecclesiastical authority and every theology claiming to possess the only true faith. Luther called him "the Devil's mouth." Expelled from Strassburg and from Ulm, he set up his printing-press in Basel. A fearless critic and social reformer, Franck expounded a humanistic mystical syncretism including non-Christian sources and anticipating modern liberalism. His chief work is Chronica (1531).   T.A.K.

Francke, August Hermann: (1663-1727) German Pietist leader and founder of the orphanage and schools at Halle bearing his name. Simultaneously pastor, professor, and pioneer in social service, Francke combined evangelistic fervor with Biblical scholarship and executive skill. He exerted wide influence in vitalizing devotional life, introducing the Bible-centered principle into education, and stimulating charitable and missionary activities. See catechumenate; pietism.
                                                         T.A.K.

Frank, Franz Reinhold v.: (1827-1894) He was professor at Erlangen—one of the most noted confessional Lutheran theologians. His comprehensive exhibition of the entire systematic theology was supported by his sharp analysis of Ritschl*. He examined in detail the entire Lutheran dogmatic theology from the point of view of the pietistic tenet of rebirth. His reconstruction of orthodoxy was externally nourished by speculative idealism. See Erlangen School, neo-Lutheranism.

Die Theologie der Konkordienformel, 4 vols (Erlangen u Leipzig, 1858), System der christlichen Gewissheit, 2 ed, 2 vols. (Erlangen u Leipzig, 1881-1884), System der christlichen Wahrheit, 3 ed, 2 vols (Erlangen u Leipzig, 1894), System der christlichen Sittlichkeit, 2 vols. (Erlangen u Leipzig, 1884-1887), Geschichte der neueren Theologie, insbesondere der systematischen seit Schleiermacher, rev. ed, by R. Grützmacher (Leipzig, 1908).   H.H.

Franzelin, John Baptist: (1816-1886) Austrian Jesuit and Cardinal. Professor at Rome and influential in the Vatican Council, he was one of the leading Roman Catholic theologians of his century.   E A.R.

fravashi: The eternal part of the righteous individual, his guardian angel, fighting in the ranks of the angels which protect the pious Zoroastrian*, first mentioned in the Avesta* in the "Yasna of the seven chapters" (Yasna*, chs. 35-42), later in Yashts* 13 and 61.   R.H.P.

Frazer, James George: (1854-1941) He was an eminent investigator of primitive society and human beliefs. He reached the conclusions that beliefs are efficient factors of human behavior and social control, that the role of superstitions has been rather beneficial, that superstition has among certain peoples and at certain times strengthened the respect for government—especially monarchical government—for private property, for marriage, and contributed to a stricter observance of the rules of sexual morality, and for human life. His theory has been corroborated and supported by many field studies. See primitive religion.

J. G. Frazer, Psyche's Task: A Discourse concerning the Influence of Superstition on the Growth of Institutions (London, 1909).   H.H.

Free Christian Zion Church of Christ: A Negro religious sect founded by E. D. Brown at Redemption, Arkansas, in 1905 in a controversy over church finances. It claims to be in general accord with the Methodist Church in theology and organization. There are nine churches in Arkansas and Texas, with a total membership of 1,850.   E.T.C.

Free Church of England: The name often given to the religious bodies in England which are separated from the Established Church (the Anglican Communion). The Roman Church, and certain Unitarian bodies, are excepted. In recent years, the Free Church (which includes Wesleyans, Congregationalists, Baptists, etc.) has established a Free Church Council, to coordinate their relations and present a common front.   W.N.P.

Free Church of Scotland: In the Church of Scotland* long before 1843 there was protest against the legal system under which lay patrons chose parish ministers. Court decisions strengthening lay patronage so subjected the church to the state that in this year 474 ministers out of 1203 and a larger proportion of congregations formed the Free Church of Scotland. This name stood for both a national church and the church's spiritual freedom. Property worth over half a million dollars was surrendered. Preparatory work led by Thomas Chalmers* gave the church at the outset effective support of its ministry and adequate buildings. All the foreign missionaries of the Church of Scotland joined it. A strong theological school, New College, was immediately established in Edinburgh, and others were added in Glasgow and Aberdeen. Throughout its life the Free Church was one of the most important of Protestant churches, eminent for preaching, missions and service to Scotland. Its distinguished theological scholarship becoming decidedly progressive in the late nineteenth century, was widely influential. In 1892 it liberalized its interpretation of the Westminster Confession*. In 1900 with the United Presbyterian Church* it formed the United Free Church of Scotland*, having then 293,396 members. A small dissenting body continues the Free Church. See Cameronians, Guthrie, Thomas, Rainy, Robert. Cf. Moderates, The.

J. R. Fleming, The Church in Scotland, 1843-1929, 2 vols. (Edinburgh, 1927, 1932); P. Bayne, Free Church of Scotland (2nd ed 1894).   R.H.N.

Free-Lovism: (Gates style) See Battle-Axe experiment.

freedom: See cause, religious liberty.

Freemasonry: A world-wide philosophical fraternal institution, whose origins are lost in the immemorial past, but whose present organization dates from 1717, the establishment of the premier Grand Lodge of England. It is a speculative art, teaching morality and basic religion by means of symbols, particularly those derived from the builders' craft. As an oath-bound body, it is secret only as regards its modes of recognition, ritualistic practices, and certain legendary dramatic presentations. Because of its democratic qualities and supra-national character, it is feared by spiritual and political tyrants, and many attempts have been made to suppress it, notably papal action beginning in 1738 and the present Nazi government of Germany.

Freemasonry is non-sectarian and proposes to be "the center of union, and the means of conciliating true friendship among persons that must have remained at a perpetual distance." However, there are certain religious professions required first, belief in God, the Great Architect of the Universe; and, second, belief in the immortality of the soul. Much of the occult lore of the Middle Ages (alchemy, the Kabalah, Templary, etc.) has left its imprint upon the Order, especially in the higher degrees.

The fraternity differs in organization, and to a certain extent in ritual, from country to country. In the United States, after the first three degrees (the Blue Lodge), there are two divisions: the so-called Scottish and the American (commonly called the York) rites, culminating respectively in the 32nd and Knight Templar degrees. Some of the eminent American Masons have been George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Albert Pike.

R. F. Gould, History of Freemasonry (1885); R.

F. Gould, Concise History of Freemasonry (1903); A. G. Mackey, Encyclopedia of Freemasonry (Clegg-Hughan revision, 1924), J. F. Newton, The Builders (1914), Albert Pike, Morals and Dogma (reprinted 1930).   A C.

Free Methodist Church: See holiness churches.

Free Spirit, Brothers and Sisters of the: Lay religious groups of western Europe in the middle ages whose main interests were personal piety and freedom from clerical authority. In practice, some were ascetic and others, quite the reverse. Unpopular generally and persecuted as heretics through the fourteenth century.   A.S.

free-will: See libertarianism.

Free Will Baptists: A group of Baptist churches which accept the Arminian or free will theology as opposed to Calvinism or predestination. They are among the oldest sects in the country, the movement having come from Wales about 1701. There are 920 churches and more than 76,000 members.   E.T C.

Freud, Sigmund: (1856-1939) He maintained that love of the ideal is a sublimation of sexual love. In contrast, classical tradition has maintained that sexual love is subservient to the love of the ideal. The basic paradox of his metapsychology consists in the fact that psychoanalysis as a cathartic method of mental healing involves a philosophy in which reason and the urge of life are primary, whereas, actually Freud's irrational monism and theory of repressive instincts, lead to a philosophy of death.

Notwithstanding his leaving a healing art loosely connected with a body of speculations which require radical transformation before it meets with ease the standards of science, the concept of the unconscious, the creation of the analytic technique of free association, and the development of a specific form of doctor-patient relationship, were his greatest contributions to psychiatry and therapeutic psychology. Greater emphasis upon the etiological and perpetuating role of anxiety, greater stress upon intra-social rather than intra-psychic phenomena, and greater interest in the transference of and in the immediate present than in the past are the significant new trends in psychoanalytic therapy.

In his application of psychoanalysis to the study of religion Freud has been much less convincing than elsewhere. In Civilization and its Discontents, he discussed the conscious feeling that one is immortal. He argued that it is not a rational proof of theological premises, for the subjective experience of immortality is a regression to an infantile mode of thought. Almost two decades ago he staggered the religious world in The Future of an Illusion with the charge that religion "is a universal, obsessional neurosis of mankind," by means of which individuals are able to nurse themselves into an unhealthy state of immaturity. He contended that religion is an illusion due to be destroyed when mankind has overcome its infantile prejudice. God, in short, is nothing but a creation of man. Religion is a technique by means of which the person who is afraid of life tries to find a haven of false security. He reduced the idea of God to a rationalization of the father ideal and the infantile wish for protection from the terrors of nature. He departed from his life-long analysis of unconscious motivations and attacked theology. He ignored the religious needs of men, and attacked the logic of theology which justifies these needs by arguing that science, the supremacy of intellect, can take its place. In his last work (Moses and Monotheism) he attempted to write a biography of the founder of the Hebrew nation, largely used as an occasion to work out and expand his well-known theory of religion. It was an ambitious construction resting on an extremely slight and tenuous foundation of historical data. Wishful speculation loomed large.

In attacking religion unsparingly in his works, he was least astute here, and his polemics did him no credit. His discussion of religion showed a misunderstanding of what religion is, and he fell into a morass of inconsistencies. Notwithstanding Freud's eminent failure to understand the religious needs of men, he has done mankind a real service in ruthlessly exposing the unhealthy kind of religion, in distinguishing sane religion from neurotic religion. As a person grows healthy and independent, he abandons the ways of using religion as a crutch. Freud regarded religion as mainly associated with human weakness. He was attacking the abuse rather than the use of religion. He never concerned himself with healthy religion In fact, he did not know what normal, sane religion is. See psychology, schools of

His main works The Future of an Illusion (1928) ; Civilization and its Discontents (1930) , New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis (1933) , Gesammelte Schriften (Leipzig, Vienna, Zurich, 1934) , A General Introduction to Psychoanalysis (1935) , The Problem of Anxiety (1936) , The Basic Writings of Sigmund Freud (1938) ; Moses and Monotheism (1939).   H.H.

Freudian psychology: See psychology, schools of.

friar: (Lat., frater; Fr., frère) The somewhat obsolete English name for any member of any of the four original, mendicant Orders (Franciscans, Dominicans, Carmelites and Augustinians) in the Roman Catholic Church. To be distinguished from monk, in that the friar is a minister of the gospel, engaged in pastoral work and teaching, whereas the monk is a cloistered religious, only working in public under unusual conditions. It should be noted that, though mendicants, the Jesuits are not friars but regular clerics. For specific details see the four Orders named above.   V.J.B.

Friars Minor: (Franciscans) A Roman Catholic mendicant Order founded by St. Francis* of Assisi, 1207-1209. The original rule was very strict, stressing extreme poverty. As a result of later reforms, three branches with autonomous heads developed: Conventuals, Observants and Capuchins*. At first gray, the habit was changed to brown. Early in the 13th century the Franciscans took up university teaching and produced some of the most influential Catholic philosophers and theologians Alexander of Hales, St Bonaventura, Matthew of Aquasparta, Duns Scotus, and William of Occam. Their theology is traditionally Augustinian, modified by Aristotelianism in the late 13th century. The Order is also noted for its widespread missionary activity. See Franciscans.

V.J.B

friendly societies: The device by which persons pool their resources to meet contingencies of illness, death or other emergencies is widespread and very old. The Tong societies among the Chinese in our country fulfil such a function. In the later colonial days almost all national groups formed their societies for mutual aid. Although all associations of private citizens were forbidden in the Roman Empire, an exception was made in favor of "enclesia," mutual aid societies formed of persons belonging to specific nationalities living in Rome and other cities of the empire for the care of their poor, sick, for burial and other contingencies. However, the early medieval religious guilds, and later the trade guilds were the predecessors of contemporary friendly societies of England, which arose almost immediately after the confiscation of the property of the guilds by Henry the VIII in the 16th century.

The modern friendly society, strictly speaking, is an English institution, which may have a social function such as the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, or be a trade union. Gradually, after many experiments and failures, the funds entrusted to such societies have come under some sort of governmental supervision, to insure their solvency and therefore their service to its members.

When social insurance was introduced into England the government placed some of the administrative responsibility for sickness insurance with the friendly societies, as for example that of supplying hospitalization, when indicated. It was anticipated with the coming of social insurance the usefulness of the friendly society would lessen, but their growth since 1911 has belied that fear. The movement is essentially the expression of the intent of its members to maintain their own economic self-sufficiency rather than to rely on the state.

W. T. Pratt, The Law of Friendly Societies—with Acts (London, 1909) ; J. F. Wilkinson, The Friendly Society Movement, Its Origin, Rise and Growth (London, 1891).   F.J.B.

Friends of God: An informal fellowship of German mystics, in large part laymen, during the fourteenth century centering around John Tauler* and Heinrich Suso*.

A. G. Seesholtz, Friends of God (1934).
W.S.H.

Friends, Society of (Quakers): See Society of Friends (Quakers).

Fries, Jakob Friedrich: (1773-1843) German philosopher. Professor of Philosophy in Jena, 1800-1805 and again 1816-1843; 1806-1816 in Heidelberg. Transformed Kant's philosophy by means of a combination of Platonic and Romanticist views. Over against Kant's metaphysical agnosticism he held that the human mind was capable of directly apprehending the transcendental reality of the ideas by means of "Ahnung," i e, the highest development of the faculty of 'feeling.' This view enabled him to interpret religion in a way similar to that of Schleiermacher's*—with whom he shared the Moravian upbringing and the indebtedness to Fichte*—as direct contact with the ideal reality. At the beginning of the twentieth century Fries' philosophy was revived in Goettingen by the Neo-Friesian School (Leon. Nelson, Wilh. Bousset, Rudolf Otto).

Wissen, Glaube, Ahndung (1805), new edition by L Nelson (1905), Neue Kritik der Vernunft (1807); Fries' Biography by E Th Henke (1867); see also Th Elsenhans, Fries und Kant, 2 vols (1906); Rudolf Otto, Kantisch-Friessche Religionsphilosophie, 2nd ed (1921), Ueberweg's Geschichte der Philosophie, 12th ed. (1923), vol IV p 147 ff   O.A.P.

Frigg or Frigga: Daughter of Fiórgyn and wife of Odin*. She was the mother of Thor, Balder and other gods. Variously regarded as goddess of the earth and air. The constellation Orion was her spinning-wheel. As patroness of conjugal love, she was especially worshipped by married couples.
                                                                                    P.G.M.

Frohschammer, Jakob: (1821-1893) Ordained as Catholic priest, he was professor of philosophy at the university of Munich. Many of his earlier writings were placed on the Index. He fought with conviction, decisiveness and self-sacrifice for the independence of philosophy from Catholic theology. He explained the world in terms of the principle of imagination. Imagination is the most fitting medium to represent the existence of the nature of an absolute divine being, avoiding pantheism and affirming the personal relation of the creator to the world. The world is conceived as derived from the imagination of God.

Das Christenthum und die moderne Naturwissenschaft (Wien und Leipzig, 1868); Das Recht der eigenen Ueberzeugung (Leipzig, 1869), Das neue Wissen und der neue Glaube (Leipzig, 1873); Die Phantasie als Grundprincip des Weltprocesses (Munchen, 1877); Uber das Mysterium Magnum des Daseins (Leipzig, 1891), A Altensperger, J. Froshammers Philosophische System im Grundriss (Zweibrucken, 1899).   H.H.

Frommel, Gaston: (1862-1906) Swiss theologian, followed Vinet* in his approach to religious belief through the moral conscience, but stressed the element of binding obligation in conscience rather than the element of freedom. Criticised the subjectivism and relativism of the Paris theologians. See Sabatier; Ménégoz.   W.M.H.

Fruitlands (Mass.) community: See communistic settlements, secular.

fugue: (Lat., fuga, flight) A polyphonic* form of composition used chiefly in instrumental music but often employed in choral* music as in Bach's B Minor Mass. The fugue originated in the vocal motet* and in the instrumental ricercare both of which consisted of an orderly exposition of material without any development which characterizes a fugue.

J S Bach, The Art of Fugue, D F. Tovey, Companion to "The Art of Fugue" (1931).   E.H B.

Fulbert of Chartres: (960-1028) A pupil of the famous Gerbert of Aurillac*, he became the founder in 990 of the celebrated school of Chartres*. By nature an obedient follower of the Church Fathers, yet he sets limits to the human intellect in its flight toward the mysteries of God which, in his view, no erudite speculation but only a humble faith can comprehend. He died as bishop of Chartres.   S.C.T.

functional school: See anthropology.

functionalism: (functional psychology) See psychology, schools of.

fundamentalism: Was a Post-World War theological and religious reaction which received its name from a series of little books entitled The Fundamentals. A Testimony of the Truth (12 vols, 1910-1912) which were published and circulated widely, with money furnished by two wealthy laymen. The doctrines listed as fundamental were the Virgin birth of Christ, the physical resurrection, the inerrancy of the Scriptures in every detail, the substitutionary theory of the atonement, and finally the imminent, physical second coming of Christ. Those who supported these views did not hesitate to denounce those who denied them as "no Christian" with the result that all the larger evangelical churches in America were soon in the midst of a bitter controversy. The movement was organized to resist what they considered dangerous tendencies, especially in many well-known Theological Seminaries, to use scientific methods in dealing with the Scriptures.

The Baptists and Presbyterians were the denominations most affected by the controversy, though among the Methodists and Disciples the issues were sharply drawn. The Baptists not having any general church courts in which heretics might be brought to book the fundamentalist leaders were driven to the expedient of denouncing the Modernists in their public pronouncements in their pulpits and National Conventions. Several new fundamentalist Baptist Theological seminaries were established to counteract the influence of the liberal institutions. Among the Presbyterians there was a schism led by Professor John Gresham Machen* of the Princeton Theological Seminary. A new Theological Seminary was formed in Philadelphia which took the name of Westminster, and a new fundamentalist church emerged which has taken the name Bible Presbyterian Church.

Among the loosely organized Disciples body the issues involved were argued back and forth in the columns of their individually controlled church papers, the Christian Century supporting the liberal view, and the Christian Standard upholding the so-called fundamentals. Among Methodists the conservatives attempted to set up rigid doctrinal standards to which ministers were to subscribe, which was out of harmony with Methodist history and tradition. Cf Auburn Affirmation, evolution, controversy over.

S G. Cole, The History of Fundamentalism (1931)   w.w s funeral customs: See death and burial practices.

fung shui: See Chinese Terminology.

future life, conceptions of: See annihilationism, final judgment, immortality, kinds of, immortality, conditional, resurrection, rewards and punishments, transmigration future punishment: See final judgment, rewards and punishments.

G

Gabars or Ghebers: The popular name for Zoroastrians* residing in Persia in contrast to those known in India as Parsis. With Moslem conquest those who remained unconverted to Islam were persecuted. A small group of Gabars, perhaps 10,000 survive today. See kafir.   P.E.J.

Gabirol, Solomon Ibn: (1021-1058/1070) Known to scholastics as Avencebrol, Avicembron and Avicebron*, Gabirol is the first Spanish-Jewish poet-philosopher of distinction. He produced such a colorless philosophical work (Fons Vitae) that he was taken for a Muslim and a Christian until the discovery of Falakera's epitome by S. Munk in the last century. While his influence on subsequent Jewish life and thought was slight, he is regarded as the fountainhead of classical Jewish mysticism and of much medieval Christian mysticism. He was a monistic Neo-Platonist. He assigns to matter, the metaphysical stuff, the supreme position. Matter is the underlying substance for all being from the highest to the lowest, with the exception of God. He rejects the Neo-Platonic teachings regarding an impersonal and necessary cosmic process, and stresses the will of God. God is known only through his will, his effects in the world. As a mystic he even goes out of the way to find a physiological correlate to human virtues and vices. He also wrote Judaistic, intellectually inferior but popular ethical writings, in which he conspicuously avoided theological positions. .
N. Bialik, and I. H. Ravnitzky, Shire (Poems). 7 vols. (Tel-Aviv, 1927-32); I Husik, A History of Medieval Jewish Philosophy (1941); J. Guttmann, Die Philosophie des Salomon ibn Gabirol (Gottingen, 1889); D. Kaufmann, Studien über Salomon ibn Gabirol (Budapest, 1899); S. Munk, Mélanges de Philosophie Juive et Arabe (Paris, 1859).   H.H.

Gad: One of the twelve sons of Jacob, and so one of the twelve tribes of Israel. Also, as the name means "luck, fortune," a goddess. See Isaiah 65·11 (R.V.).   P.G.M.

Galatians, Letters to the: Returning to Antioch after the second missionary journey Paul learned that teachers of a Judaizing form of Christianity had appeared in Galatia and persuaded the Galatian Christians to accept a legalistic variation of Christianity which he considered fatal to the great experience of faith. Writing in the name of the whole local brotherhood—the great missionary church of Antioch—he denounced the new teaching in the most vehement manner, asserted his apostolic commission as directly and divinely given, showed the hollowness of the Judaizers position, from various angles, and asserted the sufficiency of the attitude of faith, in the Christian experience, legalistic observances could add nothing to it, in fact they could only impair and nullify it. Galatians is a great assertion of Christian freedom, this freedom has its dangers, but it is nevertheless absolutely essential to the exercise of faith. Galatians was written from Antioch, about A.D 52 or 53. The Galatian churches were probably those of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium and Pisidian Antioch, not of north Galatia, as some have argued.
E. D Burton, The Epistle to the Galatians (1920); J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (10th ed., 1890).   E.J.G.

Galen (Galenus), Claudius: (2nd century) A cultured physician of Pergamum and later family physician to Marcus Aurelius* in Rome. An eclectic Aristotelian, he wrote voluminously on medicine, anatomy, and philosophy.   J.E.N.

Galesburg Rule: A declaration concerning pulpit and altar fellowship with other denominations, adopted by the General Council, a body of conservative American Lutherans*, at Galesburg, Illinois, in 1875. The Rule, worded by Dr. C. P. Krauth*, is: "Lutheran pulpits are for Lutheran ministers only, Lutheran altars are for Lutheran communicants only."   T.A.K.

Galilei, Galileo: (1564-1641) As his thought moved in dynamic terms, he inverted Aristotelian metaphysics. Instead of stressing the principle of final causality, he regards God as the first efficient cause or creator of the atoms.
Dialogues and Mathematical Demonstrations concerning Two New Sciences (1914); J. J Fahie, Galileo, his Life and Work (1903); F. Wieser, Galilei als Philosoph (Basel, 1919); Z. Harsanyi, The Star Gazer (1939).   H.H.

Gallican Confession: Also called "Confession of Rochelle," was drafted by Calvin*, enlarged and adopted by the Synod at Paris, in 1559, as a confession of faith and an order of discipline. Afterwards it was repeatedly revised under the direction of Beza, and finally ratified at the Seventh National Synod at La Rochelle, in 1571, in the presence of the Queen of Navarre and her son (Henry IV). The Gallican Confession, the work mainly of Calvin himself, and of his friend and successor, Beza*, in 40 articles contains a concise and faithful summary of the doctrines and discipline of John Calvin. It was superseded by "The Declaration of Faith of the Reformed Church in France," 1872.

Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom (1877), vol 1.   T.F.H.

Gallican liturgies: The ancient rites of the non-Roman Western Church, many features of which were adopted in the Roman rite when it superseded them in the early Middle Ages. See liturgy.
                                                                                           E.R.H.

Gallicanism: The name of two overlapping movements in the French Church—political, defending royal and lay rights as against Pope and clergy, and ecclesiastical, maintaining the autonomy of the French Church and the subordination of Popes to General Councils, both were united under Louis XIV in the Gallican Articles of 1682; thereafter Gallicanism declined gradually, although as late as 1869-1870 there was some French opposition to the doctrine of papal infallibility. See Loyson; Old Catholics; ultramontanism.

L. Pullan, Religion Since the Reformation (1923).
                                                                                           E.R.H.

Gamaliel I: Gamaliel I, also known as Gamaliel the Elder or Hazaken, a grandson of Hillel*, was one of the most prominent and respected teachers of the Law* of his day (30-60 C E.) and occupied a leading position in the Sanhedrin*, the highest court at Jerusalem. In fact according to one tradition, he may have been the *Nasi or head of the Sanhedrin.

There are not many laws or opinions in the Talmud* attributed to Gamaliel. .However, a study of those that are recorded in his name show that he was keenly aware of the needs of his day and did not hesitate to act boldly to meet them. One of the principles which guided him in many of his enactments was that law must lead to the "improvement of the world" (mippne tikkun Ha'olam) and promote the common good.

Gamaliel is mentioned in Acts 5.34ff. as the Pharisee* who favored leniency at the trial of the disciples, arguing that "if this work be of men, it will be overthrown; but if it is of God ye will not be able to overthrow them." Gamaliel is also mentioned in Acts 22:3 where Paul* states that he was "brought up at the feet of Gamaliel."   E.B.-L.F.

gambling: The staking of money or other valuable or important considerations on a future event, chance, or contingency, which is unknown or uncertain to the participants. The essential element in gambling is wagering, or the act of staking or hazarding per se. In gaming, the future event is the outcome of a game of chance, or mixed chance and skill. Insofar as the outcome can be predicted by knowledge of the strength, skill, et cetera, of the contestants, the element of pure chance is usually increased by odds in favor of, or by handicaps against, the probable winner. Gaming is closely related to divination*, through which primitive man sought to forecast future events, in fact, the instruments devised for the one purpose were frequently employed for the other. Gambling, however, is more inclusive than gaming, since wagers may be laid on any uncertain social or physical contingency, such as the outcome of an election or the amount of precipitation during a given month or season. The lottery is a form of gambling in which prizes are distributed by lot or chance among persons who have paid for the chance to win.

Gambling is distinguished from legitimate forms of commercial speculation and insurance in that the latter perform useful social services by stabilizing the market and by shifting the incidence of loss or gain due to economic changes which would take place in any event, whereas the former increases instability, creates risks which serve no corresponding economic needs, and adds losses to some and equivalent gains to others which would not occur in the absence of the gambling transaction itself. On the other hand, speculative transactions become both socially and ethically a form of gambling when the intention of the parties is that no deliveries of commodities or securities shall be ever made, and that the whole price shall never be paid, but that the difference in value shall be ascertained at some future date and the excess or difference shall be paid directly from one party to the other.

John Ashton, History of Gambling in England (London, 1898) ; B Seebohm Rowntree, Betting and Gambling (1905) ; Ernest D. MacDougall, Speculation and Gambling (1936).   H.E.J.

gaming: See gambling.

Gandharva: In the Vedas the term is usually singular. An obscure but very old figure, he is said to be the measurer of space and is related to the sun, and also with Soma. In the Avesta Gandarewa is a dragon like monster. Some scholars regard the Gandharvas as spirits of the wind. They are in later times represented as divine musicians in Indra's heaven. The Sanskrit word for music is Gandharva. They possess mysterious power over women. They are beloved of the Apsarases or heavenly nymphs of Indra's heaven.   C.S.B.

Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand: Indian National leader, born Oct. 2, 1869, in Porbandar, India. Studied law in London; began practices in Bombay, in 1893 went to South Africa on legal business; soon, however, renounced wealth and position to lead the South African Indians in their struggle for greater justice, developing the doctrine of non-violence and truth-force into a powerful political and economic instrument. Returning to India in 1914, Gandhi was loyal to the British Government during the First World War with the expectation that India would receive self-government within the Empire. After the Amritsar Rebellion and the Rowlatt Enactments, he declared April 6, 1919 a day of National Humiliation and exhorted the people to a program of passive resistance, implemented by economic and political boycott and the development of home industries. In Dec. 1921, he became the recognized leader of the Indian National Congress, with comlete national independence as the avowed goal. Popularly Gandhi was titled Mahatma* (Great Soul). Though a devoted Hindu, he has found support for his doctrine of nonviolence in the Sermon on the Mount and has commonly used the NT along with the Bhaghavad Gita* for spiritual guidance. He has been consistently sympathetic with the demand of the Hindu Untouchables for abolition of the caste system and has sought politically to unite Hindus and Moslems. In this latter effort he has been unsuccessful, with the Moslem Party finally demanding "Pakistan", a separate independent Moslem state. Gandhi has repeatedly used the hunger strike and the fast unto death as spiritual instruments to protest against British policy and to unify his people. In the crisis of 1942, with Japan threatening India, Gandhi was still sufficiently powerful to lead in a program of civil disobedience against British rule, resulting in his internment, in Aug, 1942, in the palace at Poona.

M. K Gandhi, Young India (1927) ; C. F. Andrews, ed., Mahatma Gandhi, His Own Story (1930), and Mahatma Gandhi at Work (1931) ; Jashwant Rao Chitambar, Mahatma Gandhi, His Life, Work and Influence (1933).   E.T.R.

Ganesha: The elephant headed son of Shiva, a popular divinity of Shivite Hinduism. He is the god of good luck, prosperity and of wisdom, and the remover of obstacles. He is usually represented as very fat and riding on the back of a rat.   C.S.B.

Gano, John: (1727-1804) Baptist clergyman. Chaplain Continental Army. Prayed in Washington's headquarters at cessation of hostilities. Did not immerse Washington at Valley Forge.
                                                      C..R.M.

Gansfort, John Wesel: (Doctor contradictionum), 1420-1489, educated by and ever a close associate of the Brethren of the Common Life.* Generally claimed by Protestants as a precursor of Luther*; but while they thought alike on many points, Wesel stressed "faith in love" to Luther's "faith alone," and, like Erasmus* later, he was irenical.   Q.B.

Garizim: Sacred mountain of the Samaritans, near Shechem, Palestine (Deut. xi, 20; xxvii, 12; Jos. viii, 33). See F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, vol. i (1933), pp. 360-369.   S.L.T.

Garman, Charles Edward: (1850-1907) A graduate of Amherst College in 1876 and Yale Divinity School 1879. Garman was called to Amherst to teach Philosophy in 1880 and thereafter occupied the chair of Mental and Moral Philosophy until his death. His teaching of philosophy was original in method and exceptionally stimulating to religious and theistic thought.

Cf The memorial volume, Letters, Lectures and Addresses of Charles Edward Garman (1909).
                                                      J W.B.

Gass, Friedrich Wilhelm Joachim Heinrich: (1813-1889) He taught at the universities of Breslau, Greifswald, Giessen and Heidelberg. As a church historian he knew himself above all as a pupil of Schleiermacher*.

Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik in ihrem Zusammenhang mit der Theologie überhaupt, 4 vols. (Berlin, 1854-67) , Geschichte der christlichen Ethik, 3 vols. (Berlin, 1881-87).   H.H.

Gassendi, Pierre (1592-1655) French philosopher and mathematician; professor of theology and philosophy at Aix and later of mathematics at the Collège Royal in Paris. He was a leading opponent of Descartes* and revived interest in the materialism of Epicurus and Lucretius. His chief works are De Vita et Moribus Epicuri (1647); Philosophiae Epicuri Syntagma (1649); and Syntagma Philosophicum (1658).

See G. S. Brett, The Philosophy of Gassendi (1908).   J.E.N.

Gates, Theophilus: (1787-1846) See Battle-Axe experiment.

Gathas: The oldest part of the Avesta* (Yasna, chs. 28-34, 43-51, 53), consisting of 17 hymns arranged into 5 gathas according to meter; they preserve in its most authentic form the teaching of Zoroaster (for which see, Persia, religions of).
                                                      R.H.P.

Gaunilo: (unknown—around 1083) The Count of Montigny, later a monk in the monastery Mar-Moutier, near Tours, who made himself famous with his Liber pro insipiente, "Book in behalf of the Fool". (Who said in his heart· there is no God.) In this treatise, Gaunilo subjected Saint Anselm's* (1033-1109) ontological argument* for the existence of God to a pungent criticism to which the ages could not add very much.
                                                      S.C.T.

gayatri: A famous prayer repeated daily by all orthodox Hindus, taken from the Rig Veda (Book 3, lxii, 10) "Let us meditate on the adorable splendor of Savitar, may he enlighten our minds." It is also the name of one of the meters employed in the Vedic hymns.   C.S.B.

Gehenna: (Gr., Geenna, from Heb., Ge Hinnom) The valley of Hinnom, near Jerusalem where early Israelites sacrificed children to Moloch*; afterward regarded a place of abomination and refuse, where fires continually burned to prevent pestilence. In the N.T. it refers to hell, and in general use indicates a torture chamber or place of suffering. See heaven and hell.
                                                      P.E.J.

Geiler, John of Kaisersberg: (1445-1510) Popular preacher at Strassburg Cathedral. His sermons abound in practical illustrations, racy language, satire, humor. He strove to reform outward manners and morals.   E.C.K.

Geisteswissenschaften: "Sciences of the mind" as opposed to the natural sciences. Term originating in the philosophy of Hegel* who distinguishes logic, philosophy of nature and philosophy of mind as the three main parts of his system. Wilhelm Dilthey* used the term G. in his Einleitung in die G. (introduction into the sciences of the mind). W. Windelband and H. Rickert defined G. as those sciences which deal with history and culture.   R.K.

Gemara: The term Gemara is the Aramaic word for "learning", and as technically used is applied to the discussions of the Rabbinic scholars on the Mishna*, the code of Jewish law, formulated by the famous Rabbi Judah I the Patriarch and his colleagues, early in the third century. This Code became a text book in the Palestinian and Babylonian academies, where oral discussions of it, and comments on it, were crystallized into memorized books. These have come down to us in the form of the Palestinian Talmud* and the Babylonian Talmud. The former originated in the academies of the Holy Land, in the third and fourth centuries; the latter in those of Babylonia in the third, fourth and fifth centuries. The Talmud includes both the Mishna and the comments, the term Gemara is used exclusively for the comments. Cf. amora.   L.F.

Gematria: See Kabbalah.

General Assembly: The phrase is scriptural (Heb. 12 23). In church history and now it is used principally as the title of the supreme judicatories of Presbyterian churches*, e.g., those of Scotland and the United States. The general assembly has authority executive, legislative except as limited by the need of the concurrence of presbyteries, and judicial. In other Reformed churches of Presbyterian polity the General Synod is equivalent.   R.H.N.

General Association of Regular Baptist Churches in the U. S. A.: A group of Baptist churches in the North which united in "an endeavor to get back to the old-fashioned ideals, policies, and practices of Baptists as they used to be." It claims to be a "fellowship" as distinguished from a "convention," and that its churches are not "members," since "a Baptist church cannot be a member of anything outside itself." Its theological position is fundamentalist. There are 84 churches and 22,000 members.   E.T.C.

General Baptists: A sect of Arminian or free-will Baptists in the United States. They differ little from other "free-will" or "general" Baptists, but are organized in a separate denomination. They claim 422 churches and 36,000 members.   E.T.C.

General Conference Mennonites: See Mennonites.

general councils: See councils.

General Six-Principle Baptists: A sect of Arminian Baptists emphasizing the "six principles" of Heb. 6.1, 2· repentance, faith, baptism, laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment. The sect claims to be the original Baptist church in America, founded by Roger Williams. It now has only 4 congregations and fewer than 300 members. See Baptists.
                    E.T.C.

Genesis: The first book of the O.T., being an account of the creation of the world and the primeval history of mankind (chapters 1-11) and the history of the patriarchs (chapters 12-50). Moses* is considered to be the author by Jewish, Christian and Islamic tradition, but the book is the product of a ·long process of writing and editing by J, E and P, reaching its final form cir. 400 B.C. Some scholars have claimed for the book other sources, such as S*, an Edomitic* document (R. H. Pfeiffer) and L*, a primitive lay source (Otto Eissfeldt). In its present form Genesis shows a greater unity of conception and purpose than most of the other composite books of the Hexateuch*. The first eleven chapters contain profound religious myths which resemble those of other civilizations of the ancient Near East; the story of the flood*, for example, so closely resembles the account of the flood in the Gilgamesh Epic* as to suggest direct or ultimate dependence upon it. The remainder of Genesis consists of legends concerning the patriarchs, the ancestral fathers of the Hebrew nation. Recent archaeological discoveries, especially at Nuzi in northern Mesopotamia, tend to authenticate the general background of these legends, but their historicity in detail cannot be affirmed.
    S. R. Driver, The Book of Genesis (Westminster Comm., 2nd ed 1904); R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (1941).   J.P.H.

Genesis, the Little: See Jubilees, Book of.

Geneva Bible: Sometimes known as the Puritan Bible or "Breeches" Bible*. It was the work of a group of Marian exiles at Geneva, and was distinguished by the copious use of marginal notes for the interpretation of passages. The first edition was printed in 1560. Even after the publication of the King James Version in 1611, this Geneva version remained for many years the most popular English Bible. See Bible, English.
                    W.S.H.

Genevieve, St.: (c. 422-512) Saint, patroness of Paris. Woman of deep piety and monastic zeal to whom powers of prophesying were attributed. Her shrine attained great popularity.
                    E.H.C.

gentile: The rendering in English of a Gr. word used in the Septuagint* to mean "non-Jew," "foreigner," or "heathen," and occurring in the N.T. also in that sense. "Gentile Christianity" describes the Church which drew its members from among non-Jews. According to Acts 11 20 f., non-Jews (as distinguished from Jewish proselytes) were first admitted to the Church at Antioch*. Paul soon came to be recognized as the "apostle to the Gentiles," and before the writing of the Epistle to the Romans Gentile Christianity had come greatly to outnumber Jewish Christianity*.   s.m.g.

Gentili, Alberico: (1552-1608) An Italian Protestant who fled to England, becoming Regius Professor of Civil Law at Oxford. The greater part of De Jure Belli Libri Tres (1598) is devoted to an analysis of the rules that ought to govern the conduct of war. He advocated for Europe an international government with decisions made by the majority of states.
T. A. Walker, History of the Law of Nations, vol. I. (Cambridge, 1899).   h.h.

genuflexion: (Lat., genu-flexio, bow the knee) A ceremonial posture adopted in the Catholic Church at certain points, as, e.g., before the Blessed Sacrament, at the incarnatus in the Creed, etc. See kneeling at communion.   w.n.p.

Georgian style: See art, ecclesiastical, Christian; church building.

Gerbert of Aurillac: (Pope Sylvester II, 999-1003) Born in Auvergne, he acquired not only the training - of his native land, with the Benedictines* of Aurillac, but also the culture of Spain, in which country he studied mathematics, astronomy and music with the bishop of Vich. Subsequent to a sojourn 'in Rome, he became a student at Rheims where he distinguished himself as teacher of philosophy, dialectic, and mathematics, and as head of the episcopal school. He later appeared in public disputation at Ravenna before Otto II who bestowed upon him the abbacy of Bobbio. For a short time, and not very happily, abbot of this famous monastery, he returned to Rheims where he was to become archbishop. In 999, Otto III secured the papacy for his old tutor who took the name of Sylvester II.   r.c.p.

Gerhard, Johann: (1582-1637) German Lutheran dogmatician and foremost exponent of Lutheran orthodoxy. Professor at Jena for two decades, Gerhard was at once a highly respected teacher, an ecclesiastical leader, and a counselor of princes. But his fame rests on his doctrinal works, chiefly his Loci Theologici (1610-1622) in nine huge volumes and the four-volume Confessio Catholica (1634-1637). His devotional book Meditationes Sacrae (1606) has been translated into most European languages and is still widely used. An irenic and constructive theologian, Gerhard interprets Lutheranism in terms of evangelical catholicity. In massive learning, comprehensive scope, accuracy of detail, and logical precision Gerhard is a Lutheran counterpart of Aquinas. His contemporaries regarded him as the greatest of living theologians.
     t.a.k.

Gerhardt, Paul: See hymns.

Gerlach, Stephen (1546-1612) Champlain for the German Embassy in Constantinople. He studied in the University of Tubingen, Wurtt. As pastor in the East, he cultivated the friendship of literary men and his diary is a valuable source of information about Greece, Turkey, Palestine and Egypt. He studied many literary and social problems of the enslaved Greek nation and brought back to Germany valuable manuscripts and the much needed information about the Near East. The reward for his work in Greece was his appointment as Professor of Theology in the University of Tubingen.   g.e.z.

German Baptist Brethren: See Dunkers.

German Reformed Church, the: See Reformed Church in the U. S. See Churches of God in North America.

German separatist communities: See communistic settlements, religious.

Gerson, Jean Charlier de: (1363-1429) The most influential French ecclesiastic of the later 14th and early 15th centuries, Chancellor of the University of Paris for thirty-four years, theologian, preacher, conciliarist. His administrative reforms raised the standards of instruction at the University of Paris. As a churchman and preacher he strove for the reform of the church and sought to increase the piety of its members. His clear espousal of the conciliarist cause is notably expressed in his tracts, De Unitate Ecclesiastica and De Auferibilitate Papae Ab Ecclesia, and exemplified by his dynamic leadership at the Council of Constance*. In philosophy he held a modified nominalist position. In theology he was a mystic. See conciliarism.   f.w.n.

Gerson, Levi ben (Gersonides): (1288-1340) Jewish theologian and astronomer. A bold, rigorous thinker, unflinchingly Aristotelian* in theology. God does not know matter or particularity, not that His knowledge is imperfect, but that the formal, rational order of things alone is worth knowing or fully real. Also, man's will being free, and acts he might, in future, perform or not perform being thus indeterminate, the divine or true knowledge, which sees things as they are, will see these acts only as indeterminate or possible. (See foreknowledge, divine, and Carneades.) This second argument implies that past and present events, being determinately particular, must by divine knowledge be known as such, but G. overlooks this because (equally with Maimonides*, the chief object of his polemic) he believes God to be immutable and devoid of contingency, whereas, he argues, only what is in some way contingent and changing can know the contingent and changing. The premise is that an object of knowledge "substantializes" the knowing (were the object not actual, the knowing of it as actual would be potential only). This Maimonides had conceded of human knowing, and he had conceded further that if the contingent objects of God's knowing are similarly required for the actuality of his knowledge of them (as actual), then part of God's actuality must be contingent. M. avoided this conclusion by denying any and all analogy between humanly conceivable and divine "knowledge" (or other attributes). G. points to the theological havoc wrought by this denial, and proposes instead the denial that God knows contingent objects, except in their non-contingent, providential, immaterial elements or aspects. This denial, held to be none, of omniscience is a heroic effort to save the purely absolutistic conception of God (see cause, perfect; omnipotent, personal, God as) while avoiding the paradox of a knowing which is necessary through and through although what it knows exists to be known (as existent) only contingently. It did not occur to G.—or to other medieval thinkers—that if God's knowing is really analogous—with whatever sublime differences—to man's, it may, like man's, though in radically superior fashion, involve elements of contingency and change. See time, L. Gerson, The Wars of God (in Hebrew, Ger. trans. by B. Kellermann, 1916). See I. Husik, A History of Jewish Philosophy (1916).   C.H.

I. Weil, Philosophie religieuse de Levi ben Gerson (Paris, 1868) ; M. Joel, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie (Breslau, 1876) ; I. Husik, "Studies in Gersonides," Jewish Quarterly, vol. III. (1917-18) ; J. Guttmann, Die Philosophie des Judentums (Munich, 1933) , J. Karo, Kritische Untersuchungen zu Levi ben Gersons Widerlegung des Aristotelischen Zeitbegriffes (Leipzig, 1935).   H.H.

Gesenius, Friedrich Heinrich Wilhelm: 1786-1842) German Oriéntalist and Biblical critic, born at Nordhausen, Hanover. He was professor of theology (after 1810) in the University of Halle, where he became the most popular teacher in Germany in his field and a pioneer in establishing the scientific study of Semitic languages (especially Hebrew) and of the O.T. His Hebrew grammar and lexicon have gone through many editions and have been widely translated.   J.P.H.

Gess, Wolfgang Friedrich: (1819-1891) He first taught at the Basel Mission House; then at the universities of Göttingen and Breslau. Embracing kenotic* christology, he gave it especially pronounced biblical traits.

Christi Person und Werk nach Christi Selbstzeugniss und den Zeugnissen der Apostel, 3 vols. (Basel, 1870-87).   H.H.

gestalt psychology: See psychology, schools of.

Geulincx, Arnold: (1624-1669) Dutch theologian in Löwen (Louvain) who later became a Calvinist and died as professor at the University of Leiden. He owes his fame to his doctrine of Occasionalism* according to which we are only onlookers not actors of our lives. The body is only an instrument; neutral reflexes and the inner will are only occasiones, causae occasionales for God who as a vera causa performs all our actions. His most important book Tractatus Ethicus primus appeared in 1665.   S.C.T.

Ghazzali, Al-: See Algazali.

ghetto: Originally the word, ghetto, was used to designate the separate section of the city in which Jews resided following the diaspora* whether from choice or compulsion. More recently it has been applied to the immigrant community in America in which any group differing in language, race, religion, or general culture has for a time been segregated. Segregation of the Jew first took place in response to common needs and mutual desires, later from compulsion. The compulsory ghetto restricted the movements of the Jew, his economic opportunities, and in general isolated him from the remainder of the population. Commonly the compulsory ghetto was enclosed by walls within which all Jews were compelled to remain under penalty except for restricted hours when they were permitted access to the surrounding community for business purposes. Such ghettos had gradually disappeared until revived by the Nazi regime in Germany.

The voluntary ghetto, whether of Jews or non-Jews, reached its zenith in the United States at about the time of World War I where it provided a transition from the Old World to the New for the large influx of immigrants. As the immigrant has been assimilated, with the restrictions upon immigration through quotas the areas of first settlement have tended to disappear except for the segregated colonies of Negroes who because of race prejudice are confined to restricted areas in American cities in much the same fashion as was the Jew in historical Europe. See anti-semitism.   E.R.M.

Ghibellines and Guelfs: Both terms are medieval and signify two different trends of thought, parties or affiliations in the former Holy Roman German Empire*, the one emphasizing the spiritual, the other the temporal power. The Ghibellines favored primarily the German emperors in their relations to the Papacy; the Guelfs favored the popes. Historically, the terminology of the two factions can be traced as far back as 1215, when the nobility of Florence was divided, the one faction favoring the exploits of the Emperor (Frederick II) into Italy, the other, in union with the people of Tuscany and Lombardy, opposing them. Later, the terms were used to differentiate, especially in the larger cities and communes, the feudal nobles (Ghibellines) and the plebeans or peoples' party (Guelfs) whom the popes always favored in their struggles for independence and freedom. Pavia and Siena, e.g., were Ghibelline; Milan and Florence, Guelf. Although Pope Benedict XII, in 1334, had forbidden under ecclesiastical censure use of the terms, the nomenclature temporarily remained at least as catch words of two different political trends and traditional animosities, until the advent of Charles V into Italy (1529) who established a new relation between Pope and Emperor. That the terms were in usage also in Germany (Waiblingen and Welfen) as early as the XII century is held by many authors, as representing the rivalry between the House of Welf (the Dukes of Bavaria) and the House of the Hohenstaufen (the Duke of Suabia), the former being the Guelfs, the latter, the Ghibellines The terms served in Germany also to differentiate the followers of Emperor Frederick I (Barbarossa) and those of Pope Alexander III* in the Lombardic struggles for supremacy. In Germany the terms disappear in the XIV century.

Paulet, Guelfs et Gibelines, 2 vols. (Paris, 1922); Lex. f. Theol. u. Kirche, IV, 486; Cath. Encyc. VII, 56-58.   R.M.H.

ghost: See death and burial practices; primitive religion; spirits.

Gideons, The: An interdenominational laymen's association organized in 1899 by John H. Nicholson, Samuel E. Hill and William J. Knights at the Janesville, Wis., Y. M. C. A. Its program includes a ministry of evangelism and the purchase and distribution of Bibles placed in hotels, hospitals, penitentiaries and since 1937 in public schools.

The International headquarters are located in Chicago, Ill.   V.F.

Gilbert de la Porree: (1076-1154) Besides being the greatest logician of the twelfth century, he also represents the culmination of moderate realism, a middle ground between Plato and Aristotle. He held that the persons of the trinity owed their existence, their unity, to divine subsistence.

A. Berthaud, Gilbert de la Porrée et sa philosophie (Poitiers, 1892).   H.H.

Gildas: (ca. 493-ca. 570) British monk, author of The Fall of Britain, a gloomy description of Christian Britain (Wales) during and after the Anglo-Saxon invasion of the island.

H. Williams, Gildas. (Cymmrodorion Record Series III, 1899.)   J.T.M.

Gilgamesh epic: The principal work of ancient Assyro-Babylonian literature which has survived. It recounts the heroic exploits and wanderings of Gilgamesh, who had apparently been originally an historical ruler of Uruk but became a mythical figure, and his friend, Engidu, half-man and half-bull. It contains the Babylonian Flood* Story, which is told to Gilgamesh by his ancestor Ut-napishtum, to whom he had gone seeking the secret of immortality. The best preserved version of this epic is from the Assyrian library of Ashurbanipal, but the Babylonian version was probably composed about 2000 B.C. and was based in part upon Sumerian legends of the third millennium B.C. A translation into English free verse has been published by William Ellery Leonard: Gilgamesh, Epic of Old Babylonia, (1934).   J.P.H.

Gioberti, Vincenzo: (1801-1852) At first devoted himself to a clerical career, later he was professor at the university of Turin, Italy. He was imprisoned and exiled for trying morally and politically to regenerate the Italians. He tried to reconcile the papacy with political liberalism. He developed a Platonic ontology, reminding one of Malebranche and Spinoza.

Teoria del sovranaturale (Brussels, 1838); Del primato morale e civile degli Italiana (Brussels, 1843); Discorso preliminare sulla teoria del sovranaturale (Paris, 1850), Della riforma cattolica della chiesa (Torino, 1856), Della filosofia della rivelazione (Torino, 1856); B. Spaventa, La filosofia di Gioberti (Napoli, 1863), L Ferri, Essai sur l'histoire de la philosophie en Italie au XIX siecle (Paris, 1869); K Werner, Die italienische Philosophie des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts. 5 vols. (Wien, 1884-86).   H.H.

Girgensohn, Karl: (1875-1925) German Protestant theologian. He was born in Oesel, Latvia. From 1903-1907 he was privatdozent in Dorpat, from 1907-1918 professor of Systematic Theology, Dorpat, from 1919-1922 at Greifswald, and from 1922-25 in Leipzig.

He was a representative of conservative Lutheran theology and was a prolific writer. Especially was he influential through his psychology of religion, in which he attempted to apply experimental methods to the study of the Christian faith.

Principal works· Die Religion, ihre psychischen Formen und ihre Zentralidee (1903); Seele und Leib (1908), Der seelische Aufbau des religiösen Erlebens. Eine religions-psychologische Untersuchung auf experimenteller Grundlage (1921); Autobiography in Die Religionswissenchaft in Selbstdarstellungen, vol 2 (1926).   O.A.P.

given, the: 1) Reality*, or the universe, regarded as independent of man's thought. 2) The total field of experience as it is at any particular time, or at all times (so D C. Williams). 3) The sensory content or data with which thought deals; also any aesthetic, moral, religious or other experiences regarded as subject matter for interpretation by thought. 4) That in a personal consciousness (especially in God's) which is not created or produced by the choice or will of the person (so Brightman). See finite God.   E.S.B.

Gladden, Washington: (1836-1918) A. B. Williams College 1859; engaged in hospital work with the U. S. Army 1863; pastor Congregational Church, North Adams, Mass. 1866-1871; North Church, Springfield, Mass. 1875-1882; First Congregational Church, Columbus, Ohio, 1882-1918. He was on the editorial staff of The Independent 1871-1874.

Author. Being a Christian (1876), How Much is Left of the Old Doctrines (1899); Present Day Theology (1913); Ruling Ideas of the Present Age (1895), Social Salvation (1902); Ultima Veritas (poems) (1912); Recollections (1909) (an autobiography); etc.,—some forty volumes in all.

Dr. Gladden was an energetic and fearless leader in liberating and socializing American theology and in vitalizing church and civic life.

His familiar hymn "O Master, let me walk with Thee" (1880) serves to keep living the spirit of his "lowly" but wide and forward-looking service. See New theology, the.   J.W.B.

Glassites: A small Scottish sect so-named from its founder, John Glas (1695-1773); also known as Sandemanians from his son-in-law, Robert Sandeman (1718-1771), who modified the teaching of the sect. It repudiated the State connection as antichristian, sought to conduct its affairs after the pattern of primitive Christianity, and was extremely strict and exclusive in matters of conduct.   A.K.R.

Glogau, Gustav: (1844-1895) Was professor of philosophy at the university of Kiel, Germany. Only psychology can show how the spiritual forces—ethical, social, artistic and religious—emerge in actual history. At the apex of all philosophy is the existence of God. God is because I am. Derived from God is the world of ideas. These exert a "solicitation", whereby the finite spirits inwardly develop. Glogau combats an intellectualism that exalts logical activity for its own sake. His thought approximates theosophy or mysticism.

Ein Beitrag zur Religionsphilosophie (Kiel, 1891); Gustav Glogaus Vorlesungen ueber Religionsphilosophie, ed. by H Claasen (Kiel, 1898), J. Andrich, Glogaus Theorie ueber die Entwicklungsstufen des Geistes (Erlangen, 1913).   H.H.

gloria: (Latin) The second section of the ordinary of the mass, used regularly except during Advent, Lent, and at funerals. A song of joy originating at the Christmas festival.   E H.B.

gloria in excelsis: The ancient Angelic Hymn (cf. Luke 2, 14). It is of Greek origin, and in the Eastern Church is used at Matins (Orthros). In the Roman Mass it is used (but not in penitential seasons) after the Kyrie. In the Anglican Communion service it is a post-communion hymn of thanksgiving.   P.V.N.

gloria patri: A brief ascription of praise to the three persons of the Trinity*, used in the Western Church at the end of the psalms and canticles of the divine office* and in several other contexts.   P.V.N.

glory, Old Testament conception of: A theological terminus technicus used most frequently to translate the Hebrew word kābôd. 1) Its primary meaning in secular usage was "to be heavy." A man's "Glory" was that about him which was weighty, important, the place of honor which his material possessions gave him, or whatever was imposing about him (cf. Gen. 31 1; 45 13; Psa. 49.17). 2) When applied to God, it refers to the imposing nature of His appearance. It is impossible for man to see God, but man does see God's "glory", a shining envelope surrounding His being. Thus we hear of the pillar of cloud and of fire in the wilderness, of the cloud at the dedication of Solomon's Temple and in the visions of Isaiah (chap. 6.4) and Ezekiel (chap. 1: 26ff.). 3) The term seems to have been further developed as the inclusive name for the self-revelation of God, whether in nature or in history (cf. Isa. 6:3; 60:1-3; Psa. 19:1). 4) Man, on his part, should "give glory to God": that is, recognize the weight and claims of God's revelation and regulate his life accordingly (Isa. 42:12; Psa. 29:1, etc.).   G.E.W. glosses: (from glossa meaning "tongue", or a word needing explanation) Hence it came to be used of the additional comments added in the margin or between the lines which later copyists incorporated into the text. From that it has come to mean any sentences or phrases not belonging to the original writing.   C.T.C.

gnomic couplet: A maxim or proverb epitomizing some point of moral wisdom based on experience, cast in the characteristic parallelism of Hebrew verse, e.g, Proverbs 10.1.   R.B.Y.S.

Gnosticism: Decades of modern research into the origin of Gnosticism have issued in a vast accumulation of materials for analysis, comparison, and synthesis and in the setting aside of earlier explanations but not in any final solution of the intricate problems presented. The early church fathers called gnosticism, Greek wisdom; Harnack* termed Christian gnosticism, the "acute Hellenization of Christianity", Gnosticism is now regarded as "pre-Christian oriental mysticism." The emphasis has shifted from interpreting it as philosophy and speculation to appreciating it as mysticism and primitive religious elements with Anz tracing its beginnings to the Babylonian religion; Friedlaender observing pre-Christian Jewish tints, Reitzenstein looking first to Egypt and then to Iran for its origin, Troje turning to India, Bousset to Babylonia and Iran and Eisler to the Orphic cults as sources. The total trend, designated Gnosticism, has become a syncretistic whirlpool with one eddy the orientalization of the Graeco-Roman civilization and the other the hellenization of the Orient.

The particular relation between Christianity and gnosticism has been defined as derivation of the former from the latter, as non-existent, and as the impact of the syncretism caused by the amalgamation of orientalism with Graeco-Roman culture upon Christianity. Christian gnosticism was the attempt to separate Christianity from its past by fusion with its environment.

Gnosticism was always a plan of salvation, a cosmic or supercosmic drama accompanied by a corresponding historical drama, outlining the story of the world from its creation to its redemption to its destruction; depicting the story of Man from his origin to the last man; narrating the story of the heaven-sent redeemer who recapitulated in his own life the drama of the cosmos, portraying the story of the individual man who likewise completed the cycle of suffering, dying, and rising again.

Gnosticism formerly understood as dualistic has become both dualistic and monistic, with a high God and a demiurge*; a cosmic fall* and an historic fall; a pleroma and an hysterema; spirit opposed to matter; good and evil desire; Man of Paradise and man of history. But it also had a synthesis, coincidentia oppositorum, the good God responsible for the demiurge and his evil world, the restoration of the original situation whence the next stage of movement proceeded. Light associated with darkness but returned to light. Spirit and soul were finally separated from the evil body. Elements of the pleroma that sank to the hysterema finally returned to the realm of perfection, immateriality, and the absolute.

The ethic of gnosticism was cooperation with the world process and therefore both ascetic and libertine. Without esoteric, revealed knowledge and magical practices and sacraments the way of salvation could not be known. Earthly men were of three kinds hylics, psychics, pneumatics with the psychics redeemed by faith and the pneumatics by gnosis.

Christian gnosticism tended toward repudiation of the O.T. and made Jesus an appearance and his death only apparent. The high aeon* entered the body of Jesus at baptism and deserted it before the death upon the cross. It discriminated between creator-god and the Father of Jesus. The gnostic god was a philosophical abstraction with mystical trimmings and redemption a divine comedy. In gnosticism the same god could not be both creator and judge and redeemer. If gnosticism had triumphed, Christianity would have become just another Graeco-Roman mystery cult. See Agapetae; Basilides, mystery religions, Ophites, salvation, Valentinus.

S Angus, The Mystery Religions and Christianity (1925), W. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis (1907), S. J Case, The Evolution of Early Christianity (1914); R Eisler, Orphisch-dionysische Mysteriengedanken in der Christlichen Antike (1925); John Knox, Marcion and the New Testament (1942); N Leisegang, Die Gnosis (1924); R Reitzenstein, Poimandres (1904); Das iranische Erloesungsmysterium (1921); Die hellenistischen Mysterien—religionen (1927), P. Wendland, Die hellenistische—roemische Kultur (1912), 163 ff.   C.H.M. goblin: (Perhaps from med. Lat. from Greek kobaloi, spirits invoked by rogues) A mischievous, repulsive demon.   F.L.P.

God: There are numerous theories as to the origin of the belief in God or gods. Some of these theories have had an anti-religious motive. They have sought to discredit theistic faith by ascribing its origin to fear, to the objectification of desire, to perverted sexuality, to priest and state craft, to social injustice, to dreams and trances, or to some other unworthy or untrustworthy aspect of human life or experience. The sufficient response to all such theories is that the validity of a belief or institution is not dependent on its historical genesis but on its present rationality and worth. Astronomy, chemistry and manual labor are not discredited by their historical connection with astrology, alchemy and slavery. And the same holds true of religion, in so far as it emerged out of earlier superstitious beliefs of one kind or another.

On the other hand, the belief in God cannot be validated by tracing its origin back to a primitive revelation, as some religious apologists have done. For aside from the impossibility of scientifically establishing such a theory, a divine revelation cannot be recognized as such without an antecedent belief in God. So setting aside the idea of a miraculous revelation some philosophical theologians have argued that theistic belief is rooted in a native human religious capacity which is as fundamental, as independent, and as trustworthy as is the theoretical, the moral, and the aesthetic reason This is the theory to which the epistemology of Kant and Schleiermacher naturally leads.

In the evolution of the biblical idea of God there were two developments of special significance. One was the moralizing and the universalizing of Jehovah, by the great Hebrew prophets: Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Deutero-Isaiah. This spiritual achievement under the extremely adverse political conditions that then prevailed is without parallel in the religious history of mankind. It constituted one of the great epochs of the human spirit. The other development was the fulfilment or culmination of the prophetic movement in the life and death of Christ. In the teaching of Jesus and Paul the God of Israel became not only a righteous and universal Deity in a more absolute sense than heretofore, he became a suffering God, a God of sacrificial love. This ideal through its embodiment in the person of Christ gave rise to the doctrine of the Trinity, with which we are not here concerned.

The prophetic-Christian conception of God was predominantly practical rather than theoretical in its source. But it became gradually fused with congenial theistic elements in Greek philosophy, and out of this fusion arose the rationalized Christian doctrine of God This doctrine in its main outlines has persisted in the church down to the present. It is monotheistic. It represents God as a unitary, personal Being, as immutable, as omnipotent, as omnipresent, as omniscient, as eternal, as the Creator and Preserver of the world, as a morally perfect Being, as a righteous and loving Father.

The existence of such a Deity was assumed in primitive Christianity. There was no need for proving it. But in the Graeco-Roman world the situation was different. There skepticism was common, and the church soon found it necessary to provide an apologetic for its faith. In the subsequent history of the theistic argument three periods may be distinguished. The first extended to 1200 A D., the second from 1200 to 1800, and the third from 1800 to the present. During the first period the "ontological" argument was dominant, during the second the "cosmological" and "teleological" arguments, and since 1800, the "moral" argument.

The ontological argument received its classical formulation from Anselm* (d. 1109) but its underlying principle or principles go back to Plato. According to Platonic or Neoplatonic realism the more universal an idea is, the greater is its reality, the greater its causal efficiency, and the greater its worth. The supreme universal is, therefore, the supreme cause, the supreme good, the supreme truth, the supreme reality. The very idea of a supreme or perfect Being thus implies his existence. For if he did not exist, he would not be supreme or perfect. Existence is implicit in the idea of perfection. But from the modern individualistic standpoint this "conceptual" argument, as it may be called, has no cogency. Between idea and reality there is a gulf which no logic can bridge.

The cosmological and teleological* arguments came into ascendancy with the revival of Aristotelianism in the thirteenth century. These arguments reason from the existence of the world to the existence of God as its cause, and hence may together be called the "causal" argument. According to Kant, the cosmological argument rests on "indefinite experience only", and, according to Thomas Aquinas, consists in reasoning from motion to a Prime Mover, from efficient or secondary causes to a First Cause, and from contingent existence to a necessary Being. The teleological or "physico-theological" argument, on the other hand, takes its start, according to Kant, "from definite experience, and the special constitution of the sense world thus revealed to us". By Aquinas it is called the "argument from the governance of the world." More commonly it is known as the "design" argument. These two arguments are in principle valid, if the validity of the category of cause is admitted. But God as mere Creator falls far short of the full Christian idea of deity.

The moral or "valuational" argument was Kant's substitute for the preceding theoretical arguments. It is based on the demands of the moral nature. Conscience assumes that the moral ideals are realizable. But they can be realized only if there is a supreme moral will. Morality thus leads inevitably to religion. God is a postulate of the moral law. This line of thought, supplemented by Schleiermacher's and Lotze's conception of the objectivity of religious as well as moral values, makes provision for the God of Christian experience, as the purely theoretical arguments did not.

The history of Christian thought with respect to God reveals on the whole remarkable continuity. But there have been several important developments or changes of emphasis, such as 1) the change from a universalistic to an individualistic conception of the divine nature or essence, 2) a change from a more or less dualistic to an immanental view of God's relation to the world, 3) a tendency toward an idealistic as distinguished from the earlier realistic conception of nature, 4) a stress on the orderliness of the divine will as opposed to the earlier emphasis on its arbitrary character, 5) an emphasis on the "passibility" of God as distinguished from the earlier emphasis on his "impassibility", and 6) the grounding of theistic belief in the practical rather than the theoretical reason. See analogy; attributes of God; cause; creation; finite God; first cause; foreknowledge; God as personal; eternal; eternity; immanence; infinite; omnipotence; omnipresence; omniscience; panentheism; pantheism; perfect; super-personal; theism; theodicy; time; transcendence; trinity.

B. P. Bowne, Theism (1902); A. E. Taylor, Art. "Theism," in Hastings' Enc. Rel. Eth. (1917-22); A. S. Pringle-Pattison, The Idea of God (1917); W. R. Sorley, Moral Values and the Idea of God (1919); F. R. Tennant, Philosophical Theology, Vol. II (1930); A. C. Knudson, The Doctrine of God (1930), and The Philosophy of Personalism (1927).

A C.K

God, as personal: Persons as we know them are social, that is, they enjoy personal relations. A "personal God" suggests one who can respond to prayer. But we may distinguish two forms of response, local and cosmic. God, if a cosmic being, can "answer" one man's prayer only as he simultaneously and without foolish bias takes account of other men's prayers and of all cosmic needs. God may nonetheless respond to the universe with full regard to the individuals which actually compose it, and in this sense may enjoy personal relations (See omnipotence and perfection.)

Since a person is a conscious individual, an impersonal deity must lack either consciousness or individuality (or both). Both have been often denied to God, and for the same reason: that they imply limitations. To be conscious of something is to be subject confronted by object, determined by it, and with it constituting a whole greater than either subject or object alone. Again, to be an individual is to be one member of a class or species rather than another, is to be this while failing to be that, for example, here and now in space and time rather than there and then. Men are individuated from one another, it is argued, by their defects and inabilities; but the being with all power and value must be being and value as such, "pure" being, rather than this or that being or personality in particular. It is also often said that God is not conscious or individual because he is super-conscious, super-personal*. It may be doubted, however, if "super" has here any meaning; since value is an affair of valuation and enjoyment, and superior value can only be superior satisfaction for some valuer, and a "super-personal valuer" seems only verbally distinguished from a superior type of person.

The limitations inherent in "personality" are of two kinds, only one of which need apply to a personal God. 1) Men are individuated partly by their localization in space-time, by the fact that they are parts of a larger whole, able to deal effectively with but a small portion of this whole. But suppose a being able to deal effectively with all portions of reality and in this sense non-localized. (See omnipresence.) 2) Such a being would still have a kind of limitation, in that it would deal with reality as it is and not as it might be. Even the whole of actual reality is limited, by comparison with the logically possible; and the being who, in non-localized or universally efficacious fashion, deals with all actual things as actual, can yet deal with possible things only as possible, until they too have been actualized (and not all of them can be at once—see perfection), and so he must lack whatever value would be found in dealing with these possible things as actual, should they become actual. Our human individuality is that of parts of the cosmos; the divine individuality may be that of the cosmos itself as integrated into a single self-identical life. (See panentheism.) If the parts of the universe have individuality, the whole cannot be mere being in general. However, it may be asked if the whole has sufficient unity to be personal, for the individual is contrasted not only to the general but to the ununified or unintegrated. The universe has integrity at least in the sense that it is the only whole whose literal dissolution seems unthinkable. The pervasive laws of nature also suggest cosmic unity. If in us a precarious and imperfect integration of activities, easily disrupted, has for its internal reality a fitful and imperfect individual awareness, the seemingly inviolable integration of all cosmic activities into the grand pattern studied by science (a pattern which, as Fechner likes to insist, is omnipresent and unfailing) may mean a perfect consciousness. Thus, on the one hand, one may argue from the cosmic body to the cosmic all-ordering mind. On the other, we have no analogy* by which to conceive God as an individual mind or person unless we impute to him a body adequate to his cosmic functions. What but the cosmos itself could be such a body? True, the cosmic body has defects, since its parts have defects. However, the perfection of an integrated whole is in principle of a different order from the sum of the values of its parts. God cannot, in every sense, escape limitation and yet have a cosmic body (or a cosmic mind, in any sense that is humanly conceivable, even dimly); but he may very well escape our forms of (localizing) limitations, and thus may enjoy a unique kind of perfection*, though not in every sense an absolute one. And though the cosmic body must inevitably bring tragedy into the life of God—for there is discord in the life of that body—this fact, so far from contradicting the religious perfection of God, may be its very expression. For it means that our tragedies are not matters of mere indifference to the perfectly loving being, nor yet matters of pure (and ethically monstrous) bliss, but of sympathetic sorrow tinging the divine blessedness, though not overcoming it. (For this reason Whitehead* speaks of the "heroic" character of God, and says that to impute mere happiness to him is a profanation.)

The purely absolute* and wholly unlimited God of the main philosophical and theological tradition is scarcely to be termed personal, if words are to retain any meaning. The positing of the "persons" of the Trinity*, even when combined with the doctrine of the Incarnation of one of the persons, seems not to remove the basic contradiction between individuality and the sheer absence of limitation. Since philosophy is now inclined to doubt the consistency of the traditional absolutism, regardless of whether or not this absolutism be combined with a personal view of God, and since the limitations inherent in personality as such are no more than are implied by the concept of the universe as an integral whole, the supposition that a more philosophical view of God is attained by sacrificing his personality is seen to have been an error.   C.H.

God, modern conceptions of: Great diversity and much controversy are found in theology today between those who hold different ideas of God. Some of the major points at issue will be noted. Then the criteria will be listed whereby one distinguishes from other realities that reality of God which is working upon us.

The relation of God to the world is one point in dispute. Some hold that God stands in utter opposition to the world (absolutely other). Differing from this extreme transcendence are views representing all degrees of immanence and transcendence of the deity. Extreme immanence is pantheism which declares that the world is the body of God and that there is no divine being apart from this world taken in its organic totality. In between are they who think that God is an operative reality in the world but is neither outside it nor inclusive of it.

The nature of God's perfection is also an issue. Some say that God is absolutely perfect in every respect. All that has been, will be and now is, are equally present to God, controlled by God, enjoyed by God. No improvement, addition, loss or change of any sort can apply to divine reality. Contrasting to God thus absolute in every respect are other ideas interpreting him as absolute in some respects only. God may be conscious of all that is and has been but cannot be conscious of the future because the future in concrete fullness of existence is not. Hence the future can be known, controlled and enjoyed only in respect to abstract possibilities having varying degrees of probability.

The categories of consciousness, intelligence and purpose as applied to God are in question. Some say that the total cosmos is the mind of God and is completely conscious. At the other extreme are they who insist that consciousness applies only to sentient organisms as found in man and the lower animals but does not apply to God because God does not have nerves and muscles and glands. God has powers so vastly different and greater than ours, they say, that it is foolish to apply our little characteristics of consciousness, intelligence and purpose to God. God operates on too vast a scale and too intimately with each one of us to be limited by such animal-bound functions as these.

Ideas differ in respect to personality in God. Some say that personality is the ultimate metaphysical reality upon which matter and all else depend continuously for existence and that God is the one supreme personality. Others declare that an analysis of personality and the necessary conditions of its existence reveal that God cannot be a personality because the necessary conditions on a cosmic scale are lacking. In any case, say these interpreters, personality is too limiting and restrictive. The powers of God must necessarily burst the bounds of personality.

Differences also appear regarding the creativity of God. Some say that God creates everything from nothing. Others think that God creates the present state of the world out of some prior state and that prior states run back endlessly so that there was never a beginning. Still others hold that the creativity of God is only one reality at work in the world, that it must work against the resistance of manifold forms of inertia and aberration found in certain states of inanimate matter, biological organism, human personality, closed community and historic tradition. On this view, God continuously creates the order of value in the world but not these resistances to his creation.

The data and criteria by which God may be known are in dispute. Some assert that we know God in a way peculiar to inter-personal knowledge and that revelation is identical with the way in which any person makes himself known to another. However there is no agreement on the way one person knows the mind of another, so this analogy does not solve the problem. It is claimed by some that we know God as a theory or rational hypothesis derived by inference from experience of what is not God, this experience being either our own consciousness or the processes of nature. Others insist that no true knowledge of God is had at all unless we have direct experience of the divine reality working upon us. If we have any real knowledge of God it can only be by distinguishing from other realities the actual operations of God working upon us directly to create us, to correct us, and to destroy evil and create good.

Such are some of the main points in dispute. We pass now to the criteria by which to distinguish the working reality of God from all other realities which are immediately experienced by us. We believe most Christian theologians would accept the fourteen criteria here listed. These do not, however, yield any knowledge of God when treated merely as a theory or rational hypothesis tested indirectly by observations on other realities than that of God immediately experienced in creative action upon us. Each of the fourteen applies to what is immediately and continuously experienced in the way of divine reality. The last seven are most emphasized in Christianity.

1) The creativity of God as distinguishable from all that is done by human beings must be something done to us, not by us, although men may provide some of the conditions required for its working. 2) It must be creative of the human mind and personality. 3) When given dominant control it must continuously sustain the human mind and personality in what is called "mental health." 4) It must save human life from all the major ills to the degree that it is given full control by way of man's self-commitment to it. 5) It must create human community and history and keep these in growing abundance of good just so far as obstructions to its working are removed. 6) It must be the creative source of all the highest intrinsic human good. 7) It must create the world relative to our minds in the sense that it can make the world anew when men give to it supreme control over the individual, social and historical developments of human existence. 8) It must answer prayer. (See prayer.) 9) For the Christian it must have been released into history with augmented power and scope by the Cross of Christ. 10) It must be what we sin against and also the forgiver of sin through Christ (See Living Christ for 9 and 10). 11) It must have a unity peculiar to itself, incomparable and incommensurable with everything else, and in that sense absolute and perfect. 12) It must have power likewise incomparable and incommensurable with any other. 13) It must have a goodness not greatest in terms of human goodness but a goodness incommensurable and incomparable to any other because its goodness is that of being the creative source of all good. 14) It must have the quality of holiness by reason of having such unity, power, and goodness incomparable and incommensurable with any other

Chas Hartshorne, Man's Vision of God (1941); A N Whitehead, Process and Reality (1929), E S Brightman, The Problem of God (1930), W. E Hocking, The Meaning of God in Human Experience (1912), Otto, Macintosh, Wieman, Is There a God? (1932); William Temple, Nature, Man and God (1935)

H.N.W.

God, wrath of and love of: See wrath of God.

Godet, Frederic: (1812-1900) Swiss Protestant theologian   He was born at Neuchâtel, now Switzerland but until 1848 Prussian Crown land. From 1833-1844 he was teacher of the prince Frederik of Prussia, later Emperor Frederik III, whose intimate friend he remained to the latter's end.   Pastor in Neuchâtel, 1850-1873, he became professor of N.T exegesis in the University of Neuchâtel. Conservative in his political and theological views he supported the formation of the Independent Church of the Canton of Neuchâtel*, and he taught from 1873-1887 in the Free Faculty of Theology. His insistence on Biblically inspired doctrine and religion made him one of the outstanding leaders of conservative Protestantism. His commentaries, which were translated into German and English, are written in fluent and dignified language and bear witness to the author's vast learning and his keen critical judgment. His aim was throughout to develop the theological significance of the text. Biography by his son Philippe Ernest Godet (1913). Principal works Commentaire sur l'evangile de St. Jean, 3 vols. (1863-1865, 3rd ed. 1881-1885, Engl tr. 1885-1886); St. Luc (1871, 3rd ed. 1888, Engl tr of the 2nd ed. 1881), L'épitre aux Romans (1880, Engl. tr 1888); Premiere épitre aux Corinthiens (1887, Engl tr. 1893).

O.A.P.

godfather, godmother: The man and woman who act as sponsors for a child in the ceremony of baptism. The godparents contract a spiritual guardianship over the baptized with the obligation to instruct the person and see to it that he is faithful to his baptismal vows.

S.C.

Godfrey of Fontaines: Scholastic theologian and philosopher, Bishop of Tournai. He was born ca. 1260, died ca. 1320. His fourteen Quodlibeta defend and develop Thomistic ideas, although he differed from Aquinas* in making substantial form the principle of individuation.

C.V.

Gods: Most of the early gods had their origin in man's emotional response to beneficent phases of the natural world—the dawn light which banished the cold and dangers of the darkness, the warming, stimulating sun, the storm rain which brought refreshment to pasture lands and crops after drought, the cooling winds, the fresh, life-giving waters, the fertile, food-producing earth. Other lesser gods emerged from emotional attitudes toward parts of the family dwelling—the hearth fire, the door, the food stores, the land. All of these deities were visible and tangible realities, friendly and helpful to man in his struggle for the goods of life. He talked to them and by his language gave them human qualities and personality. They would never have weathered the centuries of culture history, however, if they had remained simply phases of the friendly environment. Their chance for limitless growth came when they were blended with the idea of spirit* and became spiritual beings dwelling in the unseen behind and beyond their material manifestations. No longer fettered to tangible reality, with a reputation already established as bountiful givers of the goods of life, they were free to grow into cosmic beings capable of fulfilling all human desires and guaranteeing the highest human hopes. The mystery of the unknown surrounding man's limited realm of mastery added to their grandeur.

Many thousands of such gods began the pilgrimage through time with the various peoples of the earth. Only a few have survived as great gods. Others have clung to existence in the retinue of the high gods or as manifestations of them. Some of the little gods have lived, in spite of the blighting light of philosophic thought, because they were useful to the lowly folk. But vast multitudes of the early deities have fallen by the wayside unable to endure the winds of change. Ancestral gods, culture heroes, bound to a particular race or local habitation could never break their human bonds and become cosmic figures. They have rarely been able to survive the convulsions of changing cultures.

Each of the great gods has his own distinctive character acquired through the centuries by his relationship to the social and intellectual history of his people. The gods grow, change and die as they respond or fail to respond to human needs. The powers of the gods are enlarged to meet the growing desires and hopes of men. Sometimes they assume new duties when a culture moves to a new level, or in the interaction of cultures take on the functions of gods they have displaced. A tribal god* may grow into a national or imperial god following the political triumphs of his people. The gods grow in moral character with each advance in the social ideal since no god can live and be less moral than his worshippers. Sometimes the problem of evil has forced an omnipotent god to become finite, sacrificing his power to save his goodness. Often gods die when they lose their land and people by conquest, but the commonest cause of death is their failure in usefulness. Useless gods move slowly into neglect and oblivion. The greatest challenge that has confronted the gods was when they fell into the hands of the philosophers in quest of a metaphysical ultimate. Then they were often reduced to ineffable abstractions useless for the needs of religion.

The gods of the world and the ages may be classified in a few types 1. The nature powers. Almost all of the early gods and the great gods of history in their beginnings belong to this class. They were Dawn, Sun, Moon, Storm, Rain, Thunder and Lightning, Wind, Earth and Heaven. The overarching Heaven, source of the lesser sky and air gods, as the embodiment of cosmic order often rose to the supreme rank over the nature gods. Frequently Father Heaven and Mother Earth were the parents of the other deities. (See nature worship.) 2. The family gods—Door, Well, Storehouse and especially the Hearth Fire. 3. Potencies like the Roman Numina, formed on the model of the nature gods but without personality. To this class belong also the abstract deities, qualities and virtues deified—Peace, Purity, Righteousness, Love. 4. Human gods, men who had served the people in memorable ways were often deified after death—first ancestors, culture heroes, kings, sages, great warriors and masters of healing and the arts. (See ancestor worship, emperor worship, hero worship.) 5. Fertility gods, the Mother Goddesses* and their sons or consorts. Originally they were the earth and the grain-source of the food supply. Refined by thought in later culture they became the gods of the Mysteries*. The central figure was a dying and rising savior who gave immortality to those who were initiated into the church and shared the mystic communion meal of bread and wine. (See fertility cult.) 6. Creator gods. They are the result of speculation on origins. Usually the most important of the existing gods is chosen for this rôle. Sometimes there is confusion and several gods in a single culture are credited with the work of creation or a new god may be invented, such as the Hindu deity, Viśvekarman, the "All-Maker". In the Orient, when philosophers adopted the idea of a beginningless and endless universe creator gods were no longer needed. 7. The supreme personal gods—Yahweh of Israel, the God of Christianity, Allah of Islam, Ahura Mazda of Zoroastrianism and Amaterasu-Omikami of Japan. Although the life stories of these gods are very different they are invested with all the attributes of solitary, supreme rulers of the world and of human destiny. Ahura Mazda* has one distinction. He is a finite god* of infinite wisdom and goodness at war with Angra Mainyu, co-eternal with him and the creator of all the evil of the world. 8. The impersonal gods. In some cultures thousands of years ago thought pushed beyond the personal gods to an impersonal unity either spiritual or material—a Cosmic Order, Fate, Logos, First Cause or Absolute. Examples of these philosophic ultimates are Brāhman or Paramātman of Hinduism, the Dharmakāya of Buddhism, the Stoic Logos, T'ien, Tao or T'ai Chi of China, Zervan Akarana of Iran. These divine beings are usually tolerant of the popular gods of religion who may be considered as manifestations of them or as broken lights of their unknowable reality. Buddhism provided innumerable personal Buddhas and Bodhisattvas and human incarnations to make the Dharmakāya serviceable for religion. The high god of Hinduism was also incarnated many times for the salvation of men at periods of crisis in remote and modern ages, and the personal gods of the sectarian religions are all one with it. Impersonal Absolutes are never jealous gods. See religions mentioned.

A. E. Haydon, Biography of the Gods (1941); M. Jastrow, Aspects of Religious Belief and Practice in Babylonia and Assyria (1911); J. H. Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt (1912); M P. Nilsson, Minoan-Mycenaean Religion (1927); W. W. Fowler, Roman Ideas of Deity (1914); H. S. Nyberg, "Die Religionen des Alten Iran" German trans. H. H. Schaeder, Mitteilungen der vorderasiatisch-aegyptischen Gesellschaft (1938); M. N. Dhalla, History of Zoroastrianism (1938); H. D. Griswold, The Religion of the Rigveda (1923); J. E Carpenter, Theism in Medieval India (1921); E. J. Thomas, The History of Buddhist Thought (1933); H G. Creel, The Birth of China (1936); Fung Y-lan, A History of Chinese Philosophy, trans. D. Bodde (1937); D C. Holtom, The National Faith of Japan (1937); T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (1936); M M Kaplan, The Meaning of God in Modern Jewish Religion (1937); D. B. Macdonald, "Allah" Encyclopaedia of Islam, v. 1.   A.E.H.

Gods, Sumerian: See Mesopotamian religions.

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von: (1749-1832) German poet, dramatist and thinker. Well nigh universal in the scope and power of his genius, Goethe was deeply engaged with the profoundest problems of human experience and destiny, moral, metaphysical and theological and made a rich contribution to them all.

In his study of the human soul, its temptations and achievements, he may be called the poet of salvation by aspiration. This appears at the close of his great drama Faust, whose composition was the work of his whole life-time. When Faust, after being led by Mephistopheles into various iniquities comes at length to the hour unto which he cries: "Oh stay, thou art so fair"—in contemplating the future fruits of his labor in reclaiming a tract of waste land which is to become the scene of human happiness and well-being—instead of being borne away to hell by triumphant devils, he is rescued by angels singing:

> The noble spirit now is free
> And saved from evil scheming.
> Whoe'er aspires unendingly
> Is not beyond redeeming.

That aspiration toward the highest, and salvation thereby, is not, however, man's act alone but is concurrently the work of Eternal Grace in him suggested (together with the most striking use of symbolism in literature) in the closing words of the mystic chorus:

> All that is transient
> Is symbol, not soul;
> All insufficiency > Moves toward the Whole.

> The end, long despaired of,
> Yet shall be won.
> Love ever graciously > Leadeth us on.

Goethe's theory of the nature of evil appears in the answer of Mephistopheles to the question of Faust What art thou, then?

> Part of that Power not understood > Which always wills the Bad.
> And always works the Good.

In Gotz von Berlichingen (1773), Iphigenia in Tauris (1787), Egmont (1788), Hermann und Dorothea (1798), West-ostliches Diwan (1819) and other noble dramas and lovely lyrics—as also in other of his writings and in his conversations with Eckermann, Goethe offers a profound interpretation of both Romanticism and Classicism in the light of Christianity.   J.W.B.

Gog and Magog: Enigmatic names occurring in Ezekiel's* apocalyptic vision of the final assault of the fierce armed hordes of the North on the land of Israel prior to the inauguration of God's sovereignty (Ezek. 38-39). While Josephus* identifies them with the Scythians (Ant. 1. 6, 1), the Sibylline Oracles III, 319 locates them in Ethiopia. In Rabbinic* literature they figure as the rebel peoples who rise up against God and His annointed (Midr. Psalms, ed. Buber, 2.2; Ber. 7b. Cf. Revel. 20.8).   S.S.C.

Gogarten, Friedrich: (Born 1887, Dortmund) Protestant theologian. 1927 privatdozent Jena, 1930 Professor of Systematic Theology in Breslau, 1935 in Gottingen. In opposition to the historism of his teacher Troeltsch*, but in the traditions of German idealism he aspired after a system of "glaeubiges Denken" (reasoning born out of faith). This led him temporarily to the Biblicism of Kierkegaard and Luther and to a relentless criticism of liberal and idealistic Protestantism (so-called Theology of Crisis). For a number of years he regarded himself as a theological ally of Karl Barth* and he defended the position of Dialectical Theology* with great vigor and lucidity. But following Grisebach and Buber he abandoned his supernaturalism. He came later under the spell of conservative political thinkers and finally espoused the religious philosophy of National Socialism. He became one of the theological representatives of the "German Christians", who teach that the actual revelation of God takes place in national history. Principal works:

Die religioese Entscheidung (1921, 2nd ed. 1924); Von Glauben und Offenbarung (1923); Ich glaube an den dreieinigen Gott (1926); Politische Ethik (1932); Gericht oder Skepsis. eine Streitschrift gegen Karl Barth (1937); Weltanschauung und Glaube (1937); Das Bekenntnis der Kirche (1939).   O.A.P.

gohei: (Lit. "Great Offering.") A Shinto purification device, usually made of paper strips and strings of hemp fastened to a wooden handle, in shape suggesting a duster.   D.C.H.

Goldberg Memorial Foundation, The Jeannette Miriam: Established in 1938 by co-workers and friends of Jeanette Miriam Goldberg, Jewish social worker and educator and Executive Secretary of the Jewish Chautauqua Society (1906-1935). The interest from the funds of this Foundation is used to maintain annual series of lectures exchanged between the Hebrew Union College, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and various Christian theological seminaries, by members of their respective faculties, on phases of Judaism and Christianity respectfully, an appreciation of which, it is felt, is desirable for their students. To date such lecture relationships have been maintained by the Hebrew Union College with Union Theological Seminary, Yale University Divinity School and Duke University Divinity School. The Trustees of the Foundation are Rev. Dr. Louis Wolsey and Mr. Arthur P. Fleisher, both of Philadelphia.   J.M.

golden age, the: The conception of a golden age in the past is well-nigh universal. Its most explicit formulation possibly is by Hesiod, who outlined four. golden, silver, brass and iron. This characteristic of increasing degeneracy is also common. It is illustrated in the Hebrew-Christian tradition by the idea of the Fall*. See cycles of time, Messiah; millenarianism; progress.
   Hasting's Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics I, 183-210.   P.R.H.

golden mean: See s. v. mean, Aristotelian.

golden rose: A rose-shaped ornament of pure gold, blessed by the Pope on Laetare Sunday* (the Fourth Sunday of Lent), and conferred from time to time on eminent Catholics as a token of the Pope's esteem.   C.V.

Golgotha: See Calvary.

Good Friday: The name traditionally given in the Catholic communions to the Friday before Easter, upon which (traditionally) Jesus was crucified. The origin of the name is shrouded in obscurity, but it presumably emphasizes the value to men of that which was accomplished at the Crucifixion.   W.N.P.

Goodrich, Chauncey Allen: (Oct. 23, 1790-Feb. 25, 1860) Congregational clergyman; educator, lexicographer, graduated from Yale College in 1810, was rector of the Hopkins Grammar School to 1812, and tutor at Yale, 1812-1814. In July, 1816 he was ordained over the church in Middletown, Conn. In 1817 he became professor of rhetoric at Yale, and in 1838 was transferred to the newly created Professorship of preaching and pastoral work, which position he retained until his death. Goodrich worked for many years on Webster's dictionary, editing an abridgement in 1829 and, with colleagues, a thorough revision in 1847. He studied theology with Timothy Dwight* while a tutor at Yale, and throughout his life was a close friend and associate of Dwight's other pupils who formed the New Haven theology*. He did a great deal to further the establishment of the Yale Divinity School in 1822, and to get N. W. Taylor* as the

Professor of theology around whom the school was built. In 1828 when Bennet Tyler* and the conservatives attacked the New Haven liberals, Goodrich bought the Christian Spectator and issued it as a quarterly in defense of the New Haven views until 1836.   S.E.M.

Gordon, George Angier: (1853-1929) Born in Insch, Scotland, January 2, 1853, George Gordon sailed (steerage) for America in 1871, engaged in manual toil in Boston until a discerning minister persuaded him to go to Bangor Theological Seminary to study for the ministry. Completing his course there, he entered Harvard University, graduating with honors in philosophy in 1881.
   After serving the Congregational Church in Greenwich, Conn. for three years he was installed pastor of the Old South Church in Boston in 1887 and entered upon a notable pastorate which continued over forty years. He served also at different times as college preacher and pastor at Harvard and Yale Universities. As preacher, pastor and author he exercised a wide influence and next to Bushnell* became the leading advocate of the New Theology* in America. Dr. Gordon was an ardent student of Plato and Aristotle, an earnest Trinitarian, a severe critic of Calvinism (but with a high regard for the New England Theology*) and an undiscouraged upholder of "the Larger Hope."
   Chief among his books are The Christ of Today (1895); Ultimate Conceptions of Faith (1903); Religion and Miracle (1909); Aspects of the Infinite Mystery (1916); Immortality and the New Theodicy (1897), the first Ingersoll Lecture. In 1925 he published My Education and Religion, an outstanding religious autobiography See also J. W. Buckham, Progressive Religious Thought in America (1919).
                                                          J.W.B.

Gore, Charles: See Anglo-Catholics; Christian Social Union.

Gorgons: (Gr., Gorgones, from gorgos, grim, fierce) Three hideous sisters, with serpent-entwined locks and glaring eyes that turned to stone anything that met their gaze. Hence the Gorgon's head in armorial devices. Medusa, the one mortal sister, was slain by Perseus and from her blood sprang the winged horse, Pegasus.
                                                          E.M.N.

Gosala: A contemporary of Mahavira in the 6th century B.C. and founder of the Ajivikas.
                                                          C.S.B.

gospel: See evangelical; social gospel.

gospel and the gospels: The word for gospel (Gr. euaggelion, Lat. evangelium) meant originally a reward paid the bringer of good news; then it came to mean the good news itself. In the N.T. and in other early Christian literature, it means the message of salvation through Christ, preached by the apostles and evangelists of the early church. Even when the term is found upon the lips of Jesus himself (as in Mark 1:14) it bears this meaning.
   Even after written accounts of the life and teaching of Jesus began to appear, the term gospel still meant the Christian message of salvation; hence the titles of the gospels in our N.T.: "The Gospel, according to Matthew, Mark," etc. It was not until some time in the first half of the second century that the term gospel came to be applied to the individual books. The formation of the four-gospel canon about (or soon after) 150 A.D. naturally contributed toward this result, though at the same time it retained the older emphasis upon the unity of "the gospel".

The gospels are not biographies either in the modern or in the ancient classical sense. They are written with another purpose than to give a complete account of Jesus' life and teaching. That purpose may be apologetic (John 20·31, Luke 1 4) or didactic (as in the case of Matthew, which is arranged for use in teaching); or the purpose may be to encourage a church faced with persecution and the prospect of martyrdom (as in Mark, the earliest gospel).

Back of all the gospels is the oral tradition out of which they grew. This tradition was naturally not uniform, although it had probably become more or less stereotyped before being written down. There were no doubt written sources which antedated the gospels, some even earlier than the Gospel of Mark (see articles "Synoptic Gospels" and "Form Criticism"). This material, much of it already in fixed form, and some of it probably already in writing, was translated into Greek. The process of fixation of form continued even after translation into Greek —some of the narratives seem to have acquired their present form in a Hellenistic milieu rather than in a Semitic. Moreover, the authors (or compilers) of the gospels contributed much in the way of editorial setting and arrangement (rather than in the positive revision or reconstruction of contents).

The result was not books intended for publication and reading by the general public; the gospels were 'community books' intended for use within the Christian community, whose sacred tradition they now enshrined. They were 'traditional books', hence their impersonality and anonymity.

The same holds true of the Gospel of John, as of the synoptics. It is probable that the author has made use of earlier sources, in some respects parallel to the synoptic traditions and in one or two cases overlapping those traditions. But the author has gone much farther than the compilers of the synoptic gospels have gone, in revising, reorganizing, supplementing, and reinterpreting his material. The purpose of the author is to prove that Jesus was the Son of God, and at the same time to place upon his lips, as the authoritative 'Word' of God, the Christological doctrine of the church in the author's own time. That is, he aims to set forth the meaning Christ has come to have for the church, dramatically stating these doctrines as teachings of Christ himself.

It is a question whether or not the author of John knew the synoptic gospels*. A good case can be made out for the view that he was correcting the synoptics, perhaps an even better case can be made out for the view that he was using a tradition somewhat similar to the synoptic, but was reinterpreting it. The difficulty in the way of the view that he was correcting the synoptics arises from the large number of obvious points, in need of correction from his point of view, which he ignores. (See P. Gardner-Smith, St. John and the Synoptic Gospels, 1938). See evangelical; logos, Matthew; Mark; Luke, John.

See books cited following article "Synoptic Gospels." Commentaries. Matthew, A. H McNeile, 1915; B. T D. Smith, 1927. Mark, A. E. J Rawlinson, 1925; B. H Branscomb, 1937 Luke, B S Easton, 1926; J. M. Creed, 1930; H. K. Luce, 1933 John, G. H. C. MacGregor, 1930, see also R. H. Strachan, The Fourth Evangelist, 1925, new ed , revised, 1941 (The Fourth Gospel, its Significance and Environment) ; E. F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, Its Purpose and Theology, 1908 Theology. E W. Parsons, The Religion of the New Testament; E. Hoskyns and F. N. Davey, The Fourth Gospel, 1940

F.C.G.

gothic style: Gothic is a method of construction that developed in northern France and in the English midlands during the 13th and 14th centuries. Popularly it is supposed to be nothing more than the use of pointed arches and deeply coved mouldings, but these things are but accidents that accompanied revolutionary ideas in methods of construction.

During the previous Romanesque period, wall-bearing construction was the rule. Churches were relatively narrow, and their roofs rested upon solid walls, which were necessarily of great thickness so as to resist the thrust of the roof. Where clerestories existed, these were carried on piers of great bulk, set close together.

Since many churches were damaged by fire, builders strove to throw a vault of stone over chancel, nave, transepts and side aisles. Cérisy-la-Forêt, Jumièges and St. Georges de Boscherville, all in France, show indications of this transition. The aisles and triforia of Jumièges are vaulted, and this as early as the end of the 11th century. In the Abbaye aux Hommes, in Caen, we find a crude sexpartite vault, of 12th century date. St. Nicholas, Caen, has a ribless vault over the choir. Boscherville is also vaulted, the present work of 13th century date.

As the skill of the builders developed, they found it possible to support their heavy stone vaults on lofty shafts of stone, rather than upon continuous stone walls of great thickness. Where the weight and thrust of the stone vault was carried formerly by stone walls of enormous thickness, it became possible now to carry the vaulting on stone columns, comparatively slender in cross-section, and to reduce the thickness of the side walls considerably by using buttresses and flying buttresses. Thus thrust was met by thrust, and the weight of the heavy vaulting carried downward and grounded, by means of a system of buttresses and flying buttresses, the latter spanning the side aisles. The dead loads of the Romanesque era were supplanted by a system of live loads and balanced thrusts. Walls were made thinner, resulting in an economy of material. Windows, which had been very small in Romanesque days, now could be made large, because the vault was supported by isolated columns, and not by the wall proper.

The pointed arch is but a by-product of this highly articulated system of engineering. Where it was necessary to vault spans of unequal width, it was found possible to keep the crown ribs of the vaults on the same level by using pointed arches. A round arch of a given width can rise but one-half its span above the springing line, but a pointed arch may be made higher or lower at will.

Ornament is but a minor detail of Gothic. Its most important feature is found in its live loads and balanced thrusts. It is a form of highly developed engineering. Early Gothic work is rather simple in design, but in the later periods it became the custom to fill the large windows with carved stone tracery of rich and intricate design. Vertical columns, plain during the Romanesque period, became increasingly rich in the Gothic era, with deep coves cut into the stonework. There were ornately carved capitals, richly moulded bases and elaborate string courses. On the outside of the building, row upon row of prophets, apostles and martyrs, carved in stone, occupied niches with richly carved canopies. Stained glass of dazzling color filled the great windows. See art, ecclesiastical, Christian; church building

For those who would trace the story of this development of the Gothic style, see R. A. Cram's The Substance of Gothic (1927).   F.R.W.

Gottschalk: (805-868?) Hapless Saxon monk of tragic proportion, he became gloomily predestinarian*. His book condemned, he was imprisoned, impenitently Augustinian. His poetry expressed his resigned spirit. See double predestination. See Eriugena, John Scotus.   A.C.

Gottschick, Johann: (1847-1907) He taught practical theology in Giessen and Tübingen. He was with Ferdinand Kattenbusch* one who most faithfully guarded the inheritance of A. Ritschl*.

Luthers Anschauungen vom christlichen Gottesdienst und seine tatsächliche Reform desselben (Freiburg, 1887); Die Kirchlichkeit der sogenannten kirchlichen Theologie geprüft (Freiburg, 1890); Ethik (Tübingen, 1907); Homiletik und Katechetik (Tübingen, 1907); Luthers Theologie (Tübingen, 1914).   H.H.

Gourd, Jean Jacques: (1850-1909) Of French origin, he was professor of philosophy at the University of Geneva. Religion was for him an assemblage of incoördinables, which results from the opposition of scientific, moral, aesthetic and social laws. Religion, he thought, seeks to comprehend the neglected aspects of the manifoldness of the concrete. He viewed Christianity as the best conformation of the theology of incoördinables.

Philosophie de la religion (Paris, 1912).   H.H.

governmental theory: See Grotius; redemption; satisfaction.

grace: (Gr., karis) The word has the simple general meaning of favor shown or received, and the disposition to show favor, hence liberality, agreeableness (Lk. 1: 30; 2: 40, 52; 6: 32, 33, 34, Acts 2. 47). Its special Biblical and theological use is of the divine favor to sinful men. When men were without strength or even will to save themselves, God's unrestrained kindness interposed and salvation* is now freely offered to them through the crucified and risen Christ (Rom. 3: 24, 5. 1-10). It is not of merit or in any sense earned; the sole condition in the recipient is faith (see saving faith), and it too is of God (Eph. 2 7-9). Grace is further the divine help continually afforded by which men are kept and sustained, and enabled to do what is otherwise beyond their power (2 Cor. 12 9).

Grace is a concept of the universal Church, prominent in its theology, Catholic and Protestant, and in its epochal figures, Paul, Augustine, Luther, Wesley, et al. Augustine*, on this theme as on others, is the source of variant traditions. Grace is the love of God shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit*, it is moral enablement, the remedy for man's moral inability. But it is also nutriment for the spiritual life conveyed to the individual from without through material channels This notion paved the way for the Catholic theory of sacramental Grace which still separates Catholic and Protestant teaching. For both, salvation is the gift of God (emphasized for Catholics in the doctrine ex opere operato), but Catholics regard the sacramental system as the divinely appointed medium for the communication of it. Protestants stress the personal relation: God imparts His grace when men personally surrender to Him in hope and trust.

Differences have arisen in theology over the precise proportions of divine-human participation in the work of grace. Does man of himself desire grace, or does the presence of desire mean that grace is already given? Augustine held the latter, contending against Pelagius* that God bestows will as well as the grace that is willed (velle as well as esse and posse). This is prevenient grace (gratia praeveniens); although all grace is prevenient as being of God's initiative who knows and anticipates man's every need before man himself awakes to it. Grace is sufficient, some maintain efficacious: i.e., by divine power the will is not only enabled, but effectually impelled, savingly to believe. God's initial grace is a specific act, but it continues in the Christian life as concurrent Grace (gratia cooperans). Controversy has been keen over the relation of Grace to man's free choice . Does man voluntarily align himself with Grace (synergism*)? Is grace effectual, in those in whom God exerts it, to the degree of being irresistible? This question has sundered Evangelicals (Calvinists and Arminians), those who hold grace to be irresistible adduce predestination* to explain apparent resistance (in the unsaved).

Catholics, Protestants, Evangelicals of all schools, proclaim the Gospel of grace; yet theologies that make grace the sole instrument of salvation (sola gratia) and lay no store by works, ritual or ethical (as means, they are essential as fruits) are known as the Doctrines of Grace. Grace is the symbol of God's otherness and transcendence in its relation to the immanent forces of history; it is God's Love poured forth and in its present action for the redemption* of the world. See common grace, congruism; infusion of grace, forgiveness, justification; opus operatum, perseverance of the saints; redemption; regeneration, terminism.

J. W. Oman, Grace and Personality (1925); J. Moffatt, Grace in the New Testament (1931); L. Hodgson, The Grace of God in Faith and Philosophy (1936).   J.L.

grace, Old Testament conception of: The words "grace" and "gracious" are used most often to translate the Hebrew verb hānán and its derivatives. 1) The secular usage of the verb and the noun hēn has no religious significance and refers to physical excellence and beauty, to elegance of speech, to a favorable or well-disposed attitude toward another, etc. (cf. Prov. 1 9, 31.10, Ruth 2.10, Psa. 45 2). 2) In religious usage only the verb and the derived adjective hannûn are employed. The fundamental sense of the verb is to bestow a kindness which could not have been claimed. The derived adjective refers to the unmerited kindness thus bestowed. The action is always from a superior to an inferior, the former the bestower and the latter the recipient. While much of the religious terminology of the Old Testament is borrowed from covenantal and legal practice (man or God must or will act in a certain way because of a contractual agreement—see covenant, righteousness, justice), there is also present the belief that God will do more for man than the latter deserves. This is best expressed in the stereotyped sentence: "God is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and plenteous in hésed" (for the last word, see lovingkindness). This first appears in the 9th-8th century (Exod. 34 6-7), but is more common in post-Exilic literature (2 Chron. 30.9; Neh. 9:17, 31; Joel 2:13; Psa. 86.15; etc.).   G.E.W.

Gracian, Balthasar: (1601-1658) Spanish Jesuit and philosopher of baroque pessimism. A thinker and satirist he influenced Schopenhauer and Nietzsche.   E.A.R.

Graded Sunday School Lessons: See Sunday School movement in the United States.

gradual: (From Lat., gradus, step) Originally a psalm sung from the steps of the ambo*, but now shortened to two verses with alleluia. It is used in the Mass* between Epistle and Gospel and is the most elaborate of the liturgical chants. The term is loosely applied to any musical interlude between the eucharistic lections. See plainsong; psalmody.   P.V.N.

Gradual Psalms: The Songs of Ascent or of Degrees. Psalms 120-34. Sometimes called the Pilgrim Psalms, on the supposition that they were sung on pilgrimages to the Temple at Jerusalem.   P.V.N.

Graduale: The liturgical book containing the chants sung in the Latin Mass.   P.V.N.

Grail, Holy, the: See Holy Grail.

Granth: The sacred book of the Sikhs*. Consists largely of the poems of Nanak the founder, but also writings of Kabir and the Gurus who succeeded Nanak as leaders of the faith. The 10th Guru refused to appoint a successor to himself declaring that henceforth the Granth should be the Guru. And so it has been. In the course of time the Granth itself became an object of worship.

Translated by Ernest Trumpp (London, 1877). See also M. A. McAuliffee, The Sikh Religion (Oxford, 1909).   C.S.B.

gratia creata: (grace or favor given or performed) It is the effect of gratia increata, the divine act in the soul.   H.H.

gratia gratis data: (grace or favor given freely or willingly) By itself grace is in general freely given. Gratia gratis data is the stirring of the soul beyond its purely natural stirring. It designates the charismatic* gifts capable of preparing others to receive grace. It is the influence of God preceding the infusion of real grace, the gratia gratum faciens. It induces the individual to the right use of the sacramentally infused grace. It is the work of divine grace through the word.   H.H.

gratia gratum faciens: (grace or favor which binds one or which makes one grateful) It is the real grace in contrast to the gratia gratis data. It is something created in man whereby he becomes pleasing to God and whereby he is accepted by God. It is the grace communicated by God through the sacraments. It is the Divinely created new quality or habituality in man which restores the donum superadditum man originally possessed at creation, but lost through sin.   H.H.

gratia increata: (grace or favor not given or performed) The term designates the divine love and its work.   H.H.

Gratian: The Decretum (ca. 1150?) of Gratian is an ordered arrangement and completion of the collections of the eleventh century later developed and much commented upon by the successors of Gratian. Gratian did for Canon Law* what Peter Lombard* accomplished for theology "two eggs from the same nest" as the Decretum and Peter Lombard's Quattuor Libri Sententiarum are called. See decretals; festivals and holy days, Christian.   S.C.T.

Gratry, Alphonse: (1805-1872) French Catholic theologian best known as opponent of the dogma of papal infallibility* which however he accepted after its promulgation at the Vatican Council*. Also known for his remarkable philosophical work, De la Connaissance de Dieu (1855), for his critique of Renan's* Life of Jesus (1864), and for his charming Souvenirs de ma Jeunesse (posthumous).   W.M.H.

graves: See death and burial practices.

Great Awakening, the: See Awakening, the Great.

Great Bible: See Bible, English; Coverdale.

Great Schism, the: See Cerularius, M, schism.

Great Synagogue, the: The Great Synagogue*, also known as the Great Assembly, refers to the group of scholars who met from time to time, beginning during the days of Ezra* and continuing for two centuries after him, to interpret existing laws and to enact new ordinances. The exact nature of this group, their number and internal organization are somewhat obscure. Later generations, however, ascribed many important institutions to this body, from which we may infer that it was very active and was regarded as authoritative.   E.B.—L.F.

Great Vehicle: See Buddhism; Vehicles.

Greek culture, ancient: See Hellenism.

Greek Orthodox Churches: See Eastern Orthodox Churches.

Greek religion: The religion of the Hellenic peoples from about 1500 B.C. to about 500 A.D. The Achaean religion of about 1000 B.C., classically depicted in the Iliad and in the Odyssey (redacted out of traditional ballads by "Homer," who according to Herodotus lived about 850 B.C.), although never practiced anywhere as such, is ostensibly the religion of the Greek aristocracy far from the shrines of its homeland; it combines the deities and rites of many local cults. It derives primarily from the religion of the Minoans in Crete (about 2000-1400 B.C.), adopted in part by the Mycenaean princes of Greece (about 1600-1200); from the religion of the Greek invaders coming from the North; and that of the primitive Aegeans (called "Pelasgians" by the Greek), whose bronze age civilization (about 2500-1100 B.C.) is called "Helladic" by modern archaeologists. It seems fairly certain that Rhea and Artemis are Minoan; Athena is Mycenaean; Zeus (the Indo-Europeans Dyeus, the god of the sky) and Hestia are Greek; Hermes*, Demeter, and Kore (Persephone) are Aegean. Other deities came from Cyprus (Aphrodite, originally identical with the Western-Asiatic Ishtar or Astarte), Anatolia (Apollo and Hephaistos), and Thrace (Dionysos, ignored by Homer, and Ares). Whether Poseidon is Greek or Helladic remains uncertain; Hera is Ionian. The Homeric religion is anything but primitive: the deities are no longer forces of nature or its moving spirits, and the primitive rites connected with magic, tabu, and the cult of the dead (which persisted; as we know from Pausanias, in remote rural districts) lost their superstitious meanings. The Homeric deities are glorified human beings, immortal—even though subject to wounds and pain (Iliad V:334-362), driven by human moods and passions, plotting against one another, and taking sides in human conflicts. Their mansions are on Mount Olympos (Odyssey VI.41-46). Men attribute their misfortunes (Odyssey I·188-189) and even their evil impulses (Iliad XIX: 85-89) to Zeus or to Fate (Moira), but Zeus protests that human misfortunes result from human folly (Odyssey I 32-34; contrast Iliad XXIV: 525-533). The gods are entreated by sinners through sacrifices (cf. Iliad I: 458-468), vows, libations, the sweet savor of burnt offerings, and particularly prayers (Iliad IX.499-512); they make known their wishes through diviners, priests, and interpreters of dreams (Iliad I 62-63).

The influence of Homer was decisive, although Herodotus (II:53) exaggerates in attributing to Hesiod and Homer the genealogy, the titles, the prerogatives and functions, and the appearance of the Greek gods. By the side of local cults, Homer created a common religion of all the Greeks, the worship of the Olympian gods headed by Zeus, he gave to the deities clear-cut personalities, as also human figures and countenances so well delineated that later painters and sculptors could reproduce them unhesitatingly (Phidias, according to Valerius Maximus III:vii, 4, confessed that his statue of the Olympian Zeus was inspired by Iliad I 528-530). But other religious movements arose and grew from the seventh to the fourth centuries. While the Delphic oracle of Apollo and the great Hellenic games stressed the Pan-Hellenic aspects of religion, and the veneration of heroes conversely emphasized its parochialism, corrosive influences were attacking the Homeric religion. The orgiastic rites in honor of Dionysios, the Eleusinian mysteries of Demeter, and particularly Orphism brought to the individual the assurance of salvation and eternal bliss through mystical communion with the deity. Homeric anthropomorphism was attacked (Xenophanes) or spiritualized through allegory (Stoicism), while poets (Pindar, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides) and philosophers (the Eleatics, the Sophists, Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle) in various ways gave to religion the noblest ethical and philosophical significance. Both in its primitive popular aspects and in its Platonic sublimation, the Greek religion has had a lasting influence on Christianity. See mystery religions; temples, Greek and Roman.

O. Gruppe, Griechische Mythologie und Religionsgeschichte (I. Müller's Handbuch, V, 2, 1902-1906); L. R. Farnell, Cults of Greek States, 5 vols. (1896-1909); The Higher Aspects of Greek Religion (1912); G. Murray, Four Stages of Greek Religion (1912); E. Rhode, Psyche, 7th-8th ed. (1921); Jane E. Harrison, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion 3rd ed. (1922); A. B. Cook, Zeus, 3 vols. (1914-40), M. P. Nilsson, Greek Popular Religion (1940). R.H.P.

Greek religious drama: See religious drama.

Green Lectureship, The Stephen: Established c. 1920 at Andover Newton Theological School, Newton Centre, Mass., by Mrs. Natalia L. Greene and sons with the purpose of securing "from time to time the services of scholars prepared to deliver lectures on important subjects related to Christianity in recent history." Its capital sum is $10,000. Lectures are presented at irregular intervals. Among those appearing on this foundation have been Dr. W. L. Sperry and Bishop F. J. McConnell.

(Data from the Office of the President of the Theological School.)   V.F.

Green, Thomas Hill: (1836-1882) British neo-Hegelian* philosopher, who contended that since man has self consciousness he cannot merely be a product of material forces. The moral ideal, eternally known to God, is gradually realized in human moral progress. Men are advancing in personal character and appreciation of a larger common good. Green successfully opposed skepticism and naturalism, reconciled religion with science for the time being, and advocated social reforms. His chief works, published after his early death, are Prolegomena to Ethics (1883) and Principles of Political Obligation (published separately, 1901).   W.K.W.

Gregorian calendar, the: To rectify an error in the computation of time according to the Julian Calendar (established in 47 B.C. by Julius Caesar), Pope Gregory XIII (1572-85)* edited in the year 1581 a Papal Bull "Inter gravissimas" in virtue of which ten days (Oct. 5-14) of the year 1582 were to be eliminated from the calendar. Accordingly October 4, 1582 was followed immediately by Oct. 15. The cause of the discrepancy lay in the fact that in the Julian Calendar the year was set at exactly 365¼ days with a leap year every fourth year. The 24th day of February was celebrated twice each leap year, hence the Roman expressions "bis-sextilis" or "bis sexto Kalendas Martias". Moderns simplified matters by adding a 29th day to February. As the actual time required for the revolution of the earth around the sun is not 365¼ days or 365 da. and 6 hrs., but rather 365 da. 5 hrs. 49' and 46", the calendar was running ahead of the earth each year 11' and 14". By January 1, 1582 astronomers calculated the discrepancy amounted to ten full days. The Julian leap year every four years was retained by Gregory XIII, but to make up for future (after 1582) discrepancies, only those century years equally divisible by 400 were to be retained as leap years, thus e.g., the years 1600, 2000 etc., whereas others e.g., 1700, 1800, 1900 were to be rejected. The calendar as thus amended is good for another 10,000 yrs. The Gregorian Calendar was introduced only gradually into Protestant countries. England and her colonies adopted it in 1752. George Washington was thus born on Feb. 11, 1732 as correctly recorded at his homestead in Mount Vernon, Va. because at that time the Colonies were still using the old style of calculation. After the new calendar went into effect, his birthday was made to conform to the Gregorian calendar and thus placed at February 22, because by 1752 there was a discrepancy of 11 days. All modern countries have now adopted civilly the "new style" of the Gregorian calendar; some Orthodox and Greek Schismatic Churches still retain ecclesiastically and liturgically speaking, the "old style" in the celebration of their feasts, especially Christmas, Epiphany and Easter. A similar distinction applies to Orthodox Jews in the celebration of their Easter and New Year, because calculated on another system of lunar or Jewish years.

Litt. cf. The Columbia Ency. (1935), 275-6; P. W. Wilson, The Romance of the Calendar (1937).
                                                    R.M.H.

Gregorian chant: The plainsong* chants of the Roman Catholic church. A monodic, solo or unison, unaccompanied, rhythmic but unmetrical chant*. Gregorian music consists of a great collection of more than 600 compositions on Biblical texts, begun by St. Ambrose*, bishop of Milan in the fourth century and Pope Gregory I* in the late sixth century. Aside from its use in its own right, Gregorian chant served as the basis for all polyphonic* composition through the 12th century and for many later works both polyphonic and harmonic.

The early manner of performance of Gregorian music was revived in the late 19th century by Dom Mocquereau at the Benedictine Abbey of Solesmes in France. In 1904 Pope Piux X* ordered a return to the use of Gregorian chant throughout the Roman Catholic church, without, however, excluding good music of other styles. See modes.

Dom A. Mocquereau, Paléographie musicale, 16 vols (1889-1931).   E.H.B.

Gregorian tones: Formulas for the recitation of the verses of the Psalms between the antiphons. Sung in a type of speech-song. There was a Psalm-tone for each of the eight medieval modes and one irregular one with two reciting notes called Tonus peregrinus.   E.H.B.

Gregory the Great, Gregory, I: (540-604) Called the "father of mediaeval papacy." His theology is Augustinian only in its formulas. Although a breath of Augustine's spirit is in his writings, the less valid traditional elements—miracles, hierarchical and priestly practices, emphases on merit, reward, fear and hope,—predominate. Ugly superstitions, mythological reflections about angels and demons pervade his works. He is consciously orthodox in Trinitarian doctrine and Christology and in agreement with the Councils of the Church. He rightly designated his writings as bran in comparison with the wheat of Augustine. Although almost all of his ideas have their roots in Augustine, yet almost none of them are genuinely Augustinian. The fear of uncertainty that aspires to attain security through the institutions of the church, dominates his whole thought. He became Bishop of Rome in 590, advancing papal power in the realm of politics, organized missionary efforts and interested himself in liturgy and music. See celibacy; chant; Gregorian chant; schola cantorum; seven deadly sins.

Ed. Clausier, St. Gregoire (Paris, 1886-1891); F. H. Dudden, Gregory the Great, his place in the history of thought, 2 vols. (1905); G. J. Th. Lau. Gregor I der Grosse (Leipzig, 1845).   H.H.

Gregory the Illuminator: (c. 257-333) Builder of the Christian church in Armenia. Through his efforts Christianity replaced paganism as the religion of the country. Brought Armenian church* into touch with Christendom.   K.H C.

Gregory of Nazianzus (ca. 329-390) A great theologian of the Eastern Church A friend of Basil the Great* with profound religious perception he coined in his brilliant, but overloaded rhetoric, the leading formulas for his time. With Basil he conceived of religion as a life of the spirit in which reason first visions the eternal beauty of God in his works in order to advance later to the blessed height of the contemplation of the unveiled God. See Cappadocians, the Three.

K Holl, Amphilochius von Ikonium in seinem Verhältnis zu den drei grossen Kappadociern (Tubingen & Leipzig, 1904) ; C Ullmann, Gregorius von Nazianz, der Theologe. 2nd ed. (Gotha, 1867).
                        H.H.

Gregory of Nyssa: (ca. 332-398) Eminent Greek theologian, bishop of Nyssa. In quiet serious mental work he turned back far more pronouncedly than his two colleagues (the Cappadocians) to Origen*. He was a splendid expert of scientific psychology, fond of describing the ascent of the soul to God. He concurred with the typically Greek view that God, or the good, attracts man. The will is not thereby moved, but the intellect and a certain aesthetic perception The feeling to be one with God is blessedness. See Cappadocians, the three.

K Holl, Amphilochius von Ikonium in seinem Verhältnis zu den drei grossen Kappadociern (Tubingen & Leipzig, 1904) ; H. Koch, "Das mystische Schauen bei dem heiligen Gregor von Nyssa" in Theologische Quartalschrift. vol. 80 (Tubingen, 1898).
                        H.H.

Gregory, VII., St., Pope: (1073-85) Pope St. Gregory VII, the "Monk Hildebrand" (b. between 1020-25), is rightly looked upon by Church historians as the turning point from the so-called "Dark Ages" of the papacy to the brighter future of Medievalism. He was not, however, the first of his century either to see or inculcate the need of ecclesiastical reform. His contemporaries, St. Peter Damien* (d. 1072), Cardinal Humbert of Lorraine (d. 1061), St. Hugh, Abbot of Clugny (d. 1109) and his predecessors in the Chair of Peter, from St. Leo IX (1049-54)* to Alexander II (1059-61) were, like him, intent on reform and on formulating a program that was indeed to find its culminating peak in Gregory, but its final victory only some 40 years later in the Concordat of Worms* in 1122, between Emperor Henry V (1106-25) and Pope Callixtus II (1119-24) ratified the following year by the First Lateran Council (1123). Gregory's main attacks were directed against concubinage of the clergy, simony in the procuring of ecclesiastical benefices, and investiture by secular princes. (See investiture conflict). The chief offenders among the latter was Emperor Henry IV of Germany (1056-1106), although the evil had been prevalent in the Church for centuries. To obtain his end, Gregory was finally forced to excommunicate the Emperor, thereby releasing the German princes and people from their oath of fealty. They were on the verge of electing a successor at Augsburg, Feb., 1077, when Henry voluntarily appeared (midwinter, Jan. 1077) in penitential garb at Canossa, the palace of the Countess Mathilda, whose guest the pope had been on his way towards Germany, and sought the pope's absolution, which was granted him Ungrateful for his rehabilitation Henry continued to violate the Church's canons and to persecute by military arms the very pope who had saved for him the imperial crown Gregory died in exile, at Salerno, May 25, 1085. He did not seek to dominate secular princes, as is frequently, but falsely asserted, rather, he sought to free the Church from their unwarranted usurpation, internecine strife and interference in matters ecclesiastical and primarily spiritual. He is considered to have been one of the greatest of the Roman Pontiffs and one of the most remarkable of men of all times. He was beatified by Gregory XIII in 1584 and canonized in 1728 by Benedict XIII. Feast May 25. See Dictatus Papas.

Monumenta Germaniae Historica (MGH) referring to Henry IV and Henry V, L Duchesne, edit. Liber Pontificalis II 282-9; Migne PL Vols 143-148, Eric Caspar, edit Gregorii Registrum (Berlin, 1920-23) , Hefele-Knoffler, Conciliengeschichte Vols V-VI (Freiburg in Br , 1886-90) ; Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Florence and Venice, 1759-98) Vol XX 60-391, A Fliche, Les Prégoriens (Paris, 1916). Id , La Réforme Gregorienne (Louvain, 1924) ; Id. Saint Grégoire VII in the series Les Saints (1920) ; J. Gay, Les papes au XI siècle (Paris, 1926) , W Schneider, Papst Gregor VII und das Kirchengut (Greifwald, 1919) ; Alex C. Flick, Rise of the Medieval Church (1909) , Dr J. P. Whitney and L. N. Brooks in Cambridge Medieval History, Vol V. For a good bibliographical survey cf. Cath. Hist Rev. XVII No. 3 (Oct. 1931) 257-67 by Thomas Oestreich.   R M.H.

Gregory IX: (1227-41) Born at Anagni, 1170, Count Ugolino of Segni, studied at Paris and Bologna, became under his uncle Innocent III papal chamberlain, in 1198 Cardinal Deacon and in 1206 Cardinal Bishop of Ostia. As Papal Legate* he showed great political skill as well in Germany (selection of a new emperor) as in Italy. Although before his election as pope a friend of Emperor Frederick II, he came into open conflict with him during the very first year of his pontificate due to the fact that the emperor had striven to extend his farflung empire also over the Church's domains (cf. "Papal States") and furthermore had continually delayed his solemnly pledged crusade against the Saracens. When on an occasion of an epidemic Frederick relinquished the idea entirely, he was immediately excommunicated by the pope. During the absence of Frederick in the Orient, who, although still under ecclesiastical ban, had finally consented to take up the crusade, papal troops stormed Apulia, but were soon routed by the returning emperor. When at the Peace Treaty of Ceperano, Aug. 28, 1230, prepared by the initiatives taken at San Germano, Frederick made wide and important concessions, the ban was lifted. Peace lasted for nine years. The conflicting political viewpoints of pope and emperor occasioned a new rupture, this time regarding Lombardy. Frederick was again excommunicated, March 20, 1239. The issues were fought bitterly on both sides with arms and manifestoes. The pope even went so far as to counsel and encourage through Albert of Behaim, the Archdeacon of Passau, the election of an anti-king. In retaliation Frederick hindered the convening of a General Council that had been set for Easter, 1241, in Rome. He stood with an army before the gates of the Eternal City as Gregory died. Despite passionate energy and lack of deeper consideration for others, both as Cardinal Ugolino and as Pope, Gregory IX showed a friendly and fatherly interest in the Poverello of Assisi, Francis of Assisi*. As Cardinal Protector of the Order Friars Minor* he not only advised Francis in all of his actions pertaining to the Roman Curia and the expansion of the Franciscan* Order, but likewise exercised a wide influence on the development of the Third Order*. The pope also favored the Dominicans* and confided to them almost exclusively the charge of watching over the purity of the Faith, especially through the Inquisition*, which up to that time had been in charge of the Episcopal Curias. (Centralized in 1232). He permitted the free study of the expurgated editions of the works of Aristotle and through Raymond of Penaforte published the famous collection of Decretals*, which henceforth were to be the official juridical codex of the Roman Church. The pope did much to retain the Latin Empire in Constantinople.

Potthast, Regest. Pont. I, 680-940; II, 2009-2110; Mon. Germ. Epist. Saec. XIII, I (1883); L. Auvray, Registres de Greg. IX (Paris, 1890-1918). Biographies by Balan (Modena, 1872-73) and Joseph Felton (Freiburg in Br., 1886); H Mann, The Lives of the Popes in the Middle Ages, Vol. XIII (London, 1925). R.M.H.

Gregory XI: (1370-78) Born in 1329 in the Diocese of Limoges, Pierre de Beaufort (the last French pope), was created cardinal at the age of 19 by his uncle Clement VI. He was a good canonist, pious and morally above reproach. As pope he condemned 18 theses of Wiclif*. Due to the presence and influence of the hated French officials throughout the Papal States* a national rebellion, instigated and led by Florence, spread throughout the papal domains. Florence was placed under ecclesiastical interdict and, through the aid of Breton hirelings under the Cardinal Legate* Robert of Geneva (later the Anti-Pope Clement VII), the insurrection was squelched. On the insistent pleas of St. Catherine of Siena*, Gregory finally decided to return to Rome and thus end the 70 yrs. "Babylonian Exile" at Avignon.

Baluzi, Vitae paparum Avenionensium ed. G. Mollat, Vol. I (Paris, 1916) 415-67; J. P. Kirsch, Die Rückkehr der Päpste Urban V und Gregor XI nach Rom 3 (1898); G. Mollat, Les papes d'Avignon 3 (Paris, 1921); L. Pastor, History of the Popes Vol. I and II (1923). R.M.H.

Gregory XIII, Pope: (1572-85) Born of a distinguished Italian family, Jan. 1, 1502, Ugo Boncampagni studied law in his youth and later became professor of the same subject in his home city. In 1565 he was created cardinal and sent to Spain as Papal Legate*. Elected pope on May 13, 1572 through the influence of Cardinal Granville, Gregory XIII strove to imitate his saintly predecessor, Pius V* in his own personal life and to continue the Catholic Reformation* inaugurated by him in accordance with the decrees of the Council of Trent*, in which, despite the opposition of France, he was successful. He reorganized the Congregation of the Index* referring to forbidding books, etc. In behalf of Germany he created a special cardinalitial Congregation as also two nunciatures (cf. "Papal Legates") one for Upper, the other for Northern Germany. To further the interest of union with the Church he despatched Possivino to Sweden and to Russia, where he was able to influence King John III to return to Rome. His endeavors for a new crusade against the Turks failed. In other matters however, especially in educational, legal and missionary affairs he was highly successful. In 1582 he reformed the Julian, and introduced the Gregorian Calendar*; ordered a new edition of the Corpus Juris Canonici, and encouraged the reform of ecclesiastical music. But, next to the revision of the calendar, his name will be best remembered for his interest in, and subsidizing of foreign missions (India and Japan); for the erection of 23 new seminaries, placed in charge of the Jesuits*; for the founding of the English, Hungarian, Greek, Armenian and Maronite colleges in Rome; for the endowments of the German College and of the Roman College (Sapienza) of which he is called the second founder. Although entirely innocent of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew*, despite the Te Deum at St. Peter's chanted for the safety of the King of France, he is accused of having encouraged the Irish in their rebellion against Elizabeth. As a result of his extensive educational endowments and building expenses incurred in enlarging and beautifying Rome (Quirinal, Gregorian Chapel in St. Peter's Basilica, etc.) the papal treasury was depleted, causing dissatisfaction and inviting banditry. It was only under his successor, Sixtus V* that both evils were remedied.

Bullarium Diplomatum et Privilegiorum Summ. Roman. Pont. Taurinensis editio, Vol. VI (Torino, 1860), vol. VII and VIII (Naples, 1882); Pagi, Breviarium gestorum Pontif. Roman. (Antwerp, 1873), VI, 718-863; L. Pastor, History of the Popes, Vol. XIX-XX (1930). R.M.H.

Gregory of Rimini: (unknown—1358) A member and later general of the Augustinian Order*. He taught at Bologna, Padua, Perugia and at Paris. At this latter place he embraced the nominalism of Ockham* (around 1300-1349) of which he became a leading representative ("antesignanus"). Author of a book "On Usury". (Armini, 1622). I.C.T.

Gregory, Thaumaturgus: (d. c. 270) Energetic bishop of Neocaesarea in Pontus. Man of piety, learning and missionary zeal. A leading theological writer and follower of Origen*. Called "The Wonder Worker."   K.H.C.

Gregory, St. of Tours: (538-594) Bishop of important see in Frankish kingdom. Historian of the Franks. Main historical value of his Historia Francorum lies in section dealing with contemporary events.   K.H.C.

Grenfell, Sir Wilfred T.: (1865-1940) English medical missionary, born at Parkgate, Cheshire, educated at Marlborough and Oxford, receiving the M.D. degree. After studying at the London Hospital he joined the Mission for Deep Sea Fishermen for three years as medical missionary. In 1892 he started his mission in Labrador, building hospitals, establishing homes, schools and industrial enterprises. His lectures and writings aroused interest in England, Canada and America, which created an organization known as the International Grenfell Association.   P.E.J.

Groningen school, the: A group of Dutch liberal theologians who gathered around P. Hofstede de Groot L. G. Pareau, van Oordt, W. Muurling, and others. They developed their views for many decades in the meetings of a little group of professors and pastors from the University of Groningen. As a mediating theology, influenced by Schleiermacher, Lessing, Herder and the Dutch philosopher W. van Heusde, its rationalism was frankly heterodox, but thoroughly supernaturalistic. As a group they made themselves free from the older supernaturalism. They were humanistic and synergistic. They viewed the whole history of the world as an education of mankind by God in the good, the true and the beautiful. They regarded education as the chief task of the church. They were less intellectualistic than the supernaturalists. They did not regard doctrine as the most important. Their great merit was that their theology centered in the personality, work and example of Christ. They honored the historical Jesus as divine personality; but they refused to recognize Him as a God, and rejected the satisfactio vicaria. Christ was for them as for Arius a created heavenly being and the Holy Spirit was not a person. They taught preexistence, but not the logos doctrine. They denied the doctrine of the Trinity. They declared Christianity to be the true and the most excellent stage of human religion, but they regarded Christianity not as the exclusively true religion. They rejected the dogmas of regeneration and atonement. They denied the total sinfulness of man and the existence of demons. They taught that the education of God terminated with a restoration of all things; that the O.T. was ultimately surpassed, that Paul had effected a transformation of the pure gospel of Jesus Christ. They acknowledged the validity of miracles for which reason they combatted modernism. They declared themselves decisively against restriction on liberty and doctrine, and against the obligation of the teachers of the church to agree with the confessional standards. Until 1880 they exerted a great influence in church administration. Though their present number is small, yet their theological influence is proportionately large. At present closer to the orthodox attitude, they are still opponents of confessional church politics.

P Hofstede de Groot, De Groninger Godgeleerden in hun Eigenaardigheid (Groningen, 1855) ; J. Herderschee, De modern-godsdienstige Richting in Nederland (Amsterdam, 1904) ; W F. K. Klinkenberg, De Evangelische Richting (Baarn, 1907) ; J Lindeboom, Het bijbelsch Humanisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1913) ; K H Roessingh, De moderne Theologie in Nederland; hare Voorbereiding en eerste Periode (Groningen, 1914).   H.H.

Groote, Gerard: (Gerardus Magnus, 1340-1380) Born in Derventer near Utrecht, educated in Paris, Aachen, Cologne and Prague. Distinguished professor of theology and philosophy in Cologne and holding important church positions, Groote at thirty, left honors and wealth to follow in the footsteps of Jesus Christ. He spent three years of study and in ascetic practices in the Carthusian* monastery of which an old college friend was the prior. He visited also the renowned Flemish mystic Jan van Ruysbroeck* whom he resembles in his well balanced life and in practical service to his fellowmen. Groote became an itinerant preacher to whom thousands listened. He founded the Brotherhood of the Common Life* whose main work was educating youth. Their free schools were scattered throughout the Rhine valley. The Brothers and Sisters of the Common Life in their services suggest the work done by modern social service organizations.

Groote kept a diary of his own religious experiences and when restrained from preaching by offended contemporary clergy, he retired to write. By his preaching, teaching and writing he became known as the father of the religious movement, Devotio Moderna or the New Devotion whose members schooled themselves by daily practice of Christ's teachings In 1921 in Lubeck, a Netherlandish ms. of sixty chapters on "Admonitions concerning Interior Things" was discovered among manuscripts belonging to the Sisters of the Common Life. This discovery establishes Groote as the author of the greater part of "The Imitation of Christ"*, usually attributed to Thomas a Kempis who without doubt edited the devotional book. Thomas a Kempis as member of the Windesheim congregation founded by Florentius Radewyns a follower of Gerard Groote was also biographer of Groote. See The Following of Christ, (1941, tr. into English from the Netherlands text), Joseph Malaise, S. J.

A.S.

Grosseteste, Robert: (1175-1253) An outstanding scholar, teacher, and churchman whose influence was deeply felt by such leaders as Roger Bacon and John Wyclif. A lecturer and chancellor at Oxford, he served for years as secular master of the Franciscan school there. His scholarly interests and patronage fostered achievements in the learned tongues, the physical sciences, theology, and philosophy. As bishop of Lincoln, he stressed a disciplined Christian life among clergy and laity alike. He consistently emphasized the Scriptures, preaching, and the dignity of the pastoral function. In his later years, he championed the freedom of the English church against papal and royal encroachments.

F. S Stevenson, Robert Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln (London, 1899) ; L. Thorndike, A History of Magic and Experimental Science, Vol. II (1923), pp. 436-453.   R.C.P.

Grotius, Hugo: (1583-1645) Dutch jurist. He provided through his De Jure Belli et Pacis (1625, rev ed. 1631) a standard for the conduct of war in terms of social and mundane objectives. Whereas the Catholic writers had approached the problem of war primarily as moral philosophers, Grotius looked at the matter as a lawyer and one with experience in statesmanship. His importance lay in the philosophical principles upon which he sought to found the relations between sovereign states. He is also known for his "governmental theory" of atonement, i.e., the death of Christ satisfying as a penal example God and the sovereignty of law. See satisfaction.

J N Figgis, Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius. 2 ed (Cambridge, 1923) , F. J. C. Hearnshaw, The Social and Political Ideas of some Great Thinkers of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (London, 1926); H. Vreeland, Hugo Grotius (1917).   H.H.

Grundtvig, Nicolai Frederick Severin: (1783-1872) Intensely patriotic, Grundtvig gave new interpretation of old Norse mythology, labored for greater freedom in Church and Society, founded Danish Folk High School. The Apostles' Creed summarized, to him, the Gospel, and through it the Church was in fellowship with the Living Christ, who is described in Scriptures and meets the Church in the sacraments. He wrote over 1,000 hymns, a large number originals. A parish priest most of his life, Grundtvig was Denmark's greatest personality of the 19th century, and has deeply affected the life both of Church and Society in Denmark.   C.J.B.

Grützmacher, Richard Heinrich: (1876-) He was professor of theology in Greifswald, Rostock and Erlangen. Attaching himself to the program of modern positive theology of R. Seeberg*, he gave a tri-theistic turn to the dogma of the Trinity*. He stressed the modern for apologetic purposes; but soon returned to a more strict conservatism. He sees in every neo-Protestantism a revival of old errors. See neo-Lutheranism.

Studien zur systematischen Theologie (Leipzig, 1905) ; Modernpositive Vorträge (Leipzig, 1906) ; Nietzsche und wir Christen (Gross-Lichterfelde, Berlin, 1911) ; Textbuch zur systematischen Theologie (Leipzig u. Erlangen, 1919) ; Alt und Neu Protestantismus (Erlangen, 1920) ; Spenglers "welthistorische Perspektiven" (Leipzig, 1923).   H.H.

guardian spirit: See primitive religion.

Guelfs: See Ghibellines and Guelfs.

guidance: See Oxford Group; providence.

guilt: The state of a moral agent who has disobeyed a law and thereby made himself liable to the penalty of such violation. The term guilt, recognizing the interdependence of all men in all phases of life, emphasizes the consequent responsibility and culpability which society bears to a greater or lesser degree for conditions in the social order which are harmful to the highest well-being of man In the effort to determine the degree of guilt for the violation of human law by any individual there is often in legal practice a recognition not only of the overt and forbidden act whose performance regardless of intention may constitute legal guilt, but also of the antecedent presence or absence of criminal, i.e., guilty, intent on the part of the person committing the violation. This innocent or guilty intent may in human legal procedure have important bearing on the verdict with reference to guilt.

The term guilt as used in theology has reference to sinful man's condition of deserving the condemnation of God. This condition of man is represented in the Scriptures as an objectively existing fact whether accompanied or unaccompanied by subjective feelings such as sorrow, shame, or any other emotion. The objective fact of guilt involved in sin* is affirmed to be a universal fact "for all have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3 22-23). While affirming the universality of human fellowship in sin, involving guilt, the Scriptures do recognize various degrees of guilt; cf. Mt. 11 24, 12 31-32, Lk. 12 47-48, Jn. 19 11; Rom. 2.6, Heb. 2 2-3, 10.28-29.

The doctrine of original sin*, affirming the solidarity of the human race in Adam*, declares that his transgression involved all men in the condition (including the guilt) of an innate moral corruption and a consequent tendency to evil. From that condition, which is in itself sinful and deserving of God's condemnation, as well as from the fact involving the guilt of actual sin, man can be saved only by Divine grace*. See forgiveness; imputation.   H.W.J.

guna: According to Sankhya* philosophy, *prakriti or primitive matter is composed of three gunas, or substances, or qualities according to some translators. These are sattva, rajas and tamas, terms which do not admit of exact translation though etymologically their meaning is goodness, passion, and darkness. In Sankhya thought as long as primitive matter is completely quiescent, the gunas are in equilibrium. When the equilibrium is disturbed by souls the gunas become active, each seeking ascendancy. The nature of all things is determined by the degree to which one or the other of the constituent gunas predominates. Thus sattva is uppermost in the world of divinity, rajas in the world of man and tamas in the world of the lower orders of life and in matter.   C.S.B.

Gunkel, Hermann: (1862-1932) He taught in Giessen and Halle. In studying Israelitic history of literature, he developed new ways of religious historical study. He sought with fine feeling for the means to open the original documents of religion historically. Supported by a strongly aesthetic ability, he evolved the form-historical method. He also worked out the various species of religious speech and writing. See Bousset, J. F. W., form criticism

Die Wirkung des heiligen Geistes nach den populären Anschauungen der apostolischen Zeit und nach der Lehre des Paulus. 3 ed. (Gottingen, 1909) ; Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des Neuen Testamentes. 2 ed. (Tubingen, 1910) ; Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit. 2 ed. (Gottingen, 1921) , Die Propheten (Gottingen, 1917) ; Das Märchen im Alten Testament (Tubingen, 1917) ; Einleitung in die Psalmen (Gottingen, 1928-33).

H.H.

Gunnerus, John Ernst: (1718-1733) Professor of theology in Denmark, 1754, and bishop of Trondheim after 1758. Author of Flora Norvegica, Gunnerus was the cultural leader in Norway, and instrumental in the founding of the Scientific Society, 1770.

C.J B.

Günther, Anton: (1785-1863) A secular priest, some of whose theological and psychological views were condemned by the church authorities at Rome. He sought to surmount the pantheism of Schelling and Hegel by a dualism and theism similar to Cartesianism. The cogito ergo sum is not an immediate intuition for him, but an ontological, metaphysical and rational inference. A large literature in defense and in opposition to his views arose.

Gesammelte Schriften. 4 vols. (Wien, 1881) ; L. Kastner, Die philosophischen Systeme A. Günthers und Martin Deutingers (Regensburg, 1873) ; J. Flegel, Günthers Dualismus von Geist und Natur (Breslau, 1880) , M Klein, Die Genesis der Kategorien im Processe des Selbstbewusstwerdens (Breslau, 1881) .

H.H.

Gurney, Joseph John: (1788-1847) and Gurneyites English Quaker minister and philanthropist. Wealthy, well-connected, and well-educated, he embraced the evangelical theology of his time, tempering it in practice by seeking the guidance of the Spirit through silent worship. His influence in the United States was even greater than in England, and a large number of American evangelical Friends* are sometimes called "Gurneyites." See his Observations; Essays; Memoirs.

T.E.D.

guru: Teacher or spiritual guide in Hinduism*. In some cases he is regarded as an incarnation of deity and salvation is alone possible through the guru. In the Sikh faith* the successive heads of the movement were known as gurus until the tenth who decreed that henceforth the Granth* the sacred book should be their guru.

C.S.B.

Guthrie, Thomas: (1803-1873) Eloquent Scotch clergyman, best known for his opposition to patronage*, in the course of which he became one of the leaders in the Disruption of 1843 and in the resulting organization of the Free Church*. His sensitive social consciousness led him to champion such causes as the organization of the Y.M C.A. in Glasgow (1842), the "Ragged School" movement (1847), and the temperance movement. See Autobiography of Thomas Guthrie, etc., (London, 1874-5). 2 vols.

A.X.R.

Guyau, Jean-Marie: (1854-1888) A profoundly original French thinker whose thought was a reaction against the evolutionism of Herbert Spencer*. His conception of life was largely a moral and aesthetic vitalism. In the field of religion he aimed at a singular synthesis of scientific positivism and spiritualist metaphysics. The negation of every dogma, traditional and supernatural authority, miracle, myth and rite was central in his conception of irreligion. It was not antireligious, but rather a-religious in the sense of being opposed to every current and actual religion. Convinced that all attempts at the establishment of a new religion had failed, he looked towards a purified religion, a religion of the harmony of individual and social ideals.

Esquisse d'une morale sans obligation ni sanction (Paris, 1885) , L'irréligion de l'avenir (Paris, 1887).

H.H.

Guyon, Madame: (1648-1717) Centre of the Quietist* movement in France. The resemblance of her theological doctrines to those of her contemporary, the Spaniard Molinos*, aroused the suspicion of the French clergy. Fénelon*, however, espoused her cause, but like her was compelled to submit to Rome and renounce her doctrine of possible perfection in mystic union with God. A prolific author.

Works in 40 vols (1790). Principal titles: Le Moyen court et tres facile de faire oraison, and Les Torrents spirituels.

W.W.C.

H

Habakkuk: A two chapter poem on the fall of Babylon, with minor interpolations in chs. 1-2. Chapter 3 consists wholly of later appended psalm materials. Although usually dated 612-586 B C., it appears more likely Habakkuk was an exile, writing his poem between 455 and 445 B C. as it began to appear that Persia might be able to conquer Babylonia. After reviewing the past depradations of Babylon, he asked God how soon the overthrow would be, receiving assurance it would be sure and soon. The poem ends with woes upon Babylon. The distinctive prophetic ethics, religion, and reforming genius is absent. Like Nahum*, Habakkuk was more distinctly a poet. His was an outburst of indignation against Babylonia, who had brought the Judeans into bondage.

See The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism by A. Lods (1937), pp. 232-36.   R.E.W.

habdalah: (From the Hebrew, distinction) A religious ceremony performed in home and synagogue at the close of the Sabbath and festivals, thanking God for distinguishing with unique holiness certain occasions over the routine days of the year. Blessings over wine, the lighting of a candle and the smelling of spices, constitute the ritual.   B.Z.B.

habit: An acquired bodily or mental function which, through repetition, becomes a relatively stable pattern of action characterized by efficiency and facility in performance and a readiness to respond to the appropriate stimulus. Habits are not to be thought of as merely passive structures but rather as dynamic drives to certain modes of activity. They are formed through involuntary learning, as in the conditioning of native responses, or through deliberate attention and voluntary repetition, as in learning to use a typewriter. With repetition they tend to become more and more automatic and to operate with less and less conscious attention. They are of signal importance in all learning and character formation, the latter being defined by some educators as the sum and coordination of the individual's habits. They are conservative in nature and in the form of custom, which is collective habit, offer the greatest resistance to change.   R.W.F.

Hachiman: The name under which the spirit of the Japanese emperor Ojin (traditional dates, 201-312 A.D.) is worshiped as the god of war.   D.C.H.

Hadad: See Adad.

Haddon-Colt Foundation for the Supernatural, The: Established in 1938 by Mrs. Charles K. Haddon and Mrs. Don S. Colt at Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, New Jersey. The capital sum is $1,000. This annual lecture deals positively and affirmatively with some phase of the general problem of the relations of the natural and the supernatural. Drs. H. P. Sloan, J. M. M. Gray and J. A. Mackay have served on this foundation.

(Data furnished by the Office of the President of the University.)   V.F.

hades: The realm of the dead, their abode in the underworld; so called after the Greek name of its mythical ruler. It is used in the N.T. for the Hebrew Sheol, a vast, dark region in the depths of the earth, not a place of punishment, but yet one of comfortless gloom. See descent into hades, sheol.   E.J.G.

Hadith or hadis: (Arabic term for tradition) The body of traditions from the time of Mohammed and his associates constitutes the basis of *sunna (norm), the standard of Moslem orthodoxy.   P.E.J.

hadj or hajj: (Also Hagge) Arabic term used by Moslems to indicate a pilgrimage to Mecca*. A pilgrim is called hadji.   P.E.J.

haecceitas: Scotist term meaning "thisness", coined by John Duns Scotus* (1270-1308) to indicate the principle of individuation*. Man becomes an individual by the addition to his generic and specific nature of an individual differentia, "Socratitas" or "haecceitas", which is the ultimate ground of his individuality.   S.C.T.

haftarah: (From the Hebrew "conclusion") The prophetic selection concluding the Scripture lesson which is read in the synagogue at each Sabbath and festival service.   B.Z.B.

haggada: (Also Agada or Aggadah) A general Hebrew term for utterance, and applied specifically to the non-legal portion of Rabbinic literature. It is also the title of the text recited at the festive meal (Seder*) on the first two nights of Passover*.   B.Z.B.

Haggai: First post-exilic prophetic book, with record of four addresses to the returned exiles at Jerusalem between August and December in 520 B.C. The eighteen year old community had become discouraged by crop failures, drought, and hostility of neighbors until they were ready to return to Babylon. Haggai reprimanded them for leaving the temple unbuilt. After they started a small structure, Haggai spoke again, calling the people to build even more gloriously than Solomon*. He also planned to restore the monarchy with Zerubbabel as king. Very different from reforming pre-exilic prophets, Haggai was more priestly, stressing temple worship and ritual as the key to prosperity. See The Prophets and Their Times by J. M. P. Smith and W. A. Irwin (1941), pp. 241-48.   R.E.W.

hagiographa: (Gr., hagios, sacred; grapho, I write) The "sacred writings", an alternative designation of Christian origin for the books of the third division of the Heb. canon of scripture, viz., all books other than those of "the Law" and "the Prophets". This is known to Jews as "the Writings" (Kethubim).   R.B.Y.S.

hagiography: (Gr., hagios, holy, and graphein, to write) That part of learning which has as object the saints, their lives, and the honor shown to them; as practical, it is, e.g., the list of martyrs drawn up, in early times, with the end of celebrating their anniversaries; but it is also critical or scientific as dealing with the documents or alleged documents on saints' lives. The Bollandists* are best known as hagiographers.
                                                          L.R.W.

hail Mary: The prayer in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary composed of the angel's salutation at the Annunciation*, and Elizabeth's greeting at the Visitation. The Church added the conclusion to the prayer. See Ave Maria.   s.c. hair, religious significance of: Hair is given a religious significance in all religions. Particularly, attention is shown its style, its length, its symbolic character as a link with the owner. Among primitive peoples, there was a style for festivals, for mourning, for weddings, for leaders, and medicine men, for persons in disgrace. (See Frazer, Golden Bough, vol. 3, pp. 264-7.) Long hair meant strength, integrity. Samson's hair was source of his power (Judges 16:17); Nazarites let their hair grow while under a vow (Judges 13:5) and Israelites extolled long hair in contrast to the clipped heads of their enemies (Lev. 19:27, Jer. 49:32). Shaving the head meant humiliation, punishment or penance. Semites generally forbade shaving. In later times, Hebrew men cut their hair but regarded women's long hair as her glory. (I Cor. 11:15). Christian monastic orders practiced use of the tonsure*.

Hindu ascetics and hermits set high store by hair arrangement (or disarrangement). The symbol of penitence in the O.T. is "sackcloth and ashes" Vedic students were directed specifically how to wear their hair. The hair was sometimes cut and given in sacrifice, as a symbol of a sacrifice of his own body to God. In Greece, hair was offered to the gods by youths at the initiation rites. Religions have taken advantage of the fact that the state of the hair can reveal a person's inner state; his character and position; his order or rank.   M.L.C.

halakah: (A derivative from the Hebrew, holek, to go) Used as general name for authoritative law, which is a way of life. Refers also to those parts of Rabbinic literature which deal with any phase of Jewish law. Cf. Akiba.   B.Z.B.

Hale Lectures, The: Established in 1901 by Bishop Charles R. Hale of Cairo, Illinois at Seabury-Western Theological Seminary, Evanston, Illinois. The capital sum is $50,000. The object of the lectures is "the Glory of God, and the Good of His Church." They are given about once in every three years. Lecturers and subjects include: the Rev. Fleming James, "Personalities of the Old Testament", the Rev. Winfred Douglas, "The Praise of God, or Church Music in History and Practice."

(Data furnished by the Office of the President of the Seminary)   V.F.

Halevi, Jehuda ben Samuel: (1085-1140) Practicing physician in Toledo, Spain, and the most gifted Hebrew poet and philosopher of his day. His religious poetry was dominated by a great longing for the restoration of the Holy Land and some of it was incorporated into the liturgy of the synagogue. In the Kuzari, a philosophical work in Arabic, he offered a philosophic defense of the Jewish religion. Toward the end of his career, he made a trip to Palestine, where he died.   B.Z.B.

half-way covenant, the: Origin of the phrase uncertain. It was a procedure by which the children of parents who attended and supported the New England churches, but had not met the severe experimental tests then demanded for full church membership, could be baptized. About the third generation after the settlement of the colonies there was an increasing number of such parents and church leaders had no choice but to leave their children unbaptized, lower their own demanding standards for full church communion or compromise.

Many churches and ministers, therefore, decided to accept for baptism the children of parents whose lives were not "scandalous", on condition that the parents would publically covenant to attend and support the church, though not, by virtue of such a covenant, being permitted to share the Lord's Supper or vote in church meetings. (Actually the terms of such a "Half-Way Covenant" were, in many instances, more demanding than most churches now require for full membership.) There was no general agreement about this arrangement and it engendered heated disputations. Its inception may be dated from 1657-1662. After the period of the great revivals it faded as a subject of controversy out of the New England picture. Cf. S. Stoddard.

The "Half-Way Covenant" has occasioned a most considerable literature Williston Walker's Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism, (1893) is authoritative. See also his History of the Congregationalists (1916), pp. 156, 158, 160, 170-182, 220, 262, 283, 287, 366   G.G.A

Hallaj or al-Hallaj: A Moslem mystic who was put to death in 922 A D. for crying out in Bagdad, "I am Reality", i.e., the sole reality God. He taught that man is essentially divine, created by God in his own image. God incarnates himself not only in Adam and Jesus, but in every man. His self-deification was repudiated by other *Sufis.   P.E.J.

Hallel: (Heb., praise) Designation of Psalms 113-118, included in the Jewish liturgy for New Moon and the festivals of Tabernacles, Chanukah, Pentecost, and in the Passover service.   N G.

hallelujah: (Heb., hillel, hc praises, Jah, form of Yahweh-Jehovah used in compound words) Literally, Praise ye Yahweh. A liturgical phrase originating in Jewish temple worship, where it invited a response of people and/or choir in a shout of praise (cf. Psalm 135). In its Gr. form *allelusa it is a familiar feature of Christian praise from the earliest times, cf. Rev. 19 1-6.
                                                        R.B.Y.S.

hamadryads: (Teut.) Tree-people, forest-people, spirit-folk; derived from potencies of trees and other plants, live in the woods, may be either friendly or hostile to human beings; when combined with souls of the dead the wood-spirits develop into tutelary spirits.   F.L.P.

Hamann, Joh. Georg: (1730-1788) German Protestant thinker. ("Magus des Nordens"). He was born in Konigsberg, Prussia and died in Münster-in-Westphalia. His religious realism played an important role in the making of German classicism and idealism. Herder, Jacobi*, Goethe and Hegel were deeply indebted to him, notwithstanding the unsystematic character of his thought and the obscurity of his language. He emphasized the wholeness of life over against the abstractions and artificial divisions of purely rational philosophy. The ultimate root of all reality is to be found in God, who tends to reveal himself in nature, language, history and social institutions, so that the same structural elements can be found in all of these departments. Works:

Hamann's Schriften, herausg von Roth und Wiesner, 9 vols. (1821-1843) ; Another edition by C. H. Gildemeister (1851-1873) and by Petri (1872-1873). See also: R. Unger, Hamann und die Aufklärung, 2 vols. (1911, 2nd ed. 1925) ; F. Blanke, Hamann als Theologe (1928).   O.A.P.

Hamilton, Sir William: (1788-1856) Scottish philosopher, professor at Edinburgh, 1836-1856.

He is well known for his theory of consciousness. He held that all knowledge is relative and limited to finite human experience and that the Infinite cannot be known (agnosticism), but can be experienced through the moral certainty of faith He was influential in England and America. His most important writings were articles in the Edinburgh Review and the posthumous Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic (1859).

See J. S Mill, An Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy (1865). J. Veitch, Memoir of Sir William Hamilton (1869).   J.E.N.

Hammurabi, Code of: An ancient Babylonian legal code containing 282 laws purportedly given by the Babylonian god of justice, Shamash, to King Hammurabi for the rule of his people. There is evidence that it is based upon a much more ancient collection of laws, revised and expanded by order of Hammurabi variously dated by scholars from c. 2100 B.C. to 1800 B.C. The code written in cuneiform characters on a stone pillar was unearthed by French excavators at ancient Susa in 1901-02. The broken pieces were put together and lodged in the Louvre, Paris.

See R F. Harper, The Code of Hammurabi (1904).
                                                        C.S.B.

Hampton Court Conference: A conference held at Hampton Court in January 1604 between James I and the Puritan leaders. By it the Puritans hoped to secure reforms in the church, but their hopes were not fulfilled. It was the occasion of James' succinct judgment on ecclesiastical polity: "No bishop, no king."   W.S.H.

Hanbal: Ibn Hanbal (d. 855) was the founder of one of the four orthodox schools of Moslem law, which formerly prevailed in Mesopotamia and Syria, but has gradually yielded to the Hanifite school.   P.E.J.

Handel, Georg Friedrich: (1685-1759) See oratorio, passion music.

hands, laying on of: See laying on of hands.

Hanifa: See Abu Hanifa.

Hanukkah: (From the Heb., dedication) The eight day Jewish festival commemorating the re-dedication of the Jerusalem Temple to the faith of Israel in 165 B.C.E., after the Maccabees had defeated the armies of the Syrian Greeks in a war for religious liberation. See Antiochus Epiphanes, Judas Maccabeus.   B.Z.B.

haoma: In Mazdaism and Parsism, a sacramental drink, prepared by priests, and obtained by mixing juice from a plant, haoma, with milk and water, the sacrament, used in religious services, typifies the drink of immortality which is yet to come to the faithful. See Aryan religion.
                                                        F.L.P.

Hapi: See Apis.

happiness: The state of satisfaction which is experienced in the pursuit but more obviously in the attainment of that which is regarded as desirable or good. The efforts to indicate the essence of such good fortune or happiness have led to divergent interpretations. In the intellectualism of Plato* the supreme good for man is represented as wisdom which involves, to whatever varying degrees may be possible, the cognition of and the participation in that type of being which is constituted by the genuinely real though abstract, general, timeless "ideas" or forms, i e., essences or universals, which as instances of the Good, Plato's designation for reality at its highest and best, are themselves ideal, i.e., changeless and perfect in their eternal nature, perfection being the principle of reality and of knowledge. The supreme realities are the ideas and not God who makes the world to the pattern of the ideas. God is good but not the good which is the source of the pattern. Nevertheless Plato (in the Theaetetus 176) regards the ascent of man to the Ideal Good as being in some not explicitly defined way related to the necessary condition that man "become like God, as far as this is possible, and to become like him, is to become holy, just, and wise. . . . And he of us who is the most righteous is most like him. . . . To know this is true wisdom and virtue, and ignorance of this is manifest folly and vice." In the practical intellectualism of Aristotle*, happiness is constituted by living in obedience to the intellect; it is the fulfillment of man's distinctive intellectual function as a rational being While committed theoretically to the annihilation of emotion, Stoicism* professed to find satisfaction by living in conformity to nature. By some ancient and modern Hedonists*, happiness as the dominant motivating principle of conduct and the realization of that happiness are regarded as relevant to the mundane present only. In the qualitative Utilitarianism* of John Stuart Mill*, happiness has reference to the "higher" pleasures, the welfare of all men being the standard of right conduct. Although verbally rejecting enlightened eudaemonism* as a moral end and defending a stern legalism from which utilitarian considerations are allegedly excluded and morality for its own sake affirmed, even so rigorous a moralist as Kant* could not actually escape the conviction that virtue and happiness do belong together, a synthesis which led to the postulates of immortality and the existence of God. Opposed to the recognition of happiness as the highest goal of human striving are the various doctrines of Pessimism* maintaining the inevitability of unhappiness for man. In contrast to such reasoned despair are the systems of Optimism*, which in their extreme versions attempt to supply warrant for happiness by declaring that the actual order of existence is, indeed, the best possible world. Advancing beyond the conception of outward prosperity or any other favorable external conditions as essential signs of divine blessing and necessary conditions of happiness, though not denying the legitimacy of mundane requirements (Mt. 6· 32-33), the Christian doctrine affirms that Blessedness* (the term used by many· as the synonym for N.T. happiness; cf. Mt. 5 2 ff) is spiritual and inward, a present quality of being arising from the personal relationship of faith in and love for God through Jesus Christ. Even those sufferings which may have to be endured in and because of that relationship (Mt. 5 10-12) are compelled to contribute to the blessedness of the believer (I Pet. 4 12-14) for whom the indwelling Christ is the hope of glory (Col. 1 27). The blessedness of eternal life which is in part realized even in this world as a gift of God accompanying the faith which works through love is also other-worldly in character since it will have its perfect fruition in the life to come. (Jn. 17 22-24, I Jn. 3 1-2). See Epictetus, Epicureanism, ethics, Platonism, summum bonum; value.   H.W.J.

harakiri: (Lit., "belly-cutting") A vulgar name applied to Japanese suicide by disembowelment. A more dignified expression for the same thing is seppuku.   D.C.H.

Hard Shell Baptists: A name formerly applied to Baptist churches which opposed missionary societies, Sunday schools, salaried ministers, instrumental music, and similar "innovations" which they alleged were not mentioned in the Bible. They are now for the most part found in the Primitive Baptist* and the Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Predestinarian Baptist* sects.   E.T.C.

Häring, Theodor: (1848-1928) He taught at the universities of Zurich, Switzerland, Göttingen and Tubingen. Descending from a mild Swabian pietism, he gave the ideas of Ritschl* a softer tone. He stressed the revelation of God in the historical person of Jesus the continued influence of the risen Lord in the community and in the acts of His divine calling the special significance of His passion and death. Haring became the mediator between Ritschlianism and conservative biblicism. By his understanding for those who thought differently, he contributed to a mitigation of theological antitheses.

Über das Bleibende im Glauben an Christus (Stuttgart, 1880) ; Zur Ritschls Versöhnungslehre (Stuttgart, 1888) ; Dogmatik (Stuttgart, 1906, 2 ed , Calw, 1912) ; Christian Faith A Systematics (London, 1913).   H.H.

Häring, Theodor Lorenz: (1884-)· Son of the theologian Theodor Haring*, he is professor of philosophy at the University of Tubingen. He not only has been creative in the psychology of valuation and in epistemology, he also has labored in the fields of the philosophy of history and science. But he is best known by his work on Hegel*. He presents the most detailed analysis of Hegel's early theological and philosophical writings which exist so far. He visions a Christian, theistic and dynamic metaphysics.

Die Materialisierung des Geistes (Tubingen, 1919) , Die Struktur der Weltgeschichte (Tubingen, 1921) , Philosophie der Naturwissenschaft (Munchen, 1923) ; Über Individualität in Natur und Geisteswelt (Wissenschaft und Hypothese. Bd XXX), (Leipzig and Berlin, 1926) ; Hegel, sein Wollen und sein Werk. vol I. (Leipzig und Berlin, 1929), vol II (Leipzig und Berlin, 1938) ; Die philosophischen Grundlagen der heutigen Universitätsbildung (Tubingen, 1933) , Die Entstehungsgeschichte der Phänomenologie des Geistes (Tübingen, 1934) ; Naturphilosophie in der Gegenwart (Tübingen, 1934).   H.H.

Harmonists: (Rappites) See communistic settlements.

harmony: 1) The science which treats of chords, their construction and their relationships in progression to each other. Its musical structure is vertical and implies a basis of tonality* Homophony contrasted with polyphony*.
2) A group of tones sounding simultaneously, a chord.   E.H.B.

harmony of the gospels: A harmony of the gospels is an arrangement of their contents which places parallel passages in parallel columns. The purpose of the older harmonies was to weave together all data for the life and teaching of Jesus, found in all four gospels; the purpose of present-day harmonies is to present the material for a comparison of the gospels in the interest of showing their mutual relationship, use of sources, and editorial revision of one by another (e.g., Mark as revised by Matthew and Luke). Accordingly, present-day harmonies usually do not include the Fourth Gospel. Cf. Diatessaron.
See Synoptic Gospels; E. D. Burton and E. J. Goodspeed, A Harmony of the Synoptic Gospels (1917, Greek text, 1920); A. Huck, A Synopsis of the First Three Gospels (9th edition by H. Lietzmann and F. L. Cross, 1936—Greek with German and English headings); A. Wright, A Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek with . . . Notes, 3rd edition, 1906.
                                                              F.C.G.

Harms, Claus: (1778-1855) Vigorous champion of Neo-Lutheranism* and author of the celebrated Ninety-five Theses (1817)* condemning rationalism and unbelief and denouncing the Prussian Plan of Union of Lutheran and Reformed Churches and calling for a steadfast loyalty to the Lutheran standards and to confessionalism.
See V. Ferm, The Crisis in American Lutheran Theology (1927), Ch. IV.   V.F.

Harnack, Adolf von: (1851-1930) Professor at various German Universities including Berlin (1888-1921). President of the Kaiser Wilhelm Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Wissenschaften and Librarian of Preussische Staats-bibliothek. A founder of Evangelical-Social Congress, president 1903-1912. His students established Die Christliche Welt, suppressed under Hitler. Teacher of Karl Barth* whom he later opposed. Author of hundreds of monographs and books. Greatest German church historian of his day. His History of Dogma (3 vol.) appeared in six editions (1889-1922). His work on the Apostles' creed in 27 editions. His Das Wesen des Christentums (What is Christianity), 1900, in 15 translations and over 71,000 printings. Greatest single work probably, Marcion, 1921, second ed., 1924. Cf. Sohm, R.
                                                              C.H.M.

Harnack, Theodosius: (1817-1889) Father of Adolf Harnack*, he was a Baltic orthodox Lutheran. He was professor of practical theology and university preacher at Dorpat (now Tartu, Estonia). He fought romantic hierarchism and pietistic collegialism. He sharply distinguished between the essential and the empirical church. He also was one of the main representatives of the study of practical theology between Schleiermacher and Ritschl.

Luthers Theologie (Erlangen, 1862-86); Die Kirche, ihr Amt, ihr Regiment (Erlangen, 1862); Praktische Theologie (Erlangen, 1877-78), 2 vols.
                                                              H.H.

Harper, W. R.: (1856-1906) Baptist educator. At 14, B.A., at 19, Ph.D. Popularized the study of Hebrew. Professor Semitic languages at Yale, 1886-91. First president of the University of Chicago. Chautauqua lecturer. Established four quarter university plan making Summer Quarter of rich variety, and Junior Senior College and Graduate School system. Promoted scheme of credit for courses by correspondence. Founded various scholarly journals. Valiantly defended historical approach to the Bible.
                                                              C.H.M.

harpies: (Gr., Harpuiai, from harpazo, to snatch) Weird creatures of Greek mythology, represented as 1) stormwinds that can blow a mortal away, or 2) birds of prey with faces of women. Since popular fancy pictured the soul as a bird with woman's face and credited the souls of the dead with carrying off the souls of the living, this ghost of the dead may be the prototype of the mythological figure of the harpy.   E.M.N.

Harris, Samuel: (1814-1899) Graduated, Bowdoin College, 1833, Andover, 1838. Professor of Systematic Theology, Bangor Theological Seminary, 1855-1867; President, Bowdoin College, 1867-1871, Dwight Professor of Systematic Theology, Yale Divinity School, 1871-1899.
Author: The Philosophical Basis of Theism (1883); The Self-Revelation of God (1886); God, the Creator and Lord of All (1896). In these volumes Harris constructed an intuitional theism based philosophically upon Kant (whose theistic antinomies he regarded as bi-polar) of exceptional insight, breadth and strength.
Cf. "American Theists," Harvard Theological Review, Vol. XIV, July, 1921.   J.W.B.

Hartmann, Edward von: (1842-1906) His philosophy is the outgrowth of the misery resulting from the dying materialism and positivism of the natural sciences, the consequent spread of indifference and scepticism, and from the results of applied science and the achievement of technology following the Franco-Prussian war of 1870. Hartmann vindicated the ideal against materialism by partially satisfying the metaphysical needs of his contemporaries, and emancipated philosophy from the extraneous literary, scientific and even university influences.
Taking up a military career, he was forced to relinquish it due to a disorder in his knee. He refused a professorship on account of health and the limitation of freedom. At the age of 27 he published his three volume Philosophy of the Unconscious (1869), a comprehensive work the discussion of which stimulated a large literature. Historians of philosophy have judged and evaluated the work on the basis of the first edition, ignoring the later additions and changes Hartmann made. He published during his life some 453 writings.

His books on religion were addressed to those who have been emancipated by the critical study of positive Christian dogma. Polemical towards existing religious views throughout his life, he expressed his religious opinions without reserve. He considered Christianity bankrupt in the means of satisfying the religious needs of the present which he thought was the most irreligious period of history. He thought the essence of Christianity was exhausted in the Middle Ages. In his time it ceased to be Lutheran, Augustinian and even Pauline. He wrote a severe criticism of the speculative Protestantism of a Biedermann, Pfleiderer and Lipsius. In his criticism of both the O. and the N.Ts. he blindly accepted the assertions of the most radical critics. He condemned the belief in a personal God as he thought there could be nothing divine that was not impersonal and unconscious. He denied the need of any mediator. Every man is his own savior if he was saved. He called the worship of Jesus a form of heathenism, the Jesus of evangelical faith a fetish. He pilloried the idea of the God-man, holding that humanity itself was divine. He repudiated all the historical elements of Christianity or any need of them. He thought Christian morality puerile because based on rewards, happiness and heteronomous virtues. He flouted the assumption that the end of religion is to bring happiness now and hereafter as akin to a sensuous heaven or work for a pay day. He denounced the concept of personal immortality. Church authority was for him the most insidious and dangerous of all for both mental and moral culture. He anticipated the gradual disappearance of the church. He opposed the ethic of Jesus because of its transcendent eudaemonism. He was sincere in contending that the modern spirit, with its culture, has so far outgrown historical Christianity that it no longer had anything to offer in the solution of the religious question. He developed a philosophical religion which is only for the educated world. He strove to surmount abstract monism and theism, replacing these by a concrete monism.

He also sketched the general outlines of an ideal and future religion in which the little that was left vital in mummified Christianity becomes synthesized with all pantheistic and monistic tendencies. The new religion is to be a new dispensation of and a new synthesis between the pessimistic negative religion of India and the optimistic affirmative religion of Persia. If in urging these negations with vehemence, he seemed to hate theology and the church, it was because of his great love for what he deemed the ideal religion. He was convinced of the indispensability of religion for the development of mankind and for the maintenance and advance of culture. He urged that the church was only half-hearted and shallow-in-thought in its faith. He found his point d'appui in the Persian conception of the necessary war between light and dark, or the rational idea and blind instinct and irrational will.

Hartmann's ethical and religious writings are much less abstract than his other works. Pessimism becomes a weaker factor in them. He held to the prepotence of pain over pleasure in the interests of morality and piety. Not eudaemonological pessimism, but evolutionary optimism, aggressive participation in the processes of culture was his creed. He demanded no flight from reality, or renunciation but self-immolating sacrifice and work for God's sake. He turned from passive quietism to the eternal yea of Zarathustra. Hartmann's God is the blind, but impelling power that utters itself in and through the entire process of cosmic evolution, which makes for righteousness, which animates all his work and of all soldiers of the spirit, and is revealed in the lives of all the great light-bringers in history.

Die Selbstzersetzung des Christenthums und die Religion der Zukunft (Berlin, 1874) ; Die Krise des Christenthums in der modernen Theologie (Leipzig, 1888) ; Das religiöse Bewusstsein, 2nd ed. (Berlin, 1888) ; Das Christenthum des Neuen Testamentes (Berlin, 1905) , Die Religion des Geistes, 3rd ed. (Berlin, 1907) ; Grundriss der Religionsphilosophie (Berlin, 1909) ; L. Braun, Die Persönlichkeit Gottes; eine Auseinandersetzung zwischen E. v. Hartmanns Philosophie des Unbewussten und dem kritischen Theismus, 2 vols. (Heidelberg, 1929-31) , F. W Brepohl, E. v. Hartmann und das Erlösungsproblem (Berlin, 1910) ; C. Neumann, E. v. Hartmanns Erlösungslehre (Breslau, 1910) , F. J Rintelen, Pessimistische Religionsphilosophie der Gegenwart (Munchen, 1924) ; J, P. Steffes, E v Hartmanns Religionsphilosophie des Unbewussten (Mergentheim, 1921).   H.H.

Hartmann, Nicolai:

(1883-) Known chiefly for the contributions to a theory of objective values made in his monumental Ethik (1926), (Eng. tr. in 3 vols. by Stanton Coit, 1932). With Scheler, Hartmann applies the phenomenological method to experiences of value and with him comes to the conclusion that values are independent, possessing a hierarchy of their own, and that consciousness does not create but must take account of them. Unlike Scheler* he believes that if a God exists it is wholly impersonal.

Other works: Grundzüge einer Metaphysik der Erkenntnis (1921) ; Das Problem des geistigen Seins (1933) ; Zur Grundlegung der Ontologie (1935).

J.S.B.

harvest festivals:

The harvest festival harks back to primeval ideas regarding the annual death of vegetation, when the Earth Mother or her child withdrew into the underworld and fertility and growth were suspended on the earth. The grain died at the harvest. In Europe great importance attached to the cutting of the last sheaf because it was supposed to embody the life of the grain. It was called "mother", "maiden", "old woman", "great mother", sometimes made into a doll dressed in woman's clothes and carried home in joyous procession. The reaper of the last sheaf acquired its mysterious potency and was given a place of honor with it at the harvest supper. The fertility of the new crop was bound up with this sheaf. It was sometimes sprinkled with water, thrown into a river or mixed with the seed grain. The idea of the mother of the maize or of the rice appears also in Asia. In Judaism the primitive practices associated with the death of vegetation dropped out of the official ceremony and the harvest festivals became simply times of rejoicing. In general the harvest feast* completed what the firstfruits* ceremony began. It combined a solemn communion of eating with or in the presence of the corn spirit, rejoicing over the completion of the harvest, and anxiety regarding future fertility. The socially approved licence which accompanied some harvest ceremonies may be bound up with this fertility motif.

                                                                    A.E.H.

Hase, Karl August von: (1800-1890) German theologian. He was born at Steinbach (Saxony);
in 1823 he became privatdozent at Tubingen, 1828 at Leipzig, and from 1830-1883 he was professor of Church History in Jena. Hase is one of the outstanding men in German theology of the 19th century, remarkable for his comprehensive culture, the universality of his interests and his lofty idealism. Notwithstanding his vast erudition his academic and literary interest was in the sympathetic understanding and artistic presentation of the subject rather than in detailed research.
    Influenced by Schelling, Schleiermacher and German romanticism Hase occupied a mediating position between rationalistic liberalism and orthodoxy. His theology was a re-interpretation of 17th century Lutheran orthodoxy through German idealism. More than any of his contemporaries he laid great emphasis on the aesthetic element in religion. In the political and ecclesiastical fight against Roman Catholic ultramontanism*
he became soon one of the protagonists, a role for which he was qualified by regular journeys to Italy and contacts with many of the leading men in Rome. Politically he was an active fighter (he was for this reason imprisoned from 1824-1825). He helped much to develop the idealistic type of religion among the educated class in Germany. In Church History he excelled in biographic studies. A prolific writer, his Works in twelve volumes (1890-1893) incorporate only one-half of his literary production.
    Principal works. Evangelisch-protestantische Dogmatik (1826, 5th ed 1860), Hutterus Redivivus (1829, many editions); Leben Jesu (1829, 5th ed.
1865); Kirchengeschichte (1834, 12th ed. 1899);
Handbuch der praktischen Polemik gegen die römischkatholische Kirche (1862, many editions); Gnosis, oder protestantisch-evangelische Glaubenslehre für die Gebildeten in der Gemeinde wissenschaftlich dargestellt, 3 vols (1827-1829, new rev. ed. 1869-1870);
Ideale und Irrtümer (autobiography) (1871).
    See also: "Hase" in A. Hauck's Realenzykl (3rd ed vol. VII, pp. 453-461) by his disciple, Gustav Krüger; Fr. H. R. v. Frank, Geschichte der protestantischen Theologie (1894), pp. 141 ff.   O.A.P.

Hasideans: The Hasideans (Heb., Hasidim "saints") Jews, organized during the fourth or third century B.C. for the purpose of promoting the observance of Jewish ritual and the study of the Law. It is clear from the subsequent history, that their society was the group out of which developed the Society of the Pharisees*, concerning which we are much better informed. The Hasideans are probably referred to in some of the Psalms, e.g., Ps. 149.5: "Let the Hasidim be joyful in glory . . . the high praises of God are in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand." If the Psalmist was referring to the Hasideans in this passage, the incident he has in mind is undoubtedly the Maccabean war against the Syrian king, Antiochus IV. There are more explicit references to the Hasideans in the Books of Maccabees. Thus I Macc. 2.41 records that Hasideans, "mighty men in Israel . . . such as were devoted to the Law", joined the Maccabean opposition to Antiochus. In I Macc. chap. 7, they are described as welcoming a compromise peace with the Syrians. The relationship between this group and the Essenes* has been much discussed, but has not yet been clarified.   L.F.

Hasidism: (Hebrew, pietism, from hasid, pious) Mystical movement in modern Judaism, founded by the practical cabbalist Israel Baal Shem Tob (abbreviated Besht, the Kind Master of the Name, 1700-1760) shortly before the middle of the 18th century. This simple man of the people, famed as a miracle worker and healer, was a true saint and mystic. Through his own revivalist ardor and through the learning and organizing skill of his disciples, Rabbi Jacob Joseph Cohen of Polonnoye and Rabbi Dov Baer the Maggid (preacher) of Meseritz (1710-1772), the movement attracted a large following from among the untutored Jewish elements of the Polish Ukraine as well as a considerable number of scholarly men. Some of the more gifted of their disciples established dynasties, perpetuating their leadership of bodies of Hasidism by transmission from father to son.
    The movement touched off the creative spiritual impulse of the Jewish people, rousing the masses to spiritual ardor and producing many luminous personalities. The foremost thinker of the movement was Rabbi Shneur Zalman of Liadi (1747-1812), who formulated a system of rational theology known as Habad (abbreviated from Hoch-ma—wisdom, Bina—understanding, and Daas—knowledge). Among its popular saints are R.
Levi Isaac of Berditchev, R. Elimelech of Lizian-ka, R. Jacob Isaac the "Seer" of Lublin, and R.
Nahman of Bratzlav.
    Thoroughly orthodox in character, Hasidism adheres strictly to every cardinal doctrine and practice of traditional Judaism. Yet it transformed everything by its emphasis on Divine immanence, on constant communion with God in thought and in prayer, on faith in the inspiration and wonder-working powers of the leaders (Zaddikim), and on ecstatic joy and fervor in worship. In Hasid-ism mysticism appears no longer as an esoteric doctrine and a system of asceticism, but as the vital singing faith of the people. It appealed not by apocalyptic visions of speedy Messianic deliverance, but by lifting the gloom from the depressed and impoverished masses, by easing their pain and suffering, and by quickening the despondent with renewed hope. It preached contentment, meekness and modesty, without suppressing the natural impulses of the heart.
    The adoration of the leaders as intermediaries between God and ordinary men and as the sources of both earthly and spiritual blessings, and the stress on salvation by faith rather than by works and by study of Torah*, endangered the foundations of rabbinical Judaism. The overenthusiastic cheerfulness of the devotees of Hasidism —induced sometimes by spirituous liquors—jarred on the sensibilities of the puritanic rabbis of the old order, and led to bitter conflicts and to persecution. The growing influence of the Zaddikim, the establishment of separate prayer-houses, the new method of worship and adoption of the ritual of the Palestinian Cabbalists (Nusah Ari), and the slight variation in the mode of killing animals for food virtually separated the Hasidim from the rest of Jewry as a distinct sect. For a time intermarriage between them and their opponents (Mithnaggedim) was prohibited

Despite the opposition, Hasidism made great progress, and, during the first half of the 19th cent., won over nearly half of all the Jews of the world. A more formidable danger menaced the movement with the rise of the Haskalah (Enlightenment), which sought to spread Western culture among the Jews of Russia, Poland, Galicia, etc. In the changed intellectual atmosphere of the second half of the 19th cent. the power of Hasidism waned. The credulity and superstition of the ignorant people and the craftiness of some of the Zaddikim drew the fire of the apostles of the Enlightenment. Still Hasidism continued as a living force in Russia to the Bolshevist revolution, and in Poland, Hungary and Rumania to the Second World War. In attenuated form it continues in Palestine, America, and other lands to which it was transplanted by the Hasidim. The positive spiritual values of the movement, its glowing faith and optimism, its exuberant folklore and folksong have enriched every phase of Jewish life and culture. They have fertilized the creations of musicians like Ravel and Ernst Bloch and of poets, novelists and dramatists like Judah Leib Peretz, S. Ansky, Sholom Ash and S. Agnen, and have fascinated students like S. Schechter, A. Horodetzki, Simon Dubnow, and Martin Buber.
M. Buber, Die Chassidischen Bucher (1928); S. Dubnow, Toldot Habasidut (1932); S. A Horodetzki, Leaders of Hasidism (1928); idem Hahasidut Vehahasidim. 4 Vols. (1922-28); A. Kahana, Sefer Hahasidut (1922); A Z Idelson, Jewish Music (1929); idem, Thesaurus of Hebrew and Oriental Melodies, Vol. X; Songs of the Chassidim (1932); Jacob S. Minkin, The Romance of Hassidism (1934); L. Newman and S. Spitz, Hasidic Anthology (1934); G. Sholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1941).   s.s.c.

Haskell Lectures, The Charles E.: Established in 1894 by Mrs. Caroline E. Haskell these lectures are given at the University of Chicago on the subject of comparative religion. Among the twenty lecturers who have appeared on this foundation are: J. H. Barrows, G. F. Moore, M. Jastrow, Jr., F. Cumont, M. Anesaki, S. Radhakrishnan, Hu Shih, D. C. Holtom. Endowment, $20,724.00.

(Data from the offices of the Dean of the Divinity School and the secretary of the University.)
                                                           v.f.

Haskell Lectureship, The: This lectureship was established in 1905 by Mrs. Caroline E. Haskell of Michigan City, Ind., at the Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin, Ohio. The capital sum is $20,000. It is given in a series of six lectures annually and deals with the relationship of Christianity to the East   Among the distinguished lecturers the following have served G. F. Moore, W. M. Ramsay, F. A Loofs, M. Jastrow, H. Rashdall, E. F Scott, C. C. Torrey, K. Lake, H. R. Mackintosh; J. H. Breasted, W. E. Hocking, R. M. Jones; R. Otto; T. R. Glover, B H Streeter, A. Deissmann; J. B Pratt, J. Morgenstern, M Sprengling; and F. C Grant.

(Data from the office of the Dean of the Graduate School.)   v.f.

Hasmoneans: (also Asmoneans) The dynasty commencing with Simon, brother of Judas Maccabeus*, deliverer of the Jewish people from the oppressive Syrian yoke, who became king of the Jews in 142 B C., and ending with Antigonus, executed by Mark Antony in 37 B C. These successive rulers combined in their persons the offices of king and high-priest. Herod the Great, an Idumean, became king after Antigonus, and strengthened his claim to the throne by marrying Mariamne, the last Hasmonean princess.
                                                           j.m.

Hasselquist, Tufve Nilsson: (1816-1891) Born in Sweden, studied at Lund, and ordained as pastor 1839, Hasselquist emigrated in 1852 to America. He was a pioneer among the Swedish immigrants, among whom he became the spiritual leader for a generation. Pastor at Galesburg, Illinois, he was active in the organization of the Augustana Synod in 1860, and became president of Augustana College and Theological Seminary in 1863. Through his founding of the Swedish press in America (1855) his influence extended wherever Swedish settlers made their homes.   c.j.b.

Hatch, Edwin: (1835-1889) English theologian, noted especially for his work in the history of the early Christian Church. Two of his most important works are The Organization of the Early Christian Churches, (Bampton Lectures, 1880, published, 1881), and The Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages upon the Christian Church (Hibbert Lectures, 1888, published posthumously, 1890). Hatch maintained that Greek thought bequeathed a disastrous legacy to the Christian Church by deflecting it from an original vital moral simplicity to a body of orthodox metaphysics, thus giving dogma preeminence over conduct.   h.w.j.

Hathor: (Egyptian) Cow goddess of ancient Upper Egypt; cow goddess of the sky of which the sun is born, sky imagined as an immense cow whose legs were established at the four corners of the earth, and who is upheld by other gods. See Egypt, religions of.   f.l.p.

Hauck, Albert: (1845-1918) German Protestant theologian. He was born in Wassertrüdingen (Middle Frankonia). From 1878-1889 he was professor of Church History in Erlangen and from 1889-1918 in Leipzig. He laid the foundations for a systematic exploration of the sources of German Church History in the Middle Ages. He was a master in the interpretation of the legal and political tendencies that framed the history of that age. He was co-editor, with J. J. Herzog, of the last volumes of the second edition of the Protestantische Realenzyklopädie (RE) and sole editor of the third edition of that work. (1896-1913).

Principal works: Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 vols. (unfinished) (1892-1920); 3rd and 4th ed. vol. I (1904), vol. III (1906); Die Entstehung der bischöflichen Fürstenmacht (1891); Deutschland und England in ihrer kirchlichen Beziehung (1917); Biography by H. Boehmer, in Beiträge zur sächsischen Kirchengeschichte, v. 33 (1919).   O.A.P.

Hauge, Hans Nielsen: (1771-1824) A Norwegian lay preacher, who proclaimed a living Christianity as against formal Rationalism and superficial Pietism, Hauge was persecuted under Conventical laws, but by writing and followers roused the whole people to more sincere spiritual life. Hauge also contributed to social regeneration of Norway by new, scientific interest in agriculture and industry.   C.J.B.

Hausrath, Adolf: (1837-1909) As professor in Heidelberg, he furthered above all by his critical work and descriptive art interest in the apostle Paul and in the relation of growing Christianity with the existing world.

Der Apostle Paulus (Heidelberg, 1865); Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, 4 vols 3 ed. (Heidelberg, 1879); Jesus und der neutestamentliche Schriftsteller, 2 vols. (Berlin, 1908).   H.H.

haustafel: Literally house-table, but more freely, code of domestic morality. According to Weidinger, Die Haustafeln (1928), there existed in the ancient world, side by side with the code of public morality, a private, unwritten code of domestic morality which at times found written expression. To this code he gave the name Haustafel, a designation now generally accepted. A haustafel usually begins with a statement of the individual's duties to the gods and to his country, and continues with the mutual obligations and duties of husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and slaves, and friends to each other. More or less complete examples of this moral pattern may be found in Hellenistic writers like Epictetus, Seneca, Diogenes Laertius, Philo, and Pseudo-Phocylides. It is also present, with Christian adaptations, in the following early Christian writings: Colossians 3.18-4:1; Ephesians 5:20-6·9 (probably derived from the Colossian example); I Peter 2:13-3:9; Titus 2:1-10; I Clement 21.6-9; Barnabas 19:5-8; Polycarp 4:1-6:3; Ignatius to Polycarp 5:1-2. The identification of the haustafel throws some light on the origins of Christian morality.   M.R.

Hazen Foundation, The Edward W.: With an initial endowment given to the Foundation by Edward W. Hazen of Haddam, Conn., in 1925, this foundation was incorporated the same year and has since Mr. Hazen's death received supplementary endowment funds from his estate. In the Articles of Association the purpose is stated "to promote the public welfare either by supporting existing agencies or through independent activities . . . such agencies or activities to be exclusively religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational in character." The specific field of this Foundation has focused in later years upon "young people and . . . activities designated to promote a sound character", particularly college students. Total appropriations from 1925 to 1939 have amounted to $763,534.68. The field of religious and character development in higher education has come to occupy a dominant place in the Foundation's program with emphasis upon aiding and promoting the professional growth of leaders. Conferences are held in regional areas bringing together an invited group of college teachers and administrators, university pastors and secretaries to study questions relating to college young people. Theological discussion groups have been sponsored among younger thinkers and a series of published pamphlets and books on religion have received grants. Headquarters, Haddam, Conn.   V.F.

Heads of Agreement: (1691) A union document of Congregationalist and Presbyterian leaders in England. Cooperation in the ordination of ministers followed, but the union was impermanent.

W. Walker, Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism (1893).   J.T.M.

heart: The heart was universally recognised in ancient cultures as the seat of emotion. It was sometimes thought to be the center of life or the dwelling place of the soul. When the personality functioned through several souls, the heart-soul was one of them. Plato placed the mortal soul in the heart as the ruler of emotion and intelligence. In the Greek myth of the eating of Dionysus Zagreus by the Titans, his' heart was rescued, brought to Zeus and reborn through Semele. In primitive and some higher cultures the heart was the mainspring of courage. The heart of a brave man, or of a ferocious animal was eaten to acquire courage and strength. In ancient Mexico and in some other cultures it was the part of the victim offered to the gods. It had a prominent place among the amulets used for protection, especially against witches and the evil eye. See charms and amulets.   A.E.H.

heathen: The nations outside the Jewish people and hence not entitled to share in the promises of salvation and blessing in which the Jews believed. See pagan.   E.J.G.

heaven and hell: Heaven is the biblical term for the expanse which seemed to the ancients to cover the earth as a domed vault in which the heavenly bodies seemed to be placed. Generally a plurality of heavens was accepted, either three or seven. In the second place, it was looked on as the dwelling place of the Deity and therefore could be used in metonomy for God. (Lk. 15.18) since his name was too holy to pronounce. In later Christian theology heaven was looked upon as the celestial abode of the redeemed dead. That is really not witnessed in the N.T.; in Revelation* the martyrs are temporarily in heaven but they are soon to reign with Christ on earth. (Rev. 7:9 ff., 20 4). But it is inhabited by various angels*, some of whom were hostile to God. (Rev. 12 7 ff.) Hence, heaven had to be redeemed in the eschatological* reconstitution. With the giving up of the primitive hope, heaven was looked upon as the permanent abode of the redeemed.

Hell is the word used to translate several different biblical terms. It is used for sheol in the O.T. That was the abode of all the dead according to the early Jewish view, but in Enoch 22 there is already a division of Sheol. Again, hell is used in the Authorized version for the Greek word *Hades; (Lk. 16.23). Tartarus, the heathen term for the place of punishment of the incurably corrupt lies behind II Pet. 2:4. Most frequently, hell is used for *Gehenna, (Mk. 10.43, etc.) which took its name from the valley of Hinnom outside Jerusalem. It came to be the designation for the place of future punishment. Other terms for ultimate punishment in the N.T. are unquenchable fire, outer darkness, second death, lake of fire, and wrath to come. See rewards and punishments.　　　　　c.t.c.

Heber, Reginald: (1783-1826) English poet and bishop of Calcutta, India. He is best known as a hymn-writer, his works including "Holy, Holy, Holy", "From Greenland's Icy Mountains" and "Brightest and Best of the Sons of the Morning." See hymns.　　　　　　　　　　　w.n.p.

Hebrew language: Ancient tongue in which most of the O.T. was written. Transformed and used in the Rabbinic Literature, today revived by the Zionists*. Belongs to the North-Western branch of the Semitic family. Characterized by its consonantal stability, the triliterality of its radicals, its wide use of prefixes and suffixes, of nominal construct states, the flexibility of its verbal voice-system and the simplicity of its syntax. Offers concise and forceful means of expression, especially for epic and lyric poetry.
　　See Th. H. Robinson, The Genius of Hebrew Grammar (1928) ; H. Bauer and P. Leander, Hebräische Grammatik (1933). See alphabetic writing.
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　s.l.t.

Hebrew temples: See temples, Hebrew.

Hebrew theology and religion: See Israel, religion and theology; Judaism.

Hebrews, Epistle to: This writing has come down without any note of authorship, and has been variously assigned to Paul, Barnabas, Luke, Apollos, Aquila and Priscilla. Its title, likewise, is due to later guesswork, and in view of its classical style, its philosophical assumptions, its disregard of Jewish legalism, it cannot have been intended for some reactionary group of Hebrew Christians. A number of indications, and particularly the closing salutation "Those of Italy salute you", suggest that it was written for the Roman church by one of its teachers who for the time being was in a foreign city. It is not properly a letter but an eloquent discourse, to which a few personal greetings are appended. Its purpose is to demonstrate to a group of Christians, now growing indifferent, that Christianity is the final and perfect religion. Christ is the "great High-Priest", who has brought to reality all that was merely foreshadowed in previous forms of worship. While he works with the apocalyptic conception of a temple in heaven the writer thinks, like Plato and Philo, of an ideal world, over against the visible one, which is apprehended by faith. Although it lacks the purely religious insight of Paul and John, Hebrews is one of the noblest and most impressive of the N.T. books. The date of Hebrews is about 85 A.D.

　　A. B. Davidson, The Epistle to the Hebrews (1882) ; J. Moffatt, The Epistle to the Hebrews (ICC, 1924) ; E. F. Scott, The Literature of the New Testament (1932).　　　　　　　　　e.f.s.

Hebron: Ancient city of Southern Palestine, 19 miles South of Jerusalem, formerly called Kiriath-Arba (Jud. i, 10-15); first capital of David (II Sam. ii, 4, etc.). See F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, vol. ii (1938), pp. 345-347.
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　s.l.t.

Hecker, Isaac Thomas: See Americanism; Paulists, the.

hedonism: (Gr., hedone, pleasure) General name for psychological and ethical theories making pleasure the aim of conduct. Psychological hedonism maintains that every person in fact always does act from a desire for pleasure. Ethical hedonism may be egoistic or universalistic: if egoistic, it affirms that every person ought always to act in the way that will bring most pleasure to himself in the long run; even on this view Hobbes* believed that the Golden Rule is valid. Universalistic ethical hedonism is another name for Utilitarianism*. See Cyrenaics; eudaemonism; happiness; s. v. Kant.　　w.k.w.

Hefele, Karl Joseph von: (1809-93) Historian, Bishop of Rottenburg, b. Unterkocen, Württemberg; d. Rottenburg. Following Möhler he taught church history at Tübingen (1836-69), introduced a course on Christian archaeology and opposed Illuminism. At the decisive session of the Vatican Council regarding papal infallibility Hefele voted "non placet"* but acquiesced when the dogma was defined. His standard work is a history of the Councils in seven volumes.
　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　　b.r.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich: (1770-1831) An absolute idealist, most influential German philosopher of the first quarter of the nineteenth century, originator of "philosophy of religion" under that name. He was born in 1770 in Stuttgart, Swabia. He studied at the University of Tübingen (1788-1793), where Hölderlin and Schelling were his friends. He taught, philosophy in Jena (1801), where he collaborated with Schelling, and wrote his first masterpiece, Die Phänomenologie des Geistes (1807). After some experience as newspaper editor (Bamberg, 1807-1808) and as director of a gymnasium (Nurnberg, 1808-1816), he returned to a university professorship, at Heidelberg (1816-1818). Meanwhile he had written his Wissenschaft der Logik (1812, 1816) and his system in outline, the Encyclopädie der philosophischen Wissenchaften (1817). In 1818 he accepted a call to the chair of philosophy in Berlin, where he became virtual "dictator" of German philosophy, growing somewhat more conservative in the process. His popularity was irksome to his rival, Schopenhauer*, whose pessimism contrasted with Hegel's idealistic optimism. In 1821 he published his Grundlinien der Rechts-Philosophie, and, from 1827 on, contributed to the Jahrbücher für wissenschaftliche Kritik. In 1830 he served as Rector of the University, and died the following year.

After his death, his works and lectures were published by a group of his students, "friends of the immortalized one." Among the most influential of his writings are the lectures thus published posthumously on the basis of students' notes. These are: Vorlesungen über die Geschichte der Philosophie; Vorlesungen über die Philosophie der Religion, Vorlesungen über die Philosophie der Weltgeschichte, and Vorlesungen uber die Aesthetik. All are available in English translations.

See Hegelianism.

See R. Haym, Hegel und seine Zeit (1857) ; E. Caird, Hegel (1883) ; and T. L. Haring*, Hegel, sein Wollen und sein Werk (2 vols , 1929, 1938). Hegel's works are in process of republication in a critical edition by Lasson and Hoffmeister (pub. in Phil. Bib. by Meiner) ; Glockner has reprinted the old text complete in the Jubiläumsausgabe (1928-1939), to which he adds Hegel (2 vols) and an invaluable Hegel-Lexikon (4 vols).   E.S.B.

Hegelianism: The philosophy of Hegel* and his school; absolute idealism*, with special emphasis on interpretation of history, society, the state, art, and religion.

I. The principles of Hegelianism.

1) "The true is the whole," that is, for an adequate understanding of any particular experience a grasp of its relations to experience as a whole is needed. Hence the emphasis on history, development, and correlation of sense data with value experience.

2) Experience is the source of all knowledge. Logic, natural science, art, religion, and philosophy are various levels of interpretation of experience (the Phänomenologie des Geistes is the basis and pre-supposition of all Hegel's thought). Haering calls Hegel "the empiricist of consciousness."

3) "The actual is the rational;" that is, the surface appearances of consciousness require re-formulation by coherent thought. Not the uncriticized surface, but rationally critical thought about experience, yields an adequate account of actuality. Hence Hegel opposes Schleiermacher's emphasis on feeling. (See reason in religion).

4) The method of philosophy is dialectic*, which originally meant the process of question and answer in truth-seeking (Zeno of Elea, Socrates, Plato). Hegel assumed that all thought is a description of the real (the Absolute*). He took dialectic to mean the movement of thought which drives it on from any point of view which it assumes (thesis) to an opposed point of view (antithesis), so that the relation between the two generates a new insight or aspect of reality (synthesis). Thus, logic starts with the most necessary and abstract category, being (thesis); but to assert pure being drives one to admit that one has really said nothing (antithesis); yet the change from being to nothing is a becoming (synthesis). Logic as a whole deals with Being (Sein, immediate experience, potentiality), Essence (Wesen, external relations, actuality), and Notion (Begriff, internal relations, the movement from potentiality to completed actuality). Philosophy as a whole, starting from the Phänomenologie, becomes a dialectical movement from Logic ("the system of pure reason," "the representation of God as he is in his eternal essence before the creation of nature or any finite spirit"), to Philosophy of Nature (the "other" which experience reveals to thought—"a living whole," of dialectical stages, the mechanical, the physical, and the organic); but the relations of Logic and Nature compel dialectical thought to find its synthesis in Philosophy of Mind ("the concretest, highest, most difficult knowledge," its stages are subjective or individual, objective or social, and absolute, in the Absolute, the highest truth is grasped through art, religion, and philosophy). Technically, dialectic is the opposition of thesis and antithesis; movement to the synthesis is "speculation" (Encyclopädie, secs. 79-82).

5) The principle of negativity is the source of dialectical movement. Negativity means that we can understand any A, not by declaring (with Aristotle) that A is not non-A, but by examining the relations between A and non-A. The mind is "a system of movements" (Phänomenologie, Lasson, 239), negativity is the principle that one must interpret what is present by reference to what is absent, or omitted, or overlooked, or not yet developed. "Each one of us is what some other moment of his life reflectively finds him to be" (Royce), reference to the life of God as "the play of love with itself" is trivial if "the seriousness, the pain, the patience and labor of the negative are lacking" (Phänomenologie, 20). No finite being or stage of dialectic can fully overcome negativity; only the whole can be adequate truth.

6) The Absolute Idea or Absolute Spirit is the all-inclusive and completely coherent eternal consciousness of which every stage of dialectic is a partial description. Hegel rejects Spinoza's pantheism, on the ground that his Substance is not Subject (personality). Hegel's Absolute, which he discusses far less than his followers and his critics, is not "the night in which all cows are black" (Hegel's description of Schelling's Absolute) nor a "block universe" (W. James's view of Hegel's Absolute), but "the eternal and fully realized Idea, which is eternally active, and eternally produces and enjoys itself as Absolute Spirit" (Encyclopädie, sec. 577).

7) Hegel's philosophy is evolutionary; not in the Darwinian, but in the cosmic and metaphysical sense. The universe is a constant movement, in which the syntheses suggest "creative evolution." No stage of evolution is final. Philosophy can only interpret the stages that have been traversed, but cannot predict the future.

8) Hegel's philosophy of religion (the first systematic account under that name), like his pure philosophy, has for its content "God and God alone as the truth." Religion is man's experience of relation to the Infinite "in feeling, intuition, and divination, in pictures, and in devotion," rather than in the intellectually adequate form of philosophical truth. "Religion is the Divine Spirit's self-knowledge, by mediation of the finite spirit." In it "all riddles of the world are solved," in an experience of freedom and blessedness. The history of religions is the evolution of spirit in its dialectical apprehension of the divine, from nature religions, through religions of spiritual individuality, to the Absolute Religion, 'which is Christianity, with its dialectic of Father (thesis), Son (antithesis), and Spirit (synthesis). See Trinity.

II. Hegelian Schools.

Hegelianism in Germany illustrated the dialectic by dividing into a right wing (orthodox, supernaturalistic, represented by Gabler, Hinrichs, and Goschel, whom Hegel once endorsed), a left wing (radical, heterodox, tending toward more or less impersonal pantheism, as D. F. Strauss—Leben Jesu, 1835—and Bruno Bauer, of the Tübingen School* of N.T. criticism, or toward materialism, as L. Feuerbach and Karl Marx, founder* of modern socialism), and a center (avoiding both extremes and developing Hegel's own thought, as Hegel's biographer, Rosenkranz, the historian of philosophy, Erdmann, the Old Testament critic, Vatke, and the group who edited Hegel's works). Hegel exerted a wide influence in Great Britain (Stirling, T. H. Green, E. and J. Caird, Bradley, Bosanquet) and America (the St. Louis School, Royce, Creighton, Calkins). Anglo-American Hegelianism was predominantly personalistic absolutism (Green, the Cairds, A. E. Taylor, Royce, Calkins); but Bradley inclined to a superpersonal Absolute and Bosanquet (and Creighton) to a more impersonal view.

III. Hegel's Influence.

No philosopher has influenced nineteenth and twentieth century thought more extensively than Hegel. 1) He changed history of philosophy from a chronicle of individual opinions to a living, logical development, each stage of which is necessary to the truth; Erdmann and Windelband in Germany and Croce in Italy have carried on this insight. 2) Hegel was the first to grasp world history as an organic evolution of all nations. 3) His lectures on the fine arts have enabled aestheticians to understand better the contributions of each stage in the history of art, as well as the inter-relations of the arts 4) His emphasis on rational development guided W. T. Harris as United States Commissioner of Education (1889-1906), as well as inspiring John Dewey in his democratic revolt against Harris's methods, and Gentile in his organization of education in Fascist Italy. 5) In social philosophy, Hegel's influence has been both conservative (his historical emphasis) and revolutionary (the advance of dialectic). His philosophy of right rests on an organic theory of the state, and as such has influenced both Fascist and National Socialist theories, as well as Communism (through both Marx and Lenin). 6) His theory of the state led to a glorification of war as a noble sacrifice of the individual for the social whole. 7) His interest in economic institutions contributed to Marxist socialism. 8) Hegel's philosophy of religion, with its recognition of the value of every stage of development in all religions, prepared the way for modern Biblical criticism (F. C Baur was influenced by Hegel in founding the Tubingen School), history of religions, comparative religions, and anthropology. He was one of the chief founders of "modernism" and liberalism in Christian thought, although entirely opposed to anti-metaphysical humanism. He sounded the evolutionary keynote of modern times. Hegel has been called "ein alles Umfassender," in contrast to Kant, who is "ein alles Zermalmender." See metaphysics, neo-Hegelianism.

See, besides the standard histories of philosophy: A Seth, Hegelianism and Personality (1887); B. Croce, What is Living and What is Dead of the Philosophy of Hegel (Ital , 1907, Eng , 1915), McTaggart, Studies in Hegelian Cosmology (1918), 2nd ed , Reyburn, The Ethical Theory of Hegel (1521); W. T. Stace, The Philosophy of Hegel (1924); N. Hartmann, Die Philosophie des deutschen Idealismus: Hegel (1929) , Moog, Hegel und die hegelsche Schule (1930); W. Schultz, Die Grundprinzipien der Religionsphilosophie Hegels und der Theologie Schleiermachers (1937); Marcuse, Reason and Revolution (1941).   E.S.B.

Hegesippus: The author of a book entitled Memoirs which was written about 180 A.D., and was probably the earliest Christian history after the Acts of the Apostles. This work is now lost, but fragments of it are preserved by Eusebius, and contain some of the most valuable notices we now possess concerning men and events in the early church.

E J. Goodspeed, Early Christian Literature (1942).   E.F.S.

hegira: (Arabic, hijrah, flight) The flight of Mohammed from Mecca*ᵛ to Medina* in A.D. 622. After his death the Moslem calendar was dated from this event July 6, 622 A.D , and history is dated A.H. (year of hegira).   P.E.J.

Heidegger, Martin (1889-) Professor of philosophy at Freiburg since 1928, Heidegger has become well known for his fresh attack on traditional problems. Influenced by Aristotle, the scholastics, Kant, Kierkegaard, and Husserl's phenomenological* method he has tried to meet the problems of ontology through an analysis of man's moral and emotional situation. The Greeks, he believes, were right in their sense for the philosophical importance of ontology, wrong in their stress on the perceptible object and the spoken proposition with its copula "is". Subject and predicate exist only in the larger subject-object situation where the object reveals itself directly and in its relations of "withness" (Seinbei). Confronting his world, man finds ties binding him to objects, companions, life, also to his essential possibilities, to matters of concern (Sorge) and to death. To understand these one should understand Time. See Jaspers, Karl.

Chief Works: Sein und Zeit (1927), Kant und das Problem der Metaphysik; Vom Wesen des Grundes (1929). J.S.B.

Heidelberg Catechism: A Reformed (Calvinistic) Catechism* drawn up by two Heidelberg professors, Ursinus* and Olevianus, in 1562 A.D., at the instance of the Elector of the Palatinate, Frederick III, "The Pious" (1559-1576). It was intended for use in the schools, as part of the effort being successfully made by the Elector to swing his territories from Lutheranism to the Reformed faith and practice. It is irenic in spirit, except in its references to the Catholic mass*; and has been widely accepted by the Reformed churches* within and outside of Germany. See In Commemoration of the Three Hundredth Anniversary of the Heidelberg Catechism, published by the German Reformed Church in the U. S. of North America (1863). A.K.R.

Heilsgeschichte: (history of salvation) A Protestant interpretation of history that in the 18th century superseded both the Augustinian and early Protestant views. The purpose of history is believed to be the formation of God's chosen people in a process of gradual growth, the Holy Spirit being the agent of this development. Progressive revelation of the saving truth is one aspect of his work. Jesus Christ is the center of the whole process; the establishment of his Kingdom through a fight with the powers of evil is his aim. J. A. Bengel* created this view. He modified the mechanical dispensationalism* of Coccejus and Vitringa by applying to history the idea of organic growth and forestalled naturalistic misinterpretations of this view by confining the specific agency of the Holy Spirit to the chosen people. This view lived on in North German Pietism (Collenbusch, Hasenkamp, Gottfried Menken), in 'Swabian Pietism' (Oetinger, J. T. Beck, Carl Aug. Auberlen) and in the School of Erlangen (Joh. Chr. K. von Hofmann*). It is widely accepted by Continental theologians.

Gustav Weth, Die Heilsgeschichte. Ihr universeller und individueller Sinn in der offenbarungsgeschichtlichen Theologie des 19. Jahrh. (München, 1931); Albrecht Ritschl, Geschichte des Pietismus. v. III (Bonn, 1886); Gottlob Schrenk, Gottesreich und Bund im älteren Protestantismus, vornehmlich bei Johannes Coccejus. Zugleich ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Pietismus und der heilsgeschichtlichen Theologie (Gutersloh, 1923); Gustav Kruger's Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, v. IV: Die Neuzeit, by H. Stephan and H. Leube (2nd ed. Tühingen, 1931); Otto A. Piper, God in History (1939). See also the articles on the above mentioned theologians in Schaff-Herzog's Encyclopaedia. O.A.P.

Heim, Karl: (1874-   ) He first taught in Münster, then in Tübingen. Rooted in Swabian pietism, he combines an uncompromising faith in Christ with a bold world and life-embracing, epistemologically oriented, reflection. He shares the new Protestant orthodoxy with Barth, Brunner and Aulén. He revives the old idea of Satan. He is an evangelistically minded philosopher. He defends a realistic eschatology against the Platonizing eschatology of Barth's earlier writings. His theocentric theology emphasizes afresh divine transcendence, and demands a new understanding of all fundamental philosophical assumptions. He is in intimate touch with the various contemporary philosophical currents. He keenly experiences the distress resulting from a sceptically developed criticism and relativism. He not only seeks the destruction of the current world views dominating the age, but he also gives faith a more vital concreteness. His theology is an impressive attempt to make the power of intensive faith also externally fertile.

Das Weltbild der Zukunft (Berlin, 1904); Das Gewissheitsproblem in der systematischen Theologie bis zu Schleiermacher (Leipzig, 1911); Leitfaden der Dogmatik (Halle, 1912, 3 ed, Leipzig, 1923); Glaubensgewissheit (Leipzig, 1916, 3 ed, Leipzig, 1923); Die Weltanschauung der Bibel (Leipzig, 1920, 5 ed., Leipzig, 1928); Das Wesen des evangelischen Christentums (Leipzig, 1925, 4 ed, Leipzig, 1929); The New Divine Order (London, 1930); The Church of Christ and the Problems of the Day (1935); God Transcendent (1935); Der evangelische Glaube und das Denken der Gegenwart vol. I: Glaube und Denken (Berlin, 1931, 4 ed., Berlin, 1938); vol. II· Die Herrschaft des Christus, (3 ed., Berlin, 1937); vol. III. Jesus der Weltvollender (Berlin, 1937). H.H.

Heimdallr, Heimdall: (Teut.) Norse-Icelandic watchman-god. In the saga he is stationed by the gods at the foot of the rainbow bridge linking heaven and earth, over which gods pass to descend to judge people in the underworld; stationed at the foot of the bridge, with his dog, Garm, he prevents any of the earth-born giants (gods) from scaling the heights of heaven and entering Asgard*, the home of the gods. He sees as well by night as by day, and can hear the wool growing on the backs of sheep, his great strength is derived from the earth and the sea. F.L.P.

Heinrici, Karl Friedrich Georg: (1844-1915) He was professor in Marburg and Leipzig. Critical of naturalistic evolutionism and radical relativism, he was greatly interested in the Hellenistic influences in primitive Christianity.

Die Sendschreiben des Apostels Paulus an die Korinther, 2 vols. (Berlin, 1880-87); D. A. Twesten nach Tagebüchern und Briefen (Marburg, 1889); Theologische Enzyklopädie (Freiburg, 1893); Beiträge zur Geschichte und Erklärung des Neuen Testamentes, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1894-1908); Die Bergpredigt (Leipzig, 1905); Der literarische Charakter der neutestamentlichen Schriften (Leipzig, 1906); Hellenismus und Christentum (Berlin, 1910); Die Hermesmystik und das Neue Testament (Leipzig, 1918). H.H.

hell: See heaven and hell; Gehenna; sheol.

Hellenism: A term used to describe ancient Greek culture. After the time of Alexander the Great the Greek speech and manner of thinking pervaded the lands around the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea and thus there arose a cultural development termed Hellenistic in contrast with the original Hellenic civilization of Greece itself. In English the noun "Hellenism" may refer to either of these phases of Greek culture, but it is the Hellenistic rather than the Hellenic that is of greatest significance for Judasim in the Dispersion and for early Christianity on gentile soil. See Judaism, Hellenistic.   s.j c.

Helvetic Confessions: The name of two documents which set forth the common faith of the Swiss Protestant Churches. The first (1536) proved both too short and too Lutheran in tone for it to be very popular, and it was displaced by a document written by Bullinger* (1562 & 1564) for his own use. This was adopted throughout Switzerland, and also in Scotland, Hungary, France, and Poland. It is one of the most widely recognized confessions of the Reformed Church*.   G.R.C.

Hengstenberg, Ernst Wilhelm: (1802-1869) German Lutheran theologian, professor in Berlin for four decades, founder and editor of an influential journal, Evangelische Kirchenzeitung. He published numerous commentaries on the Bible and a three-volume Christology of the Old Testament (1829-1835). Hengstenberg was one of the principal leaders of orthodox Lutheranism in its struggle against rationalism. See neo-Lutheranism.   T.A.K.

Henke, Heinrich Philipp Konrad: (1752-1809) He was director of the theological seminary in Helmstedt. He was a convinced adherent of rationalism. As a deist he did not differentiate between the history of the church and the history of dogma. He hoped to emancipate the Christian doctrine from the superstitions of christlatry, bibliolatry and onomatolatry. Not only did he not realize the scope of his method, but he also failed to see the possibilities of a profounder idea of revelation.
Lineamenta institutionum fidei Christianae historico-criticarum (Helmstedt, 1793); Allgemeine Geschichte der christlichen Kirche, 6 vols., (4 ed., Braunschweig, 1799-1804).   H.H.

henotheism: Intermediate stage between polytheism and monotheism; worship of one god by an individual, clan, or nation to the exclusion of others; term applies when worshiper has achieved this measure of unity but is not sufficiently philosophically advanced to deny the existence of other gods; stage of Israelite belief in God from Moses to the exile. See Amos; exile; monotheism.   R.E.W.

henoticon: (Gr., union) A law promulgated by the Emperor Zeno in 482 in an unsuccessful effort to conciliate Monophysites* and Catholics. Based on the formula of Nicaea rather than Chalcedon.   S.M.G.

Henry IV: (1553-1610) King of France. Wide experience of the internal wars of France convinced him of the need of religious accommodation and a strong centralized power. His conversion to Catholicism (in conjunction with the Edict of Nantes*) provided the one; his firm administration the other. See Wars of religion.   G.R.C.

Henry IV of Germany: See Gregory VII, St., Pope.

Henry VIII: (1491-1547) King of England. His personal affairs became intimately involved in political and religious matters, but his divorce was the pretext, not the cause of the Reformation in England. He abolished the papal jurisdiction in England, and reduced clerical privilege and property. He proclaimed the royal supremacy even in the church, but in his break with Rome he found a basis of strong national support. He was an able if often unscrupulous ruler, with great practical gifts and unusual political perception. See Defender of the Faith, Six Articles, Supremacy, Acts of; Ten Articles.   G.R.C.

Henry of Ghent: (?-1293) Scholastic philosopher and theologian. He ranks a close second to his eminent contemporaries, Sts. Thomas and Bonaventure, and Duns Scotus. His greatest works are the Quodlibeta, and his incomplete Summa Theologica.   W.H.

Henry of Langenstein: (c. 1340-1397) Professor at the University of Paris, Rector of the University of Vienna, theologian, whose Epistola Concilii Pacis (1381) was an influential document calling for conciliar reform and union of the church. See conciliarism.   F.W.N.

Henry of Lausanne: (d. c. 1145) Fiery itinerant preacher and ascetic, he was influential especially in Provence, probably in company with Peter de Bruys*. Calumniated by such men as Peter the Venerable and Bernard of Clairvaux*, he died soon after one of his numerous arrests by ecclesiastical authorities for alleged attacks on the faith of the church.   R.C.P.

heortology: (Gr., heorté, feast) The study of sacred calendars, especially the church year*.   E.R.H.

hepatoscopy: "Liver observance." A form of divination practiced among Babylonians, Hittites, Etruscans, and others; the divination* is based upon the primitive assumption that the seat of life is in the liver, and that the structure of the world and the fortune of the individual may be traced on the liver of a sheep. The priest-diviner puts questions to a god, then sacrifices the sheep, and secures answers through the examination of the markings on the liver and interpreting what he finds as favorable or unfavorable in terms of power to the individual involved in the questions.   F.L.P.

Hepzibah Faith Missionary Association: A holiness sect having 20 churches and about 700 members, nearly all in the west north central states. It was organized at Glenwood, Iowa, in 1892 by uniting some scattered independent churches It has no distinctive tenets or practices but follows the general pattern of sects which seek holiness or sanctification through emotional reactions. See Evangelistic Associations, holiness churches.   E.T.C.

Hera: (Gr., Hérā) Queen of the gods, sister and wife of Zeus*, with whom she was worshiped on the mountain tops. Mother of Ares, she was honored with games of war; women paid tribute to her as goddess of marriage. Her temples at Olympia, Argos, and Samos are renowned.   E.M.N.

Heraclitus: (fl. 504-501 B.C.) Called "the obscure," a Greek philosopher living in Ephesus. One of the most brilliant of the pre-Socratics. Held that all things change; nothing is permanent except the law (logos) of change. The world process of many cycles is compared to fire. "All things flow; we cannot step twice into the same river." "War is the father of all." Logos doctrines of N.T. and Stoics* were influenced by him. Hegel admired him. See dialectic.
See Diels, Fragmente der Vorsokratiker; Burnet, Early Greek Philosophy.   E.S.B.

herbaries: (herbals) Books on the medicinal and magical virtues of plants. The early medieval Herbarium attributed to Apuleius had a wide vogue. O. Cocayne, Leechdoms, Wortcunning and Starcraft of Early England (1864), Vol. I.   J.T.M.

Herbart, Johann Friedrich: (1776-1841) Professor at Königsberg and Göttingen and exponent of an analytic metaphysical realism. His theory that the aim of education is the development of good will, tested in his pedagogical seminary and model school in Königsberg, exerted considerable influence on American education. He wrote little on the philosophy of religion but believed in God and regarded religion as a practical support for moral education. His view of God was deistic, resting on a teleological and aesthetic view of nature. Several of his disciples attempted to construct a philosophy of religion on Herbartian principles, notably M. W. Drobisch, A. Schwarze, L. Strümpell, and G. F. Taute.
See his Werke (ed. Hartenstein, 1850-52) and especially his Aphorismen zur Metaphysik und Religionslehre (Werke, IV, 591-622).   J.E.N.

Herbartianism: See Herbart, J. F.; psychology, schools of. See also O. Pfleiderer, Philosophy of Religion (1887, tr. by Menzies) Vol. II, pp. 214-228.   J.E.N.

Herbert, George: (1593-1633) English clergyman and poet, remembered chiefly for a collection of devotional verse, The Temple (1633). Notable also is his brief prose volume of pastoral instruction, A Priest to the Temple (1652), which, like the poems, reveals a sober but gracious piety and a staunch adherence to Anglican tradition.   L.W.C.

Herbert of Cherbury, Lord: See deism, Enlightenment, the.

Hercules: (Lat., Herculēs, from Gr., Herakles) The Roman counterpart of the Greek Heracles, who early in his wanderings came to Rome. As god of victory and traders, he had an ancient altar in the Forum Boarium (Cattle Market). The lion-skin and club were his symbols, his tree the poplar.   E.M.N.

heredity: a) Refers in biology to the transmission of characteristics to offspring in accordance with the constitution of the germ plasm of parents. In man both physical and mental traits are so transmitted. The former would include race, color, sex, height, longevity, color and texture of hair, color of eyes, some diseases, physical type, in short, all the basic traits of the physical constitution Mental characteristics as determined by heredity include mental ability, aptitudes, temperament, certain sensory characteristics, proneness to some mental disorders, and other tendencies or qualities of mind From all this we may say that each individual is born with an original nature which is determined by that of his immediate and more remote progenitors. However, it is necessary to add that whatever one's original nature it is affected or modified in important ways by life experience in the environment under which it develops. See original nature.
b) The term has also sociological significance that antedates our modern knowledge of biology. That is, one comes into the world not only with a biological inheritance, as. discussed, but also with a social heredity that consists of elements, such as language, social position, traditions, laws, customs, folkways, economic techniques, diet, social organization, and so on for all the superorganic aspects of the life of man. All these are in the nature of a group possession, the vehicle for the transmission of which is communication, chiefly language. Human behavior is a resultant of the interaction between one's physical and social heredity. See culture, environment.
H. S Jennings, The Biological Basis of Human Nature (1930).   A.E.W.

heresimach: (Gr., haeresis, heresy machesthae to fight with or against) An active opponent and critic of heresy and heretics, a heresy hunter. See also heresiologist.   M.S.E.

heresiologist: (Gr, haeresis heresy logy) Literally, a student or chronicler of heresies (heresiographer), but commonly employed of one who wrote against them (cf. heresimach). Among the leading heresiologists of early Christianity may be mentioned Irenæus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Dionysius of Alexandria, and Epiphanius.   M.S.E.

heresy: A term signifying any doctrine or belief which, though held by a professed adherent, is in opposition to the recognized and generally accepted standards of truth which are authoritatively defined and enforced by the established institution, party, or system concerned.

According to the R.C. point of view, it is a heresy for anyone professing the Christian faith to reject deliberately and pertinaciously by formal denial or by doubt the dogma established by the authority of the Catholic Church. In addition to the formal heresy of the deliberate rejection of the Church's teaching, the R.C. Church distinguishes material heresy, that is error which though heretical is the result of ignorance and not of deliberate choice.

The term heresy should be distinguished from *schism, which signifies a separation from the unity of the Church, and from *apostasy which signifies the abandonment of the faith.

Protestantism, generally speaking, recognizes the Holy Scriptures as the standard of truth authoritative for faith and practice. The term heresy is applied by a Protestant Body to any doctrine or belief professing to be Christian which is declared to be at variance with the teachings of the Holy Scriptures as interpreted by that Church Body, whether set forth in established creeds or in less formal theological standardizations. See sect.   H.W.J.

heresy, Roman Catholic view: According to Roman Catholic terminology, heresy consists in denying any dogma, that is, any truth clearly revealed in Sacred Scripture or Tradition. A truth of this kind need not necessary be explicitly defined by the Church. It suffices that the truth be evident from Revelation. To be a true heretic, one must be baptized, his error must be voluntary; and his denial must be characterized by obstinacy. Cf. auto-da-fé.   W.H.

Hermann, Rudolf: (1887-) He is professor of systematic theology at the Ernst Moritz Arndt University in Greifswald, and occasionally acts as its Director. Although soteriology received from many sides new impulsions, he revived older soteriological acquisitions. He manifests strong religious-philosophical interests and has done considerable research on Luther. He associated himself with the group Theologia militans that has shown for some time noticeable resistance to Nazi ideology.

Christentum und Geschichte bei Wilhelm Herrmann. Mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der erkenntnistheoretischen Seite des Problems (Lucka, 1913); Der Begriff der religiös-sittlichen Anlage in der Apologetik Kählers (Gütersloh, 1917); Zur Frage des religionspsychologischen Experiments; erweitert aus Anlass der Religionspsychologie Girgensohns (Gütersloh, 1922); Luthers These "Gerecht und Sünder zugleich" eine systematische Untersuchung (Gütersloh, 1930); Luthers Theologische Grundanliegen (Greifswald, 1933); Die Bedeutung der Kirche bei Schleiermacher (Greifswald, 1934); Theologische Anliegen zur Kirchenfrage (Greifswald, 1937); Deutung und Umdeutung der Schrift (Leipzig, 1937).
                                                      H.H.

Hermas, Shepherd of: The longest of the writings which are included in the collection of the Apostolic Fathers*. According to an ancient testimony it was written about 140 A.D., but it is probably of still earlier date. The author is Hermas, a Roman Christian who describes in three sections (Visions, Mandates, Similitudes) the message brought to him by Christ under the guise of a Shepherd. The principal object of the work, which is of no great literary or religious value, is to ensure a second repentance for sins committed after baptism.

J. B Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers (1890); E J Goodspeed, Early Christian Literature (1942).
                                                      E.F.S.

hermeneutics: The science of the laws and principles of interpretation and explanation. In theology it is applied to the study of the general principles whereby the meaning of the Scriptures is to be ascertained. It precedes exegesis* which is the actual interpretation of particular passages. It requires a knowledge of the original languages of the Bible and includes discussion of the qualifications of an interpreter and the methods and history of interpretation.   A.K.R.

Hermes: (possibly from Greek herma, a cairn or stone-pile, or upright stone from which the later Herm figure was derived)

